CHARKE, Charlotte, youngest daughter of Colley Cibber, was educated in a manner more fitting the character of a boy than a girl. She early married Richard Charke, a violin performer, whose debaucheries soon produced a separation, and threw a thoughtless imprudent wife into the vortex of dissipation and poverty. The stage for a while supported Mrs. Charke, and from the humble part of Mademoiselle in the Provoked Wife, she rose to the capital characters of Alicia in Jane Shore, and Andromache in the Distressed Mother. Unfortunately however her temper proved the source of many calamities, she quarrelled with Fleetwood the manager, and though forgiven and reconciled, she again transgressed, and at last had recourse for subsistence to the scanty pittance of a heroine in a strolling company. In 1755 she published a narrative of her own life, but perhaps with no success sufficient to administer to her indigence. She died four years after in great distress.

CHARLEMAGNE, or CHARLES the Great, and first king of France and first emperor of the West, was son of Pepin and Bertrade. He succeeded, on the death of his father, to some German provinces, and after the decease of his brother Carloman, 741, he was acknowledged king of France. The military abilities which he possessed were soon displayed in his war against the Saxons, whom he defeated; and after he had rendered himself by repeated victories master of Germany and of Italy, and dreaded in Spain by his conquests near Barcelona, he went to Rome, and in the year 800 renewed in his person the empire of the Cæsars, and was crowned by Leo III. emperor of the West. This new and extensive power was acknowledged by neighbouring princes, and Charles displayed his pride and magnificence in his pompous reception of the ambassadors of Nicephorus emperor of the East. Great in war, he became equally illustrious in peace, he protected and encouraged the arts, and made his palace the asylum of learned men. Besides monasteries he erected academies and schools at Paris and in various parts of his dominions, and directed the powers of his genius to the establishment of salutary laws, and to the promotion of commerce and industry among his subjects. This illustrious prince died 814, aged 71, after reigning 47 years over France, and 14 over the Empire, and he was buried in the cathedral of Aix-la-Chapelle. He appointed his only surviving son Lewis emperor and king, and bestowed the crown of Italy on Bernard, the illegitimate son of his son Pepin.

CHARLES II. surnamed the bald, son of Lewis the Debonnaire, succeeded to the French crown 840. He was elected emperor by the pope and the Roman people in 875, and he distinguished his reign by the victory which he obtained over his brother Lothaire, at Fontenay in Burgundy. Prudence however did not mark his conduct, and he found at last his enemies too powerful, and whilst he fled into Italy, he was poisoned at Briord, 6th October, 877, by one of his servants. The feudal government may be said to have begun under his weak reign.

CHARLES III. or simple, was born 879, and succeeded to the throne of France 893. His abilities were unequal to the arduous labour of governing a kingdom already distracted by the rebellious spirit of the nobles, and by the invasions of the Normans, and instead of mounting the imperial throne, which a little art might have secured, he was obliged to resign some of his provinces to his victorious enemies. The haughty conduct of his minister Haganon, a man of obscure birth, but of intriguing abilities, at last totally alienated the hearts of his subjects, and soon an army, headed by Robert of the blood royal, appeared in the field. Charles, notwithstanding the feebleness of his conduct, obtained the victory and killed his rival; but another battle fought by Hugh the great, son of the fallen prince, proved fatal to the fortunes of Charles. He escaped to the palace of the count of Vermandois, where he died after seven years of cruel confinement in the castle of Peronne, 7th October, 929, aged 50.

CHARLES IV. the fair, was third son of Philip the fair, and succeeded to the French throne on the death of his brother Philip the tall, 1322. His reign was disturbed by quarrels with England, and peace was at last re-established by the intercession of Isabella, who had married the English monarch, and by the cession of Guienne. He died 31st January, 1328, aged 34, after a weak and inglorious reign.

CHARLES V. or wise, was son of John, and succeeded to the throne of France 1364. By his abilities and courage, and the successes of his famous general du Guesclin, he repaired the losses which the monarchy had suffered under the feeble administration of his father, and the English were gradually dispossessed of the provinces which they had before conquered in France. After a short reign of 16 years, Charles, who had made the happiness of his people, and the improvements of commerce and naval affairs, the particular object of his cares, died 16th September, 1380, aged 43. He founded the library of Paris, and was the first who bore the title of dauphin.

CHARLES VI. or well-beloved, was son of Charles V. whom he succeeded in 1380, at the age of 12. His inexperience, and the ambitious views of his three uncles the dukes of Anjou, Berri, and Britany, unfortunately tended to disturb and weaken the kingdom, when unanimity and vigour were so necessary to withstand the attacks of the victorious English. An unhappy delirium with which the monarch was seized, followed by mental imbecility, completed the ruin of the nation, while the civil war on one side depopulated the country, and the successes of the English, and the glorious victory of Agincourt, on the other, left the unfortunate Charles little beside the empty title of king. Henry V. of England was crowned at Paris, and ruled the kingdom at his pleasure; but his death, in 1422, and that of Charles soon after, on the 20th October of the same year, produced a change in affairs, and restored to France the benefit of her own native sovereigns.

CHARLES VII. surnamed the victorious, succeeded his father Charles VI. and was crowned at Poitiers 1422. He possessed great vigour and activity, and though at first a king more in name than in power, he bravely resisted the inroads of his victorious enemies, and though conquered, he still sought for more certain opportunities of annoying his invaders. Misfortunes however proved too great for his resources. Orleans, the last important place of his dominions, was already besieged and ready to fall into the hands of the English, and Charles in despair prepared to retire to Provence, when Joan of Arc, was presented to him as the future deliverer of his country. Superstition thus was enabled to finish what valour could not do, and Joan, as the pretended missionary of Heaven, quickly drove the English before her, retook all the conquered provinces, and saw her monarch crowned under her victorious standard in the cathedral of Rheims. Thus wonderfully restored to his dominions and supported by the valour of his generals, of Dunois, Sacraitrailles, Arthus, and Culant, Charles too often forgot his duties in the arms of his mistress, and suffered his people to be plundered by worthless favourites. He died 22d July, 1461, aged 58.

CHARLES VIII. called the affable, was son of Lewis XI. and ascended the throne 1483. He married Anne of Britany, but while in this union he enlarged his dominions, he determined to acquire military glory by the invasion of Italy, and his successes were so rapid that he found himself almost all at once master of Florence, Rome, Capua, and Naples. Proud of his successes, and flattered by the pope, he caused himself to be crowned emperor of Constantinople and king of Naples; but the submissive princes of Italy rose against their invader, and six months after Charles escaped with difficulty into France, and only after the famous battle of Fouroua, in which his army of 8000 men routed a force five times more numerous than his own. Whilst he meditated revenge and formed plans of fresh conquests, he was suddenly carried off by an apoplexy, at Amboise, 7th April, 1498, aged 27.

CHARLES IX. was born 1550, and succeeded to the throne, after the death of his brother Francis II. 1560. His minority was guided by his mother Catherine de Medicis, but as the kingdom was divided by factions, which assumed the names of Papists, Lutherans, and Huguenots, nothing for the happiness of the people or the glory of the throne could be expected. In the midst of these political struggles between the leading men of the times, the Condes, Colignis, and Guises, Charles maintained a conduct full of dissimulation and hypocrisy; and while he pretended friendship and protection to all his subjects, he was cruelly meditating that fatal massacre of St. Bartholomew in 1572, which leaves so indelible a stigma of barbarous cruelty on his name. Though some have considered the bloody deed as the machination of his mother and of her ecclesiastical counsellors, yet Charles deeply participated in the crime, and the encouragement which he gave to a band of murderers in his own palace, leaves him little claim to the forgiveness of outraged humanity. These horrid scenes, it is said, presented themselves in dreadful array to his terrified imagination, and on his death-bed produced the appalling exhibition of a tortured conscience and an avenging Heaven. He died 30th May, 1574, aged 24.

CHARLES, the fat, son of Lewis the German, was elected king of Italy, and emperor 881. Though he had the art of obtaining all the crowns which once adorned the head of Charlemagne, he did not possess sufficient abilities to support their glory, but by the intrigues of his prime minister Luidward, whom he had banished from the court, and by the invasion of Arnold duke of Carinthia, he was driven from his throne. Reduced to privacy, and dependent on the bounty of the victorious Arnold, he at last died of grief near Constance, 13th January, 888.

CHARLES IV. son of John of Luxemburg, and grandson of the emperor Henry VII. ascended the imperial throne 1347. His reign is famous for the golden bull, enacted at the diet of Nuremberg 1356. This celebrated agreement was ushered forth into the world with curious reasons drawn from prejudice and superstition, and while it gave Germany a long admired constitution, it proved the necessity of seven electors.

by the seven gifts of the holy ghost, and the seven branches of the holy candlestick. Charles, who was more fond of the pomp of royalty than the prosperity of his kingdom, yet deserved the respect of the learned by the protection which he extended to literature, and the university which he established at Prague. He died at Prague 29th November, 1378. He was four times married.

CHARLES V. eldest son of Philip, archduke of Austria, and Jane of Castile, was born at Ghent, 25th February, 1500. He was proclaimed king of Spain, 1516, and two years after elected emperor of Germany, on the death of his grandfather Maximilian. His elevation to the imperial throne was disputed by the intrigues and the gold of Francis I. of France, who aspired to the same honours, and a fierce war was consequently kindled between the two powers. Charles, supported by the aid of Henry VIII. of England, by Adrian VI. by the Florentines and Venetians, proved successful in his attacks against the French, who were driven from Italy. Even Marseilles was besieged by the imperial troops under Bourbon, and at the fatal battle of Pavia, 1525, Francis fell into the hands of his enemy. This advantageous conquest did not improve the affairs of Charles; instead of marching into the heart of France, he negotiated with his prisoner, and when afterwards the fate of war placed Rome and the pope in his power, he found that his successes armed the princes of Europe against him, and rendered his power rather suspected than formidable. The peace of Cambrai in 1529, put an end to the dissensions of the continent; but Charles, restless and ambitious of military glory, crossed in 1535 the Mediterranean, to gather laurels on the coast of Africa. He took Goulletta, defeated Barbarossa, and after entering victorious into Tunis, and restoring liberty to 22,000 Christian slaves, he replaced Mulei-Hassen on the throne. Returned to Europe, Charles, in 1536, again turned his arms against Francis; he ravaged Champagne and Picardy, but ill success obliged him soon to seek a reconciliation, and the peace of Nice, in 1538, restored tranquillity between the rival monarchs. After suppressing an insurrection at Ghent, 1539, Charles in 1541 meditated the conquest of Algiers; but the expedition proved unfortunate, and a war with France in 1542 seemed to promise more important conquests to his gigantic ambition. But though leagued with the English, he found himself disappointed; his army was defeated at Cerisoles, and he made peace at Crepy, 1545. His attempts against some of the German states were equally unsuccessful, and whilst he endeavoured to oppose the dissemination of the principles of Luther, he found himself obliged by the power, the intrigues, and the perseverance of Maurice elector of Saxony, and Joachim elector of Brandenburg, to sign the treaty of Passau in 1552, and to accord liberty of conscience to the protestants of Germany. The defeat of his army before Metz, by the duke of Guise, under Henry II. of France, afterwards tended to check his pride; and at last, worn out by infirmities, dissatisfied with the world, and fully sensible of the vanity of all human grandeur, he formed the resolution of resigning his princely honours. He placed the imperial crown on the head of his brother Ferdinand, and appointed his son Philip his successor as king of Spain, 25th October, 1555, and, to the astonishment of the world, retired to the privacy of a monastic life. In the monastery of St. Juste, on the borders of Castile and Portugal, Charles attempted to forget the temptations of sovereign power, and the cares of government; but whilst his hours were passed in the cultivation of his garden, in mechanical pursuits, in religious duties, and monastic discipline, some have imagined that he sighed for the dignities which, in a moment of weakness, he had superstitiously abandoned. That, however, he evinced his contempt of mortal honours, appears by his celebrating his own obsequies in his lifetime, and wishing thus to be forgotten by the world. This farce of sepulture soon became real, the following day he was attacked by a violent fever, which proved fatal the 22d September, 1558. With some weaknesses, Charles possessed great virtues, and his reign is become interesting in the history of Europe, by the schism which shook the power of Rome, and established the protestant tenets, and by the revolution in commerce, science, and navigation, which the discoveries of Columbus effected.

CHARLES VI. fifth son of the emperor Leopold, was born 1685, and proclaimed by his father, in 1703, king of Spain, under the title of Charles III. Though bravely opposed by Philip V. he was enabled to continue the war of succession; and when elected emperor of Germany, 1711, he still maintained his claim, by the valour of his generals and the fidelity of the Barcelonese. The treaties of Radstadt and Baden, in 1714, at last put an end to the tumults of the continent, and Charles had the good fortune to obtain, in exchange for Spain, the kingdoms of Naples and Sardinia, the Netherlands, and the dutchies of Milan and Mantua. In 1716 a new war was undertaken against the Turks, and by the abilities and successes of prince Eugene, Belgrade, Temeswar, and all Servia were added to the imperial dominions. The intrigues of Alberoni, the Spanish minister, rekindled unfortunately the war; but the quadruple alliance signed in London, 1728, between the courts of Vienna, England, France, and the States General, enabled the emperor to obtain an equivalent for Sardinia, which the Spaniards had rapidly conquered, and at last, after the disgrace of Alberoni, Philip V. acceded to the terms offered by his opponent, and abandoned his claims on Sicily and Sardinia. By the pragmatic sanction, Charles was empowered to make his Austrian states descend, in default of male issue, to his daughters; and he might have closed his reign in honourable peace, had he not interfered in the affairs of Poland, and supported the exclusion of Stanislaus from the throne. His territories were afterwards attacked by the Turks; and he had the misfortune to see his armies defeated, and wasted away by disease and famine; and at last he resigned by treaty, 1739, his pretensions to Belgrade, Servia, Sabach, and Wallachia. He died 20th September, 1740, aged 55, and was the sixteenth and last emperor of the house of Austria in the male line.

CHARLES VII. son of Maximilian Emanuel, elector of Bavaria, succeeded his father as elector, 1726; and upon the death of Charles VI. he laid claim to Bohemia, Austria, and the Tyrol, and refused to acknowledge the pragmatic sanction, and the rights of Maria Theresa to the imperial throne. Supported by the arms of Lewis XV. he was crowned king of Bohemia, at Prague, and emperor at Frankfurt, 1742; but Maria Theresa, though for a moment stripped of her dominions, found powerful allies in the English, and the French and Bavarian forces were defeated with great rapidity, and Charles in his turn found himself possessed only of the empty title of emperor. He died soon after, 20th January, 1745, aged 48.

CHARLES I. king of Spain, was Charles V. emperor of Germany.

CHARLES II. son and successor of Philip IV. as king of Spain, 1665, was twice married, but had no issue. By his last will, made 1698, he called to the Spanish throne the prince of Bavaria, the nephew of his queen; but, in 1700, he declared Philip duke of Anjou his successor. He died the same year, 10th November, aged 39; and the unsettled succession proved the source of civil discord. Charles was the last of the eldest branch of the Austrian princes who reigned in Spain.

CHARLES III. king of Spain, was son of Philip V. and on the death of his brother, Ferdinand VI. 1759, he exchanged his kingdom of Sicily for the Spanish dominions. He possessed abilities as a monarch, and virtues as a man; but his attempts to raise the Spaniards from their natural indolence proved abortive, and though, in the war with England, he retook Minorca, he saw his commerce ruined, and his treasures at Havanna fall into the hands of his enemies. He died 1789.

CHARLES I. king of England, son of James I. and Anne of Denmark, was born at Dunferling, 19th Nov. 1600. On his father's accession to the English throne, he was created duke of York, and on the death of his brother Henry he became prince of Wales. He succeeded his father in 1625, and that year married Henrietta, daughter of Henry the great of France, whom he had seen and admired at Paris, during the romantic excursion which he took to pay his addresses to the infanta of Spain, accompanied by his favourite, Buckingham. The fair prospects which a new reign and a virtuous monarch might promise to the nation, were soon obscured by the storms of popular discontent and party prejudice. The Spanish war in which the kingdom was engaged, was conducted with ill success by Buckingham; and when the parliament inveighed against the haughtiness and maladministration of this hapless favourite, Charles, instead of dismissing, resolved to support him. Another parliament proved equally unruly, and was dissolved with equal indignation by the offended monarch, who now began to raise supplies by his own authority, under the name of loans, benevolence, and ship money. This, instead of strengthening his power, rendered him more unpopular; and when Buckingham failed in his attempt to relieve the protestants of Rochelle, in 1627, the clamours of the people were loud and violent, and the exhausted state of the treasury rendered the calling of a new parliament necessary. From this turbulent assembly Charles obtained, with difficulty indeed, some supplies; but, in return, he was attacked with representations of grievances, and was obliged to assent to the petition of right, which explained and more fully settled the rights of the subject. The progress of his favourite's impeachment was stopped by his assassination at Portsmouth, by the dagger of the fanatic Felton; and the conclusion of the war with France and Spain rendered Charles less dependent on his parliament, which he dissolved, with the resolution of never calling another. After Buckingham's death, the king placed his confidence on no minister with equal satisfaction; but whilst from his better judgment more mild measures were expected, the spirit of dissatisfaction was kindled in the most violent degree by the raising of ship money for the defence of the nation. The measure was sufficiently supported by the practice of former reigns, and the unanimous opinion of the judges; but the arbitrary proceedings of the reign of Henry or of Elizabeth, were ill calculated to ensure obedience in times when the divine right of kings was disputed, and the necessity of parliamentary control loudly proclaimed. Hampden opposed the unpopular tax; and though condemned by the court of exchequer, he rejoiced in the struggle which his single arm had waged against the oppressive measures of the government. The attempt of Charles to enforce the reading of the English liturgy in the churches of Scotland excited the same ferment in the north which unhappily prevailed in the south; and when the Scotch had bound themselves by the oath of the solemn league and covenant to defend their presbyterian principles, which they declared to be the cause of Christ, and had assembled an army to support their claims, Charles had the weakness to propose a negotiation, instead of giving battle; and, while he consented to withdraw his forces, he had the mortification to observe that, by the intrigues of Richelieu, his enemies, instead of disbanding their followers, were increasing their means of offence. In 1640 another parliament was called, but from its clamours for the redress of grievances, was as soon dissolved; yet such were the distresses of the monarch for want of money, that he was again, the same year, persuaded by his council of peers, assembled at Rippon, to have recourse again to a popular election. This parliament, called the long parliament, met in November, 1640; and they did not separate till they had effected the ruin of the king and of his government. Instead of listening to the representations of the monarch, they exclaimed against the arbitrary measures of the court; and that they might strip the throne of all its ornaments, and the monarch of all the wisdom and integrity of faithful advisers, impeachment and persecution were denounced against the ministers. Strafford was tried, and condemned, though Charles opposed the unavailing shield of royalty to save him, and Laud soon after, on pretences as frivolous as they were cruel, was dragged to the scaffold. To serve the king seemed now to be a crime; and Charles, stripped of the assistance of his wisest ministers, was unable to stem against the torrent of fanatic zeal and popular fury, which decreed the abolition of the court of the star chamber, the high commission, and other offices which were the bulwark of the monarchy. While faction thus prevailed at home, the intrigues of the puritans were not in vain in Ireland, and the most horrid massacres and outrages of every kind were perpetrated, in the name of religion, while the unhappy monarch was publicly branded as the author of national miseries, which he could neither foresee nor prevent. In the meantime, the violence of the presbyterian faction acquired strength in England; episcopacy was declared to be unnecessary; and the thirteen bishops who presumed to make representations against the conduct of their persecutors were sent in disgrace to the Tower, as guilty of treason. Instead of conciliating popularity, if indeed any step of the devoted monarch could conciliate popularity, Charles increased the virulence of the commons, by appearing, agreeable to the advice of some of his counsellors, in the house, and from the speaker's chair impeaching five of the members. This bold step ought to have been supported or never adopted; but Charles, retiring in disappointment to Windsor, wrote a letter to the parliament to excuse his conduct, and thus to render himself ridiculous in the eyes of the nation. The parliament in the mean time had called upon the militia of the city for the defence of their privileges, and the king, who found that nothing but force could now restore him to his dignity and to his consequence in the nation, retired to Nottingham, where, August 25, 1642, he erected the royal standard. This was a declaration of war, which the parliament were not backward to acknowledge. Various battles were fought at Edgehill, Marston Moor, and Newbury, with various success, but all the advantages which the monarch had gained by the valour of his troops, and the loyalty of his adherents, were unhappily lost in the fight of Naseby, 4th June, 1645, where, after displaying all the coolness, prudence, and intrepidity of the ablest general, Charles was obliged to fly with the loss of his artillery, his baggage, and his cabinet of letters, which the republicans published with every offensive remark of insolence and vulgarity. Thus left without resources, and shut up at Oxford, ignorant whom to trust, and unable to increase the number of his adherents, Charles formed the fatal resolution of throwing himself upon the mercy of the Scotch army. He left Oxford in disguise, and after wandering nine days, he appeared in the Scotch army at Newark, but instead of being received as a monarch, and of finding his misfortunes respected as they deserved, he found himself a prisoner, and soon learnt that his expected friends with unparalleled barbarity had sold him to the English parliament for the sum of 200,000*l.* Charles was conveyed a prisoner to Holmby castle, and to Hampton court, but though here he could not, as he hoped, restore himself to power by interfering between the jarring factions of the puritans and the independents, he had the art to effect his escape to the Isle of Wight. But while he meditated passing into France, he soon found himself a prisoner in the hands of Hammond the governor of Carrisbrooke castle, and when removed to Hurst castle and to Windsor, he unhappily discovered that the rudeness with which he was treated was the prelude to a melancholy tragedy. The republicans were sensible that their power could never be consolidated till the king was no more, and therefore a universal clamour was raised to pass sentence upon him. Brought before this self-created high court of justice, over which Bradshaw, a worthless lawyer, presided, Charles displayed the usual independence of his character. While he refused to acknowledge the authority of his judges, he betrayed no violent emotions of fury or bursting indignation; he was the meek, the patient, the resigned Christian, who yielded with all the dignity of conscious innocence to the power which usurpation and tyranny had erected for his destruction. He heard the sentence of death pronounced against him with composure, and the three days which he was allowed to prepare for another world, were passed in the affectionate duties of recommending forgiveness of injuries, moderation, and the practice of every virtue to his children, and in the becoming offices of a devout and penitent Christian. On the scaffold, which, probably to insult him, was erected in the front of his palace of Whitehall, he preserved his usual composure, and after conversing with Juxon bishop of London, who attended him, and witnessed his heroic resignation, he gave the signal to the masked executioner, who cut off his head at one blow, 30th January, 1648. The remains of the martyred monarch were removed to Windsor, but were rudely interred by order of the parliament without the burial service being read over them. Though insulted by republican malice, and though misrepresented by political opponents, Charles must be considered as a great man; and whoever wishes to form an accurate judgment of his character, must view him as the successor to an almost arbitrary power, as the monarch of a turbulent nation, as the bulwark of what he considered as the constitution and the happiness of his country, and as the steady and prudent opposer of bold unprincipled innovators, whose conduct was seldom guided by any but selfish and personal views. As a domestic character, he was amiable and exemplary, and as a man of letters, his abilities were respectable. In his intercourse with the parliament, he often alone was opposed to the insinuating language and sophistical arguments of numerous delegates, but none ever left his presence without admiring his firmness, the acuteness of his remarks, the readiness and propriety of his answers, and the general intelligence and powerful elocution with which he supported and adorned his conversation. Though his enemies have attempted to rob him of the merit of writing the Icon Basilike, a pathetic composition which operated in his favour like the testament of Cæsar at Rome, and which required the gigantic abilities of Milton to vilify it, yet he is now generally imagined to be the author of it, and not Gauden. Charles left two sons, who succeeded after him on the throne. One of his daughters married the duke of Orleans, brother to Louis XIV. and another the prince of Orange.

CHARLES II. king of England, after his father the first Charles, was born 29th May, 1630. He heard at the Hague of the tragical death of his father; and soon after, at the invitation of the Scotch, who wished in this early proof of loyalty to wipe away their former treachery to his predecessor, he came privately to Scotland, and was crowned at Scone in 1651. Though with the title of king, Charles felt himself surrounded by all the jealousy of the republicans, and the fanaticism of the presbyterians, and perhaps might rejoice in the defeat of his followers at Dunbar, as it set him free from oppressive and suspicious advisers. From Scotland Charles proceeded to Worcester, where he was totally defeated by the superior valour of Cromwell, and he escaped from the field of battle with great difficulty. After concealing himself in the branches of an oak in Boscobel wood, where he saw his enemies in full pursuit of him, and after disguising himself under the various characters of a wood-cutter, a peasant, a servant, &c. he at last reached Brighton, and embarked for France. The death of Cromwell and the inabilities of his successor, paved the way for his return, and when Monk, at the head of the army in Scotland, had the boldness and loyalty to declare in his favour, he was hailed by universal shouts of approbation from the nation; and on his birthday 1660, was restored to the throne of his ancestors. But unhappily, while the gloom and fanaticism of the republicans were deservedly exposed to ridicule, neither virtue nor temperance accompanied the return of the new monarch. Charles did not possess the amiable qualities which adorned the character of his father; though affable and good-natured, he was licentious and immoral, and the debaucheries which he had seen practised in France, he permitted to flourish at his own court. The merits of those who had suffered in the cause of his father were disregarded, while infidelity was countenanced, and patronage extended to the worthless and the profligate. Though Charles had married, in 1662, the princess of Portugal, he kept several mistresses by whom he had children, on whom he lavished the treasures and the honours due only to the son of virtue and merit. As a monarch he was little attached to the interests or the glory of England. Dunkirk, so long the pride of the English, was sold to France to supply his extravagance, and war was imprudently undertaken in 1663, against the Dutch, the Danes, and the French. Long accustomed to victory, the English were terrified at the sight of a Dutch fleet, which sailed up the Medway; and while they reflected on the weakness of their government, a dreadful plague came to destroy thousands of the inhabitants of London, in 1665, and the next year a most tremendous conflagration laid the fairest part of their city in ruins. Peace with the Dutch, in 1667, was soon after followed by the disgrace of the virtuous minister Clarendon, and the elevation of those unprincipled favourites called the cabal to power. Charles, regardless of the complaints of his people, scrupled not to receive a pension from the French king; and, in virtue of that disgraceful alliance, he undertook a new war against the Dutch. Whilst the peace of Nimeguen, in 1678, restored tranquillity to the continent, the English were alarmed by rumours of treasonable plots, and the arts and malignity of Oates, Bedloe, and others, were called forth to give popularity to the monarch, by sacrificing some innocent individuals, Russel and Sydney, to the cries of faction. The whole of the reign of this licentious monarch contains little to recommend him to the respect of posterity; though it is to be observed, that the habeas corpus act, and the bill to exclude the duke of York from the throne, because he was a papist, were passed into law by the parliament. Charles died suddenly of an apoplexy, 6th February, 1685, leaving no issue by his queen. It is said, that in his expiring moments he received the sacrament from the hands of a popish priest, and thus convinced the world that in supporting the church of England he had acted the part of a false and hypocritical friend.

CHARLES GUSTAVUS X. king of Sweden, was son of John Casimir, count Palatine of the Rhine, and born at Upsal 1622. On the abdication of Christina, he ascended the Swedish throne 1654, and showed himself prudent and warlike. He attacked the Poles, and, in consequence of his famous victory at Warsaw, he found himself master of the whole country, from Dantzic to Cracow. Fortune, however, proved inconstant, and Casimir king of Poland, with the assistance of the emperor Leopold, was soon enabled to recover all his lost provinces, and to drive his enemy back to Sweden. Charles, expelled from Poland, turned his arms against the Danes, and marched to the gates of Copenhagen; but soon after found his victories checked by the misfortunes which befell his flag.

He died at Gottenburg 13th February, 1660, aged only 37. An account of his life has been written by Puffendorf, two vols. fol.

CHARLES XI. son and successor of the preceding, was born 25th December, 1655. The war with Denmark, which was ended soon after his accession, was renewed by the ambition of Christiern V. in 1674; but though Charles proved victorious, and obtained possession of Helmstadt, Lunden, Landseroon, &c. he lost his province of Pomerania; which, however, the peace of Nimeguen restored to him in 1676. He died 15th April, 1697, aged 42, at a time when his wisdom had marked him as the mediator and umpire of the peace of Ryswick. He wisely reformed the abuses of his courts of judicature, and enforced the quick and impartial decision of all disputes among his subjects. Though respected as a good prince, he yet showed himself in some instances tyrannical, and abridged the privileges of the senate and of the people.

CHARLES XII. of Sweden, was born 27th June, 1682. From his earliest years he glowed to imitate the heroic character of Alexander; and, in his eagerness to reign, he caused himself to be declared king at the age of 15, and at his coronation boldly seized the crown from the hands of the archbishop of Upsal, and set it on his own head. His youth seemed to invite the attacks of his neighbours, of Poland, Denmark, and Russia: but Charles, unawed by the prospect of hostilities, and though scarce 18, wisely determined to assail his enemies one after the other. He besieged Copenhagen, and by his vigorous measures, so terrified the Danish monarch that, in less than six weeks, he obliged him to sue for peace. From humbled Denmark, Charles marched against the Russians; and though at the head of only 8000 men, he attacked the enemy, who were besieging Narva with 100,000 men. The conflict was dreadful, 30,000 were slain, 20,000 asked for quarter, and the rest were taken or destroyed; while the Swedes had only 1200 killed, and 800 wounded. From Narva, the victorious monarch advanced into Poland, defeated the Saxons who opposed his march, and obliged the Polish king, in suing for peace, to renounce his crown, and to acknowledge Stanislaus for his successor. Had Charles been now reconciled to the Russians, he might have become a great monarch, as he was a successful warrior; but the hope of future triumphs flattered his ambition, and as if determined to dethrone the czar, he advanced into Ukraine, whilst his enemies fled on every side before him. The battle of Pultowa, however, proved unfortunate, July, 1709, Charles, defeated and wounded, fled from the field, and sought protection at Bender from the Turks. His affairs were now desperate, the banished Augustus was restored to the Polish throne, and the grand seignor, tired of his guest, wished him to remove from his dominions. Charles with only 40 domestics opposed for some days a Turkish army, and when obliged to submit, he sullenly feigned sickness, and during ten months he lay in bed. At last he left his confinement with only two faithful attendants, and travelling post reached in eleven days Stralsund, from which he crossed to Sweden. Untamed by misfortunes, he immediately invaded Norway, with an army of 20,000 men, but at the siege of Fredericks-hall, while visiting the works, he was struck by a cannon ball, and expired on the spot, 12th December, 1718. Charles, in his imitation of Alexander, converted his firmness into obstinacy, his courage was rashness, and his severity was cruelty. He possessed nothing of the great qualities or the amiable virtues of the hero, though he was bold even to madness, and persevering even to his ruin. At the battle of Narva, when five of his horses were shot, he exclaimed as he mounted a fresh charger, "these people find me exercise." When one day dictating to his secretary at Stralsund, a bomb fell on the roof of the house, and crushed the room next the place where they were sitting. But while the secretary dropped his pen, all terrified, the monarch asked calmly what was the matter: "The bomb!" replies the secretary. "The bomb!" cries the monarch, "what has the bomb to do with what I am dictating? write on."

CHARLES I. king of Naples, was count of Anjou, and brother to St. Lewis, king of France, whom he accompanied on his Egyptian expedition, where he shared his fortunes and his captivity. On his return to Europe, he, as the husband of Beatrix the heiress of Provence, assumed the rights of a sovereign, and conquered Arles, Marseilles, and Avignon, and afterwards at the request of pope Urban IV. he marched against Manfred the Sicilian usurper. His expedition was successful, Manfred was defeated, 1265, and the year after cruelly put to death, and the conqueror assumed the title of king of Naples and Sicily. The widow of Manfred and his son shared also his untimely fate, and Conradin duke of Swabia, grandson of the emperor Frederic II. who had ventured to lay claim to the Sicilian crown, was seized, and after the mockery of a trial, expired under the hands of the public executioner. Though success followed the monarch in his expeditions against Tunis and the Ghibelines, yet his arbitrary and cruel massacres excited the indignation and the hatred of his subjects. An insurrection was formed, and the rebellions Sicilians on Easter Monday, 1282, sacrificed 8000 Frenchmen to their fury, on the ringing of the bells for the evening service, which bloody catastrophe is still handed down to execration, under the name of Sicilian Vespers. Charles died 7th Jan. 1285, tortured by the sad reflection, that his cruelty had occasioned so much dissatisfaction, and such dreadful bloodshed. Charles, though an arbitrary, was an able and politic prince, his power was acknowledged all over the Mediterranean, and to his dominions in Italy and in France he added the sounding title of king of Jerusalem.

CHARLES II. king of Naples, surnamed the lame, was a prisoner at Messina in the hands of the Sicilians, who wished in his death to avenge the cruelties which his father had exercised against their favourite Conradin. The execution of the sentence was stopped by the interference of Constance queen of Arragon, whose husband Peter III. had laid claim to the Sicilian crown, and Charles, thus saved from death, directed all the powers of his mind to the recovery of his father's dominions. He prevailed against his rivals, and was crowned king at Rome, and he employed himself zealously in promoting the arts of peace and of commerce, and the practice of religion among his subjects. He died at Naples, 1309, aged 61, leaving by his wife, Mary of Hungary, several children. He was succeeded by his son Robert.

CHARLES III. king of Naples, was grandson of the preceding, and by his marriage with Margaret the niece of Joan queen of Naples, he obtained the kingdom, 1380, on the excommunication of that princess. He showed himself infamous, by cruelly putting the deposed queen to death, and he afterwards quarrelled with the pope who had supported his claims to the crown. He was killed in his attempts to obtain the crown of Hungary, 1386, aged 41.

CHARLES II. king of Navarre, son of Philip count d'Evereux, was surnamed the Bad. He was born 1332, and as the son of the daughter of Lewis Hutin of France, he on his mother's death, though only 18, succeeded to the throne of Navarre. Cruelty and artifice marked his conduct, he caused to be assassinated Charles of Spain, constable of France, and when arrested by the order of king John, his father-in-law, he not only contrived to regain his liberty, but with horrid vengeance caused slow poison to be administered to the dauphin, his brother-in-law, after he had seduced him from his affection and allegiance to his father. Unable to place himself on the throne of France, he espoused the interests of the English who invaded the kingdom, and where he could not succeed by open force, he effected his purposes by the instruments of poison or assassination. His death, which happened 1st Jan. 1387, in his 55th year, was extraordinary. His physicians had ordered him to be wrapped up in clothes dipped in brandy and sulphur, to support and revive a constitution, weakened by leprosy and by debauchery, and while the operation was performing, his servant dropped a taper on the inflammable linen, which caught fire and consumed to the very bones the unhappy man before he could be extricated.

CHARLES MARTEL, son of Pepin Heristal, by a concubine, obtained great power as duke of Austrasia, and by defeating Childeric II. of France, he made himself master of the kingdom. Instead of ascending the throne, he remained satisfied with the title of mayor of the palace, whilst the government was conducted agreeable to his will. He waged war against the Saxons; and in a battle near Poitiers against the Saracens, in which he slew Abderam the chief, it is said, that not less than 375,000 of the enemy were destroyed. So much valour, accompanied with the most consummate prudence, rendered him popular, and at the death of Thierry the king, 737, Charles retained in his hands the reins of government, under the title of the duke of the Franks. He died 22d Oct. 741, respected as a father, and a benevolent prince. His sons Carloman and Pepin inherited his dominions, and Pepin thus became the first king of the Carolingian race.

CHARLES, duke of Burgundy, surnamed the Warrior, and the Rash, was son of Philip the Good, and born at Dijon, 1433. Early inured to war, he conquered the people of Liege and Ghent, and carried his arms against Lewis XI. of France whom he took prisoner, and obliged to make peace on his own terms. His attacks against the Low Countries, Guelderland and Zutphen, were attended with success; but he met a severe check in Switzerland, and when he attempted to repair his losses, another defeat ruined his army, and drove him away in disgrace. He was slain 5th Jan. 1477, as he was endeavouring to escape from the siege of Nanci. He had four wives, the second of which was Margaret of York, sister to Edward IV.

CHARLES, count of Flanders, was son of Canute, king of Denmark, and succeeded Baldwin, 1119. By his benevolence and virtues, he became popular among his Flemish subjects; but the goodness of his heart could not avert the dagger of an assassin, by which he perished, 1124, while engaged in devotion in a church at Bruges.

CHARLES I. duke of Lorraine, laid claim to the crown of France on the death of his nephew Lewis the indolent; but was defeated and taken prisoner. He died in the 4th year of his confinement, 994, aged 41.

CHARLES II. duke of Lorraine, son of duke John, was a prudent and warlike prince, and died 1430.

CHARLES IV. duke of Lorraine, son of Francis count of Vaudemont, and grandson of Charles III. was born 1603. He was fond of military glory, and was engaged in frequent disputes with Lewis XIII. whose arms were too powerful for him to oppose. Though twice stripped of his dominions by the French, his restless ambition refused to enjoy tranquillity, and by embracing the cause of the Spaniards, he exposed himself to new troubles. He was seized by the duke of Condé, and imprisoned at Antwerp and Toledo, and not restored to liberty till the signing of the Pyrenean treaty. In 1662, by the treaty of Montmartre, he resigned his dominions to Lewis XIV. provided he was acknowledged in France as prince of the blood royal; but afterwards he revoked the agreement. Deprived again by the fortune of war of his provinces, he united his forces to those of the emperor, and though defeated by Turenne, 1674, he repaired his military reputation, and after routing the French, he took the marshal of Crequi at Treves. He died soon after at Birkenfeld, 1675, aged 72. He had married the princess of Cantecroix, but before her death he took another wife, whom, however, the king of France confined in a convent.

CHARLES V. of Lorraine, nephew of the preceding, was son of duke Francis, and was born at Vienna, 1643. He early entered into the service of the emperor Leopold, and acquired great military glory in his campaigns in Hungary. In 1674, he declared himself a candidate for the crown of Poland, but neither his intrigues nor his valour could secure his election. He took Philipsburgh in 1676, and the following year married the queen dowager of Poland, sister to the emperor. Afterwards he was engaged against the Turks at the head of the imperial armies, and though partially defeated, he was soon enabled with the powerful assistance of John Sobieski, to drive them from before the walls of Vienna. Various successes followed this glorious campaign, and Buda would have fallen had not the duke's progress been arrested by a violent fever, but he recovered to defeat the Turks, in the dreadful battle of Mohatz in 1687, and to overrun all Transylvania. His services were afterwards employed against the French in Flanders, but his career of glory was cut short by death, after taking Mentz, 1690, in his 49th year. Lewis XIV. said of him that he was the wisest and the most generous of his enemies. He was father of Leopold the father of the emperor Francis I.

CHARLES ALEXANDER, of Lorraine, grandson of the preceding, was governor of the Low Countries, and general of the imperial armies. He was opposed to the king of Prussia, and in his campaigns against the French in Bohemia and in Germany, he acquired great glory. Though defeated by the king of Prussia, he had the good fortune to rout his generals in two engagements. He died 4th July, 1780, aged 68, universally respected as a brave warrior and an amiable man.

CHARLES EMANUEL, duke of Savoy, surnamed the great, was born 1562. He early signalized himself in the battles of Vigo, Ast, Chatillon, &c. and not only seized Provence and Dauphiné, but laid claims to the throne of France, on the death of Henry III. With the most ardent ambition he next aspired to the kingdom of Cyprus, to the province of Macedonia, and at last he attempted to seize, in 1602, the town of Geneva, in the midst of a profound peace. This violent measure was resented by the Genevese, who hanged as public robbers a few of his wretched followers whom they had taken prisoners. He next laid claim to the dominions of Mantua, on the death of the duke Francis, but to little effect, and by the insidious advice of the French, he attacked Genoa, but desisted through the interference of the Spanish monarch. On the death of the emperor Matthias, he became a candidate for the imperial crown, and next by attempting to seize Montserrat, he drew upon himself the hostilities of France, Spain, and Germany. He died at Savillon 26th July, 1630, aged 78, it is said of a broken heart, because he had lost Pignerol.

CHARLES EMANUEL II. son of Victor Amadeus I. succeeded to the dukedom of Savoy on the death of his brother Francis, 1638, though only four years old. The weakness of his minority induced the Spaniards to attack his dominions, but the interference of the king of France, and the peace of the Pyrenees, restored him to all his possessions. He was an amiable and benevolent prince, who regarded the happiness of his people as of greater value than foreign conquests. In cultivating the arts of peace, and in improving the commerce of his subjects, he made a large and commodious road through an arch of 500 paces long in a rock at Montevisa, between Dauphiné and Savoy, and embellished Turin and other places in his dominions with noble and useful edifices. The last part of his life was unfortunately embittered by the revolt of his protestant subjects in the Vaudois, who complained of the oppression of his governors. He died 1675.

CHARLES EMANUEL III. son of Victor Amadeus II. was born 1701, and succeeded on the voluntary abdication of his father, 1730. He ardently embraced the projects of France and Spain to humble the Austrians, and after the celebrated victory of Guastalla, he obtained the cession of some valuable territories in the Milanese. With political inconsistency he afterwards in 1742, joined his forces and influence to the queen of Hungary against his two former allies, and though he was often unsuccessful, yet he had the courage to defend himself in the field, even against superior numbers, and at the conclusion of the war he lost none of his former possessions. The return of peace now afforded him opportunities to display his patriotism and humanity. He was mild, prudent, and economical in his administration, abuses were corrected in every department, salutary reforms were introduced, vice and luxury were checked, and a new code of laws more humane and more decisive was established. He died 20th February, 1773, aged 72. He was three times married.

CHARLES EDWARD, grandson of James II. king of England, is known in history by the name of the pretender. In 1745, at the age of 25, when the Scotch seemed inclined to resist the government of the Hanoverian family, he landed in Scotland, and supported by the adherence of some of the disaffected nobles he proclaimed his father king, and fixed his residence at Edinburgh, with all the pomp and parade of royalty. By a sudden and masterly attack, he had the good fortune to defeat at Prestonpans, the forces which had marched to oppose him under Sir John Cope, but by delaying to take advantage of the terrors of his enemies, he contributed to his own ruin, and though he afterwards advanced as far as Manchester and Derby, he soon found that the people, recovered from their panic, were unanimous against him. On his rapid return to Scotland, he routed general Hawley at Falkirk, but the approach of the duke of Cumberland put an end to his triumph. He retreated before the royal army, and at last the hostile troops met in the field of Culloden, to decide the fate of the kingdom. The Scotch fought with accustomed bravery, but the English prevailed, and the unfortunate youth escaped with difficulty from the battle, where he left dead 3000 of his misguided adherents. Though a large reward was offered for the head of the illustrious fugitive, who had thus to combat against want and temptation, yet the peasants of Scotland pitied his misfortunes, and even those of his enemies, who were acquainted with his retreat, kept inviolate the fatal secret, and while they condemned his ambition, commiserated his distresses. He at last escaped to St. Maloes, and never again revisited the British dominions. He died at Florence 1788. He had married a German princess of the house of Stolberg Guendern. His brother, Henry Benedict, cardinal York, when plundered by the ravages of the French revolution, was honourably relieved by the English monarch, and derived from his bounty a liberal pension to soothe the misfortunes which had overwhelmed his old age.

CHARLETON, Walter, a physician born at Shepton Mallet, 2d February, 1619, and educated at Magdalen-hall, Oxford, where he took his degrees. He became a man of eminence in his profession, published several respectable works, and was physician to both the Charles's. He was one of the first members of the royal society, and in 1689, became president of the college of physicians. As his circumstances were not prosperous, he retired to Jersey, where he died 1707, aged 87. The best known of his works is his Stonehenge restored to the Danes, 4to. 1603.

CHARLEVAL, Charles Faucon de Rey lord of, a French writer of great genius and of amiable manners. Though of a very weak constitution, yet by strictly adhering to the regimen prescribed by his medical friends, he attained the extraordinary age of eighty, and died 1693. His works appeared 1759, in 12mo. though his nephew objected to the publication. The epigrams and the other poems are much admired.

CHARLEVOIX, Peter Fr. Xavier de, a learned Jesuit, born at St. Quentin, famous for his travels, and his authentic historical compositions. He died 1761, aged 78. He wrote the history of Japan, 2 vols. 4to. and 6 vols. 12mo.—History of St. Domingo, 2 vols. 4to.—History of New France, 3 vols. 4to.—and of Paraguay, 6 vols. 12mo.—In 1720, he visited Canada, by order of the French King, and passing up the St. Lawrence, and through the lakes to Michilimackinac, he descended through lake Michigan, and the rivers Illinois and Mississippi, to New-Orleans. In 1722, he returned to France, and published a valuable history of Canada, and a journal of his travels. L.

CHARMIS, a physician at Rome, under Nero, whose celebrity arose more from the singularity of his prescriptions, than his skill in the profession.

CHARNACE, Hercules Girard baron de, a native of Brittany, who served in the army, and was afterwards sent by Richelieu as ambassador to Sweden, to engage Gustavus Adolphus to make war against Germany. He was also ambassador at other courts, and was killed at the siege of Bredda, at the head of a troop of horse, 1637.

CHARNOCK, Stephen, was born in London, and studied at Emanuel, Cambridge, from whence he removed to Oxford. He became an eloquent presbyterian preacher in Ireland, and was chaplain to Henry Cromwell, but on the restoration, he was unwilling to conform to the articles, and therefore preached only in private meetings. He died 1680, aged 52. His works are in 2 vols. folio. His discourse on providence is admired.

CHARNOIS, N. Vachour de, a native of Paris, known as the editor of the journal des theatres, and as the author of some popular romances. He afterwards conducted the Moderateur paper, at the beginning of the revolution, and being arrested on suspicion, he became one of those unfortunate victims so barbarously murdered at the Abbaye, September 2d, 1792.

CHARONDAS, a legislator born in Sicily. He flourished about 400 years B.C. and made a code of laws for the people of Thurium.

CHARPENTIER, Francis, dean of the French academy, was born at Paris, February 1620. His learning and abilities recommended him to Colbert, for whom he wrote a discourse to prepare the full establishment of an East India company. He was afterwards made a member of the new-founded academy of medals and inscriptions, and greatly contributed to the noble series of medals struck in the reign of Lewis XIV. He died 22d April, 1702, aged 82. Besides harangues, and discourses delivered on public occasions, he wrote some poems, sonnets, and odes.

CHARRIER, Mark Anthony, a lawyer, member for Mcnde at the States General in 1789. He boldly opposed all innovations, and when the convention decreed the abolition of royalty, he headed the insurgents of his department, and at last being taken prisoner, was condemned to death 16th July, 1794.

CHARRON, Peter, a learned Frenchman. Though born of humble parents, he was well educated in the universities of Orleans and Bourges, but after applying himself to the law, he found that his abilities must remain long and perhaps ever neglected and unknown, he therefore became an ecclesiastic, and as an eloquent preacher soon acquired fame and popularity. He was admired by the bishops, listened to with admiration by the king, and made chaplain to queen Margaret. On his return to Paris, he wished to enter into some of the religious orders, but as he was now 48, his applications were rejected, and therefore as a secular, he continued his labours of pulpit eloquence. At Bourdeaux he became acquainted with Montaigne, who treated him with great kindness and affectionate regard. His publication of the three truths in 1594, recommended him to the notice of the bishop of Cahors, by whom he was made his vicar general, and canon theological. He was afterwards presented to the chaptership of the church of the bishop of Condom, and in 1601 he printed his books "of wisdom," which spread his fame through the kingdom. In 1603 he went to reside at Boulogne, but the climate was unfavourable to his constitution, so that he returned to Paris, where he died November 16th the same year, of an apoplexy. Of his works the best known is "of wisdom," two translations of which have appeared in England, the last by Dr. Stanhope, 1697.

CHARTIER, Alan, a native of Bayeux, secretary to Charles VI. and VII. of France. He was employed in embassies, but he acquired greater celebrity as a writer. He died 1449. His works, consisting of poetry and prose, appeared 1617. His brother John was a Benedictine, author of the great chronicles of France from Pharamond to the death of Charles VII. in three vols. fol. 1493—and the history of Charles VII. printed folio, 1661.

CHARTIER, Rene, a physician to the French king, and professor of medicine. He edited the works of Hippocrates and Galen in Greek and Latin, in 14 vols. folio, from 1619 to 1679, when the last vol. was published.

CHASSENEUX, Bartholomew de, a French lawyer, president of the parliament of Provence, who boldly opposed the prosecution of the Vaudois, a religious sect who refused to acknowledge the authority of the pope, and of the church of Rome. This conduct, which humanity and not party had dictated, was regarded with such animosity that he was poisoned 1541. He was author of a work on the customs of France, and of other things.

CHASTEL, John, son of a woollen-draper at Paris, attempted the life of Henry IV. of France, 27th December, 1594. He was then only 19. The blow was so sudden that he nearly escaped through the crowd, but it is said that the wildness of his looks betrayed him. He confessed that from the wickedness of his past life, he was doomed to eternal torments in another life, and that to make them more tolerable, he wished to do some great action. He was condemned to have the flesh of his arms and thighs torn off with red-hot pincers, his right hand cut off, and afterwards his body drawn and quartered by four horses pulling different ways, and his remains then burnt to ashes. This was December 29th, 1594, and at the same time the Jesuits, at whose instigation the crime had been committed, were banished for ever from the kingdom.

CHASTELAIN, Claude, an ecclesiastic born at Paris. He drew up formularies for the diocese of Paris at the request of the archbishop, and published, besides the Roman martyrology,—universal martyrology—and a journal of his life, with curious anecdotes in MS. He was well skilled in ecclesiastical history and in antiquities, and died 1712, aged 73.

CHASTELLUX, Francis John marquis de, field marshal of France, is well known by his writings. He was member of the French academy, and of several other learned bodies, and died at Paris 1788. His chief works are on public happiness, 8vo.—translated into English—travels in North America, 8vo. also translated into English. This last work is far from popular in America, where the author had served in the army during the American war.

CHAT DE RASTIGNAC, Raymond de, a French officer who opposed the league, and behaved with great bravery in various battles. He was killed at la Fere 26th Jan. 1696.

CHAT DE RASTIGNAC, Lewis James de, of the same family as the preceding, was an ecclesiastic, who rose by his merit to the bishopric of Tours, and died universally respected 1750, aged 63. He wrote some discourses, harangues, &c. His benevolence was particularly conspicuous during an inundation of the Loire, when he was the common father of the poor, who had been driven from their habitations.

CHATEAUBRIAND, Frances de Foix, wife of the count of, is known in French history as the mistress of Francis I. who left her for the superior attractions of the dutchess d'Etampes. She was a woman of great courage and of a commanding aspect. She died 1537, aged 62.

CHATEAU BRUN, John Baptist Vivien de, a native of Angouleme, member of the French academy, and eminent as a dramatic writer. He died 1775, aged 89. Besides Philoctetes, Astyanax, and Mahomet II. tragedies, he wrote les Troyennes, which is evidently his best play, and which he kept by him 40 years before he produced it before the public.

CHATEAURENARD, Francis Lewis Rousset count de, a native of Touraine, distinguished as a naval officer in the Mediterranean, against the Sallee rovers. He defeated the Dutch fleet 1675, and for his eminent services was made an admiral and marshal of France. He died 1716, aged 80.

CHATEL, Tanneguy de, a French general born of respectable parents in Brittany. He gained some credit by an expedition against the English coast, and in 1410 he had the good success to defeat Ladislaus, who had usurped the crown of Naples, upon which he was, in 1414, made marshal of Guienne. He distinguished himself at the battle of Agincourt, and supported the Dauphin against the Burgundians when they attacked Paris. He afterwards effected a reconciliation between both parties, but had the meanness and brutality to advise the Dauphin to assassinate the unsuspecting duke of Burgundy 1419. On the Dauphin's elevation to the throne, Chatel was made grand-master of the household, and trusted with important embassies.

He died 1449. His nephew, who bore the same name, is known in French history for his attachment to the unhappy Charles VII. whom he attended with fidelity in his last moments, and buried at his own expense.

CHATEL, Peter du, or CASTELLANUS, a native of Arc, educated at Dijon. He was so learned a Grecian, that he assisted Erasmus in his translations, and for some time was press corrector to Frobenius at Basil, after which he travelled to Egypt and Syria. On his return to Europe he became private reader to Francis I. who made him bishop of Tulle, and afterwards of Macon, from which he was translated by Henry II. to Orleans, where he died 1552. He wrote two funeral orations on Francis I. and a Latin letter against Charles V. and showed himself a scholar of superior abilities, and a strong advocate for the privileges of the Gallican church.

CHATEL, Francis du, a painter of Brussels, in the middle of the 17th century. His best piece is at Ghent, representing the Spanish king receiving the homage of the Flemings.

CHATELARD, N. du, a gentleman of Dauphiné, who became passionately fond of Mary queen of Scots, and actually concealed himself in her chamber, when she was returning to Scotland, after the death of her husband Francis. He was for this imprudent conduct, which it is said the queen had countenanced, condemned to suffer death.

CHATELET, Paul du Hay lord of, descended from the Scotch Hays, was born in Britany, and became president of the court of justice in the army of Lewis XIII. He was also member of the academy, and wrote various pieces in verse and prose, besides the history of Bertrand du Guesclin, constable of France, folio. He was a man of great firmness and integrity, and boldly spoke to the king in favour of Montmorency, who had been condemned for high treason. He died 1636, aged 44.

CHATELET, Gabrielle Emilie marchioness de, a learned French lady, daughter of the baron de Breteuil, born 17th December, 1706. Superior to the trifling pursuits of her sex, she aspired to high distinction in the regions of science and philosophy, and by her valuable works she may be said to have rivalled Leibnitz and Newton. Her institutes of physic addressed to her son is a work of very great merit. Her intense application it is said shortened her life. She died 1749, aged 43. She translated the institutes of Leibnitz and the principia of Newton.

CHATTERTON, Thomas, an extraordinary youth, born at Bristol, 20th Nov. 1752. He was taught reading, writing, and arithmetic, at a charity-school on St. Augustin's Back, and at the age of 14 he was articled clerk to an attorney at Bristol, with whom he continued about three years. His employment however was not congenial to his turn of mind, he devoted himself more to poetry, antiquities, and heraldry, than to law; and early in 1769 some of his compositions appeared in the periodical publications of the times. In 1770 he left Bristol and came to London, with the hope of making his fortune by his pen; but though he flattered the great, and espoused in political pieces the cause both of the ministry and of opposition, though he was courteously treated by Beckford in the height of his popularity, yet he found his income inferior to his wants. Though a liberal contributor to the Gospel Magazine, the Town and Country, the Court and City, the London, the Political Register, &c. he found himself indignantly dependent upon the booksellers, and a prey to the severest indigence, so that in a fit of despair he destroyed himself by poison, August, 1770. Though possessed of great genius, Chatterton was irascible, headstrong, and impetuous in his temper, and it has been said by his biographer that he had all the vices and irregularities of youth, and that his profligacy was at least as conspicuous as his abilities. His name is known particularly in controversial history. He published a number of poems, which he described as written about 300 years before by Rowley, a Bristowyan monk, and when pressed for the originals, he refused to give them, but declared that he had received them from his father, whose family had for nearly 150 years been sextons of Redcliff church in Bristol, and that till then they had remained disregarded and buried in dust in an old chest, in an unfrequented room over the chapel. This story, which Chatterton always supported as undeniably true, called forth the attention of the learned, and whilst some of the critics beheld in the poems of Rowley, all the marks of genuine antiquity, others considered them as a literary forgery imposed upon the credulity of the world, by the artifice of an ingenious though ill educated youth of 17. To Mr. George Catcott of Bristol, the public are indebted for the best part of the poems, who procured them from the unfortunate Chatterton. They were published in 1777, in one volume 8vo. by Tyrwhitt, and republished in 1778; and while Bryant and dean Milles and others considered Rowley as the real author of the poems, Tom Warton, Walpole, and others represented them as the authentic production of Chatterton, who thus wished to disguise the first efforts of his muse by assuming the venerable name of antiquity. Chatterton's works have been lately edited in 3 vols. 8vo.

CHAUCER, Geoffrey, a poet denominated by Dryden the father of English poetry.

He was born in London 1328, and studied at Cambridge, and afterwards at Oxford, and then travelled upon the continent. On his return he entered at the Inner Temple, and soon ingratiated himself into the friendship of persons of distinction, was made page to the king, and rewarded with a pension of 20 marks. He was afterwards gentleman of the chamber to the king, his salary was doubled in 1369, and after being employed to negotiate with the republic of Genoa, for ships for a naval armament, Edward repaid his services by granting him a pitcher of wine daily to be delivered by the butler of England. He became afterwards comptroller of the customs of London for wool, &c. and was employed as commissioner to the French court on the violation of the truce. These high favours, which contributed to his independence, and made his income not less than 1000*l.* a year, were confirmed by Richard, Edward's successor; but Chaucer, by embracing Wickliffe's tenets, became obnoxious to the persecution of the clergy, and though he escaped by flight for a time, he was imprisoned, and liberated at last with difficulty. He soon after removed from the bustle and intrigues of public life, and in his retirement at Woodstock, and afterwards at Donnington, he devoted himself to the cultivation of his muse. He died 25th October, 1400, and was buried in the great south cross aisle in Westminster abbey. He left two sons, Thomas, who was speaker of the house of commons in Henry IV.'s reign, and Lewis. His wife's name was Philippa Rouet, of Hainault, and as her sister Catharine, the widow of Sir Hugh Swinford, was married to John of Ghaunt, duke of Lancaster, Chaucer shared the favours of royalty, and was indebted for some of his honours to the influence of his princely brother-in-law. The poetry of Chaucer, though in the idiom of the 14th century, is not devoid of great smoothness and delicacy, the sentiments are bold, the characters are all well supported, and the genius of the poet is every where brilliant, sprightly, and sublime. Of all his poems the Canterbury tales possess the greatest merit. They have been learnedly edited by Mr. Tyrwhitt, 5 vols. 8vo. The life of the poet has been published by Godwin, in two ponderous vols. 4to. His works altogether were published by Urry, fol. The tales have been modernised and imitated by Dryden, Pope, and others.

CHAULIEU, William, a native of Fontenay, in Normandy, educated in the college of Navarre, at Paris. The liveliness of his genius recommended him to the notice of the great and the learned; he was courted by the duke of Rochefoucault, by Marsillac, by the dutchess of Bouillon, and by the duke of Vendome, who gave him a priorate in the isle of Oleron, with an income of 28,000 livres, and afterwards the abbey of Pouliers, Rennes, Aumale, &c. In the midst of affluence and conviviality, he gave vent to the sallies of his muse, and alleviated the pains of an obstinate gout, by composing epigrams and sonnets for the amusement of his friends, and the derision of his enemies. Though a perfect master of all the graces of poetry, and therefore deservedly styled the Anacreon of France, he had no wish of presenting his poems before the public, and they remained scattered in the hands of his friends, or in the collection of the curious, till collected by the attention of Camusac and St. Mark. Besides letters in prose, and epistles in verse, they contain elegies, ballads, madrigals, airs, and all the charming trifles of a careless, wanton, and sportive muse. Chaulieu died 1726, at the great age of 81. The best edition of his works is that of Paris, 2 vols. 8vo. 1774.

CHAUMETTE, Peter Gaspard, son of a cobbler, was born at Nevers, 24th May, 1763. After various low occupations he appeared as one of the boldest at the taking of the Bastille, and displayed all the violence of a republican and the zeal of a demagogue. United with Hebert, he for a while guided the sanguinary multitude, and proposed, with the feasts of the goddess of reason, those walking guillotines which were to purge France of all her royalists, and her suspected citizens. After being guilty of the most atrocious cruelties and the blackest profligacy, he was sent before the revolutionary tribunal by Robespierre, and when on the scaffold prophesied that his fall would soon be followed by that of his enemies. He was guillotined 13th April, 1794. A "precis historique" on life is attributed to him.

CHAUMONOT, Joseph, a native of Italy, was a missionary of the Society of Jesuits for more than half a century among the Indians of North America. He entered on his labours as early as 1642, among the Hurons, north of lake Erie, and spent most of his time among them. He composed a grammar of their language. [F. L.]

CHAUNCEY, Charles, a nonconformist divine, who migrated from Ware, Hertfordshire, to America, where he became president of Harvard college, and died 1671. His son Isaac afterwards came to England, and settled at Andover as a dissenting minister, but soon after studied physic, and practised in London, where he died about 1700. He wrote an essay on Daniel's prophecy—the divine institution of congregational churches, 8vo. &c.—He was born in Hertfordshire in 1589, and educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he obtained the degree of bachelor of divinity, and afterwards the professorships of Hebrew and Greek. After his arrival in New-England, he preached for some time at Scituate. He was appointed to the presidency of the college in 1654, and discharged the duties of the station with great reputation till his death. He was distinguished for talents, was an indefatigable student, and excelled as a scholar. J. L.

CHAUNCEY, Ichabod, a nonconformist, who was ejected from his living at Bristol, and then practised physic there, and died 1691, author of some tracts.

CHAUNCEY, Charles, D.D. congregational minister, and a descendant of president Chauncey, was born at Boston, Massachusetts, in 1705. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1721, and was ordained pastor of the first church in Boston in 1727, where he laboured till his death in 1787, in the eighty-third year of his age. He was eminent for his talents, learning, and love of civil and religious liberty. He rendered himself conspicuous by opposing Mr. Whitefield, and the extraordinary religious excitement which prevailed throughout New-England in 1743, and by several publications in favour of the doctrine of universal salvation, which met with an answer from Dr. Jonathan Edwards. J. L.

CHAUNCEY, Maurice, a Roman Catholic historian, was a monk of the Charter-house in London, at the commencement of the reformation, on which, being imprisoned, he escaped to save his life, and went over to Flanders till the accession of Mary. Then he and his brethren had the monastery of Shene, and he became confessor to the queen. On her death he went again to Flanders, and died at Brugn, 1581. Besides some other works, he wrote "historia aliquot nostri sæculi Martyrium, cum pia, tum lectu jucunda, nunquam—antehac typis excusa," 4to. 1550. Anthony Wood says he left behind him a most celebrated name for his rare piety, so that knowing and moderate protestants admit it is worthy to be kept in everlasting remembrance. J. L.

CHAUNCEY, Charles, LL.D. a distinguished lawyer, was born at Durham, in Connecticut, May 30, 1747. Removing to New-Haven, he was admitted to the bar, November, 1768, appointed secretary for the state, 1776, and a judge of the superior court, 1789. In 1793 he retired from public life. While at the bar his practice was uncommonly lucrative. He was forty years an instructor in jurisprudence, and his students are found in almost every state in the union, as eminent advocates, judges, and statesmen. He was president of the first agricultural society in Connecticut, which he was mainly instrumental in founding. He was familiar with the ancient and modern languages, with law, theology, and miscellaneous literature. Superior native faculties, improved by intense study for more than sixty years, rendered him one of the most learned men of the age, and his house was pre-eminently the abode of science, hospitality, and religion. J. L.

CHAUNCEY, Henry, was educated at Bishop Stortford school, and Gonvil college, Cambridge, and entered at the Middle Temple, and was called to the bar. Rising by degrees in his profession, he was knighted by Charles II. 1681, and seven years after made a sergeant at law, and appointed a Welch judge. He was married three times, and died at Yardley, 1700. He is the author of the historical antiquities of Hertfordshire, in one vol. folio.

CHAUSSE, Michael Angelo de la, a learned antiquary of Paris, who went early to Rome, where he published his Musæum Romanum, fol. 1690, improved to two vols. fol. in 1746. He gave to the world besides recueil des pierres gravées antiques, in 4to. 1707—and picturæ antiquæ cryptarum Roman. et sepulcri nasonum, fol. 1738, all which display great erudition, and remarkable judgment.

CHAUVEAU, Francis, a painter and engraver of Paris, who died there 1676, aged 63. His first engravings were from the pieces of la Hire, but he soon trusted to his own genius, and used the graver only for the delineation of his own pictures. Not less than 4000 pieces are mentioned as engraved by him, and 400 executed from his designs.

CHAUVEAU, Rene, son of the preceding, possessed the genius and followed the profession of his father. He distinguished himself particularly as a sculptor. He resided for some years in Sweden and at Berlin, and died at Paris 1722, aged 59.

CHAUVIN, Stephen, a native of Nismes, who as a protestant left France at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and went to Rotterdam, and afterwards to Berlin, where he became professor of philosophy. He died 1725, aged 85. He published Lexicon philosophicum, fol. and a new journal des savans, begun at Rotterdam, 1694.

CHAZELLES, John Matthew, a French mathematician, born at Lyons, 1657. He came to Paris in 1675, and was recommended to Cassini, whom he assisted in the measurement of the meridian line. In 1684, he instructed the duke of Mortemar in mathematics, and by his influence was appointed hydrography professor for the galleys of Marseilles, where he made many valuable observations, and drew a new map of the coast of Provence, besides plans of various harbours and forts. His great and extensive abilities were usefully employed by the French ministry. His astronomical observations were not confined to Europe, but he visited Greece and Egypt, and first observed in his measurement of the great pyramid, that its four corners exactly correspond to the four cardinal points of the world. Chazelles, whose private character and virtuous deportment was not surpassed by the extent of his genius, died January, 1710. Besides his voyage in the Levant, he contributed greatly to the improvement of the Neptune François. He was made member of the academy of sciences in 1695.

CHEFONTAINES, Christopher de, a native of Britany, provincial and general of the cordeliers. He was in 1579 made archbishop of Cæsaria by Gregory XIII. and sent to Flanders, where his eloquence as a preacher made many converts among the protestants. He died at Rome 1595, aged 63. He was in his character a most learned man, an able and judicious divine, but accused also of heretical opinions. His work on transubstantiation was regarded as curious.

CHEKE, John, a learned Englishman, born at Cambridge, 16th June, 1514, and educated at St. John's college. He was made professor of Greek in the university, with a stipend of 40*l.* a year, and in 1544, he was appointed tutor with sir Anthony Cooke, to prince Edward. On the accession of his pupil to the throne, he was rewarded with an annuity of 100 marks, and a grant of land, and appointed besides provost of king's college. In 1551 he was knighted, and soon after rose to the office of secretary of state. On the accession of Mary he was stripped of his honours, and permitted to travel abroad, but after supporting himself for some time at Strasburg by teaching Greek, he was seized on his return between Brussels and Antwerp, by Philip of Spain, and sent like a traitor to London. His religion was now the cause of his persecution, but he did not possess the firmness of a martyr, and when offered to choose between the fagot and popery, he abjured his faith, and was received by cardinal Pole into the bosom of the catholic church. A confession so violently extorted and so rashly given, preyed now upon his spirits, and shortened his days. He died of shame and remorse, 13th September, 1557, aged 43. He left three sons. His works were numerous and valuable, and they are mentioned by Strype in his life. Those best known are the hurt of sedition, against the insurgents 1549—epistles on the death of Bucer—de pronunciatione Græcæ potissimum linguæ disputationes, 1555, Basil—de superstitione ad regum Henricum, &c. He was deservedly considered as one of the most learned men of his age, but his attempts to improve the pronunciation of Greek was regarded by bishop Gardiner as heresy, and therefore forbidden.

CHELONIS, a daughter of Leonidas, who married Cleombrotus, king of Sparta, and proved a remarkable example of filial and conjugal affection.

CHEMIN, Catharine du, a French lady, wife to Girardon, and eminent for painting flowers. She died at Paris, 1698, and her husband erected a monument to her memory in the church of St. Landez.

CHEMINAIS, Timoleon, a native of Paris, much respected as a preacher among the Jesuits, and little inferior to Massillon. He died 1690, aged 38. Besides five volumes of sermons, he published sentiments of piety, &c.

CHEMNITZ, Martin, a Lutheran divine, born at Britzen in Brandenburg. He studied at Magdeburg and Frankfort on the Oder, and afterwards taught a school in Prussia, and became librarian to the prince. He afterwards returned to Wittemberg, where his friend Melancthon lived, and thence removed to Brunswick, where he died after 30 years' residence, 1586, aged 64. His works are Harmonia evangeliorum—a treatise against the Jesuits—and examen concilii Tridentini, a valuable performance. His character was highly esteemed by the princes of Germany, so that he is deservedly ranked next to Luther, on account of the services which he performed in the establishment of the reformation. He was also well versed in astronomy and mathematics.

CHEMNITZ, Boreslaus Philip, grandson of the above, was born at Stettin, and died 1678, aged 73. He served in a military capacity in the armies of Holland and Sweden, and became counsellor of state and historiographer to queen Christina. His history of the Swedish wars in Germany appeared in 2 vols. fol.

CHERILUS, a Greek poet, intimate with Herodotus. He celebrated the victories of his country over the Persians.

CHERON, Elizabeth Sophia, daughter of a painter at Meaux, was born at Paris. She devoted her time to poetry, painting, the learned languages, and music, and obtained great celebrity by her pencil, especially in history, oil colours, and in miniature. She was admitted into the academy of painting and sculpture, and the academy of Ricovrati at Padua honoured her with the appellation of Erato. She died at Paris, 3d Sept. 1711, aged 63.

CHERON, Lewis, brother to the preceding, was born at Paris, and came to London, where he executed some historical pieces, especially the judgment of Paris, and the council of the gods, for the duke of Montague. He was a protestant, and died in London 1713, aged 53.

CHERUBIN, father, a capuchin friar of Orleans, in the middle of the 17th century.

His book called ocular dioptrics, on the theory of telescopes—and his vision parfaite, 2 vols. fol.—prove his abilities as a mathematician and philosopher.

CHESELDEN, William, an English surgeon of great eminence, born at Somerby in Leicestershire. He was the pupil of Cowper, and also of Ferri, the surgeon of St. Thomas's hospital. He early distinguished himself, and began to read lectures at the early age of 22, which he continued for upwards of 20 years. He was successful in cutting for the stone, and he immortalized himself by giving sight to a youth of 14, who had never seen, of which he published a curious and interesting account. He was now at the head of his profession, and was appointed principal surgeon to queen Caroline, and blessed with well-earned fame and independence. He obtained also what he chiefly wished, the office of head surgeon to Chelsea-hospital, which he retained till his death. He died of an apoplexy, April 10th, 1752, aged 64. He was intimate with Pope, by whom he was greatly esteemed. His anatomy of the human body, published 1713, has passed through several editions. He wrote besides osteography in folio, 1733, and other anatomical essays chiefly inserted in the philosophical transactions. He was the first foreigner admitted member of the French royal academy of surgery.

CHESNE, Joseph du, physician to the French king, was born at Armagnac. After residing some time in Germany, he settled at Paris, and acquired great celebrity by his practice, and by his knowledge of chymistry, though he was opposed and ridiculed by other physicians, especially Guy Patin. He died at an advanced age at Paris, 1609. He wrote in verse the folly of the world, 4to.—and the great mirror of the world, 4to.—besides some treatises on chymistry.

CHESNE, Andre du, called the father of French history, was born at Turenne, and crushed to death by a cart as he was returning from Paris to his country house in 1640, in his 56th year. He wrote the history of the Popes, 2 vols. fol.—history of England, 4 vols. fol.—history of French cardinals—collection of French historians, 24 vols. fol. of which only four were published by him.

CHESTER, John, colonel in the American army, was born at Weathersfield, January 29th, 1749, and graduated at Yale college, in 1766. He joined the revolutionary army in 1775, at the head of a company of volunteers, and distinguished himself at the battle of Bunker Hill. He was afterwards advanced to the rank of colonel, and continued in the army much respected till 1777. He was afterwards, for some time, speaker of the legislature of Connecticut, and a member of the council. In 1791, he was appointed by Washington, supervisor of the district of Connecticut. He also held for some time the office of judge of the county court and of judge of probate. He was distinguished for abilities, dignity, and amiableness of manners, integrity, and usefulness. He died on the 4th of November, 1809. L.

CHESTERFIELD, Philip, earl of. Vid. STANHOPE.

CHETWODE, Knightley, was born at Coventry, and became fellow of King's college, Cambridge. He was nominated bishop of Bristol on Trelawney's translation, but James abdicated before the election could pass the seals, and he lost the see. He was afterwards chaplain to the English forces in Holland, under Marlborough, became dean of Gloucester, 1707, and died April 4th, 1720. He wrote, besides some poems, a life of lord Roscommon, still remaining in MS. at St. John's, Cambridge.

CHEVALIER, Anthony Rodolph le, a native of Montchamps in Normandy, who left France on account of his religion, and was employed as teacher of the French language to Elizabeth, afterwards queen of England. He left England at the beginning of Mary's reign, and studied the oriental languages under Tremelius, whose daughter he married, and then taught Hebrew at Strasburg and Geneva. He afterwards returned to France, but escaped on the dreadful day of St. Bartholomew, and came to Guernsey, where he died, 1572, aged 65. Besides the Jerusalem Targum translated from the Syriac, he published a Latin grammar of the rudiments of the Hebrew language, 4to. 1574.

CHEVALIER, Lewis, a native of Touraine, who in his youth entered among the religious of la Trappe, but afterwards, in consequence of the austerities of the monastic life, he applied himself to the law, and acquired eminence. His pleadings for the canons of Rheims appeared in 1716. He was a man of great piety, and died 1744, aged 81.

CHEVERT, Francis de, a French general, born of obscure parents at Verdun. He rose from the ranks, and distinguished himself by assiduity, courage, and a great knowledge of tactics. After Bellisle's retreat from Prague, he defended the place with the most obstinate bravery, and yielded only through famine, 1742, and on honourable terms. His valour greatly contributed to the victory of Hastenback in 1757, and that of Lautenberg. He died, 1769, aged 74.

CHEVILLIER, Andrew, author of the origin of painting in Paris,—of a dissertation on the council of Chalcedon,—and other works, was a learned Frenchman, librarian to the Sorbonne, and who died 1700, aged 64.

CHEVREAU, Urban, a native of Loudun in Poitou, who distinguished himself by his assiduity and learning, and became secretary to Christina queen of Sweden, whom he had the art to reconcile to the catholic faith. After his return to Paris he was preceptor to the duke of Maine, and he afterwards retired to his native place, where he built an elegant mansion, and died after spending there 20 years of ease and literary seclusion from the world, 1701, aged nearly 88. He wrote a history of the world—the effects of fortune, a romance—and other things.

CHEW, Benjamin, president of the high court of appeals of Pennsylvania, was born in Maryland, November 29th, 1722, and after having received a classical education, went to England in 1743, and studied law in the Temple. On his return, he settled in Delaware with a high reputation for talents, acquirements, and excellence of character. In 1754, he removed to Philadelphia, and soon became one of the most conspicuous men in the province. After holding several inferior stations, he was in 1774 appointed the chief judge of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, and held the office till the dissolution of the colonial government in 1776. At the commencement of the revolution he warmly opposed the encroachments of the British, but disapproved of the separation of the colonies from the parent country. He retired to private life, enjoying the respect of his fellow-citizens, and on the organization of the new judiciary department in 1791, was appointed president of the high court of appeals of that state, and held the station till the abolition of that tribunal in 1807. He died January 20th, 1810, aged 87. His talents were highly respectable, his learning extensive, his manners dignified, and his public and private life adorned by great uprightness and amiability. [L.]

CHEYNE, George, a Scotch physician, educated at Edinburgh. When 30 years of age he came to London, and from an abstemious mode of life became a jovial and free-living companion. He grew so much in bulk and unwieldy corpulence, that the smallest exertions were painful to him, and all the powers of medicine were unavailing to relieve him, till the use of a milk diet reduced him from the enormous weight of 32 stone to nearly one-third, and enabled him to live to the mature age of 72. He died at Bath, 1743. He wrote an essay on long life and health—tractatus de infirmorum sanitate, &c.—a treatise on nervous diseases—fluxionum methodus—philosophical principles of religion natural and revealed.

CHEINEL, Francis, was born and educated at Oxford, and made fellow of Merton in 1629. During the civil wars he embraced the puritanical party, and as the favourite of the parliament, he was sent to convert the university and made visiter, and in 1648, appointed Margaret professor there, and president of St. John's college. He was, however, incapable of filling those places with becoming propriety, and he retired to his living of Petworth, in Sussex, from which he was ejected at the restoration. He is much less known for his sermons and political tracts, than for his acquaintance with the celebrated Chillingworth. He attended him in his last moments, and when he was buried at Chichester, he contemptuously threw the book which that great author had written against the papists into his grave, with every mark of insolent zeal and fanatical madness. He died at Preston, in Sussex, 1665, leaving behind him several sons.

CHIABRERA, Gabriello, an Italian poet, born at Savone, where he died, 1638, aged 86. He studied at Rome, and was much courted by the wits and great men of the age, and particularly by pope Urban VIII. He wrote heroic, dramatic, pastoral, and lyric poems, published at Rome, 1718, in 8vo.

CHIARI, Joseph, a historical painter, born at Rome, and pupil to Carlo Maratti. He was attacked with the plague when an infant, and though he recovered, his constitution ever after felt the shock. His pieces adorned the public buildings and churches of his native city. He died 1727, aged 73.

CHIAVISTELLI, Jacob, a perspective painter of Florence, who died 1693, aged 77.

CHICHELY, Henry, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Higham Ferrers, and educated at Winchester-school, and New college, Oxford. He was sent by Henry IV. to congratulate Gregory XII. on his elevation to the papacy, and was appointed by him bishop of the vacant see of St. David's. In 1409, he was at the council of Pisa, and five years after, on the death of Arundel, he was translated to Canterbury. In this high office, he supported his power with great firmness, and enlarged the privileges of the clergy, and boldly excommunicated lord Strange, who had assaulted Sir John Trussel in St. Dunstan's church, and killed one of his servants. He also opposed the encroachments of the pope, and rendered himself popular by his influence with the clergy, and by promoting occasional donations for the support of the government. Besides founding in his native town a college for one master and eight fellows and other subordinate officers, he laid the foundations of that noble edifice in Oxford, called All Souls. This splendid college was completed in 1440, and the chapel was with great pomp consecrated by the founder. Chichely was very munificent in his contributions to charitable purposes. He died 12th April, 1443, after being archbishop 29 years, and he was buried in Canterbury cathedral. It is said that when 80, he wished to resign his exalted situation, which the pope refused.

CHICHERLY, Sir Henry, one of the most considerable planters in Virginia, was appointed in 1674 lieutenant governor of the colony, under Sir William Berkeley. Colonel Jeffries succeeded Berkeley, and dying in 1678, the administration devolved on Sir Henry, who was again commissioned lieutenant governor. The following year Lord Culpepper arrived as governor general. He left Virginia in 1680, and Chicherly was again placed at the head of government. Discontents prevailed at this time among the people, on account of a law passed in 1680, prohibiting masters of ships to lade or unlade excepting at stated places. The colony was threatened with a second rebellion, and the measures adopted by the governor, some of which were contrary to his instructions, and of which he assumed the sole responsibility, gave evidence of his prudence and decision of character. In 1682, Lord Culpepper returned to his relief.

CHICOYNEAU, Francis, a native of Montpellier, physician to the French king. He was sent by the regent Orleans to stop the plague at Marseilles, and the confidence with which he entered a place, filled with disease and death, contributed, with his excellent prescriptions, to reanimate the terrified inhabitants, and dispel the distemper. He was honourably rewarded as he fully deserved. He died at Versailles, 1752, aged 80. Of his works, the most curious is that in which he supports that the plague is not contagious.

CHICOYNEAU, Francis, son of the above, was as illustrious as his father in medicine. He chiefly excelled, however, in botany, and greatly improved and adorned the royal garden at Montpellier. He died 1740, aged 38, professor and chancellor of the university of Montpellier, an honour which four of his family had enjoyed before him.

CHIFFLET, John James, a physician, born at Besancon. After travelling through Europe, and being for some time physician to the archduchess of the Low Countries, he remained in the same capacity with Philip IV. of Spain, who treated him with great kindness. He died in a good old age. He wrote Vindiciæ Hispanicæ against the French, besides other works. His son John distinguished himself by his knowledge of Hebrew; and his son Julius was eminent as a civilian, and was in great favour with the king of Spain.

CHILDEBERT I. king of France, after his father Clovis, 511. He assisted his brothers Clotaire and Clodomir in the defeat of Sigismund king of Burgundy; but he was afterwards routed in his attempt to invade the Spanish dominions. He died at Paris, 558.

CHILDEBERT II. son of Sigebert and Brunehaut, succeeded his father in the kingdom of Austrasia 575. He afterwards joined the kingdom of Burgundy, of Orleans, and part of Paris, to his own dominions, after the death of Chilperic, king of Soissons, and died by poison 596, aged only 26. During his reign some excellent regulations were made for the preservation of good order and subordination.

CHILDEBERT III. brother of Clovis III. and son of Thierry, was surnamed the just. He was governed during the whole of his reign by Pepin, the mayor of the palace, and died 711, in the 16th year of his reign, and aged 28.

CHILDERIC I. king of France after his father Merovæus, 456. He was banished the next year for his ill conduct, and retired to Thuringia, from which he was recalled in 463. He afterwards behaved with great valour, and enlarged his kingdom by conquest. He died 481, aged 45.

CHILDERIC II. son of Clovis and Bathilda, succeeded his brother Clotaire III. 670, and for a while, when governed by the wise counsel of Leger, bishop of Autun, he was a popular monarch. He afterwards gave himself up to every species of licentiousness and cruelty, and was at last assassinated by Bodilon, in the forest of Livri, 673. His wife and his son shared his fate.

CHILDERIC III. surnamed the idiot and the idle, was raised to the throne by Pepin, 742. Some time after he was hurled from his elevation by the same powerful minister, and confined in a monastery, where he died, 755. He was the last of the first race of the French kings, and was succeeded by Pepin.

CHILLINGWORTH, William, a celebrated divine, born at Oxford, October 1602. Laud, then fellow of St. John's, was his godfather. He entered at Trinity, and applied himself not only to divinity, but to the mathematics and poetry, but his acquaintance with Fisher the celebrated Jesuit, overturned his faith, and with more zeal than judgment he embraced the tenets of the catholic religion. That he might pursue his studies with more success, he retired to Douay university, but the correspondence of Laud, now bishop of London, shook his religious opinions, and he soon became sensible that the pope of Rome is not that infallible person he had implicitly believed. Restored to the protestants, Chillingworth returned to Oxford, where he proposed to complete his free inquiry into religion. The change of his principles, however, drew upon him all the virulence of the catholics, but in several treatises, as well as by letters and conversations, he defended his conduct, and supported the reasonableness of the protestant tenets, with such mildness, united with firmness and candour, that even his enemies applauded him. In 1637, his book, called the religion of protestants a safe way to salvation, appeared, and with a modest and elegant dedication it was presented to Charles I. and so universally admired was it, that it passed through several editions, and will remain a lasting monument of the author's superior abilities, and of sound reason, and pure religion. Though admired and respected as a divine, Chillingworth yet started objections against the thirty-nine articles, and refused to assent to the damnatory clauses of the Athanasian creed. His scruples, however, gradually removed, and he subscribed the articles, considering it as a subscription of peace and union, and not of belief or assent. Soon after he was promoted to the chancellorship of Salisbury, with the prebend of Brixworth, Northamptonshire, and the mastership of Wigston's hospital, Leicestershire. The troubles of the times prevented higher elevation. Chillingworth, who was zealously attached to the king's cause, took up arms against the republicans, and acted as engineer at the siege of Gloucester. At the siege of Arundel, however, he was taken prisoner with the garrison by Sir William Waller, and as he then laboured under an indisposition, he was removed to Chichester, where after a short illness he expired in the bishop's palace. His last moments were attended by the fanatical Cheynell, who at his funeral insulted his remains by throwing with religious frenzy into his grave his celebrated book mentioned above. He died about the 30th of January, 1644, and was buried in Chichester cathedral. Clarendon has improperly mentioned that he died in Arundel-castle. The fame of Chillingworth is firmly established as a noble disputant, a perspicuous reasoner, and a candid and inquisitive philosopher, and he is more than entitled to the commendations which not only Wood, but Tillotson and Locke, themselves such patterns of excellence, have passed upon him. Besides his works already mentioned, and several others in the defence of religion and of loyalty, some valuable manuscripts are preserved in Lambeth chapel, among Mr. H. Wharton's MSS.

CHILMEAD, Edmund, was born in Gloucestershire, and educated at Christ Church, Oxford. On being ejected from his livings by the republicans in 1648, he subsisted in London by teaching music. He died, 1654. He wrote a treatise on the use of the globes, and published translations of some Greek authors.

CHILO, a philosopher of Sparta, and one of the seven wise men. He died about 597 B. C.

CHILPERIC I. youngest son of Clotaire I. succeeded on his father's death to the kingdom of Soissons 561. His wife Galasuinda was barbarously assassinated as it is supposed by his mistress Fredegonde; but instead of avenging her death he married the suspected murderess, and committed every kind of cruelty to satisfy her vengeance and ambition. He lost part of his dominions by the invasion of Sigebert king of Austrasia, who wished to punish the death of his sister-in-law the murdered queen, and after sacrificing his sons Merovæus and Clovis to the jealousy of the infamous Fredegonde, he at last saw the wickedness of his conduct, and became a devotee. He was murdered as he was returning from hunting in 584, and Fredegonde and her favourite Landri were universally suspected as the assassins.

CHILPERIC II. son of Childeric II. succeeded Dagobert III. in 715. He headed his troops with Rainfray, the mayor of the palace, against Charles Martel, but was soon after defeated, and when in the power of the conqueror reduced to privacy. He died at Attigny, and was buried at Noyon in 720.

CHINE NOUNG, emperor of China, about 2837 years B. C. is said to have instructed his subjects in agriculture, and in extracting wine from rice. He was well acquainted with mathematics, physic, music, and poetry.

CHING or XI-HOAM-TI, emperor of China, about 240 B. C. is said to have built the great wall after the expulsion of the Tartars. He was warlike, but disgraced his reign by burning all the books which he could procure.

CHIRAC, Peter, physician to the French king, was born at Conques in Rouergue. He was professor of medicine at Montpellier, and was appointed physician to the army of Roussillon by marshal Noailles, in which capacity his treatment of the sick soldiers under a violent dysentery was particularly successful. He was also very successful during an epidemic distemper at Rochefort, and a pestilence at Marseilles. He died 11th March, 1732, aged 82. He wrote dissertations on wounds—on fevers—on the use of the rust of iron in the incubus—besides other medical tracts.

CHISHULL, Edmund, was born at Eyworth, Bedfordshire, and educated at Corpus Christi college, Oxford. He obtained a travelling fellowship, and consequently visited Turkey and the Levant, and was chaplain to the English factory at Smyrna. He became B. D. 1705, and was presented by Mr. Conyers to the living of Walthamstow, in Essex, where he died 18th May, 1733. He wrote against Dodwell on the mortality of the soul, and his travels in Turkey were published in 1747, by Mead, in folio.

CHITTENDEN, Thomas, first governor of Vermont, was a native of Guilford, Conn. and born in 1730. He had only a common education, and rose above those around him by the superiority of his talents. In 1774, he removed to Williston, Vermont, and in 1777, was appointed a member of the convention, which declared that to be an independent state. In the following year, he was elected governor, and was re-chosen to the office with the exception of one year till his death in 1797. He was a man of strong sense, keen discernment, great integrity and humanity, and an exemplary Christian. [L. L.]

CHOIN, Mary Emily Joly de, a lady descended from a noble Savoy family. She was about the person of the dutchess of Conti, where she was seen by the dauphin; but no solicitations could prevail upon her to deviate from the rules of decorum and chastity. It is said that the prince at last married her privately, and, in her company, reformed his conduct, and regained the affection of the king. After his death, in 1711, she retired to obscurity, and died 1744, universally respected for her private virtues.

CHOISEUL, Stephen Francis duc de, a French politician of great abilities. After enjoying the confidence of Lewis XV. and serving his country as an ambassador and as minister at home, he was disgraced; and on his retirement, still retained popularity and universal respect. He was a liberal and munificent patron of arts and of literature, and by his political intrigues, was called by the king of Prussia the coachman of Europe. He died 1785, aged 66.

CHOISI, Francis Timoleon de, prior of St. Lo, and dean of Bayeux, was engaged by the French government to go as ambassador to the king of Siam, who wished, it was said, to become a convert to Christianity. Though he had spent the earlier part of his life in debauchery, yet he reformed his conduct, and applied himself to the cultivation of literature. He died at Paris, October 2, 1724, aged 81. He wrote an account of his journey to Siam—the history of France, during five reigns, 5 vols. 4to.—an ecclesiastical history, 11 vols. 4to.—dialogues on the immortality of the soul, &c.

CHOMEL, Pcter John Baptist, physician to the French king, died 1740. He wrote history of common plants, 3 vols. 1761. His son John was also a physician, and died 1765. He wrote Essay on the History of Medicine in France—the Life of Molin—

Eulogy of Duret—letters on the maladies among cattle.

CHOPIN, René, a native of Bailleul in Anjou, distinguished as a lawyer, and known as the author of a treatise de domino—de sacrâ politicâ monasticâ—the customs of Anjou—the customs of Paris, &c. all published in 6 vols. fol. He died under the operation of being cut for the stone, 1606, aged 69.

CHORIER, Nicholas, author of the philosophy of an honest man—the history of Dauphiné—Latin poems—and an indecent work called Aloysiæ Sigæ Toletanæ Satyra Soladica de arcanis amoris et Veneris—was an advocate of the parliament of Grenoble, where he died 1692, aged 83.

CHOSROES I. the Great, succeeded Cambades as king of Persia 531. He made war against the Romans, but was defeated by Belisarius, and afterwards by Tiberius, and died of vexation 579. To great virtues he united unhappily cruelty, oppression, and boundless ambition.

CHOSROES II. succeeded his father Hormisdas as king of Persia 590. His cruelties excited the revolt of his subjects, but the Romans supported him, and he was enabled to conquer Egypt, Africa, and Judæ. He was at last defeated by Heraclius, and imprisoned by his own son. He died in confinement 627.

CHOUET, John Robert, a native of Geneva, possessed of such talents, that at the age of 22 he was appointed professor of philosophy at Saumur, where he replaced the tenets of Aristotle with the philosophy of Des Cartes. In 1669, he returned to Geneva as professor, and by his popularity obtained a seat in the council 1686. He was repeatedly syndic, and died 1731, aged 89, universally respected as a good citizen and an upright magistrate. He wrote introduction to logic—theses physicæ de variâ astrorum luce—discourses on the history of Geneva—and other works.

CHOUL, William du, a French antiquary of Lyons. He travelled over Italy, and wrote a valuable treatise, 1556, on the religion and castramentation of the ancient Romans, which has been translated into Latin and Italian.

CHRISTIE, William, was educated at Aberdeen, and appointed master of the grammar-school at Montrose, where he lived respected as a diligent and attentive master, and died 1774, aged 44. His grammar and his introduction to the making of Latin are both well spoken of.

CHRISTIERN I. king of Denmark, son of Thierry count of Oldenburg, succeeded Christopher of Bavaria 1448. He was a popular monarch, benevolent and humane. He founded the order of the elephant, and died 1481.

CHRISTIERN II. surnamed the cruel, or the northern Nero, succeeded on the Danish throne his father John 1513. He was elected king of Sweden 1520; but instead of proving, as he promised, the father of his people, he became their tyrant, and massacred at a feast ninety-four of the Swedish nobles to whom he owed his elevation. A series of atrocities rendered him so unpopular in his new dominions, that he was driven from Sweden by the valour of Gustavus; but in Copenhagen he pursued the same ferocious conduct, in consequence of which he was expelled from his throne by his indignant subjects, and escaped to Flanders. Ever restless and ambitious, he gained the Dutch to espouse his cause; but he was defeated in his attempt to recover his dominions, and died in prison 25th January 1559, universally abhorred.

CHRISTIERN III. nephew and successor of Frederic I. 1534, deserved and obtained the affection of his subjects. He embraced the opinions of Luther, and made that the established religion of his kingdom. He died 1st January, 1559, aged 56.

CHRISTIERN IV. succeeded as king of Denmark his father Frederic II. 1588. He made war against the Swedes, and was nominated chief of the protestant league for the re-establishment of the prince Palatine, 1625. He died 28th February, 1648, aged 71, much respected as an able and benevolent monarch.

CHRISTIERN V. succeeded his father Frederic III. in 1670. He formed a league with the German princes, and made war against Sweden, but, though brave and warlike, he was defeated. He died 4th September 1699, aged 54.

CHRISTINA, queen of Sweden, daughter of Gustavus Adolphus the great, was born 8th December, 1626, and succeeded her father 1633. After reigning with splendour, and the character of a great and popular sovereign, she resigned the crown in 1654, in favour of her cousin, Charles Gustavus. She had some time before embraced the catholic religion, at the instigation of the Jesuits; and she retired to Rome, where she continued to reside till the death of her cousin in 1660; when she attempted, either by the suggestions of ambition, or the advice of her religious advisers, to resume the crown, which as a catholic she could not effect. She died at Rome 19th April, 1689, aged 63. She was a woman of great abilities, was well acquainted with several languages, and was not only a frequent correspondent with Grotius, Salmasius, Des Cartes, Vossius, Bochart, Huet, and other men of letters, but a liberal patroness of literature. Some circumstances, however, are mentioned which reflect some disgrace upon her character and manners.

CHRISTOPHERSON, John, an English prelate, born in Lancashire, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He became fellow and master of Trinity college, and dean of Norwich, and in queen Mary's reign he was made bishop of Clchester. He died the year after his elevation, a little before the queen. He was a firm Romanist. He translated Philo Judæus into Latin, and also the ecclesiastical histories of Eusebius, Sozomen, Socrates, Euegrius, and Theodoret; but as a translator he is neither faithful, nor elegant, nor accurate.

CHRYSIPPUS, a stoic philosopher of Tarsus, said to have written above 700 books. He died B.C. 207.

CHRYSOLORAS, Emanuel, a learned Greek, born at Constantinople about 1355. He came into England in the reign of Richard II. as ambassador from John Palæologus, to solicit assistance against the attacks of the Turks. After his return to Constantinople, he came to Florence, where he taught Greek for three years; and afterwards he became Greek professor in the university of Ticinum, at the request of the duke of Milan. He afterwards visited Venice and Rome; and, in 1413, he was sent by pope Martin V. as ambassador to Sigismund emperor of Germany, to settle the place for the meeting of a general council. He afterwards returned to his own emperor at Constantinople, by whom he was sent as ambassador to the council of Constance. He died at Constance, a few days after the opening of the council, 15th April, 1415; and a handsome monument was erected to his memory by the gratitude of his scholar Poggius. He wrote, besides a Greek grammar, a parallel between ancient and modern Rome.

CHRYSOSTOM, John, a native of Antioch, who became bishop of Constantinople, and one of the most illustrious fathers of the church. In eloquence and benevolence he was equally known; but the divisions of the age embittered in some degree his happiness, and he was banished from his see by his enemies, though afterwards restored. He died at Pityus, on the Euxine Sea, 407, aged 53. His works were edited by Montfaucon, in 13 vols. fol.

CHUBB, Thomas, was born at East Harnham, near Salisbury, 29th September, 1679. He was at the age of 15 apprenticed to a glover; but when his time was expired, as his eyes were weak, he engaged in business with a tallow chandler, but devoted his hours of relaxation to the laborious study of English books. A strong retentive memory soon rendered him well versed with mathematics, geography, and other sciences, but particularly divinity; and further to improve himself, he established a club at Salisbury, where the members disputed with freedom on all theological subjects.

The controversy about the Trinity between Clarke and Waterland then engaged deeply the public attention; and Chubb was prevailed on by his theological friends to commit his sentiments to paper. He complied, and his book called "the supremacy of the Father asserted, &c." was soon read, and universally admired. Now an author by profession, he was courted by the learned and the great. For some years he lived in the house of Sir Joseph Jekyll, and often waited at table as a servant out of livery, but refused the prospects of preferment for his obscurity at Salisbury, where he retired, and died 1747, aged 68. To the last period of life Chubb was attached to the business of a tallow chandler, and after the death of his partner he frequently assisted the nephew, on whom the concern devolved. After his death, two volumes, of posthumous works were published, which displayed the author as a violent opposer of the Mosaic and Christian dispensations, extravagant and licentious in his opinions, and shameless enough to deny a future judgment, and almost a future existence, the hopes and consolation of the good man. This publication greatly astonished the world, especially as nothing immoral, profligate, or licentious, had ever been observed in his conduct. His principal works are, the true gospel of Jesus Christ asserted—an inquiry into the ground and foundation of religion—four dissertations on subjects in the Old Testament, &c.

CHUDLEIGH, Mary, daughter of Richard Lee of Winsloder in Devonshire, was born 1656, and married Sir George Chudleigh, bart. by whom she had several children. She possessed respectable poetical talents, and published some poems, which passed through a third edition in 1722. She wrote besides some tragedies, operas, masques, still preserved in her family, and some essays on philosophical and moral subjects, which displayed, besides great neatness, and purity of language, an extensive degree of piety and knowledge, with resignation and benevolence of heart. She died 1710.

CHURCH, Benjamin, distinguished by his exploits in the Indian wars of New England, was born in Duxbury, Massachusetts, in 1639. He commanded the party, by which King Philip was killed, in 1676, and afterwards having the appointment of colonel, headed several expeditions against the French and Indians in Nova Scotia, and Maine. He was a man of great enterprise and bravery, upright and pious. He died in 1718. [F L.

CHURCHILL, Sir Winston, was born at Wootton Glanville, Dorsetshire, 1620, and is known more as the father of the great duke of Marlborough than as an historian. He was of St. John's college, Oxford, but the troubles of the times prevented his taking a degree, and he engaged warmly on the side of the king, in consequence of which his estates were forfeited. He married a daughter of Sir John Drake of Ashe in Devonshire, at whose house he took shelter from the persecution of his enemies, and at the restoration he recovered his property, and obtained a seat in parliament. He was knighted in 1663, and elected a member of the Royal Society. He published, in 1675, a kind of political essay on the history of England, in folio, which possessed little merit. He died 26th March, 1688. Besides his son above mentioned, and three sons and three daughters who died in their infancy, he had Arabella, who was mistress to the duke of York, and by whom he had two sons and two daughters. The eldest of these sons was the celebrated duke of Berwick, killed at the siege of Philippsburgh, 1734.

CHURCHILL, John, duke of Marlborough, and prince of the holy Roman empire, was son of the preceding, and was born at Ashe, June 24th, 1650. His education was little attended to by his father, who introduced him when 12 years of age to the court, and 1666, in the first Dutch war, he was made an ensign in the guards, and soon after went to Tangier to serve against the Moors. His time here was assiduously devoted to military science, he became on his return a favourite with the duke of Monmouth, in whose regiment he was made captain, and with whom he served against the Dutch at the siege of Nimeguen. He distinguished himself so much by his valour, that Turenne praised the conduct of the handsome Englishman, as he denominated young Churchill. At the reduction of Maestricht he was equally entitled to universal praise, so that the French monarch, whose auxiliaries the English then were, saw and commended his bravery. This well-deserved reputation advanced his fortunes at home; on his return to London he was made lieutenant-colonel by the king, and gentleman of the bed-chamber, and master of the robes to the duke of York, whom he accompanied into the Low Countries, and into Scotland. About this time Churchill married Sarah Jennings, a lady who attended on the princess Anne, afterwards queen of England. On his return from Scotland with the duke, he was shipwrecked on the coast, east of the Humber, but though more than 120 persons lost their lives, yet he had the good fortune to escape. His influence with the duke was now so great, that he was created a Scotch peer in 1682, by the title of baron Eymouth, and on the death of Charles he was sent as ambassador to France, to announce the elevation of his patron to the throne, and in 1685 he was made an English peer as baron Churchill. The invasion of Monmouth tended now to display his military abilities, he was sent against the unfortunate duke, and in a little time repressed his rebellion, and took him prisoner. These meritorious services highly recommended him to James, yet though he was consulted by him, and even intrusted with the command of 5000 men on the landing of William of Orange, he was suspected of favouring the cause of the invader, and accordingly he abandoned him, and fled to the prince, yet without betraying his secrets, or taking any of his soldiers with him. This step rendered him a favourite with the prince of Orange, and on the abdication of James, he was raised to new honours, made a privy counsellor, and created earl of Marlborough. In 1689 he was at the battle of Walcourt, and laid the foundation of that great military fame, which was soon to astonish the continent. He was afterwards in Ireland, where he supported the cause of William by the reduction of Cork; but in the midst of his popularity he was suddenly checked, his offices were taken from him, and his person confined in the tower; a violent measure, which is secretly attributed to his partial attachment to the interests of the princess Anne. This was, however, a partial eclipse of his greatness, the king knew his merits, and soon restored him to favour, and when, after queen Mary's death, he intrusted him with the care of the duke of Gloucester, he paid him this handsome compliment, "My lord, make him what you are, and my nephew will be all I wish to see him." Fresh favours were now heaped upon him, he was declared commander in chief of the troops sent over to Holland, and ambassador extraordinary to the states, and William evinced his further confidence in his attachment, by recommending him on his death-bed to Anne, as the fittest person to protect the liberties of Europe. The good opinion of William was continued by his successor; Marlborough was confirmed in his appointments, and elected by the United States captain general of all their forces, with a stipend of 100,000 florins per annum. Hostile to pusillanimous delays, he now prevailed upon the English ministry to declare war against France and Spain 1702, and he quickly repaired to his head quarters, and opened the campaign by reducing the strongest garrisons on the frontiers, and among them Venlo, Ruremond, and Liege, which was taken sword in hand. After these brilliant successes, he returned to London, where he was received as a conquering hero. The queen created him a duke, and granted him during her life a pension of 5000*l.* from the post-office. The next campaign was equally splendid, Marlborough defeated the allies at Schellenburgh, and afterwards at Hochstet, where Tallard the French general was taken prisoner, and after thus serving the empire and conquering all Bavaria, he returned to England, bringing with him as trophies of his conquests 121 standards and 179 colours, together with the captive general, and 26 officers of high distinction. On this occasion he received, as he had done the preceding year, the thanks of the parliament, and the queen seconding the wishes of a grateful nation, settled on him and his heirs the manor of Woodstock, and the hundred of Wootton. The campaign of 1705 was equally successful; but Marlborough distinguished himself particularly as a negotiator at the courts of Vienna, Berlin, and Hanover, and for these great services merited and received again on his return, the thanks of the parliament, though intrigues were made against his power, and attempts meditated to baffle him in the prosecution of the war. In 1706 he won the famous battle of Ramilies, after exposing himself to great personal danger, as colonel Bingfield, who held the stirrup for him to remount, had his head carried off by a cannon ball, and the consequence of this victory was the fall of Louvain, Brussels, Ghent, Antwerp, Ostend, Dendermonde, and other strong places. These successes were received with fresh marks of approbation by the English, he was not only unanimously thanked by both houses, but the queen was addressed to make his titles hereditary in the male and female lines of his daughters. Blenheim house was built by the nation to commemorate his victories, and the 5000*l.* from the post-office were now annexed to his title. The year 1707 was very barren in military incidents, but Marlborough on the following year, in conjunction with prince Eugene, pushed his conquests so rapidly that the French king in 1709 made serious proposals for a general peace. This was generally understood to be a manœuvre to disconcert the plans of the English and Dutch, but Marlborough, as great a negotiator as a general, soon defeated the plans of the enemy, and the French once more appeared in the field, headed by marshal Villars, an officer of whom Lewis XIV. boastingly spoke, saying, he had never been beat. Villars however was defeated at Malplaquet, and Tournay taken, and the duke returned to London to receive new congratulations and reiterated applauses. In the midst of his popularity however Marlborough began to feel the secret machinations of his political enemies, and though he was empowered to negotiate for a peace at Gertruydenburg, and though on its unsuccessful termination he renewed the war with his usual felicity, the queen was alienated from him, and yielding to the superior influence of a new favourite, Mrs. Masham, she withdrew her confidence from the dutchess, and listened too fondly to those who accused the duke of ambitious views. But though his family were removed from their offices, and his friends discarded, he remained still at the head of the army, and displayed against Villars those superior manœuvres of generalship which always ensured him success, and maintained his high reputation. On his return to England he was apparently well received by the queen, who soon after dismissed him from his employments, and his enemies attacked him in parliament, and while on one hand he was charged with ambitiously protracting the war, he was on the other accused of applying the public money intrusted to him to private purposes. The press also vented forth pamphlets against the duke whose great services were forgotten, and therefore yielding to the bitter and acrimonious language of faction and of persecution, he retired into voluntary banishment, and passed with the dutchess, November 14th, 1712, to Ostend, and remained for nearly two years on the continent. He returned a few days after the queen's death, and became a great favourite with George I. who consulted him with confidence, and by his advice took those bold measures which crushed the rebellion of 1715. This great man died loaded with infirmities 16th June, 1722, aged 73, at Windsor-lodge, and his remains were buried in Westminster abbey, with the greatest solemnity, August 9th. Besides the marquis of Blandford, who died at Cambridge in his 18th year, the duke had four daughters married into the most illustrious families of the kingdom. The emperor of Germany made him a prince of the empire, as a reward for his great military services. Some of his letters have been published, and show him to have been a man of consummate abilities. His dutchess survived him for some years. She was a woman of strong masculine powers of mind, of boundless ambition, and as arbitrary in the cabinet of the queen, as her husband was formidable in the field.

CHURCHILL, Charles, the poet, was born 1731, son of the Rev. Charles Churchill, curate of St. John's, Westminster. He was educated at Westminster, but though endowed with great natural abilities, yet he so much neglected their improvement that he was refused admission at Oxford for incapacity, though it is said this disgrace arose from the contempt with which he treated the frivolous questions proposed to him by his intended tutor. He continued, in consequence of this, at Westminster, and at the early age of 17 married, and when of proper age he was ordained by the bishop of London, and retired into Wales, upon a curacy of 30*l.* a year. In this retired situation, to improve his income he became a cider merchant, but his prospects of independence ended in a bankruptcy, and he came back to London, and on the death of his father succeeded to his curacy. He here added to his resources by teaching young ladies to read and write, but as his mode of living was expensive, his debts increased, and he was with difficulty saved from the horrors of a jail by the humanity of Mr. Lloyd, second master of Westminster school, who liberally satisfied his creditors. The success of "the actor" by young Lloyd at this time encouraged Churchill to cultivate the muses, and he published his Rosciad, which was so universally admired, that Colman, Thornton, and the wits of the age, were considered as the authors, and not an obscure clergyman. The popularity of this and other poems, and the emoluments arising from the sale, now altered the manners and conduct of the poet. Elevated with prosperity, he now quitted the habit and the sobriety of a clergyman, he became a fashionable man of the town, abandoned his wife, and launched into all the extravagance of gay and dissipated life. As the friend and associate of Wilkes he crossed to Boulogne in October, 1764, where some time after a fever attacked him and carried him off. He died 5th November, 1764. Besides his Rosciad, he wrote the prophecy of famine, an admired poem,—an apology to the critical reviewers,—night and the ghost, in which he ridicules Dr. Johnson in the character of Pomposo,—Gotham and independence,—epistle to Hogarth, &c. The poems after his death were published in 2 vols. 8vo. and have lately been re-edited. Though once popular and admired they are now little read. He wrote also some sermons.

CHURCHMAN, John, distinguished for his researches after the cause of the variation of the magnetic needle, was a native of Maryland, and a quaker. He published, besides several philosophical tracts, a useful variation chart of the globe, was a member of the Russian imperial academy, and was presented by it with a set of its transactions. He died on a passage from Europe, July 24th, 1805. [F L.]

CHURCHYARD, Thomas, a poet, born at Shrewsbury, author of the Worthies of Wales. He died about the 11th of queen Elizabeth, 1570. His epitaph is preserved by Camden.

CHYTRÆUS, David, a native Swabia, divinity professor at Rostock, and author of a commentary on the Revelation—of a history of the confession of Augsburg—and other works. He died 1600, aged 70.

CIACONIUS, Alphonsus, of Baeca, in Andalusia, died at Rome 1599, aged 59, with the title of patriarch of Alexandria. He was author of vitæ et gesta Romanorum portificum et cardinalium, 4 vols. fol—historia utriusque belli Dacici—bibliotheca scriptorum ad ann. 1583—explication of Trajan's pillar, fol. 1576.

CIACONIUS, Peter, a critic of Toledo, who died at Rome 1581, aged 56. He was employed by Gregory XIII. in correcting the calendar, and wrote learned notes on Arnobius, Tertullian, and other Latin writers.

CIAMPELLI, Augustine, a native of Florence, the pupil of Santi di Titi, and eminent as an historical painter. He died 1640, aged 62. Some of his pieces are preserved at Rome.

CIAMPINI, John Justin, a learned Italian, who established at Rome the academy of ecclesiastical history, and that of mathematics and natural history. He died 1698, aged 65. He wrote different works—on the remains of ancient Rome—on the sacred edifices built by Constantine, &c.

CIBBER, Colley, poet laureate to George II. was son of Caius Gabriel Cibber, a native of Holstein, by the daughter of William Colley, Esq. of Glaiston, Rutlandshire. He was born in London, 6th November, 1671, and educated at Grantham school, Lincolnshire. He did not succeed in his application to be admitted at Winchester college, and his intention of entering at Oxford was thwarted by the event of the revolution, which made him a soldier in favour of the prince of Orange. He soon after exchanged the military life for the stage, and appeared in inferior characters, at the salary of 10s. a week. The first character which he performed with success was the chaplain in the Orphan, and the next Fondlewife in the Old Bachelor, till he acquired eminence and an advanced salary. To add to his income, he now had recourse to his pen, and wrote Love's last shift, in which he himself bore a part. His best plays were the Careless Husband, acted in 1704, and the Nonjuror, in 1717. This last was a party piece, and was dedicated to the king, who gave to the poet 200*l.* and the appointment of laureate. But besides the malevolent attacks of periodical writers, the author was exposed to the enmity and satire of Pope, who, with more virulence than honour, made him the hero of his Dunciad. In 1730 he quitted the stage, though he occasionally appeared before the public, especially when his own plays were represented. He died December, 1757. His plays, which, like his children, as he jocosely observed, were numerous, were collected in 2 vols. 4to. Though he never succeeded either as a writer or actor of tragedy, nor as a lyric poet, yet it must be acknowledged, in spite of the malice and venom of Pope, that his comedies are sprightly and elegant, and his character as a man and as an actor respectable. His apology for his life is curious.

CIBBER, Theophilus, son of the preceding, was born in 1703, and educated for a little time at Winchester school, from which he passed upon the stage. Aided not so much by the influence of his father, who was manager of the theatre royal, as by his own natural powers, he soon rose to popularity and eminence as a favourite actor; and he might have ensured respectability and independence if he had possessed economy, and paid attention to the decorum and manners which ought to mark every private and public character. Thus exposed, by his extravagance and follies, to distresses and persecution, he at last embarked for Dublin, in October, 1757, to assist Sheridan against the opposition of a new theatre; but unfortunately the ship was wrecked on the coast of Scotland, and Cibber and the whole numerous crew perished. As a writer he produced Pattie and Peggy, a ballad opera, and he altered The lover, a comedy, and Shakspeare's Romeo and Henry VI. He wrote also some appeals to the public on his own distressful situation. The lives of the poets of Great Britain and Ireland, in 5 vols. 12mo. though bearing his name, were published by Robert Shields, an amanuensis of Dr. Johnson.

CIBBER, Susannah Maria, sister to Dr. Arne, and daughter of an upholsterer in Covent-garden, married Theophilus Cibber in April, 1734. Though this union displeased old Cibber, yet he was reconciled to his daughter-in-law, and soon had the pleasure to see her shine on the stage as a rising and popular actress. Her first attempt was in 1736, as Zera, in Aaron Hill's tragedy; and her powers soon appeared so great, that her salary was raised from 30s. a week to 3*l.* and the highest characters in tragedy were intrusted to her judicious and masterly representation. The conduct of her husband, however, did not conduce much to her felicity. His extravagance and dissipated manners revolted her, and she soon found that, to supply his necessities, he bartered her reputation and her honour. The guilty addresses of a favourite suiter, recommended by the intrigues of a worthless husband, soon triumphed over the scruples of a neglected and dishonoured wife; but when Cibber sought reparation in a court of justice, and claimed 5000*l.* for the violation of his domestic peace, the scene of depravity displayed induced the jury to return a verdict of 10*l.* only. Mrs. Cibber lived with her seducer till her death, which happened 30th January, 1766. She was buried in Westminster abbey. She left one natural child. She translated the oracle of St. Foix; but her great merit arises from her powers of acting, in which she displayed with so much success the feelings of the delicate Celia, the haughty Hermione, the love-sick Juliet, and the abandoned Alicia.

CICERO, Marcus Tullius, a celebrated orator, born at Arpinum. His eloquence in the Roman forum was so ardent as to rival the illustrious fame of Demosthenes; and in the elegance of his writings, and the clear and lucid arguments of his philosophy, he equalled the ablest authors, and the most renowned sages of Greece. He had the singular fortune of discovering and defeating the conspiracy of Cataline, during his consulship, and deserved to be called, for his services, another founder of Rome. In the struggles between Cæsar and the republic he however betrayed irresolution, and probably to that timidity which feared boldly to proclaim its sentiments, he owed his downfall. Augustus, in the establishment of his triumvirate, after flattering him, meanly sacrificed him to the resentment of Antony, by whose orders he was basely murdered as he fled to the sea-coast, B. C. 42, in his 63d year.

CICERO, Quintus Tullius, brother of the orator, was sacrificed to the dagger of the triumvirs.

CID, The, a Spanish hero, whose real name was don Roderigo Dias de Bivar. He was knighted in consequence of the valour he had displayed in his very youth; and, in 1063, marched with don Sancho of Castile against Ramiro king of Arragon, who fell in battle; after which he went to the siege of Zamora, where Sancho, now become king, was slain. On Sancho's death, his brother Alfonso ascended the throne of Castile; but Roderigo, instead of continuing the peaceful and obedient subject, declared himself independent, and, after depopulating the country, fixed his habitation at Pena de el Cid, the rock of the Cid, near Saragossa. He afterwards took Valentia, and maintained his independence till his death, 1099. The history of this hero, whose name Cid signified lord, has been immortalized in the romances of the Spaniards, and particularly in the popular tragedy of Corneille.

CIGALA, John Michael, an impostor, who, in 1670, appeared at Paris, and pretended to be an Ottoman prince and king of Jerusalem. He visited Poland, England, and other countries, and imposed upon the credulity of princes and of subjects, till some one who knew his obscurity and his artifice exposed him to the contempt and the derision of the world.

CIGNANI, Carlo, a painter of Bologna, educated in the school of Albano. His paintings are greatly admired for correctness, gracefulness, and a fertility of genius, which was successfully displayed in expressing the passions of the soul. He died at Forli, 1719, aged 91.

CIMABUE, Giovanni, known as the reviver of painting in Italy, was born at Florence, 1240. Under the direction of Grecian painters, who were sent for by the Florentines, he soon acquired that eminence which inventive genius and indefatigable application deserve. He painted for several of the cities of Italy, but particularly for his native city, where a picture of the Virgin is still seen and admired. He was also an eminent architect, and was engaged in the building of St. Maria del Fior church in Florence. His paintings were chiefly in fresco and in distemper, as painting in oil was not yet discovered. He died at the age of 60. His reputation, though respectable, would probably have been higher, had he not been eclipsed by his pupil and friend Giotto. His profile by Simon Sanese is still seen in the chapel-house of St. Maria Novella.

CIMON, an Athenian general, son of the great Miltiades, famous for his defeat of the Persians. He died at the siege of Citium in Cyprus, 449 B. C.

CINCINNATUS, Lucius Quintus, a famous Roman, whose virtues raised him to the dictatorship from the plough. He defeated the enemies of his country, and quickly returned to the cultivation of his farm. He lived about 460 B. C.

CINCIUS ALIMENTUS, Lucius, author of a history of the wars of Annibal, &c. is often quoted by Livy.

CINNA, Lucius Cornelius, a Roman consul, whose union with Marius deluged Rome with blood, about 87 B. C.

CINNAMUS, John, a Greek writer, in the service of Manuel Comnenus the emperor, of whose reign, and that of his father John, he composed a history, printed, Greek and Latin, Utrecht, 4to. 1652, and at Paris, by Du Cange, fol. 1670.

CINO DU PISTOIA, or DE SIGIBULDI, a poet of Pistoia, known as a lawyer and a senator of Rome. He was professor afterwards in various universities, and died 1336. He wrote a commentary on the digest, and deserved the commendation of Dante for his excellent poetry. His works were edited, Venice, 1589.

CINQ MARS, Henry Coissier, marquis of, son of marquis D'Effiat, was marshal of France, and the favourite of Lewis XIII. Though thus noticed by the king, and patronised by Richelieu, he had the ingratitude to encourage Gaston duke of Orleans, the king's brother, to rebel and to solicit the assistance of Spain in his perfidious enterprises. The plot was discovered by Richelieu, and Cinq Mars lost his head, September, 1642, aged 22.

CIOPANI, Hercules, an Italian critic of Sulmo. As a native of the same city which gave Ovid birth, he was induced to undertake a learned commentary on the works of his countryman, to which he prefixed a life, with an account of the country of Sulmo, published 1578. It possesses merit, and has been published in the edition of the variorum.

CIPRIANI, Vid. CYPRIANI.

CIRANI, Elizabeth, a native of Bologna, eminently distinguished as a painter. Though she was happy in tender and delicate subjects, she particularly excelled in the great and terrible.

CIRCIGNANO, Nicolo, called Pomerancio, from his native place, was a historical painter, several of whose pieces are preserved in the churches of Rome and Loreto. He died 1588, aged 72. His son Antonio, distinguished also as a painter, died 1620, aged 60.

CIRILLO, Dominic, a botanist, born near Naples, educated under the care of his uncle Nicholas, who was professor of medicine at Naples. Though intended for the profession of medicine, he showed greater partiality for natural history, and he obtained a professorship in botany at Naples, 1760, where the next year he published his introducio ad botanicum. He visited England, in the company of lady Walpole; and as he spoke English with great fluency, he derived much benefit from the lectures of Dr. W. Hunter, and the conversation of the learned in London. On his return to Italy, he again devoted himself to his favourite pursuits; but a restless and ambitious disposition proved his ruin. He embraced the tenets of the revolutionary philosophy, and when the French entered Naples, he boldly espoused their cause, and accepted an office under them; for which, on the restoration of the lawful sovereign, he was condemned, and executed as a traitor, 1795, aged 65. He wrote besides, nosologia methodicæ rudimenta, 1780—de essentialibus nonnullarum plantarum characteribus, 1784—Neapolitana Flora, 1793—Cyperus Papyrus, Parmæ, &c.

CIOFERRI, a painter and architect of Rome, greatly honoured by the duke of Tuscany, and particularly by pope Alexander VII. and his three successors. He was happy and correct in his subjects; but his characters wanted animation and variety. He died at Rome, 1689, aged 55.

CISNER, Nicholas, a native of Mosbach, on the Neckar, who studied at Strasburgh, under Bucer, and was professor of moral philosophy at Wittemberg. He afterwards visited France and Italy, and took his degrees in law at Padua, and settled at Heideberg, as professor, and counsellor to the elector Palatine. His works were published at Frankfort, 1611. He died 1583, aged 54.

CIVILIS, Claudius, a Batavian general in the service of Rome. He was suspected by the Romans of treachery, and treated with harshness: in consequence of which he roused his countrymen to rebellion, and expelled the Romans. He afterwards was reconciled to the emperor Vespasian, and submitted to his power.

CIVOLI, Lewis, or Cardi, was a native of Cigoli in Tuscany, and studied under Corregio. He also excelled in music and poetry; but devoted himself assiduously to painting. His best pieces are preserved at Florence.

CLAGETT, William, an English divine, born at Bury, Suffolk, where he was educated, and at Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he became D.D. 1683. He was for seven years a preacher in his native town, and afterwards was elected preacher to the society of Gray's-Inn. He was besides rector of Farnham-royal, Bucks, and lecturer of St. Michael Bassishaw. He was one of those resolute divines, who opposed the popish plans of James II. and he deserved for his learning, piety, and virtues, the high character which bishop Burnet and Dr. Sharp have given him. He died of the smallpox, 1688, aged 42, and his wife 18 days after him. Four volumes of his sermons were published after his death by his brother Nicholas. He was author of some controversial pieces.

CLAGETT, Nicholas, brother of the preceding, was also born at Bury, and educated at Christ's church, Cambridge, where he became D.D. 1704. He succeeded his brother as preacher at Bury, and continued there 46 years, and he was besides rector of Thurlow magna, and of Hitcham, and archdeacon of Sudbury. Besides his brother's works, he published some sermons and pamphlets of his own. He died Jan. 1727, aged 73; one of his children, Nicholas, was afterwards bishop of Exeter.

CLAIRAUT, Alexis, a learned mathematician of the French academy of sciences. He was one of those who visited the north, to discover the true form of the earth. He died 1765, aged about 52. He published elements of geometry and algebra—tables of the moon—treatise on the figure of the earth—besides several papers in the journal des sçavans. His abilities were prematurely displayed, as, it is said, that he could read and write at the age of 4, he understood algebra at 9, and at 11 wrote a memoir on curves, which was honourably applauded in the miscellanea Berolinensia.

CLAIBORNE, William Charles Cole, governor of Mississippi and Louisiana, was a native of Virginia, and born in 1773. He was bred a lawyer, and settled in Tennessee, where his talents early procured him an appointment as one of the judges of the territory. In 1796 he was a member of

The convention which framed the constitution of that state, and the following year was elected a representative to congress. On the accession of Mr. Jefferson, he was appointed governor of the Mississippi territory, in the place of governor Sargent. When Louisiana was purchased he was appointed, together with general Wilkinson, a commissioner for taking possession of that territory; and on the establishment of the new government was appointed governor of the most important section of the country, and discharged the duties of the office greatly to the satisfaction of the people, and to the general government. On the first election of the governor of Louisiana by the people, Mr. Claiborne was chosen, and continued in office until, by the provisions of the constitution, he was no longer eligible. In 1816 he was elected to a seat in the Senate of the United States, but was prevented from taking it by sickness. He died at New-Orleans, November 23d, 1817. ¶ L.

CLAIRFAIT, N. count de, an Austrian general, greatly distinguished against the French at the beginning of the revolution. He was a Walloon by birth, and was first employed against the Turks. His manœuvres in the Netherlands were rapid and masterly; but though after taking Longwy and Stanay, he lost the famous battle of Jemappe by the superior number and irresistible impetuosity of the French, he made a most heroic retreat across the Rhine. Afterwards, under the prince of Coburg, he distinguished himself at Altenhoven, Quievrain, Hansen, and Famars, and decided the victory of Neerwinden, and afterwards bravely opposed the progress of Pichegru. He defeated, in 1795, the French army near Mayence, and took many prisoners; soon after which he was recalled, and received with becoming respect by the emperor at Vienna, where he became counsellor of war, and where he died 1798. As a soldier, he was brave and intrepid; as a general, a severe disciplinarian; cool in the midst of danger, precise in the execution of his plans, formed after mature deliberation, and universally beloved by his army. The French with truth regarded him as one of their ablest opponents.

CLAIRON, Clara Joseph Hippolyta, Lewis Delatude, a native of Paris, who, from an obscure origin, rose under the friendly direction of mademoiselle Dangeville, a well-known actress, to high celebrity on the French stage. At the age of 12 she appeared in the play of the Isle of Slaves, and was much applauded, and afterwards at Rouen, and then at Paris, she became a favourite actress. She chiefly excelled in tragedy, and at the age of 80 she surprised and delighted Kemble, who paid her a complimentary visit, with a most energetic recitation of one of the scenes of Phædra. She died at Paris, 31st Jan. 1803, aged 80.

CLANCY, Michael, M.D. was educated at Trinity college, Dublin, but unfortunately lost his sight before he could practise as physician. He was recommended by his friend, the famous Montesquieu, to lord Chesterfield, viceroy of Ireland, from whom he obtained a pension. He obtained also the Latin school of Kilkenny. He wrote, besides some poems, the comedy of the Sharper, and of Hermon prince of Chorda, and he appeared with applause as the blind Tircias, when Œdipus was performed for his benefit at Drury-lane. He wrote also memoirs of his own life, 2 vols. 1746.

CLAP, Thomas, president of Yale college, was born at Scituate, Massachusetts, in 1703. He received his education at Harvard college, and in 1726 was settled pastor of the congregational church in Windham, Connecticut. He was appointed president of Yale college in 1739, and held the office till September, 1766, when he resigned, and in January of the following year died. He possessed strong powers of mind, and was one of the most learned men in the country. He was profoundly versed in mathematics, natural philosophy, history, theology, and ethics, was an impressive and popular preacher, and an exemplary Christian. He published a history of Yale college, and an ingenious tract on the nature of meteors. He also made collections for a history of Connecticut, which were plundered by the British in the war of the revolution. ¶ L.

CLARA, a native of Assisi, of respectable parentage. She early devoted herself to a religious and recluse life, and her example was followed by her sister Agnes, and other female friends. She obtained from St. Francis d'Assisi, the church of Damain, and became abbess of a new order of nuns, which she there established. She died 1193, aged 100, and was canonized by Alexander IV.

CLARIO, Isidore, an Italian bishop, distinguished at the council of Trent. He was eloquent and learned, and died at Foligno, 1555. His annotations on the vulgate translation of the Bible, with corrections of the text, &c. are inserted in the index expurgatorius.

CLARKE, Samuel, a celebrated orientalist, born at Brackley, Northamptonshire, and made student of Merton college, Oxford, in his 15th year. During the civil wars he was chiefly resident at Oxford, where he obtained the place of superior beadle of civil law, when it became vacant. In 1650 he was master of a boarding-school at Islington, where he assisted Walton in the correction and publication of his polyglott Bible. In 1658 he succeeded to the vacant headship, which he retained till his death, Dec. 27th, 1669, aged 46. He wrote some very learned treatises on oriental literature, and on the Hebrew text, &c.

CLARKE, Samuel, a nonconformist under Cromwell, born at Woolston, Warwickshire, and educated at Cirencester, and Emanuel college, Cambridge, and afterwards minister of St. Benet Fink, London. He was one of the commissioners at the Savoy, and died greatly esteemed for his private and public character, 25th Dec. 1682. He wrote lives of puritan divines—martyrology—lives of eminent persons—ecclesiastical history, &c.

CLARKE, Dr. Samuel, a famous English divine, son of Edward Clarke, esq. alderman of Norwich, and many years one of its representatives in parliament, was born there 11th Oct. 1675. After being educated at the grammar school in his native town, he entered at Caius college, Cambridge, where he applied himself diligently to the philosophical pursuits of the age. As Rohault's physics, on the principles of Des Cartes, were the system publicly taught in the university, Clarke, who well understood the tenets of Newton's philosophy, republished the book in a new translation, with learned and valuable notes, though only at the age of 22. He afterwards studied theology, and was ordained by Moore, bishop of Norwich, in whose household he lived as chaplain for 12 years, with all the familiarity of a friend and equal, by whom he was presented to the living of Drayton, Norfolk. In 1704 he preached Boyle's lectures, on the being and attributes of a God, and gave such satisfaction, that he was again appointed the next year, and chose for his subject the evidences of natural and revealed religion. These two courses of lectures, when published, excited some controversies, and tended to spread the celebrity of the author. About this time he is suspected by Whiston to have inclined to Arianism, as he declared to him that he never read the Athanasian creed except once, which was by mistake, and on a day when not directed by the rubric. His letter to Dodwell was published in 1706, on the immortality of the soul, which subject gave rise to a long controversial dispute, and afforded him the opportunity of displaying his great metaphysical and physical knowledge. Notwithstanding this controversy, he applied himself to mathematical pursuits, and published a translation of Newton's optics, with which the great philosopher was so pleased, that he gave him 500*l.* for his five daughters. He was at this time made rector of St. Bennet's, Paul's wharf, London, by his patron Moore, who introduced him to queen Anne, who appointed him one of her chaplains, and gave him afterwards St.

James's rectory, Westminster. He now took his degree of D.D. at Cambridge, and displayed such fluency and purity of expression in his academical exercises as drew forth the astonishment of a respectable audience. He published, in 1712, an edition of Cæsar's commentaries, dedicated to the great duke of Marlborough, and in the same year appeared his book on the doctrine of the Trinity, in three parts, which, though mentioned with commendation by bishop Hoadly, yet roused the attacks of many severe and acrimonious critics, and was even complained of in the lower house of convocation. In consequence of this the work excited universal attention, but Clarke did not shrink from the threatened danger, and at last the complaint was dismissed by the upper house, without examination and censure. An account of these proceedings was afterwards published, as an apology for Dr. Clarke; but the obnoxious book passed through two large editions, and since has been published with great additions. In 1715 and 1716, Dr. Clarke was engaged in a dispute with Leibnitz, with respect to natural philosophy and religion, in which, as his friend Whiston says, "his letters are among the most useful of his performances in natural philosophy." In 1718 Clarke's alteration in the doxology of the singing psalms gave great offence; to the words "to God through Christ his only son, immortal glory be," were substituted the following "to God through Christ his son our Lord, all glory be therefore." This circumstance was so resented by Robinson, bishop of London, that he wrote a circular letter to his clergy, not to use any new forms of doxology, and the dispute thus kindled produced various publications on both sides, which betrayed great intemperance and unchristian spirit. The friendship of lord Lechmere about this time presented Clarke to the mastership of Wigston's hospital in Leicester, and in 1724 he published 17 sermons. On the death of Newton, in 1727, Clarke was offered his place of master of the mint, worth near 1500*l.* a year, which he very disinterestedly refused as incompatible with his spiritual engagements. In 1729 he published the 12 first books of the Iliad dedicated to the duke of Cumberland, with a new Latin version, and learned notes, and in 1732 the other 12 books were published by his son. He was attacked on the 11th May, 1729, as he was going to preach before the judges at Serjeant's-Inn, with a violent pain in his side, and unable to officiate, he was removed home, where the symptoms of his disorder became more alarming, and at last attacking his head, robbed him of his senses, and he expired on the 17th of the same month, aged 54. The same year were printed his exposition of the church catechism, and 10 vols. of sermons in 8vo. which had mostly been preached on Thursday mornings at St. James's church. Clarke, though attacked by various authors in the walk of theology and philosophy, has found great and learned champions in Hare, bishop of Chichester, and Hoadly, bishop of Winchester. They not only extol his extensive knowledge in every branch of classical and philosophical science, but they enlarge on the goodness of his heart, and the exemplary piety of his life. By his death, says Hoadly, the world was deprived of as bright a light and masterly teacher of truth and virtue, as ever yet appeared among us, and his works must last as long as any language remains to convey them to future times.

CLARKE, William, an English divine, born at Haghmon abbey, Shropshire, 1696, educated at Shrewsbury school, and St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow 1717. He was presented by archbishop Wake to the rectory of Buxted, Sussex, and in 1738 he was made prebendary of Chichester, and in 1770 chancellor of that diocese, and vicar of Ampport, where he died 21st October, 1771. His great work is the connexion of the Roman, Saxon, and English coins, 4to. He married a daughter of the learned Wootton, by whom he had a son and daughter.

CLARKE, Edward, son of the preceding, was fellow of St. John's college, and succeeded on the resignation of his father in 1738, to the rectory of Buxted, Sussex, besides which he held Uckfield and Wilmington. He was chaplain to lord Bristol's embassy to Madrid in 1760 and 61, and on his return he published a 4to. volume of letters on the Spanish nation. He had meditated, with Mr. Bowyer, the plan of an enlarged Latin dictionary, but after printing one sheet, the work was laid aside for want of encouragement. He also proposed to publish a commentary on the New Testament from his father's papers, and the notes of able commentators, but the project was likewise abortive. He died November, 1786.

CLARKE, John, one of the founders of Rhode-Island, was an Englishman, and once practised medicine in London. He came to Massachusetts soon after its first settlement, and on being with several others, who were Baptists, driven from that colony, settled at Newport, Rhode-Island, where they organized a government. In 1644 he formed the second Baptist church established in America, and became its pastor. In 1651 he was sent to England as an agent of the colony, and resided there till 1663, when he procured a charter, and returned to his pastoral labours. He was distinguished for piety and beneficence; and had the honour of contributing much towards the establishing first government in modern times, which gave to all equal civil and religious liberty. He died in 1676. ¶ L.

CLARKE, Jeremiah, was president of the colony of Rhode-Island in 1648. ¶ L.

CLARKE, Walter, was governor of Rhode-Island in 1676, 1686, 1696, and 1697. He had been speaker of the House of Deputies, and was one of governor Andre's council in 1687. ¶ L.

CLARKE, George, governor of New-York, assumed the administration as senior counsellor on the death of Cosby, in March, 1736, and was appointed his successor in the October following. He was of an ancient family in Somersetshire, and was bred a lawyer. His administration was agitated, like that of his predecessor, by contention with the assembly. He was succeeded by Clinton in 1743, and returned to England. He died at his residence in Chester in 1763. ¶ L.

CLARKE, Richard, a clergyman of the Episcopal church, who maintained for many years a high reputation in South Carolina. He was a native of England, and soon after his arrival in Charleston was appointed rector of St. Philip's church in that city. Here he was greatly admired as a popular preacher, and highly respected as an exemplary, amiable, benevolent, and liberal man. He returned to England in 1759, and was soon afterwards appointed a stated preacher in one of the principal churches in London. In this station his eloquence and piety attracted a large share of public attention. His publications, chiefly on theological subjects, were numerous, amounting to six or seven octavo volumes. He lived to a late period in the eighteenth century, universally beloved and respected. ¶ L.

CLARKE, John, governor of Delaware, was elected in 1816, and succeeded by Molleston in 1819. He died at Smyrna, August, 1821. ¶ L.

CLARKE, Edward Daniel, LL.D. professor of mineralogy in the university of Cambridge, England, was educated in Jesus college, Cambridge, where he took the degree of master of arts in 1794. In 1799 he commenced a tour through the north of Europe, a part of Tartary, Circassia, Asia Minor, Greece, and Turkey, of which he afterwards published a very copious narration. He died April 9, 1822. ¶ L.

CLARKE, Abraham, a member of congress from the state of New-Jersey, and one of the signers of the declaration of independence, was born in the borough of Elizabethtown, New-Jersey, February 15, 1726. He early manifested an ardent thirst for knowledge, and was particularly fond of mathematics and of the science of law. He successively held the offices of high sheriff, commissioner for settling undivided lands, and clerk of the colonial assembly. In 1776 he was appointed a delegate to the continental congress, and took a leading part in the Jersey delegation in the memorable scenes of that year. He continued to be elected to a seat in congress with little interruption during the continuance of the old confederation; and after the adoption of the federal constitution was elected a member of the house of representatives of the United States. In 1794 he retired from all public employment, and in the autumn of that year died in the 69th year of his age. His strength of mind, his unsullied integrity, his public spirit, his patriotism, his uniform zeal in behalf of civil and religious liberty, and his exemplary piety, rendered him one of the most respectable and useful men of his time in New-Jersey. [] L.

CLARKE, Henry, a mathematician, was born in 1745, at Salford, near Manchester. His first situation was that of assistant in a school, after which he became partner in a seminary at Sedburgh, but quitted that profession for the business of a land-surveyor. When the Manchester Society was formed he was appointed lecturer in mathematics and natural philosophy. In 1802 he became professor in the royal military college at Marlow, at which time he obtained the degree of doctor of laws from the university of Edinburgh. He died at Islington, April 30, 1818. His works are—1. The Summatim of Series, translated from the Latin, 4to.—2. Treatise on Perspective, 8vo.—3. Treatise on Circulating Numbers, 8vo.—4. Treatise on Short-Hand, 12mo.—5. Essay on the usefulness of Mathematical Learning, 8vo.—6. Tabule Linguarum, or concise Grammars of the Latin, Spanish, Portuguese, Italian, French, and Norman Languages—7. The Seaman's Desiderata, or New and Concise Rules for finding the Longitude at Sea—8. A New and Concise Operation for clearing the Lunar Distances from a Star, or the Sun—9. Virgil Revindicated, in reply to Bishop Horsley, 4to.—10. An Introduction to Geography, 12mo.—W. B.

CLARKSON, David a native of Bradford, Yorkshire, educated at Clare-hall, Cambridge, where he became fellow, and had Tillotson afterwards primate for his pupil. He was ejected in 1662 from his living of Mortlake, in Surry, for nonconformity, and died 1686, aged 64. He was a learned and respectable character. He wrote no evidence for diocesan episcopacy in primitive times, 4to. 1681, ably refuted by doctor Henry Maurice—sermons, &c.

CLAUDE, a monk of the Celestine order in the 15th century. He was author of a treatise on the errors of our sensations, published by Oronce Fine, 1542.

CLAUDE of LORRAINE, a celebrated landscape painter, born in 1600. He was of so dull a disposition when at school, that he was placed early with a pastry-cook, with whom he served his time, and afterwards travelling to Rome, he was accidentally hired by the painter Augustino Trasso, as a common servant to pound his colours, and wait upon him. The kindness of his master soon made him acquainted with the first principles of painting, and now genius began to expand, and Claude retired to the banks of the Tiber and the striking scenes of Nature, where, in solitude, he copied the beauties displayed to his view, with success and effect. Thus assiduity assisted genius, and the humble Claude, by degrees, almost self-taught, produced those noble pieces which for their fine distribution of light and shade, for harmony, and for the exquisite delicacy of the tints, have procured him deservedly immortal fame. He was scrupulously attentive to the finishing of his pieces, and he often did and undid the same piece seven or eight times, till it pleased him. Urban VIII. and several Italian princes patronised him. His performances in fresco and in oil are chiefly commended. He died 1682, and was buried at Rome.

CLAUDE, John, a French protestant, born at Sauvetat in Angenois 1619, and ordained minister at Montauban. His opposition to the catholics produced the suspension of his ecclesiastical office, but his answer to Mess. de Port Royal, who wished to convert Turenne to the Romish faith, excited a great controversy in the kingdom. Though opposed by Arnold, Nouet, and other able catholics, Claude maintained his reputation by his pen, and in his treatises on the eucharist, and in defence of the reformed church, evinced the abilities of a sound theologian, and a learned disputant. The edict of Nantes however at last terminated his labours in France, he was directed, in 1685, to leave the kingdom, and he retired to Holland, where he was kindly received by the prince of Orange, who allowed him a pension. Though his voice was not pleasing, yet he was greatly admired as an eloquent orator, and his last sermon which was on Christmas day, 1686, pleased and sensibly affected the princess of Orange. He died January 13, 1687, carrying with him the regret and the affection of the protestant churches. He had a son, Isaac Claude, born 5th March, 1653. He was educated in France, and became minister of the Walloon church at the Hague, where he died 29th July, 1695. He published many of his father's works.

CLAUDIAN, a Latin poet patronised by Stilicho, whose misfortunes he shared. He came to Rome 395.

CLAUDIUS I. son of Drusus, succeeded Caligula as emperor of Rome. He gave himself up to dissipation, and was at last poisoned by his wife Agrippina to make room for her son Nero, A.D. 54, in his 63d year.

CLAUDIUS II. a Dalmatian, who succeeded Gallienus as emperor of Rome. He died after a reign of two years, greatly lamented, 271.

CLAUDIUS, Appius, a Sabine who settled at Rome, B.C. 504, and became the progenitor of the Appian family.

CLAUDIUS, Appius, son of the above, was consul at Rome, but behaved with such severity that his soldiers refused to fight under him.

CLAUDIUS, Appius, a Roman decemvir, son of the above, infamous for his attempt to violate Virginia, for which his office was abolished, and he himself died in prison.

CLAUDIUS, Appius, surnamed Cæus, was of the same family, and distinguished himself as an orator and lawyer. He is celebrated for supplying Rome with water by means of an aqueduct, and for making the well-known Appian road, which led as far as Capua.

CLAVIUS, Christopher, a Jesuit and mathematician, born at Bamberg, Germany, 1537. He was considered as the Euclid of his age, and he was, on account of his abilities, engaged by Gregory XIII. in the reformation of the calendar, which he ably defended against Joseph Scaliger. His works were printed, 5 vols. fol. He died at Rome 1612.

CLAYTON, Dr. Robert, a learned prelate, member of the royal and antiquarian societies in London. He was made bishop of Killala 1729, translated to Cork 1735, and to Clogher 1745, where he died 25th September, 1758. He was averse to the use of the Nicene and Athanasian creeds, and unsuccessfully moved for their rejection in the Irish house of lords. He was the intimate friend of Bowyer the printer, and other learned men. He published an essay on spirit, 8vo.—chronology of the Hebrew Bible vindicated, 4to.—inquiry on the time of the coming of the Messiah, 8vo.—vindication of the histories of the Old and New Testaments, 8vo.—journal from Grand Cairo to Sinai, translated from the MS. of a prefect of Egypt, 4to. and 8vo.—and other works.

CLAYTON, John, a distinguished botanist and physician of Virginia, was born in Kent, England, and came to Virginia in 1705. He was one of the most eminent practical botanists of his time, corresponded with Linnæus, Gronovius, and other distinguished men abroad, and was elected a member of most of the literary societies of Europe. He wrote several, valuable works on botany, among which is the "Flora Virginica" published at Leyden. He was for 51 years prothonotary of Gloucester county. He died in 1773. He was an amiable, upright, and exemplary member of the Episcopal church. J. L.

CLAYTON, Joshua, governor of Delaware, was educated a physician, and published several medical essays. In 1798 he was elected to succeed Mr. Vining in the senate of the United States. He died in 1799. J. L.

CLEANTHES, a Grecian philosopher, disciple of Zeno. He starved himself to death at the age of 90, B. C. 240.

CLEAVER, William, an English prelate, was the son of a clergyman who kept a school at Twyford, in Buckinghamshire, was born there in 1742. He went to Magdalen college, Oxford, and afterwards obtained a fellowship at Brazenose, where he became tutor to the late marquis of Buckingham, by whose interest his brother, Euseby Cleaver, was made bishop of Fernes, and finally archbishop of Dublin. William Cleaver, in 1784, obtained a prebend in Westminster, and in 1785 was chosen head of his college, soon after which he took his doctor's degree. In 1787 he was consecrated bishop of Chester, translated to Bangor in 1800, and to St. Asaph in 1806. He died in 1815. He published—1. De Rhythmo Græcorum, 8vo. 2. Directions to his clergy on the choice of books, 8vo. 3. Remarks on Marsh's Dissertation on the Three First Gospels. 4. Sermons on Various Occasions. He was also editor of the splendid impression of Homer printed at Oxford, by the Grenville family.—W. B.

CLEVEE, Joseph a Flemish painter, who died 1536. His pieces were chiefly misers counting their hoarded treasures. His family produced other respectable painters.

CLEGHORN, George, a Scotch physician, born at Cranton, near Edinburgh, 18th December, 1716. After studying belles lettres at Edinburgh, he applied himself to physic and surgery, under the care of Dr. Monro, and, in 1736, went as surgeon to the 22d regiment of foot to Minorca, where he resided thirteen years. On his return to London, in 1750, he published his valuable work on the diseases of Minorca. The year after, he settled at Dublin, where he began to read regular courses of anatomy, and where he became highly respected for his learning and his amiable manners. He died Dec. 1789. It is not the least of his praise to mention, that on his brother's death he sent for his widow and nine children from Scotland, and settled them in Dublin, with all the affection and tender care of a parent.

CLEVELAND, John, Vid. CLEVELAND.

CLELAND, John, son of colonel Cleland,

the Will Honeycomb of the Spectator, was early sent as consul to Smyrna; and on his return to England he went to the East Indies. His quarrel, however, with the presidency of Bombay prevented his advancement, and he left the country. Poor and dissatisfied, on his arrival in London, loaded with debts, and exposed to the intrusion of bailiffs, and the horrors of a prison, he endeavoured to extricate himself by writing that infamous publication, the woman of pleasure, which, though it procured him not more than 20 guineas, yet brought into the hands of the licentious and mercenary bookseller not less than 10,000*l.* The evil tendency of his publication caused his appearance before the privy council; but lord Granville, the president, admitted his plea of poverty, and, to engage him no longer to exercise his abilities in such immoral compositions, he procured him a pension of 100*l.* a year. His memoirs of a coxcomb, and his man of honour, in some slight degree atoned for the depravity of his former work. He died 23d January, 1789, aged 82.

CLEMENSIS, Nicholas, a native of the diocese of Chalons, who studied at Paris, under Gerson, and in 1393, became rector of the university. From a letter which he wrote to Charles VI. of France, exhorting him to put an end to the papal schism, he was accused as the author of the bull of excommunication sent against his sovereign by Benedict XIII. and he took refuge in a convent. He was afterwards reconciled to the king, and was preferred. He died 1440. His corrupt state of the church, in which he boldly develops the abuses of the papal see, was published by Lydius, a protestant in Holland, 1613. He wrote besides a treatise on simony, an able work.

CLEMENCET, Charles, a French Benedictine, born at Painblanc in Autun, taught rhetoric at Paris, where he died 1778, aged 74. He possessed a happy memory, and great industry. He wrote that valuable book l'art de verifier les dates, 4to. 1750, and fol. 1770—a general history of Port Royal, ten vols. 12mo.—and other works.

CLEMENS, Titus Flavius, a father of the church, generally called Alexandrinus, because born at Alexandria, according to some. He succeeded, 191, Pantænus, in the catechetical school of Alexandria, where he died. The best edition of his works is that of Potter, 2 vols. fol. Oxford, 1715.

CLEMENS, Romanus, a father of the church, the companion of St. Paul, and bishop of Rome. He died 100. His epistle to the Corinthian church has been published 1698, and translated by Wake, 1705.

CLEMENT II. bishop of Bamberg, was elected pope by the council of Sutri 1046, and died 9th October, 1047. He was a Saxon by birth, and was distinguished by his zeal against simony.

CLEMENT III. bishop of Præneste, succeeded Gregory VIII. as pope 1187, and died 27th March, 1191, after publishing a crusade against the Saracens.

CLEMENT IV. Guy de Foulques, a Frenchman, elected pope after Urban IV. at Pezrousc, 1265. Before his election he had been a soldier, and then a civilian, and on the death of his wife he took orders, and became archbishop of Narbonne, and a cardinal. He showed great moderation and prudence, and refused to bestow his favours indiscriminately on his relations. He died at Viterbo 29th November, 1268.

CLEMENT V. or Bertrand de Goth, was born at Villaudran, near Bourdeaux. He was archbishop of Bourdeaux 1300, and after the death of Benedict XI. was elected pope 1305. He was crowned at Lyons, and removed the see of Rome to Avignon 1309. He abolished the templars at the request of Philip the Fair of France, whose views he blindly seconded. He is accused of incontinence, by his intercourse with the countess of Perigord; and he was extravagant in his expenses, though fond of acquiring money. He died 20th April, 1314, at Roquemaure, near Avignon.

CLEMENT VI. Peter Roger, a doctor of Paris university, who succeeded Benedict XII. on the papal throne 1342. He is represented by Petrarch, whom he patronised, as a worthy, generous, and learned prelate; but other historians paint him as debauched, proud, and ambitious. He died 6th December, 1352, at Avignon.

CLEMENT VII. Julius de Medicis, a natural son of Julian de Medicis, was declared legitimate by Leo X. on the testimony of persons who said they had witnessed the marriage of his parents; and he was made by him legate at Bologna, and archbishop of Narbonne and Florence. He was elected pope 1523, on the death of Adrian VI. Great as a pope, he was weak as a politician, and by the holy league which he formed between Henry VIII. of England and Francis I. of France, he drew upon himself the resentment of Charles V. who took and plundered Rome, and besieged the holy pontiff in the castle of St. Angelo. Though he escaped, he was obliged to submit to ignominious terms; but though assisted by Henry, he refused to countenance his divorce from Catherine of Arragon; and when the English monarch married Anna Boleyn, the sovereign pontiff issued a bull of excommunication against him, and thus produced the separation of England from the Roman church. He died 26th September, 1534.

CLEMENT VIII. Hippolitus Aldobrandin, a native of Florence, made cardinal by SIXTUS V. and elected pope after the death of Innocent IX. 1592. He first opposed the election of Henry IV. of France, but afterwards was reconciled to him, though he severely resented the expulsion of the Jesuits. He was a liberal minded and benevolent prelate; and died 5th March, 1605, aged 69.

CLEMENT IX. Julius Rospigliosi, was born in Pistoia in Tuscany, of a noble family, and was elected 1667, after the death of Alexander VII. His reign was disturbed by the schisms of the Jansenists; but he heard of the loss of Candia, which was taken by the Turks, with such sorrow, that he died of grief, 9th December, 1669, aged 71.

CLEMENT X. John Baptist Emilius Altieri, a Roman, made cardinal by Clement IX. whom he succeeded 1670. He was mild and amiable in character; and as all the business of the papal see was managed by his nephew, the Romans jocosely said there were two popes, the one in fact, the other in name. He died 22d July, 1676, aged 86.

CLEMENT XI. John Francis Albani, son of a Roman senator, was born at Pesaro 1649, and made a cardinal 1690, and elected pope 1700, on the death of Innocent XII. He was three days in determining whether to accept of the popedom or not. He was an able politician; but his reign was disturbed by the schism of the Jansenists; and he published a bull in 1705, against the five famous propositions. In 1713, he issued his bull called unigenitus against 101 propositions of the New Testament by Quesnel; a book which he had originally approved and commended, but which the virulence of the times obliged him to condemn. He gave a friendly reception to the pretender; and died at Rome 19th March, 1721, aged 72. His works were edited at Rome, in 2 vols. fol. 1729.

CLEMENT XII. Laurence Corsini, a native of Rome, raised to the popedom 1730, after the death of Benedict XIII. He laboured earnestly in the reform of abuses, and when the cardinals wished to recommend to him particular ministers, he nobly replied, it is for the cardinals to elect popes, but for the pope to elect his ministers. He died 6th February, 1740, aged near 88: and so popular was his government, that the Romans erected a brazen statue to his honour.

CLEMENT XIII. Charles Rezzonico, a native of Venice, made a cardinal 1737, by Clement XII. and raised to the see of Padua 1743, where his conduct was so amiable and benevolent, that on the death of Benedict XIV. he was elected pope 1758. During his reign the Jesuits were expelled from France, Spain, and Naples. He died suddenly, 2d February, 1769, aged 76, much respected, and to his last moments heavily afflicted with the dissensions which disturbed the church.

CLEMENT XIV. John Vincent Anthony Ganganelli, son of a physician of St. Archangelo near Rimini, was born 31st October, 1705. When 18 he entered among the Franciscans, and applied himself to the studies of philosophy and divinity at Passaro, Recanati, Fano, and Rome, and when at the age of 35, he became public professor in the college of Bonaventure. He was employed under Benedict XIV. in the council of the holy office, and the next pope, Clement XIII. who equally knew his merit, raised him to the purple. Though raised to dignity, he preserved the habit and the austerity of a poor ecclesiastic, but in his opinions he espoused the cause of foreign princes, and spoke boldly of the necessity of expelling the Jesuits. On the death of Clement XIII. he was elected in a tumultuous assembly of the conclave, and proclaimed pope by cardinal de Bernis. The difficulties which surrounded him were artfully removed; he negotiated with Portugal, Spain, and France, who seemed inclined to make deep inroads on the papal power, and at their pressing solicitations he, in 1773, formally suppressed the Jesuits. The violent spirit of the times, and the unpopular measures which necessity obliged him to adopt, at last wasted away his strength, and produced such debility as proved fatal 22d September, 1774, though some have been accused of hastening his death by poison. In his character he was bold, upright, benevolent, and mild, the friend of literature, and an enemy to all abuses. When desired to live with greater splendour, he replied that neither St. Peter nor St. Francis had taught him to dine splendidly. His life has been published by Caraccioli, and some letters have appeared, 4 vols. 12mo. 1776, under his name, though they are supposed many of them to be spurious.

CLEMENT, David, a native of Hof Geismar, who succeeded his father as pastor of a French congregation there, from which he removed to Brunswick 1736, and then to Hanover, where he died 1760. He is author of bibliothèque curieuse historique de livres difficiles à trouver, 9 vols. 4to.—Specimen Bibliothecæ Hispano,—Majensia, sive Idea novi catalogi scriptorum Hispan. in bibliotheca Greg.—Majens. 1753, &c.

CLEMENT, Francis, a native of Beze in Burgundy, member of the congregation of St. Maur. He was employed by his superiors at Paris to continue Rivet's literary history of France, of which he wrote the 11th and 12th vols. He afterwards composed the 12th and 13th vols. of Bouquet's collection of French historians, and in-proved Dantine's art de verifier les dates, published by Durand and Clemencet in 4to.—and by himself, 3 vols. fol. 1783—1792. He began l'art de verifier les dates avant J. Christ, but died before its completion 1793, aged 79.

CLEMENT, Peter, a native of Geneva, who became travelling tutor to lord Waldegrave, and afterwards settled at Paris, where he conducted the Nouvelles litteraires de France from 1749 to 1754. He wrote also some poems, and Merope a tragedy, and George Barnwell translated from the English, &c. He was not always correct in his character, but often licentious. He died 1767, aged 60.

CLEOBULUS, one of the seven wise men of Greece, who died about 560 B. C.

CLEOMBROTUS, two kings of Sparta. The one fell at the battle of Leuctra, B. C. 371, and the other was son-in-law of Leonidas, and was banished afterwards.

CLEOMENES, a king of Sparta, who slew himself, B. C. 491.—Another, who succeeded Agesipolis his brother, and reigned 61 years.—Another who was defeated by the Achæans, and fled into Egypt where he destroyed himself, B. C. 219.

CLEOPATRA, a queen of Egypt, who intrigued with J. Cæsar to ensure the possession of her kingdom, and afterwards married Antony, whom she attended at the battle of Actium. Not to be led a captive in the triumph of the victorious Augustus she destroyed herself by the bite of an asp, B. C. 30.

CLEOSTRATUS, a Grecian astronomer, who invented the signs of the zodiac, and reformed the Greek calendar, B. C. 536.

CLERC, John le, a celebrated scholar born at Geneva, 19th March, 1657. As his father was a physician of eminence, and a Greek professor at Geneva, the greatest attention was paid to his education, and after studying belles lettres and the classics with the most indefatigable earnestness he directed his thoughts to divinity at the age of 19, and was at the proper time admitted into orders. He soon after embraced Arminianism, and after residing some time at Saumur, he visited England, where he was honoured with the acquaintance of many learned and respectable characters. As he totally differed from his friends and connexions at Geneva, with respect to religious opinions, he determined not to reside among them, but settled at Amsterdam 1683, where he became popular as a preacher, and particularly as professor of philosophy, Hebrew, and polite literature. His ars critica, 3 vols. 12mo. was published in 1696, and in 1709 appeared his Sulpicius Severus, his Grotius, and also the remains of Menander and Philemon, a collection which drew upon him the severe censures of those able scholars Bentley and Burman.

Le Clerc died 8th Jan. 1736, in his 79th year, having been afflicted for the last six years with great weakness of intellects. He married at the age of 34, the daughter of Gregorio Leti, by whom he had four children, who all died young. Many of his works were dedicated to English prelates and other leading men in the nation; yet his name was particularly unpopular in England, and his writings were severely censured by some of the clergy, and for this he was indebted to the Arminian principles which he had imbibed, and the acrimonious language which he used against episcopacy. At one time his admirers in England were desirous of fixing him in a more independent state here, than he enjoyed at Amsterdam, but the scheme was thwarted by opposite opinions. Whatever might be the prejudice of his enemies, he certainly deserved well of literature, for his many valuable writings in criticism, religion, and philosophy, and he must be respected as an able writer and sound divine, and an erudite scholar. His other works are systems of logic, entology, and pneumatology, besides a translation of the Bible into French, &c. He also conducted the bibliothèque choisie from 1703 to 1713, 128 vols. 12mo.—bibliothèque ancienne et moderne 29 vols. 1729—and bibliothèque universelle et historique to 1693, 25 vols. 12mo.

CLERC, Sebastian le, originally a helper in the kitchen of the abbey of St. Arnould at Metz, displayed early proofs of genius as a painter. The scraps of paper on which he had made some rude delineations were seen accidentally by the prior of the house, who had the kindness to encourage him and favour his advancement. He studied geometry and perspective, and gradually rose to eminence, till distinguished by marshal de la Ferté, and made engraver to Lewis XIV. and knighted by Clement XI. He died at Paris 25th October, 1714, aged 77. He was admirable in his landscapes, architecture, and ornaments, and he has gained credit as the author of a treatise on architecture, 2 vols. 4to.—a treatise on geometry, &c. 8vo.—and another on perspective. Not less than 3000 pieces are mentioned as the work of his graver, and he had the art, after Callot, of introducing five or six leagues extent of country in a small space.

CLERC, Daniel le, a native of Geneva, where his father was Greek professor. He studied medicine at Paris and Montpellier, and practised with great reputation and success at Geneva. He was made member of the council of state 1704, and then quitted his professional labours, and died 1728. He was a learned antiquary, and wrote bibliotheca anatomica, &c. 2 vols. fol.—histoire de la médecine, Geneva, 8vo. 1696, translated into English—historia naturalis et medica latorum lumbricorum, &c.

CLERC, John le, a French painter, knighted at Venice, where he died 1633, aged 46.

CLERKE, Gilbert, a native of Uppington, Rutlandshire, educated at Sidney college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He was an able Grecian and mathematician, but strongly favouring the Socinians, he left the university for a small estate in Northamptonshire, where he died about 1695, aged 69. He wrote an answer to bishop Bull's work on the divine faith—and a treatise on Oughtred's clavis mathematica, &c.

CLERMONT TONNERRE, Stanislaus count of, a French nobleman in the states general assembled at Paris 1789. He showed himself an able orator, attached to order, the friend of limited monarchy, and an enemy to popular tumults. His opposition to the Jacobin club sent him to prison, where he was massacred on the 1st day of Sept. 1793. His opinions have been published in 4 vols. 8vo.—and his examen de la constitution, 8vo. 1791.—His father, the duke of Clermont, was cruelly guillotined 26th July, 1793, aged 74.

CLEVELAND or CLEIVELAND, John, a poet in the reign of Charles I. was born at Loughborough 1613, son of a clergyman, and educated at Christ college, Cambridge, from which he was removed to St. Johns, of which he became a fellow in 1634. As tutor he gained great applause; and as a political writer, he ably served the royal cause. Though unsuccessfully, he opposed the election of Oliver Cromwell to be a member for the town of Cambridge, and when he found his place of residence no longer safe, he retired to Oxford, where the king had fixed his head quarters. His satirical pieces, especially "the rebel Scot," were greatly admired; he was rewarded for his loyalty, by the appointment of judge advocate of the garrison of Newark; but when this was taken by the republicans, he made his escape, destitute and poor. He was seized at Norwich, and detained as a person of great abilities and averse to the reigning government, and he obtained his liberty by writing to Cromwell a letter, in which, while he supplicates his enlargement, he boldly avows his principles and defends his conduct. After his release, he retired to London, where he became the companion of the wits and loyalists of the times, especially of the author of Hudibras. He died of an intermittent fever, 29th April, 1659. His remains were honourably buried at St. Michael Royal, College-hill, and a sermon preached over him by his friend Pierson, afterwards bishop of Chester. Though courted and admired as a poet in his own age, and preferred before Milton by his contemporaries, he is now sunk into oblivion. The last edition of his poems is in 8vo. 1687. The subjects of his muse were the party politics of the day. He was one of those metaphysical poets who abound with witty rather than just thoughts, whose learned allusions amuse and glitter for a moment, and possess nothing of the simplicity and genuine elegance which must please and captivate with equal charms every reader in every age.

CLIFFORD, George, third earl of Cumberland, was eminent as a navigator. He was born in 1558, and was educated at Peter-house, Cambridge, where Whitgift, afterwards primate, was his tutor. After applying himself to the study of mathematics, he was employed under government, and in 1586 sat as one of the peers on the unfortunate Mary queen of Scots. He was of a genius bold and enterprising, and not less than eleven expeditions by sea were undertaken by him, and at his own expense, either for purposes of discovery, or for the annoyance of the enemies of his country. Besides the many valuable captures which he made, he deserved the favour of his royal mistress, who created him knight of the garter 1591. In 1601 he was one of those employed to reduce Essex to obedience. He died in the Savoy, London, 30th October, 1605, and was buried at Kipton in Yorkshire. His daughter was the famous Anne, countess of Dorset, Pembroke and Montgomery.

CLIFFORD, Martin, an English writer, educated at Westminster school and Trinity college, Cambridge, and was made master of the Charter-house after the restoration. He was author of a treatise on human reason, published anonymously 1675, in which he makes every man's fancy the guide of his religion. Of this book Lancy bishop of Ely declared, at a public dinner at the Charter-house, that all the copies and the author himself ought to be burned. He died 1677, and was buried in the Charter-house chapel. Sprat dedicated his life of Cowley to him, and it is supposed that he was concerned in the Rehearsal.

CLINTON, Henry, grandson of Francis sixth earl of Lincoln, was knight of the Bath, and engaged as general in the American war. He evacuated Philadelphia in 1778, and took Charleston in 1780, for which he was thanked by the house of commons. He returned to England in 1782, and soon after published an account of the campaign in 1781-83, which lord Cornwallis answered, and to which sir Henry made a reply. He was governor of Gibraltar, 1795, and also member for Newark, and died soon after.

CLINTON, Charles, the father of James and George Clinton, was a gentleman of great respectability in the colony of New York. His grandfather, William Clinton, was an adherent of Charles I. and an officer in his army; after the dethronement of that monarch, he took refuge on the continent of Europe, where he remained a long time in exile. He afterwards secretly visited Scotland, where he married, and then passed over for greater security to the north of Ireland, where he died, deprived of his patrimony, and leaving James an orphan son two years old. When James arrived to manhood, he went to England to recover his patrimonial estate, but was not successful; while on this visit to the country of his ancestors, he married the daughter of a captain in Cromwell's army, which connexion enabled him to maintain a respectable standing in the country which he had selected for his residence. ☞ L.

CLINTON, Charles, the son of James Clinton, was born in the county of Longford in Ireland in 1690. He resolved in 1729 to emigrate to British America, and having persuaded a number of his friends and relatives to join him, he chartered a ship for the purpose of conveying his colony to Philadelphia. On the 20th of May, 1729, the ship left Ireland; after being at sea for some time it was discovered that the captain had formed a design of starving his passengers to death, either with a view to obtain their property or to deter emigration. Several of the passengers actually died, among whom were a son and a daughter of Mr. Clinton. In this awful situation it was proposed by the passengers to seize the captain and commit the navigation of the vessel to Mr. Clinton, who was an excellent mathematician; but the officers of the ship refusing to co-operate with them, they were deterred from this proceeding from the apprehension of incurring the charge of piracy. They were finally compelled to commute with the captain for their lives by paying a large sum of money; who accordingly landed them at Cape Cod on the 4th of October. Mr. Clinton and his friends continued in that part of the country until the spring of 1731, when he removed to the county of Ulster in the colony of New-York, where he formed a flourishing settlement, and devoted himself to agriculture, and occasionally acted as land-surveyor. He was soon appointed a justice of the peace and a judge of the county of Ulster. In 1756 he was appointed by the governor, sir Charles Hardy, lieutenant-colonel of the second regiment of militia for the county of Ulster. On the 24th March, 1758, he was appointed a lieutenant-colonel of one of the battalions of the regiment in the province of New-York, of which Oliver Delancey was colonel. In this capacity he acted under the command of colonel Bradstreet at the capture of Fort Frontenac: When George Clinton, the father of sir Henry Clinton, was installed governor in the province in 1753, an intimacy took place between him and Mr. Clinton in consequence of which, and their distant consanguinity, the latter was earnestly solicited by his namesake to accept of a lucrative and distinguished office, which overture he promptly declined, preferring the charms of retirement and the cultivation of literature to the cares of public life. Mr. Clinton had four sons in America, Alexander, educated in the college at Princeton, and afterwards a physician, Charles also an eminent physician and a surgeon in the army which took Havana in the island of Cuba; James, a major general in the revolutionary army, and George, governor of the state of New-York. He died at his place in Ulster, now Orange county, on the 19th day of November, 1773, in his 83d year. ☞ L.

CLINTON, James, was the fourth son of colonel Charles Clinton, and was born on the 9th day of August, 1736, in Ulster county in the colony of New-York. In common with his brother he was favoured with an excellent education. The study of the exact sciences was his favourite pursuit, but the predominant inclination of his mind was for a military life. After having successfully held several offices in the militia and provincial troops, he was on the 15th November, 1763, appointed by lieutenant governor Colden, captain commandant of the four companies in the pay of the province of New-York, raised for the defence of the western frontiers of the counties of Ulster and Orange; and on the 18th March, 1774, lieutenant-colonel of the militia in Ulster county. In the French war of 1756, he was a captain under colonel Bradstreet, at the capture of Fort Frontenac, and rendered essential service in that expedition in many respects, and particularly by the capture of a French sloop of war on lake Ontario, which impeded the progress of the army. After the termination of this war he married Mary De Witt, a young lady of great merit, whose family emigrated from Holland. He then retired from the camp, to the repose of a domestic life. When the American revolution was in the eve of its commencement, he was appointed, on the 30th June, 1775, by the continental congress, colonel of the 3d regiment of New-York forces. On the 25th of October following, he was appointed by the provincial congress of New-York, colonel of the regiment of militia foot in Ulster county; on the 8th March, 1776, by the continental congress, colonel of the second battalion of New-York troops, and on the 9th of August, 1776, a brigadier general in the army of the United States: in which station he continued during the greater part of the war, having the command of the

New-York line, or the troops of that state, and at its close, he was constituted a major general. In 1775, his regiment composed part of the army under general Montgomery, which invaded Canada. In October, 1777, he commanded at fort Clinton, which, together with its neighbour, fort Montgomery, constituted the defence of the Hudson river against the ascent of an enemy. His brother the governor commanded in chief at both forts. Sir Henry Clinton, with a view to effect a diversion in favour of general Burgoyne, moved up the Hudson with an army of 4,000 men, and attacked those works, which were very imperfectly fortified, and only defended by five hundred men, composed principally of militia. After a most desperate resistance, the forts were carried by storm. General Clinton was the last man who left the works, and not until he was severely wounded by a bayonet, pursued and fired at by the enemy, and his attendant servants killed. The irruptions of the Iroquois or Six Nations on the frontier settlements, were such that it was deemed necessary to inflict a chastisement which would prevent a repetition of their atrocities; an expedition against them was accordingly determined on, and the chief command was given to general Sullivan, who was to proceed up the Susquehannah with the main body of the army, while general Clinton was to join him by the way of the Mohawk. The Iroquois inhabited, or occasionally occupied, the region which comprises the western parts of New-York, and Pennsylvania, and besides their own ravages from the vicinity of their settlements, to the inhabited parts of the United States, they facilitated the inroads of the more remote Indians; when general Sullivan was on his way to the Indian country he was joined by general Clinton, with upwards of 1600 men. The latter had gone up the Mohawk in batteaux from Schenectady; and after ascending that river about fifty-four miles, he conveyed his batteaux from Canojoharie to the head of the Otsego lake, one of the sources of the Susquehannah. Finding the stream of water in that river too low to float his boats, he constructed a dam across the mouth of the lake, which soon rose to the altitude of the dam. Having got his batteaux ready, he opened the passage for the water through the dam. This raised the river so high, that he was enabled to embark all his troops; to float them down to Tioga, and to join Sullivan in good season. The Indians collected their strength at Newtown; took possession of proper ground and fortified it. They were attacked on the 29th August, 1779, their works were forced, and their consternation was so great that they abandoned all further resistance, for as the Americans advanced into their settlements, they retreated before them without throwing any obstructions in their way. The army advanced as far west as the Genessee river, and destroyed many large Indian settlements and villages. The effect of this expedition was greatly to diminish their population, and to inflict an irrecoverable blow upon their resources of aggression. For a considerable portion of the war, general Clinton was stationed at Albany, where he commanded in the northern department of the union, a place of high responsibility, and requiring uncommon vigilance and continual exertion. He was afterwards present at the siege of York Town, and the capture of Cornwallis, where he distinguished himself by his usual intrepidity. His last appearance in arms was on the evacuation of the city of New-York, where he bid the commander-in-chief a final and affectionate farewell, and retired to his estates. He was, however, frequently called from his retirement by the unsolicited voice of his fellow-citizens. He was appointed a commissioner to adjust the boundary line between Pennsylvania and New-York, which important measure was amicably and successfully accomplished. He was also selected by the legislature for an interesting mission to settle controversies respecting lands in the west, which also terminated favourably. He represented his native county in the assembly, and in the convention that adopted the present constitution of the United States. He was elected without opposition a senator from the middle district, and a delegate to the convention of 1801, for the purpose of amending the state constitution, all of which trusts he executed with integrity and ability, and to the perfect satisfaction of his constituents. The temper of general Clinton was mild and affectionate; but when roused by unprovoked insult, or unmerited injury, he exhibited extraordinary energy. He died on the 22d of December, 1812, in the 76th year of his age, and was interred in the family burial-place at Little Britain, in Orange county. [F L.

CLINTON, George, vice-president of the United States, was born in the county of Ulster, New-York, July 26th, 1739, and was the youngest son of colonel Charles Clinton. He was bred a lawyer, and settled himself in the profession in his native county, where he rose to eminence. In 1768, he was chosen to a seat in the colonial assembly, and continued in it, and was one of its most conspicuous members till the revolution. He was appointed, April 22d, 1775, a delegate to the continental congress, and took his seat on the 15th of May. On the 4th of July, 1776, he was present at the declaration of Independence, and assented with his usual energy to the measure; but having been appointed a brigadier general in the army, was obliged to retire from congress immediately after his vote was given, and before the instrument was transcribed for the signature of the members, for which reason his name does not appear among the signers. In April, 1777, he was elected both governor, and lieutenant-governor of New-York, and was continued in the former office for eighteen years. He continued during the progress of the war to render the most important services to the military department. It was owing greatly to his aid, that the army was prevented from being disbanded, and to his exertions that the southern and northern states were not separated by the intervention of the British. On being apprised, in October, 1777, of the advance of the enemy from New-York, up the Hudson, to form a junction with Burgoyne, he prorogued the assembly and took command of fort Montgomery, in which he made a most gallant defence against the British, and on being overpowered by their superior numbers, with his brother James, escaped under cover of the night. In 1801, he was again chosen governor, and in 1804, advanced to the vice-presidency of the United States, and continued in the office till his death, which took place at Washington, April 20th, 1812, in the 73d year of his age. He possessed a discriminating intellect, the most undaunted courage, and great energy of character. He was distinguished as a soldier, an able statesman, and an ardent patriot, and filled the several public stations to which he was elevated, with an ability, uprightness, and usefulness, which placed him both in public esteem, and on the pages of history among the most illustrious of the worthies of the revolution.

CLINTON, George, one of the colonial governors of New-York, was the youngest son of Francis Clinton the 6th Earl of Lincoln. He married Anne Carle, (daughter of major general Peter Carle,) and had by her three sons and three daughters. Henry, the only surviving son, was Sir Henry Clinton, who commanded the British armies in America during a considerable portion of the revolutionary war. Being a younger son, he was destined for a profession, and became a vice-admiral of the Red. He was afterwards appointed governor of the colony of New-York, and entered on the office on the 23d of September, 1743. He was unskilled in civil affairs, and was peculiarly exposed to the tumults and commotions of colonial governments. When he commenced his administration, James Delancey, afterwards lieutenant-governor, was the ruling demagogue of the province, and as long as Mr. Clinton submitted to his dictation, he had few difficulties with the general assembly. A rupture took place in the course of two years, but not until Delancey had obtained from the governor a commission as chief justice during good behaviour. After the quarrel, the administration of the government was a scene of controversy with the general assembly, in which, contrary to the usual course of things, the latter was generally in the wrong. Mr. Clinton had, however, powerful friends and advocates. Mr. Colden, afterwards lieutenant-governor, held the pen for him in his disputes with the general assembly, whilst the writer for the latter body, or rather for Mr. Delancey, was Mr. Horsemander, who was the Historian of the Negro Plot, and whose infirmities, when chief justice of the colony, produced that article in the constitution of the state, which disqualifies a judge after he has reached the age of sixty. Sir William Johnson was also a favourite of governor Clinton, and at the great Indian treaty held by him in 1746, at Albany, entered the city at the head of the Mohawks, painted and dressed like a savage. After very turbulent times he was succeeded by Sir Darcwens Osborne, on the 10th of October, 1753, who, two days afterwards committed suicide, in despair, as it is supposed, of a successful administration from the experience of his predecessor, and from the nature of his instructions which placed him in the sad dilemma of offending his sovereign from whom he derived his authority, or the people whom he governed. Mr. Clinton became, after his retirement from New-York, governor of Greenwich Hospital.

CLISSON, Oliver de, a native of Britany, who fought at the battle of Aurai in 1364, by the side of his friend count Montfort. He afterwards followed the fortunes of Guesclin, and succeeded him as constable of France, 1380. In 1382 he distinguished himself at the battle of Rosebec; but he incurred the hatred of the duke of Britany, who caused him to be condemned to death in 1387, though he escaped, and was afterwards reconciled to his persecutors. The mental disorders of Charles VI. proved fatal to his fortune, he was deprived of all his honours, and in consequence retired to his seat in Britany, where he died, 1407, deservedly respected for his valour, integrity, and humanity.

CLISTHENES, an Athenian, who introduced the law of ostracism, which proved so fatal to many illustrious generals. He had a share in the banishment of the Pisistratidae.

CLITOMACHUS, a Carthaginian philosopher, disciple of Carneades. It is said, that he wrote above 400 volumes, and he put an end to his life in his old age.

CLIVE, Robert, a celebrated general, born at Styche, Moreton Say, the family seat of his ancestors, near Market-drayton, 29th Sept. 1725. He was placed at school at Lostock in Cheshire, and afterwards at Market-drayton, then at Merchant-tailors', and lastly at Hemel-Hempstead, and probably from the rapidity of these changes, his education did not receive that high polish, which a regular unvaried system might have ensured. In 1743, he was appointed writer to the East India company, but his obstinate inflexible disposition often exposed him to the suspicion and censure of his superiors. In one instance his conduct to the secretary was so reprehensible, that the governor insisted on his making an apology. Clive made the apology with contempt, and in such ambiguous terms, that the secretary mistook it for a compliment, and invited him to dinner, 'No sir,' replied the unsubdued Clive, 'the governor did not command me to dine with you.' In 1747 he accepted an ensigncy in the military service, and highly distinguished himself at the siege of Pondicherry, where he received a shot in his hat, and another in his coat. At the seige of Devi Cotah under major Lawrence, he volunteered to storm the town, and he and three others only out of 34 who had undertaken this perilous attempt, returned, but so terrified were the enemy that they abandoned the town. On the cessation of hostilities, he returned to his civil office, and became commissary to the troops. In 1753, he returned to England, and his services were acknowledged by the handsome present of a sword set with diamonds, by the court of directors. He revisited India as governor of fort St. David, and with the rank of lieutenant colonel, and he ably assisted admiral Watson in the conquest of the pirate Angria, and took fort William in Bengal. At the battle of Plassey he completely routed Surajah Dowla, and settled Jaffier Ali Cawn on the throne of Muxadabad. He was made an Irish peer on his coming to England in 1760, and four years after he went back as president, when the vigour of his counsels, and the boldness of his measures, restored tranquillity to the east, and security to the inhabitants. In 1767 he reached home, and in 1769 was made knight of the Bath. Though his services were so great and so meritorious, yet he did not escape the malevolent insinuations of his enemies. His fortune was immense, and his assistance in one instance was rewarded by the Mogul by the present of a tract of country producing a yearly revenue of 17,000*l.* This great opulence, therefore, drew upon him the censures of some of the members of the house of commons, who in 1773 made a motion that, in the acquisition of his wealth, lord Clive had abused the powers with which he was intrusted. Against this charge he made a short but most energetic defence, and the conclusion was that the house voted that lord Clive had rendered great and meritorious services to his country. His abilities as a general were universally admired. Mr. Pitt called him a heaven-born general, who, without experience and regular study, surpassed all the military men of his age. On the breaking out of the American war, Clive was offered the place of commander-in-chief, which in consequence of the ill state of his health he declined. He was from 1760 to the day of his death representative for Shrewsbury. His health, which was dreadfully shattered by a severe nervous fever while at Madras, gradually declined, he seldom was without an attendant about his person, and his depression of spirits at last became so great that in one fatal moment he lost his reason and destroyed himself November 22d, 1774. He was buried at Moreton Say the place of his birth. He married, in 1753, Margaret, sister of Dr. Maskelyne, the learned astronomer royal, by whom he had two sons and three daughters. He made a noble present of 70,000*l.* to the invalids in the company's service.

CLIVE, Catherine, an eminent actress born in 1711. She first appeared at Drury-lane in boy's clothes in the character of Ismenes, and continued to improve till her delineation of Nell in the Devil to pay, exhibited her in the possession of such superior talents that for 30 years she remained unrivalled on the stage. In 1732 she married George Clive, a gentleman of the law, brother to lord Clive, but their union was productive of no domestic happiness, so that they separated, and never again lived together. In 1769, Mrs. Clive following the example of Mrs. Pritchard, retired from the stage, and lived at Strawberry hill, Thwickenham, where she spent the rest of her life in comfortable and independent ease. She died December 6th, 1785, highly respected in private as well as in public life. Her powers of acting were very great and diversified, and she never failed to please and captivate either as the capricious coquette, the high bred lady, the jealous wife, the affected chambermaid, or the superannuated beauty.

CLODIUS, Publius, a Roman senator of debauched character. He was a great enemy to Cato and Cicero, and at last was killed in an accidental encounter, by Milo, B. C. 53.

CLOOTS, Anacharsis, a native of Prussia, who, in the madness of the French revolution, called himself the orator of the human race, and as a member of the national convention he voted for the king's death. He was a man of letters and a nephew of W. Pauw, and published the "republique universelle," but he was as profane in his religious as he was licentious in his political tenets. He was guillotined March 24th, 1794.

CLOPINEL, or John de Meun, a French poet, born in 1280, died about 1364. He was a favourite at the court of Philip the fair, and acquired some celebrity by continuing the unfinished poem of the Romance of the Rose, by W. de Loris. He translated Boethius' consolations. His romance was edited 1735, three vols. 12mo.

CLOSTERMAN, N. a portrait painter who settled in London from Hanover 1681. He went to Spain in 1696, where he gained much money by his profession. He died 1713, of a broken heart, on being robbed and abandoned by his mistress.

CLOTAIRE I. fourth son of Clovis, and Clotilda, was king of Soissons, and after the death of Thierry and of Childebert, he united the whole French monarchy under his power, 558. He distinguished himself against the Saxons and the Thuringians, and died at Compeigne 561, in the 64th year of his age and the 51st of his reign.

CLOTAIRE II. son and successor of Chilperic, in the kingdom of Soissons, was supported by his mother Fredegonde against Childebert, and though after her death he was defeated by Theodebert king of Austrasia, and Thierry king of Burgundy, he had the good fortune to unite that power to his own dominions. Though cruel and oppressive in his conduct, some authors have praised his justice and the wisdom of some part of his government. He died 628, aged 45, leaving two sons, Dagobert and Charibert.

CLOTAIRE III. king of Burgundy and Neustria, after the death of his father Clovis II. 655, was chiefly governed by his mother Batilda. He died 670, without children.

CLOVIO, George, a Slavonian, eminent as an historical and miniature painter. He died 1578, aged 80.

CLOVIS I. the proper founder of the French monarchy, was born 467, and succeeded his father Childeric 481. He was victorious against the Romans, but in a battle with the Germans, when he saw his troops ready to give way, he made a vow that he would worship the God of the Christians, as his wife Clotilda had advised him to do, and after obtaining the victory, he was converted from the heathen religion, and was baptized with 3000 of his subjects, on Christmas-day, by St. Remi, archbishop of Rheims. He was victorious in other battles against the Goths, and though he was checked in a battle by Theodorice near Arles, he had the good fortune to subdue the best part of Gaul under his power, and he fixed his residence at Paris, which he made the capital of his dominions.

He died 511, aged 45, in the 30th year of his reign.

CLOVIS II. succeeded his father Dagobert 638, and was a mild and benevolent prince, though accused of debauchery and cowardice. He died 655, aged 23.

CLOVIS III. succeeded his father Thierry III. 691. He reigned five years, and died at the age of 14. He was governed by Pepin Heristal, who, as mayor of the palace, governed the kingdom at his pleasure.

CLOWES, William, a surgeon of eminence of whom few particulars are known. He was originally a surgeon in the navy, and was afterwards surgeon to Bartholomew and Christ hospitals, London, and to queen Elizabeth. His last publication on the venereal disease was in 1596, reprinted 1637.

CLUENTIUS, a Roman accused by his mother of murdering his father. He was ably defended by Cicero.

CLUVERIUS, Philip, a celebrated geographer, born at Dantzic 1580. He studied law at Leyden, but his genius and the advice of Jos. Scaliger directed him to geography. He travelled to improve himself through Germany, England, France, and Italy, and it is said he could talk with fluency ten different languages. He died at Leyden 1623, 43 years old. He published de tribus Rheni alveis—Italia—Germania antiqua,—Sicilia et Sardinia,—introductio ad geograph. universalem, &c.

CLYMER, George, one of the signers of the declaration of American independence, was a native of Philadelphia, and born in 1738. At the commencement of the revolution he distinguished himself by his exertions in the popular cause. He was one of the committee of correspondence of Philadelphia, and in 1776, was chosen a member of congress, and affixed his name to the declaration of independence. He was superseded the next year, but was afterwards elected again, and in 1778, was one of the convention which formed the constitution of the United States. He was for some time one of the treasurers of the colonies, and in 1791 was appointed supervisor of the excise in Pennsylvania. After the establishment of independence he rendered himself highly useful by his efforts to promote the progress of commerce, and of the arts and sciences. He was president of the academy of fine arts in Philadelphia from its establishment to his death, and a distinguished member of several other useful associations. He died at Morrisville, January 23d, 1813, aged 75.

COBB, Samuel, an ingenious poet, educated at Christ's hospital, of which he afterwards became master. He was of Trinity college, Cambridge. He died at London, 1713. He wrote observations on Virgil, and a collection of poems, 8vo. 1700. He also assisted Rowe in his Calipædia, and Ozell in his Boileau's lutrin.

COBDEN, Edward, D.D. first chaplain to Gibson bishop of London, and afterwards for 22 years to George II. was besides archdeacon of London, prebendary of Lincoln and St. Paul's, and rector of Acton, and of St. Austin and St. Faith, London. Though such a pluralist, yet his income did not exceed 350*l.* per annum, a sum which, by moderation and contentment, he converted into honourable independence and dignified enjoyment. He published "discourses and essays," 1757, of which only 250 copies were printed, and also poems for the benefit of his curate's widow. He survived the loss of his wife two years, and died 22d April, 1764, aged above 80.

COCCÆUS, Henry, a native of Bremen, educated at Leyden, and made professor of the law of nature and nations at Heidelberg, from which he removed to Utrecht, and afterwards to Frankfort on Oder. In 1713 he was created a baron of the empire, and died 1719, aged 75. He is author of juris publici prudentia compendiose exhibitæ—prodromus justitiæ gentium—deductiones consilia, &c.—Theses, four vols. 4to. &c.

COCCÆUS, Samuel, a German baron, son of the preceding, born at Frankfort on the Oder. He was in the service of Frederic the great of Prussia, and, as his grand chancellor, he presided with dignity and great impartiality over the administration of justice. Besides the Frederican code, published in three vols. 8vo. 1747, he edited Grotius de jure belli pacis, five vols. 4to. He died 1755.

COCCÆUS, or COCK, John, a native of Bremen, Hebrew professor there. He afterwards removed to Franeker, and then to Leyden, where he obtained the theological chair. He excited a warm controversy by the singularity of his opinions. He considered the whole of the Old Testament as a mystical representation of Christ and his church, and gave to every word and sentence a metaphorical interpretation. He was an advocate for the millennium, and deeply studied the apocalypse. His followers were called Coccæians. He died at Leyden 1669, aged 61. His works filled 10 vols. fol.

COCCHI, Anthony, professor of physic at Florence and Pisa, was born at Mugellano, and died 1758, aged 62. He was esteemed for his learning, and came to England with lord Huntingdon to see Mead, Newton, and other learned men. He was intimate with Boerhaave. He was antiquary to the emperor. He wrote a treatise on the advantages of the Pythagorean mode of life, and other medical treatises, besides an edition of Zenophon Ephesius' amoribus Anthiæ et Abrocomæ.

COCHIN, Charles Nicholas, a French engraver, was born 1668, and died in 1754. His principal pieces are after Watteau and le Moine, and from the paintings of the invalids, in which he was engaged 10 years.—There was another of the same name, whose smaller pieces are greatly admired, especially those after Vernent. His son, who was equally eminent, died 1790, aged 75. He was author of letters on the pictures of Herculaneum—letters on the lives of Slodz and Deshays—travels in Italy, &c.—dissertation on the effect of light and shade, &c.

COCHIN, Henry, a native of Paris, who studied the law, and was as eminent at the bar as Bourdaloue was in the pulpit. He pleaded his first cause before the great council when at the age of only 22. His memorials, pleadings, &c. appeared at Paris, in 6 vols. 4to. 1751. He died 1747, aged 60.

COCHLEUS, John, a catholic of Nuremberg, who warmly attacked Luther, Bucer, Osiander, Melancthon, Calvin, and the other reformers. He was attacked by Dr. Morrison, an Englishman, for his tract on the marriage of Henry VIII. and he violently defended himself. He died January 10, 1552, aged 72, at Breslaw. His Historia Hussitarum, in folio, is curious. He wrote besides de actis et scriptis Lutheri, &c.

COCHRAN, Robert, a Scotchman, educated at Padua, and employed by James III. of Scotland as an architect to erect some public buildings. The favour which he enjoyed with his sovereign, and his elevation to the earldom of Mar, so offended the old nobility, that they tore him from the royal presence, and hanged him over the bridge at Lauder, 1484.

COCHRAN, William, a Scotch painter, born December 12, 1738, at Strathaven, Clydesdale. After studying at Glasgow, he went to Italy, in 1761, and applied himself under the direction of Gavin Hamilton at Rome, and on his return home he acquired great celebrity, and some opulence. He died October 23, 1785, and was buried in the cathedral church of Glasgow. His pieces are much admired, especially his Dædalus and Icarus, and his Diana and Endymion.

COCKAIN, Sir Alston, a native of Ashbourne, in Derbyshire, studied at Oxford, and was fellow of Trinity college, Cambridge. He was a catholic, which circumstance diminished the number of his friends; though his poetry, occasionally licentious, was yet respectable. His extravagance reduced him in the latter part of his life. He died 1684, aged 78. He wrote four plays, and Dianea a romance.

COCKBURN, Catharine, an ingenious lady, daughter of captain David Trotter, of the navy. From a protestant she became a catholic, and again was reconciled to the protestants. In 1708, she married Mr. Cockburn, son of an eminent Scotch divine, who, though at first a nonjuror, took the oaths, and obtained the living of Long Horsley, Cumberland. Though possessed with a genius for poetry, she turned her thoughts to metaphysics, and defended Locke against Drs. Burnet and Holdsworth. She survived her husband about one year, and died 1749, aged 70. Her works were collected by Dr. Birch, in two vols. 8vo.

COCKER, Edward, an ingenious penman, who died 1677. He published 14 copy books engraved by his own hand, besides a treatise on arithmetic—a small English dictionary—and a book of sentences for writing called Cocker's morals.

COCLIS, Publ. Horat. a Roman celebrated for his brave defence of a bridge across the Tiber, against the whole army of Por-sena.

CODDINGTON, William, one of the principal founders of Rhode Island, and its first governor, was a native of Lincolnshire, England, and came to Massachusetts in 1630. He was for some time a magistrate in that colony, but in 1638, removed to Rhode Island, and was the chief instrument of establishing a settlement there. In 1640, he was appointed governor of the colony, and held the office till a charter was obtained in 1648; and again in 1674, and 1675. He was a strenuous advocate for liberty of conscience, and had the honour of a chief agency in organising the first government in modern ages under which that blessing was fully enjoyed. He died in 1678. ☞ L.

CODRINGTON, Christopher, a gentleman of genius and merit, was born at Barbadoes, and educated at Christ Church, Oxford. He was elected fellow of All-souls, in 1689, where he distinguished himself by his knowledge of physic, modern and classical literature, and divinity. He afterwards entered the army, without resigning his fellowship; and recommended himself to the notice of king William by his courage in repelling the French in their attack on St. Christopher, and at the siege of Namur. At the peace of Ryswick he was made governor of the Leeward islands, in which office he conducted himself with great propriety. He was at the successful attack on Guadaloupe in 1703; some time after which he resigned his employment, and lived in retirement and learned ease. He died at Barbadoes 7th April, 1710, and his remains were brought to England, and interred June 19, 1716, in All-souls chapel. He left his library, valued at 6000*l.* to his college, besides 10,000*l.* to build a library. He left also two plantations to the society for propagating the gospel in foreign parts. Some of his poems appear in the Musæ Anglicanæ. He was esteemed as very superior in metaphysical knowledge.

CODRUS, the last king of Athens, who nobly offered himself to death, that his countrymen might obtain the victory, according to the words of an oracle, B. C. 1070.

COEFFETEAU, Nicholas, a Dominican, born at Calais, died 1623, aged 49, after being nominated to the see of Marsailles by Lewis XIII. He translated Florus, and wrote a Roman history from Augustus to Constantine, in folio, besides other pieces.

COEN, John Paterson, a native of Hoorn, who became governor of the Dutch East Indies, and laid the foundation of the city of Batavia, where he removed the factory from Bantom 1619. He came to Europe in 1623, but four years after returned to Batavia, which he bravely defended against the emperor of Java. The bodies of the thousands, however, of the enemy who fell in the siege, produced a pestilence, of which unfortunately Coen died 1629, aged 42.

COEUR, James, a French merchant, the richest subject in Europe. His connexions were so extensive that he had 300 factors in Italy and the Levant, and his resources were so great, that he lent Charles 7,200,000 crowns of gold, with which the monarch conquered Normandy. These high services, however, were ill repaid. Though once the favourite and friend of the king, he was basely imprisoned, and, under the false pretence that he had poisoned Agnes Sorel, the king's mistress, he was tried and condemned to dishonourable concessions, and a fine of 100,000 crowns. His clerks, in his misfortunes, showed their gratitude to him; they relieved his distresses, and facilitated his escape from confinement. He fled to Rome, where pope Calixtus III. gave him the command of his fleet against the Turks. He soon after died at Chio, 1456.

COGAN, Thomas, a native of Somersetshire, educated at Oriel college, of which he became fellow. In 1575 he was elected master of Manchester school, and there, as he had taken his degrees in physic, he practised with great success. He was author of the haven of health, for the comfort of students, 4to. 1586—a preservative from the pestilence—epistolæ familiarum Ciceronis epitome, &c.

COGGESHALLE, Ralph, an English Cistercian monk, who was at the siege of Jerusalem by Saladin, of which he wrote the history, in a "chronical of the holy land," published in 1729. He wrote besides other things. He is supposed to have died about the year 1228.

COHAUSEN, John Henry, a German physician, author of a curious work, called Hermippus redivivus, &c. translated into English by Dr. John Campbell, and called the Sage's triumph over old age and the grave. In this work, he pretended that life might be extended to 115 years by taking in the breath of young women. He died at Munster 1750, aged 85.

COHORN, Meinnon, a famous Dutch engineer, who early displayed his genius for military tactics, and the art of fortification. As engineer and lieutenant-general in the service of his country, he skillfully fortified and ably defended the principal towns, and supported the siege of Namur against the celebrated Vauban. He died at the Hague 1704, aged 72. He called Bergen-op-Zoom the masterpiece of all his fortifications which he had erected in the United States. He wrote a treatise on fortification, in the Flemish language.

COIGNET, Giles, an eminent painter of Antwerp, accused of selling copies of his pieces, drawn by his scholars, and retouched by himself, as real originals. He died 1600, aged 70.

COINTE, Charles le, a French historian, born at Troyes, 4th November, 1611. He was priest of the congregation of the oratory, and for his abilities he deserved the patronage of Colbert, who obtained for him a pension of 1000 livres and three years after 500 livres more. He wrote Annales ecclesiastici Francorum, 8 vols. fol. from 235 to 835, the first volume of which appeared 1665, and the last 1679. The work, though not elegant, is curious, and contains great variety of matter. Le Cointe died at Paris, 18th January, 1681, aged 70.

COITER, Volcherius, celebrated as a surgeon, physician, and anatomist, was born at Groningen. His labours in anatomy were very useful, and laid the foundation of that eminence which modern industry has produced. He wrote a system of anatomy, fol. 1573—de cartiliginibus tabulæ, 1566, fol. &c. and died 1600, aged about 66.

COKE, Edward, a celebrated English lawyer, born at Mileham, Norfolk, in 1549. He was educated at the free-school, Norwich, and Trinity college, Cambridge, from which, after four years' residence, he removed to Clifford's inn, and the year after to the Inner-temple. After six years he was called to the bar, and pleaded his first cause in the king's bench 1578. He was about this time appointed reader of Lyon's inn, where his lectures for three years, were numerous attended, and deservedly admired. He married soon after Bridget daughter of John Preston, Esq. a lady who brought him 30,000*l.* and by whom he had ten children. He now rose to consequence by his abilities, and from his matrimonial connexions, he was elected recorder of Nottingham and Coventry, member for Norfolk, and speaker of the house of commons, in the 35th of Elizabeth. He was solicitor and afterwards attorney-general to the queen, and in that quality he was employed in the prosecution of Essex and Southampton. He was knighted by James in 1603; but he highly disgraced himself by the violence of his conduct and the scurrility of his language in managing the impeachment of the unfortunate Raleigh; a circumstance to which Shakspeare is supposed to have alluded in his Twelfth night. At the trial of the gunpowder conspirators, and of the Jesuit Garnet, he was greatly distinguished by his eloquence, and the two speeches which were afterwards published are deservedly considered as master-pieces of superior elocution, and consummate argumentation. In 1606 he was made lord chief justice of the common pleas, and seven years after placed at the head of the king's bench, and sworn of the privy council. In the trials in consequence of Overbury's murder, Coke behaved with great spirit and becoming impartiality; but the dispute which he had with Bacon, and the secret intrigues of his enemies, undermined his power, and lessened his influence with the king, so that he fell into disgrace. Some attribute his fall to the rising favourite Villiers; but whatever might be the causes of the king's displeasure, sir Edward did not behave in his adversity with the dignity and fortitude which conscious virtue and oppressed innocence should assume. When informed of his banishment from office, he on his knees acknowledged the royal mercy extended to him beyond his merits, and deprecated the severity of his sovereign's displeasure. Upon his disgrace, he received a letter from Bacon, which cruelly upbraided his conduct, and insultingly reflected upon his situation; a circumstance in itself humiliating to human nature to observe the abilities of so great a man, and so sagacious a philosopher, dishonourably demeaning himself by trampling on fallen greatness. He afterwards was restored to some degree of favour, which he probably procured by marrying his daughter to the brother of Buckingham. This union, which was negotiated against the consent of lady Coke, was productive of serious consequences, in the separation of sir Edward from his wife, which nothing at last but the king's interference could repair. He was member in the parliament of 1621; but though restored to the privy council, his conduct in the house of commons was too independent to please the court, and his popu-

jar harangues against the royal proclamations were viewed with secret resentment, and upon the adjournment of the house, he was committed to the Tower, on pretence of ill conduct during the trial of Overbury. Though soon after released he yet was again driven from the privy council, and emphatically called by James "the fittest instrument for a tyrant that ever was in England." Under the next reign, though some persecutions attended him, that he might not be elected to parliament, he was made sheriff of Bucks, and attended on the judges where he often had presided as chief justice. In 1628, however, he was elected for Bucks, and in the house became a violent advocate for the redress of grievances, and boldly declared Buckingham as the cause of all the miseries of the kingdom, though before he had pronounced him the saviour of the nation. After the dissolution of that parliament he retired to his house at Stoke Pogcs, Bucks, where he died September 3, 1634, in his 86th year. While on his death-bed, his papers were seized by sir Francis Windebank, together with his will; and they were not recovered till seven years after, when his son moved in the commons that the papers seized might be restored. Sir Edward had married for his second wife, in 1598, Elizabeth, daughter of lord Burleigh, by whom he had the lady, who as mentioned, so unfortunately produced such domestic dissensions. Coke was in his character a man of great presence of mind and resolution, full of resources; and though in his calamity dejected, yet never desponding; so that James compared him to a cat, which always falls upon her legs. Celebrated as an able lawyer, he is still known and respected as a clear and luminous writer on the constitution of his country. Of his reports the first volume appeared in 1600, in folio, but the last or 13th was published only in 1655. His institutes are divided into four parts; the first of which is a translation of Littleton's tenures; the second part contains magna charta and other statutes; the third, the criminal laws of the crown; and the fourth the jurisdiction of all the courts of the kingdom. There are besides other works of inferior consequence.

COLARDEAU, Charles Pierre, a French poet, born at Janville, Orleanois, died 7th April, 1776, aged 41. He translated Pope's Eloisa to Abelard, with great spirit and elegance, besides two of Young's night thoughts. He wrote two tragedies, Astarbe and Calisto, not favourably received on the French stage. He was elected member of the French Academy, but died before his inaugural speech. His works were collected in 2 vols. 8vo. 1779, Paris.

COLBERT, John Baptist, marquis of Seg-nelai, an illustrious statesman. His family were originally of Rheims, where his grandfather was a wine merchant, and his father of the same occupation, but afterwards a cloth and silk merchant. As clerk to Teller, a notary, young Colbert displayed great diligence and ability, and was at last recommended to cardinal Mazarin, whom he faithfully served and by whom he was highly patronised. In this office he displayed so much zeal, and in an embassy at Rome showed such dexterity and despatch, that Mazarin at his death in 1661, strongly recommended him to the king as a man of integrity, and of superior talents. Colbert was first intendant of finances, and in this appointment, he settled on the firmest basis, the trade of France with the East and West Indies. As superintendent of the buildings in 1664 he began to improve and embellish the capital, and by erecting the noble palaces of the Thuilleries, Versailles, the Louvre, Fontainebleau, &c. he contributed to the comfort of the monarch, and to the honour of the nation. His influence with the monarch procured also the foundation of the academy for painting and sculpture, the academy of sciences, and the observatory which was first inhabited by Cassini. He likewise promoted the canal by which the two seas were united, and which was completed in 1680, after 14 years' labour, and he introduced a severe reform in the courts of justice. In 1669 he was made secretary of state, and three years after minister of state, which enabled him more fully to promote the interests of his country, and the glory of his master. He died September 6th, 1683, of the stone, leaving six sons and three daughters, whom he settled by alliances with the greatest and most powerful families of France, wisely considering that high connexions are a more permanent profit to a family than a momentary popularity. He is deservedly respected as a minister who ably restored the navy, the commerce, and the finances of France, patronised learning and science, and invigorated genius by his mild and active generosity.

COLBERT, John Baptist, marquis of Torey, son of the preceding, was born September 19th, 1665. He was early engaged in politics, and as ambassador in Portugal, Denmark, and England, he evinced great judgment and ability. He was secretary of state 1686, director general of the posts 1699, and counsellor to the regency in Lewis XV.'s minority. He died at Paris 2d of September, 1746, aged 81. Ten years after his death appeared his memoirs of the negotiations from the treaty of Ryswick to the peace of Utrecht, in four parts, 3 vols. 12mo. written with great purity and commendable impartiality. He married the daughter of de Pomponne, minister of state, by whom he had several children.

COLDEN, Cadwallader, a distinguished scholar and civilian, was born at Dunse, Scotland, in 1688, and educated at Edinburgh. He studied medicine, and in 1708 came to Philadelphia, and established himself as a physician. In 1718 he removed to New-York, and was soon appointed surveyor general, and afterwards master in chancery. In 1720 he was advanced to a place in the King's council of the province, and was for a long time one of the most conspicuous members of that body. In 1761 he was appointed lieutenant governor, and held the office till his death in 1776. He was a distinguished scholar as well as a civilian; was thoroughly versed in the knowledge of medicine, botany, and astronomy; and corresponded with many of the most eminent scholars both in America and Europe. Beside his publications relating to mathematics, botany, and medicine, and which were highly respectable, he wrote a valuable history of the five Indian nations.

COLE, William, son of a clergyman, was born at Adderbury, Oxfordshire, 1626, and educated at Merton college. He retired to Butney, where he devoted himself to botany. At the restoration he became secretary to Duppa, bishop of Winchester, in whose service he died 1662. He published, 1656, the art of simpling, or introduction to the knowledge of gathering plants, and the next year Adam in Eden, or Nature's paradise, containing a history of herbs, plants, &c.

COLE, Thomas, a dissenting minister, educated at Westminster school, and Christ church, Oxford. In 1656 he was made principal of St. Mary-hall, and had the great Locke among his pupils, but at the restoration he was ejected for nonconformity, from his preferments, and after keeping a school for some time at Nettlebed, he settled in London, and was lecturer at Pinner's hall. He wrote a discourse on regeneration, faith, and repentance, 8vo.—a discourse on the Christian religion on sundry points, 8vo.—the incomprehensibility of imputed righteousness for justification of human reason, and other things, and died 1697.

COLE, Thomas, a native of Gloucestershire, who made a curious collection of herbs, &c. which, according to Dr. Pulteney, he afterwards destroyed in a fit of religious frenzy, expressing his sorrow that he had spent his time in a manner so little conducive to the service of God.

COLES, Elisha, author of a Latin dictionary, was born in Northamptonshire about 1640, and entered at Magdalen college, Oxford, in 1658. He left the university without a degree, and maintained himself in London, by teaching Latin and English.

He was afterwards usher at Merchant Tailors', but left the place for some misdemeanor, at present unknown, and retired to Ireland, where he died about 1680. Besides his dictionary in 8vo. he wrote the English schoolmaster—short-hand, Nolens Volens—an English dictionary, &c. The famous work on predestination was written by another Elisha Coles, his uncle, who lived about this period, and died 1688.

COLET, John, was born in St. Antholin's parish, London, 1466, son of the lord mayor, and brother to 21 other children. He was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, where he took his degree of D.D. 1504. His knowledge did not extend to Greek, as in those days that language was considered as unnecessary, and the learning of it was opposed by a set of men who called themselves Trojans. From Oxford he travelled on the continent, and became acquainted with the learned of the times, with Budæus, Erasmus, Grocyn, Linacre, Lilly, &c. and on his return to England, he was courted and admired for his learning and eloquence. After inferior preferments, he was made dean of St. Paul's in 1505, and in this high office, he began by preaching himself, and by procuring the assistance of able divines, to encourage inquiries after the contents of the holy Scriptures. The spirit and independence which he showed, made him, however, obnoxious to the clergy, and the bishop of London, a bigoted man, complained of him to Warham, the primate, who knowing the integrity of his views, dismissed the accusation. In his eagerness to promote learning, Colet founded St. Paul's school in 1512, of which Lilly was the first master, with an ample provision to instruct 153 boys gratis, under the patronage of the mercer's company. Whilst he meditated retirement to privacy and solitude from the tumults of a busy life, he was attacked by the sweating sickness, which after a third relapse carried him off 16th September, 1519, in his 53d year. He was buried in St. Paul's church, and the elegant monument erected over him perished with the cathedral in 1666. He wrote various things, all of which are mentioned in his life by Knight. Though he did not live long enough to see the reformation, he yet was an able promoter of it, and he was inimical to the tenets of the Romish church, not merely as the friend of reformation, but as an honest man whose opinions were respectable, as proceeding from an exemplary, moderate, and religious character. He is introduced under the character of Gratianus Pullus in Erasmus' colloquy called Peregrinatio religionis ergo.

COLEY, Henry, a native of Oxford, who from a tailor became an eminent astrological writer, as the assistant of Lilly, and the continuator of his ephemeris. His pretended knowledge of futurity rendered him very popular, so that his house in Gray's-inn-lane was frequented by people of all descriptions, and his opinion obtained by the examination of urine, &c. He wrote a key to the whole art of astrology, and died 1690.

COLIGNI, Gaspard de, admiral of France, was born 16th February, 1516, at Chatillon-sur-Loing. He was early inured to a military life, and by his brave conduct at the battle of Cerisoles, and particularly of Renti, he was made admiral of France. At the death of Henry II. he espoused the cause of the Calvinists against the Guises, and during the battles which desolated France at that melancholy period of civil war, he greatly distinguished himself, especially at Dreux, St. Denys, Jarnac, and Montcontour. Peace at last put an end to civil broils, and Coligni appeared at court, and was loaded with the caresses and the presents of Charles IX. who soon after perfidiously planned and executed his murder. Coligni was the first who fell on the fatal day of Bartholomew, 24th August, 1572. The duke of Guise headed his train of assassins to the house of the aged hero, who was stabbed in several places by Besme, and thrown out of the window. After the body had been exposed three days to the insults of the populace, the head was cut off and sent by the bloody Catherine de Medicis as a present to the Roman pontiff. The character of this great, good, and virtuous man, has been ably drawn up by the abbé de Mabli, who draws a parallel between him and Francis duke of Guise. His life has been written by Gatien de Courtilz, 1686, and is also found among the "hommes illustres de France." His brother Odet was a cardinal and archbishop of Toulouse, but on embracing the protestant tenets, he was stripped of his honours, and fled to England, where he was poisoned by one of his servants, 1571.

COLIGNI, Henrietta, daughter of Gaspard de Coligni, marshal of France, first married Thomas Hamilton, a Scotch lord, and afterwards count de la Suez of Champagne. This last union proved very unfortunate; the jealousy and severities of her husband compelled her to embrace the Catholic religion, and at last she was separated from him, and her marriage annulled by the parliament. She obtained celebrity by her wit and the effusions of her elegiac muse, so that the flatterers of her time, ascribed to her the majesty of Juno, the wit of Minerva, and the beauty of Venus. She died at Paris, 10th March, 1673. Her poetical works have been printed with the works of Pelisson, 1695 and 1725, in two volumes 12mo.

COLLADO, Diego, a Spanish Dominican, shipwrecked 1638, on his return to Europe from the Philippines, where he was superintendent of the convents. He wrote ars grammatica Japonicæ linguæ—and dictionary of the Japanese language, &c.

COLLANGE, Gabriel de, of Tours, in Auvergne, was murdered as a Huguenot at the massacre of St. Bartholomew, 1572, though he was a Catholic. He translated the cabalistic writings of Trithemius, in 4to. Paris, 1561, and was besides well skilled in mathematics and cosmography.

COLLATINUS, Luc. Tarquinius, the husband of Lucretia, went into voluntary exile, though one of the founders of Roman liberty, because the name of Tarquin was so very unpopular.

COLLE, Charles, secretary to the duke of Orleans, died at Paris, 2d Nov. 1783, aged 75. He was distinguished as a comic writer; but though he occasionally possesses all the vigour and elegance of genuine wit, and correct description, he yet wants delicacy, and that cautious regard for morals, so essential in public exhibitions. He was of that society of jovial companions known under the name of Caveau. His song on the capture of Portmahon procured him a pension of 600 livres. His works are collected in 3 vols. 12mo. under the title of theatre de société. His best plays are, Truth in wine—Dupius and Desronias—and Partie de chasse de Henri IV. from which our Miller of Mansfield is borrowed.

COLLEGE, Stephen, the protestant joiner, was condemned at Oxford as guilty of a conspiracy against Charles II. upon the testimony of a worthless informer, and he suffered death, strongly asserting his innocence, 1691. He was in his character a respectable man and an ingenious mechanic, and his daughter was made sempstress to king William, with a salary of 300*l.* a year.

COLLEONE, Bartholomew, a native of Bergamo, descended from a noble family. He followed the fortunes of De Montone, and of Joan queen of Naples, and afterwards entered into the service of the Venetians, and defeated Nicolas Piccinino. He was next in the service of Visconti, and then of Francis Sforza, for whom he dedicated the French army at the battle of Frescati. After serving so many different masters, and every where carrying victory in his train, he again entered into the service of the Venetians. He died 1475, and his memory was honoured with an equestrian statue, by the gratitude of the senate. He united to the great merits of a warrior the amiable character of the patron of learning, and the friend of religion and virtue.

COLLET, Peter, a French ecclesiastic of Ternay, who died 1770, aged 73. He is author of theologia moralis universalis, 17 vols. Svo.—institutiones theologicæ ad usum seminarian, 7 vols. 12mo.—the life of Vincent de St. Paul, 2 vols. 4to.—lives of Bourdon and De la Croix, &c.

COLLET, Philibert, a French advocate, author of treatises on excommunications, tithes, usury, alms, &c. a volume on the statutes and customs of Bresse—two letters on Tournefort's history of plants—and a catalogue of the plants in the neighbourhood of Dijon, &c. He died 1718.

COLLETET, William, a French academical, who died at Paris, 10th Feb. 1659, aged 61. He was one of the five authors whom Richelieu selected to write for the theatres; but though liberally patronised by him, he refused to alter his verses according to his suggestions. He was four times married; but his extravagance was so great, that he died in great indigence. His works were published in 1653, in 12mo.

COLLETON, James, governor of South Carolina, succeeded Morton. During his administration the colony was greatly agitated, and the government nearly overthrown, by the high church party, who in their violence against the puritans, opposed all his moderate and judicious councils, and in 1690 went so far as to procure a law prohibiting his holding any office in the colony. The proprietors, to please the party, professed to disapprove of his conduct, but the law disqualifying him for office was repealed. [F. L.]

COLLIER, Jeremy, an English divine, born at Stow-qui, Cambridgeshire, 23d September, 1650. He was educated under his father, master of Ipswich school, and afterwards entered at Caius college, Cambridge, where he took his degree of M.A. 1676. He resided for six years on his rectory of Ampton, near Bury, Suffolk, when he resigned it, and settled in London, where he became lecturer of Gray's-inn. At the revolution he was for a while silenced; but his attack on a pamphlet by Dr. Gilbert Burnet, drew upon him the resentment of the court, and he was sent to Newgate, from which, however, he was liberated without trial. He continued still as a writer to abuse the revolution, for which he was again persecuted, and sent to the king's bench prison, but released by the intercession of some of his friends. In 1696 Collier attended Friend and Perkins, two persons who were executed for their concern in the assassination plot, and by absolving them in the most solemn manner, and by his imposing his hand upon them, he exposed himself to the censures of the clergy, and was accused of insulting the civil and ecclesiastical government. Instead of putting in bail, Collier absconded, and was outlawed till the day of his death. In his retirement he not only defended his conduct, but began to acquire greater celebrity by his pen. He wrote his essays on moral subjects, and afterwards his view of the immorality of the English stage, a work which engaged him in perpetual contention with the wits and poets of the age. The severity of his attack, and the justness and force of his arguments were such, that a reformation actually took place, in the language of pieces represented on the stage, and though Vanbrugh and Congreve ridiculed his assaults, yet Dryden had the good sense and honesty of acknowledging the propriety of his remarks, and of publishing his own repentance for the licentiousness of his muse. His historical dictionary, chiefly compiled from Moreri, made its appearance in 1701, and the fourth volume of it in 1721. He afterwards published in 2 vols. fol. an ecclesiastical history of Great Britain, valuable for the various documents and extensive information which it contains. In 1713 Collier was consecrated a bishop by Hickeys, who had himself been consecrated suffragan of Thetford, by the deprived bishops of Norwich, Ely, and Peterborough. He was in consequence of his sedentary life greatly afflicted with the stone, of which he died 26th April, 1726, aged 76. He was buried in St. Pancras churchyard. Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote several treatises on controversial and ecclesiastical subjects, and assisted some of his friends in the completion of their publications. He was deservedly admired as a man of independent spirit, as a writer of great learning and genius, and as a divine of genuine piety.

COLLINGS, John, one of the commissioners at the Savoy conference in the reign of Charles II. died 1690, aged 67. He distinguished himself as a critic and divine. His weaver's pocket book was much admired. He was ejected as a nonconformist from St. Stephen's, Norwich, where he had been minister 44 years. He assisted Poole in his annotations.

COLLINGWOOD, Cuthbert, lord, an English admiral, was born at Newcastle-upon-Tyne in 1748. He was educated under Mr. Moises, at the same time with the present chancellor Eldon. In 1761 he entered into the naval service, in which he passed through all the regular steps of promotion till he was made post captain, and commanded the Prince, admiral Bowyer's flag-ship, in the battle of the 1st of June, 1794. After this he had the Hector, and next the Excellent, in which he bore a part, with his old friend Nelson, in the action off Cape St. Vincent, Feb. 14, 1797. In 1799 he was raised to the rank of rear-admiral of the white, and in 1801 to the red. In 1804 he was made vice-admiral of the blue, and served with Cornwallis in the tedious but important blockade of Brest. At length, after a variety of services, Collingwood became second to Nelson in the battle of Trafalgar, on which occasion his ship, the Royal Sovereign, commenced the fight, in such a manner as drew from the commander these expressions: "Look at that noble fellow! Observe the style in which he carries his ship into action!" After the loss of the great hero, the command devolved upon Collingwood at a critical period, and how well he secured by his prudence what had been so gloriously won, needs not be here related. He was now advanced to be vice-admiral of the red, confirmed in the command of the Mediterranean fleet, and created a peer of Great Britain, by the title of baron Collingwood. He died off Minorca, on board the Ville de Paris, March 7, 1810, and his body being brought to England was interred in St. Paul's cathedral.—W. B.

COLLINS, John, an eminent accountant and mathematician, son of a nonconformist divine, was born at Woodcaton, near Oxford, March, 1624. He was engaged with a bookseller, and afterwards with Mar, a clerk of the kitchen to Charles, prince of Wales, a man who was particularly fond of mathematics, and who constructed those sun-dials which adorned the prince's gardens. Thus early initiated to the knowledge of mathematics, he further improved himself during the seven years which he spent in the sea service, and at his return assumed the profession of an accountant, and published some valuable works on mathematical and geometrical subjects. He was a member of the Royal Society, whose memoirs he enriched by many valuable communications. He was made accountant to the royal fishery company, and was so highly respected for his knowledge of figures, that the lord Chancellor Shaftesbury often consulted him, and referred to his final decision, the settlement of difficult and intricate accounts. He died of a consumption, in consequence of drinking, after a hot day's journey, too large a quantity of cider, November 10th, 1683. He was the intimate correspondent of the illustrious men of his times, of Newton, Wallis, Barrow, Gregory, Flamstead, Leibnitz, Townley, &c. Twenty-five years after his death his writings fell into the hands of the learned William Jones, of the Royal Society. He was of a strong and inventive genius, he first projected the manner of dividing the meridian line on the nautical chart, a problem of the first importance to navigation; and he began to shorten the method of computation by logarithms, which was completed by Halley. His "commercium epistolarum" appeared in 4to. 1712.

COLLINS, Anthony, was born at Helston, near Hounslow, 21st June, 1676, and educated at Eton and king's college, Cambridge, under the tuition of Hare, afterwards bishop of Chichester. He entered at the Temple, but disliking the study of the law, he applied himself to the general pursuit of literature. He now became the friend of the learned, and gained the confidence of Locke, who corresponded with him, and at his death left a letter for him, full of the warmest confidence and affection. He was the best part of his life engaged in controversies, which proved him to be more inclined to scepticism and infidelity, than to support the Christian religion as an impartial and disinterested inquirer after truth. His chief works were, priestcraft in perfection—an essay on the 39 articles of the church of England—vindication of the divine attributes—discourse of free thinking—philosophical inquiry concerning human liberty—scheme of literal prophecy—a discourse on the grounds and reasons of the Christian religion, in two parts, a work which excited general attention, and whose tenets were in a short space of time combated by not less than 35 antagonists, among whom appear the respectable names of Whiston, Chandler, Clarke, Ashley, Sykes, and Sherlock. Collins twice visited Holland, but never penetrated farther on the continent. He retired in 1715 to Essex, where he acted as a magistrate, and deserved the public gratitude, by the benevolence and integrity with which he managed the affairs of the county as treasurer of its funds. He was long afflicted with the stone, of which he died, December 13th, 1729. He acknowledged in his last moments that the true catholic religion is to love God and to love man, and he earnestly advised those that stood around him to observe that as the awful warning of a dying man.

COLLINS, Arthur, a learned and indefatigable antiquary, whose knowledge of genealogy and labours of research are sufficiently proved in his valuable work called the peerage of England, in 8 vols. which has passed through several editions, and has been further improved by Longmate.

COLLINS, Samuel, an English physician, who studied at Padua, and was graduated at Oxford, in 1659. He wrote the present state of Russia, 1671, 8vo. besides a book of anatomy, in folio. He was censor of the college of physicians 1707.

COLLINS, William, a poet of great eminence, son of a hatter, born at Chichester, December 25th, 1720. He was educated at Winchester school, but being superannuated, and thus prevented from entering at New college, he became a member of Queen's college, and was afterwards elected demy of Magdalen 1741. During his residence at Oxford, he published his oriental eclogues, which are so deservedly admired for simplicity, richness of description, and unaffected tenderness. In 1744 he left Oxford and came to London, panting after fame, with few resources, and too wavering in his plans to execute any regular work. At this time he published proposals for a history of the revival of learning, of which probably not a single line was ever written. He was now known to Dr. Johnson, who with his friendship shared his poverty, and was privy to his distresses and dangerous escapes. The death of his uncle, colonel Martin, and a legacy of 1000*l.* soon however enabled him to live more respectably; but the acquisition of independence unfortunately did not advance the literary labours of the poet, who no sooner found himself enabled to study, than he was assailed by greater calamities than poverty, the calamities of disease and insanity. That so able a writer, and so sublime a poet, should be incapacitated to give flow to the pure streams of genius and elegant conception is a melancholy loss to mankind. For a time he endeavoured to disperse the clouds which hung threatening over his reason by travelling into France, but he returned, and after being some time confined in a house of lunatics, and afterwards attended by the care of his sister, he fell a victim to his intellectual malady at Chichester, in 1756. When he was visited at Islington by Johnson, he was found in his retirement with a book in his hand, which his friend out of curiosity examined to see what companion a man of letters had chosen. I have but one book, said Collins, but that is the best. It was a common English Testament, such as children carry to school. In his last illness, Collins expressed to his friend, Dr. Wharton, his disapprobation of his oriental eclogues. His odes, though very sublime, especially that on the passions, are however often obscure, his lines are clogged with clusters of consonants, and he too much affected the obsolete, when it was not worthy of revival.

COLLINS, John, governor of Rhode-Island, was elected in 1786, and was three years in office. He was an active revolutionary character, and was elected one of the delegates from that state to congress in 1775. Mr. Fenner succeeded him as governor. He died at Newport, March, 1795, aged 78. ☞ L.

COLLINS, John, governor of Delaware, was elected in 1820, and died at Wilmington, April 15, 1822. Mr. Rodney, president of the senate, succeeded him in the administration until the following election. ☞ L.

COLLINSON, Peter, an eminent botanist, born in the parish of Stavely, near Kendal, Westmoreland. He had an early and strong partiality for natural history, and great naturalists and many literary characters of the age were soon in the number of his intimate friends; such as Derham, Woodward, Dale, Sloane, Lloyd, and others. In 1728 he became fellow of the Royal Society, whose memoirs he greatly enriched by his own inquiries, and his valuable correspondence with foreigners, especially Benjamin Franklin, Cadwallader Colden, and the famous Linnæus. To his zeal and improvements we are indebted for the many trees and shrubs transplanted from the Western hemisphere and other countries, which adorn our gardens and plantations. He was elected fellow of the antiquarian society in 1737. In private life he was of amiable manners, very communicative, and of a very benevolent heart. He was attacked while on a visit to his friend lord Petre with a retention of urine, which medical assistance could not remove, and which shortly proved fatal, 11th August, 1768, in his 75th year.

COLLIUS, Francis, doctor of the Ambrosian college at Milan, died in 1640, at an advanced age. He wrote a famous treatise, de animabus paganorum, in two vols. 4to. in which, amidst bold and curious conjectures, he decrees salvation to the sages of Greece, the midwives of Egypt, Socrates, &c. while he denounces damnation on Pythagoras, Aristotle, and others. His book de sanguine Christi is equally curious and singular.

COLLOT, Germain, a French surgeon, famous for his skill in cutting for the stone. He died 1656.

COLLOT D'HERBOIS, J. M. a player, who exhibited with little success on the theatres of Geneva, the Hague, and Lyons. The hisses and disapprobation which attended his appearance at Lyons, made him vow vengeance on that unfortunate city, and as he had represented the character of tyrant on the stage to the best advantage, he was soon to exhibit it in real life when admitted member of the convention, and sent as deputy to punish its revolt. Invested with absolute power against the devoted Lyonese, he seemed determined to destroy every vestige of their city, not only the walls were battered down with cannon shot, but the unfortunate inhabitants were slaughtered with insulting cruelty, and not less than 209 perished in one evening. Collot, thus stained with blood, and deservedly called the tiger, returned to Paris to become the worthy associate of Robespierre. He voted for the abolition of monarchy, and the death of Lewis, because that unfortunate monarch had refused to appoint him his minister; but when his friend Robespierre was accused, he changed sides, and as president of the convention, he exerted all his influence to procure his condemnation. This minister of iniquity was afterwards himself condemned 1795 to be deported to Cayenne, where he endeavoured to excite an insurrection of the blacks. He died in confinement, November, 1796. As an orator he had some powers of eloquence, which were fatally exerted in the convention, and among the Jacobins; but as a dramatic writer he acquired little celebrity. The best of his pieces is an imitation of the Spanish play of Calderon, which he called the Paysan magistrat.

COLLUTHUS, a priest of Alexandria. He maintained that God was not the author of the wicked, nor of the misfortunes which afflict human life. He usurped the episcopal authority, but was condemned as a heretic by the council of Alexandria 324.

COLMAN, George, an English writer, born about the year 1733 at Florence, where his father was British resident at the grand duke's court. His mother was sister of Lady Bath. He was educated at Westminster and Christ church, Oxford, where he took his degree of M.A. He early displayed those shining talents which promised future reputation, and ensured him the friendship of the wits of the time, of Lloyd, Bonnel, Thornton, Churchill, and others. While at Oxford he published with Thornton the Connoisseur in weekly numbers, from 31st January, 1754 to September 30th, 1756. He entered at Lincoln's-Inn under the patronage of lord Bath, but though called to the bar, the profession of the law was less congenial to his taste and feelings than the pursuit of the muses. From writing fugitive pieces of poetry, he soon applied himself to dramatic composition. His Polly Honeycomb was acted at Drury-lane in 1760 with great success, and the next year his Jealous Wife divided the general applause with Murphy's Way to keep him, and Maeklin's Married Libertine. The death of lord Bath in 1764 left him in the independent enjoyment of a comfortable annuity, and his income was further increased upon the decease of general Pultney in 1767. He purchased of Beard in 1768, with Harris, Powel, and Rutherford, the property of Convent-garden theatre, but he soon parted with his share in consequence of some private dispute with his fellow patentees. Soon after he purchased of Foote, for an annuity, the Hay-market theatre, and with great judgment and much advantage to himself and to the public, he continued the management of that house till the time of his death, and thus introduced to the admiration and patronage of the kingdom many actors of merit and respectability. In 1790 he was attacked by a stroke of the palsy, which not only deprived him nearly of the use of one of his sides, but brought on alarming symptoms of mental derangement. He was removed to Paddington under proper management, and died 14th

August 1794. Besides the comedies already mentioned, the best of Colman's plays are the Clandestine marriage, the English merchant, the Oxonian in town, the Man of business, Epicene, the Spanish barber, Suicide, the separate maintenance, the Manager in distress, &c. He evinced his abilities as a scholar, and as a critic, by his respectable translation of Terence's comedies, and of Horace's art of poetry.

COLMAN, Benjamin, a congregational minister, was born at Boston, Massachusetts, in 1673, and graduated at Harvard college in 1692. In 1699 he was ordained pastor of the Brattle-street church in Boston, then recently formed, and laboured there with great popularity and usefulness till his death in 1747. He was one of the most eminent among the ministers of his time, in talents, learning, eloquence and devotedness to the duties of his office.

¶ L.

COLOCCI, Angelo, a native of Jesi in Italy, descended from a noble family, who assumed the learned name of Angelus Colotius Bassus. He settled at Rome, where he distinguished himself by his noble collection of books. He was made bishop of Noceera, by Leo X. and governor of Ascoli by Clement VII. He wrote Latin poems of some merit, but his Italian verses express little excellence. He died at Rome 1549, aged 82. He was the reviver and patron of the Roman academy.

COLOGNE, Peter de, a native of Ghent, educated at Paris and at Geneva, where he became the friend of Calvin and of Beza. He went to Metz, and afterwards settled at Heidelberg, where he died in the early part of his life. He vindicated the protestants against the bishop of Metz, and wrote also on the eucharist.

COLOMBIERE, Claude de la, a famous Jesuit, born near Lyons. He was an eloquent preacher, and for two years delivered his discourses with great popularity and effect before James II. of England, but on suspicion of conspiracy, he was banished from England, and died at Parai, in the Charolois, 15th February, 1682, aged 41. He is particularly known as the inventor of the Solemnity of the heart of Jesus, which had however been before introduced by Thomas Goodwin, president of Magdalen college, Oxford. The novelty of this improper act of devotion soon engaged the attention of the pious, and under the influence of pretended visions and miracles it soon gained a great number of partisans and zealous apostles. The better sense of mankind, however, and the return of genuine piety, soon dispelled these fanatical tenets. The sermons of Colombiere were published at Lyons in 1757, 6 vols. 12mo. He wrote besides some moral reflections, and spiritual letters.

COLOMIES, or COLOMESIUS, Paul, a French protestant, born at Rochelle in 1638. He travelled through Europe, and at the solicitation of Isaac Vossius, he visited England, where he was ordained and made Lambeth librarian. He died in London, in 1692. He wrote Gallia Orientalis—Hispania et Italia Orientalis—theologorum presbyterianorum Icon.—bibliothèque choisie, besides critical works, &c.

COLONI, Adam, and Adrian, two Dutch historical painters, called the old and the young. Adam died in London 1685, and his son 1701, aged 33.

COLONNA, Fabio, a botanist, born at Naples 1567. He devoted his time not only to natural history, but to the languages, to music, the law, and all the polite arts. His works, especially on botany, are very valuable. He wrote plantarum et piscium historia, 4to.—stirpium rariorum descriptio, 4to. dissertation on the glossopetra, 4to. on American plants, fol.—dissertation on the porpura, 4to. He was the first who gave distinct names to the petals and the leaves of flowers, a judicious arrangement afterwards adopted by Tournefort. The musical instrument called pentachordon is of his invention. He lived to his eightieth year.

COLONNA, Francisco Maria Pompeio, a French philosopher, whose chief work is the natural history of the universe 1734, 4 vols. 12mo. He perished in the fire which destroyed his house at Paris 1726.

COLONNA, Prospero, son of Anthony prince of Salerno, assisted, in company with his relation Fabricio, Charles VIII. of France in the conquest of Naples, but afterwards he exerted his influence and his military powers to reconquer it for the house of Arragon. He was made prisoner at the battle of Villa Franca 1515; but when restored to liberty by the French, he renewed the war with astonishing vigour, and after gaining the battle of la Bicoque, he was enabled to relieve Milan, in 1522. This distinguished warrior died 1523, aged 71.

COLONNA, Pompeo, nephew of Prospero, was brought up to the church, and made bishop of Rieti, and a cardinal, though his inclinations tended to the military profession. Ever restless and dissatisfied, he raised an insurrection at Rome on the reported death of Julius II. 1512, and, with his accomplice Savillo, he seized the capitol; but, though pardoned, and restored to his ecclesiastical honours, he again, in 1526, engaged in another conspiracy to seize the chief power, and to put the pope to death. This perfidious conduct, which brought misery on the Romans, by the sacking of the city by the constable Bourbon, was not punished as it deserved, but Colonna, whose intrigues assisted the pope's escape from the castle of St. Angelo, was again pardoned, raised to new honours, and made viceroys of Naples. He died 1532, author of a poem de virtutibus mulierum.

COLONNA, Francis, a Venetian, who, in consequence of disappointed love in his courtship of Lucretia Lelia, became author of a curious work called Hypnerotomachia di Polyphilo, printed by Aldus 1499, and translated into French 1561. He was afterwards of the order of St. Dominic, and died 1527.

COLONNA, Victoria, daughter of Fabricio duke of Paliano, was born at Marino 1490, and married, 1507, the marquis of Pescara. In 1525, on her husband's death, she retired to a monastery, and died at Rome 1547. Her elegant poems have often been printed, and are deservedly admired.

COLONNA, Mark Antonio, duke of Paliano, distinguished himself so much in the defeat of the Turks at the battle of Lepanto, 1571, that the pope permitted him to enter Rome in a triumphal procession. He was afterwards made constable of Naples, and viceroy of Sicily; and died 1584.

COLONNA, Ascanio, son of the preceding, was made a cardinal, and showed his learning and the powers of his eloquence in the defence of the pope in his dispute with the Venetians. He died at Rome 1608.

COLONNA, John, a noble Italian, sent as papal legate to the Christian army in Palestine. He was made prisoner by the Saracens, and cruelly condemned to be sawn in two; but the fortitude with which he bore the insults of his enemies disarmed their vengeance, and procured his liberty. He died 1245.

COLONNA, Giles, an Augustin monk, bishop of Bourges. He was a learned man, and a theological professor, and he wrote some works on philosophy and divinity, and died at Avignon 1316.

COLONNA, Fabricio, son of the duke of Amalfi, was a celebrated warrior against the Ursini. He was constable of Naples, and was made prisoner at the battle of Ravenna, 1512. He died 1520.

COLQUHOUN, Patrick, an active magistrate, was born at Dumbarton in Scotland, March 14, 1745. At the age of sixteen he went to America, in a commercial capacity, and on his return in 1766, settled at Glasgow, where he carried on business as a merchant, and contributed to the improvements of that city, of which he became lord provost and chairman of the chamber of commerce. In 1789 he settled in London, and in 1792 was appointed one of the police magistrates. In 1796 he published his "Treatise on the Police of the Metropolis;" for which the university of Glasgow conferred on him the degree of doctor of laws. In 1800 came out another work, "On the Police of the River Thames," containing a plan for the protection of property; which produced the establishment of a separate office at Wapping. After a long period of public service, he resigned his situation in 1818; and died in Westminster, April 25, 1820. Besides the two treatises already mentioned, he published a number of tracts, and three works of great merit—1. A new and appropriate System of Education for the labouring People. 2. A Treatise on Indigence, exhibiting a general view of the National Resources for productive labour. 3. A Treatise on the Population, Wealth, Power, and Resources of the British Empire, 4to.—W. B.

COLRANE, Henry Hare, lord, born at Blechingly, in Surrey, 10th May, 1693, was educated at Enfield, and Corpus Christi, Oxford. He was well skilled in the learned languages, and displayed his poetical talents by his musarum oblatio ad reginam, a poem inserted in the Musæ Anglicanæ. He travelled three times through Europe, and in his second tour was attended by the well-known Conyers Middleton. He made a noble collection of prints and drawings of antiquities abroad, which were munificently presented after his decease to his college. He died at Bath 4th August, 1749, and was buried at Tottenham. His books and prints on English antiquities were sold at his death, and bought for the antiquarian society.

COLSTON, Edward, an English philanthropist, born at Bristol, November 2, 1636. He greatly increased his property by his commercial connexions with Spain; and the produce of his honest industry he benevolently disposed to charitable purposes. He built almshouses in Bristol, which he endowed with an income of 282*l.* and besides the erection of a school for 40 boys, he founded, at the expense of 11,000*l.* the hospital of St. Augustin, for a master, usher, and 100 boys, for whose maintenance he appropriated an annual income of above 135*l.* Besides this, he gave many other munificent donations, especially 6000*l.* for the improvement of sixty small livings. He was not only charitable, but he possessed great meekness of temper, joined to exemplary temperance and sincere piety. It was his practice never to bestow his charity on beggars, but rather on poor house-keepers, and on sick and decayed persons. He died at Mortlake, in Surrey, 11th October, 1721, aged 85, and was buried at All-saints' church, Bristol, where a monument records his virtues and charitable benefactions.

COLUMBUS, Christopher, celebrated as the discoverer of a new continent, was born 1442, at Genoa, son of a woolcomber. He was early inured to the labours of the sea, and in his great fondness for navigation, he made himself perfect in geometry, astronomy, and cosmography. After trading in various parts of the Mediterranean he settled at Lisbon, where his brother Bartholomew was established; and here he married the daughter of a master of a vessel, who had been engaged in plans of discovery, whose charts and observations he perused; and he increased his knowledge of maritime affairs by several voyages to the Canaries and the coast of Africa. Thus guided by experience, and encouraged by the correspondence of Paul Foscanelli, a learned Florentine, he became persuaded that a continent must exist in the western ocean. He presented his plans to the Genoese republic, and afterwards to the king of Portugal; but instead of patronage and encouragement, he met in both applications with coldness and indifference. At the court of Spain, Ferdinand and Isabella showed him greater attention; and after many delays and objections, which his zeal and earnestness successfully combated and removed, he was at last permitted to sail in quest of unknown regions. On the 6th of September, 1492, he left Gomera with three small ships, and on the 12th of October, after sailing in a westerly direction, he discovered some islands, and landed at Guana bay, in the Lucca islands. After visiting and taking possession of the islands of Cuba and Hispaniola, he returned to Spain, which, after a passage of fifty days, he reached in May, 1493. These discoveries astonished and pleased the Spanish monarch. Columbus was declared admiral of the Indies, ennobled, and permitted to return to the new world with a large fleet. In his second voyage he discovered Jamaica and other islands; and on his return to Europe, 8th June, 1496, he was enabled to silence the malicious insinuations which envy had spread concerning his views, and the importance of the new world. In May, 1498, he made a third voyage, and discovered Paria, on the continent; but so violent were his enemies, that, in spite of his services, his rank, and authority, he was sent to Spain in irons, in October, 1500; but the monarch liberated him from captivity, and from every ignominious imputation. He again visited the new world, and died soon after his return at Valladolid, 20th May, 1506. His remains, by the king's command, were magnificently buried at Seville, where this short epitaph records his merits: "Columbus gave Castile and Leon a new world." Important as the services of this great man are to the world, it is melancholy to record the ingratitude of posterity, and to behold an extensive continent, the discovery of which ought to have been immortalized in the appellation of Columbia, bear the insignificant name of Americus Vespucius, one of those obscure individuals who followed, in fearful imitation, the tract of the first heroic discoverer. The life of Columbus was written by Ferdinand, one of his sons, who embraced the ecclesiastical profession, and died 1530, leaving a valuable library to the cathedral of Seville.—Another son, called Diego, inherited all his father's honours.

COLUMBUS, Bartholomew, brother to Christopher, was ingenious in his drawing of spheres and sea-charts. It is said that he was deputed by his brother to come to solicit the king of England, but that his voyage was delayed by falling into the hands of pirates; and when at last the English monarch accepted his proposals, and promised support and encouragement to his brother, he found that the plan had already been adopted by Ferdinand of Castile. Bartholomew shared the honours and the dangers of his brother's discoveries; and he was the founder of the town of St. Domingo. He died 1514, very rich.

COLUMBUS, Realdus, an Italian anatomical writer, born at Cremona. He died at Rome, 1577. It is said that his works are composed from the compositions of Vesalius, his master, and his predecessor in the anatomical chair of Padua, whose discoveries he freely appropriated to himself. His Latin is very elegant. His opinions on the blood nearly approached Harvey's discovery of the circulation.

COLUMELLA, a Spaniard, who resided at Rome under Claudius, and wrote some books on trees and agriculture.

COLUMNA, Guy, a native of Messina in Sicily, who accompanied Edward I, to England, and wrote a chronicle in 36 books, besides a history of the siege of Troy, in Latin, 1477, in 4to. The last edition is at Naples, 1655.

COLUTHUS, a Greek, author of a poem on the rape of Helen, in the 6th century.

COLVIUS, Andrew, a native of Dort, who went in the suite of the Dutch ambassador to Venice, where he gained the intimacy of Father Paul, and translated into Latin his treatise on the Inquisition. He wrote also some elegant poetry, and made a valuable collection of books and curiosities, of which a catalogue was printed, 1655. He died 1671, aged 77.—His son Nicholas was like himself a learned and eloquent divine. He died 1717.

COLWILL, Alexander, was born near St. Andrew's, Fifeshire, and educated at Edinburgh, of which he became principal, in 1662. Besides some tracts, he wrote the Scotch Hudibras, after the manner of Butler, a ludicrous poem, which severely ridiculed the presbyterians, and which is still admired in Scotland. He died at Edinburgh 1676, aged 58.

COMBEFFIS, Francis, a Dominican, known as a learned editor of several of the Greek fathers—of five Greek historians, as a supplement to the Byzantine history, &c. He died 1679.

COMBER, Thomas, an English divine, born at Westerham, Kent, 1645. He was educated at Sidney Sussex college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, and he was created D. D. by the archbishop of Canterbury. He was made dean of Durham in the room of Dr. Granville, 1691, and was chaplain to the princess Anne of Denmark and to William and Mary. He died 25th November, 1699, and was buried at Stonegrave, Yorkshire. He wrote some divinity tracts, particularly discourses on baptism, catechism, and confirmation, and on the liturgy of the church of England, &c.

COMBER, Thomas, a fellow of Trinity college, Cambridge, where he became D. D. He was born at Shermanbury, Sussex, and educated at Horsham school. He was made dean of Carlisle August 1630, and master of his college the following year. He was in 1642 deprived of all his preferments, and imprisoned. He died at Cambridge February 1653. He wrote a vindication of the divine right of tithes, against Selden.

COMENIUS, John Amos, a protestant, eminent as a divine and grammarian. He was born at Moravia 1592. After being pastor at Fulneck, and also presiding over a school there, he fled upon the invasion of his country by the Spaniards, and came to Lesna in Poland, where he maintained himself by teaching grammar, and where he published his Janua linguarum, a small book, which it is said, acquired so much celebrity, that it was translated into 12 European languages. His fame as a grammarian was now so universally spread, that he was honourably invited by the Swedes and by the English parliament to reform the public schools of the kingdom. In compliance with these requests he visited England in 1641, but the civil wars thwarted his expectations, and made his stay unnecessary. The next year he accepted the invitations of the Swedes, by whom he was respectfully treated. For four years he was engaged at Elbing in laying down plans for the promotion of general instruction, and his recommendations were publicly approved. He afterwards visited Sigismund Ragotzki, prince of Transylvania, and gave him rules for the better regulation of the schools of his country, and on his return to Lesna, he had the misfortune to see the city reduced to ashes by the Poles, and his books and manuscripts destroyed. From Lesna he fled to Silesia, thence to Brandenburg, afterwards to Hamburg, and lastly to Amsterdam, where he ended his days, 1671, aged 80. Besides his Janua, he wrote Pansophia prodromus—a new method of teaching—unius necessarii, &c. The last years of his life, however, were disgraced by visionary schemes, and attempts at prophecy. He pretended to foretell the beginning of the millennium, which he placed in 1672 or 1673, a gross absurdity, which his death prevented him from witnessing. It would have been a happy circumstance if he had been the only sufferer in his prophetic dreams; many of the Moravians were weak enough to believe him, and they were severely persecuted, after the destruction of Lesna, and the protestants of Poland also drew upon themselves the hatred and jealousy of the catholics. Comcius, in his last illness, was visited by the celebrated madame Bourignon, who had embraced his tenets, and considered him as more than mortal.

COME NATALIS or NATAL CONTI, a native of Milan, whose Greek and Latin poems appeared at Venice 1550, and his mythologia, sive explicationes fabularum, a very useful mythological work, 1564. He died about 1590.

COMIERS, Claude, canon of Embrun, was professor of mathematics at Paris, and died 1693. He wrote on comets, on spectacles, on prophecies, on speech, in an elegant and interesting style.

COMINES, Philip de, an excellent historian of Flanders. His noble birth and great acquirements soon recommended him to the notice of Charles duke of Burgundy, and afterwards to that of Lewis XI. of France. Patronised by the monarch, he grew into power and consequence, and as ambassador, he served his court with fidelity and despatch. After the death of Lewis, he was stripped of his honours; the next successor, Charles VIII. viewed him with the prejudice and malevolence of a foreigner, and he was imprisoned at Loches; but though his enemies were so powerful and numerous, that no advocate would presume to plead his cause, he defended himself with the energy and effort of innocence, and after addressing his judges in an eloquent speech of two hours, he was, after three years confinement, discharged. He died at his house in Argenton 1509, aged 64, and was buried in the church of the Augustines at Paris. Comines, though well acquainted with modern languages, was yet no deep scholar. The memoirs of his own times, however, which he left, are very valuable for the historical details which they give, during 34 years, of the affairs of the house of Burgundy, and of Lewis XI. and Charles VIII. of France, with anecdotes of the various transactions which at that time took place in England, and on the continent. His impartiality is universally acknowledged, and the respect which he shows to the English nation, entitles him to the praises which Dryden bestows upon him, in ranking him with Thucydides and Tacitus, for the acuteness of his judgment, and the great knowledge of men, manners, and politics, which he has displayed. His works were edited by Fresnoy, 4 vols. 4to. 1747, and have been translated by Uvedale into English, 2 vols. 8vo.

COMMANDINUS, Frederic, an Italian mathematician, descended from a noble family at Urbino, where he was born 1509. Besides great knowledge of mathematics, he was well versed in Greek literature, and translated Archimedes, Apollonius Pergæus, Ptolemy, Euclid, Aristarchus, &c. Besides some original compositions on the centre of gravity, on clocks, &c. He was greatly patronised by the duke of Urbino, and died 1575.

COMMELIN, Jerome, an eminent French printer, born at Douay. He settled at Geneva, and afterwards at Heidelberg, where he died 1698. He printed among other fathers, the works of Chrysostom, 4 vols. fol. an excellent edition. The mark he prefixed to his editions, was truth sitting in a chair.

COMMENDONE, John Francis, a native of Venice, who, at the early age of 10, wrote Latin verses, and so recommended himself by his learning, that he became chamberlain to Julius III. and was employed in various embassies, and made bishop by Paul IV. Pius IV. raised him to the rank of cardinal, and employed him as his nuncio in Poland, and he was afterwards legate at the diet of Augsburg, against the Lutherans. He wrote various Latin poems and letters, and died at Padua, 1584, aged 60.

COMMERSON, Philibert, botanist to the French king, was born at Chatillon les Dombes, near Bourg in Bresse, 1727. When residing as physician at Montpellier, he showed his fondness for botany to so improper a degree, that he plundered even the king's garden, to enrich his collections. He was recommended by Linnæus to the queen of Sweden to complete her collection of rarest fishes, and consequently wrote his ichthyology in 2 vols. 4to. He wrote besides a dictionary and bibliography on writers of natural history, and the martyrology of botany, containing the lives of those who had lost their life in pursuit of natural curiosities, to which his own life was to be added. His abilities recommended him to the ministry as a proper person to accompany Bougainville round the world, and he embarked in 1766, and highly distinguished himself by the labour and success of his researches. He died at the isle of France in 1773, leaving to the king's cabinet all his collection, amounting to 200 volumes in folio, besides the contents of 32 cases, containing great trea-tures, selected during his voyage. He mentions discovering a nation of dwarfs of 3 1-2 feet high in the interior parts of Madagascar.

COMMIRE, John, a Jesuit born at Amboise. He wrote Latin in so elegant a style, that his fables are esteemed equal to those of Phædrus. He died at Paris 1702, aged 77. His poems appeared in 2 vols. 12mo. 1754.

COMMUDI, Andrea, a Florentine painter who died 1638, aged 73. His Lucifer and associates fallen from heaven, painted for Paul V. was much admired.

COMMODIANUS of Gaza, a Christian poet of the fourth century, author of Institutiones, a sort of composition, neither elegant nor valuable.

COMMODUS, Lucius Aurelius Antoninus, succeeded his father Antoninus as emperor of Rome 180. After a series of dissipation, cruelty, and every profligacy, he was poisoned by Marcia his concubine 192.

COMTE, Lewis le, a French Jesuit, who went in 1685 to China as a missionary. He published an interesting account of his mission on his return to Europe, and died at Bourdeaux 1729.

COMPTON, Spencer, son of the first earl of Northampton, was master of the robes to the prince of Wales, afterwards Charles I. and accompanied him to Spain. When Charles succeeded to the throne, Compton loyally supported his measures, and attended him in his expedition against the Scots. When the royal standard was set up at Nottingham, he was among the truest of his friends. At the battle of Hopton-heath near Stafford, March 19th, 1643, he was encompassed by the enemy, and when after deeds of valour, he was offered quarter, he boldly declared he would not receive it from the hands of rebels and rogues, upon which he was slain with a blow of an halbert on the head. He was buried in All-hallows church, Derby. He left six sons and two daughters by Mary daughter of Sir Francis Beaumont.

COMPTON, Henry, a prelate, youngest son of Spencer, just mentioned. He was born in 1632. He was educated at Queen's college, Oxford, and after three years' residence he set off, in 1652, on his travels. At the restoration he obtained a cornetcy in a regiment of horse, but he afterwards studied divinity at Cambridge, where he became M. A. Soon after entering into orders he obtained the rectory of Cottenham, Cambridgeshire, a canony at Christ Church, and the mastership of St. Cross hospital near Winchester. In 1674, he was made bishop of Oxford, and the next year succeeded to the see of London. In this elevated situation he was intrusted with the education of the princesses Mary and Anne, and the strong attachment which they showed to the protestant religion is honourably attributed to the wholesome instructions of the learned prelate. He laboured assiduously to reconcile the dissenters to the tenets of the church, and he most ably resisted the claims and the doctrines of the catholics. His zeal as a protestant prelate displeased James II. and therefore he removed him from the privy council, and on his refusing to suspend Dr. Sharp, rector of St. Giles, from his ecclesiastical office, he was summoned before Jeffreys and a commission, and arbitrarily deprived of all his episcopal functions. This violence on the part of the king was noticed by Mary and by William prince of Orange, and at last James, afraid of the consequences of his conduct, consented to restore the bishop to his offices. Compton, however, received with sullenness the reparation offered to his episcopal dignity, and when the kingdom was invaded by William, he warmly espoused his cause, and conducted the princess Anne to Nottingham, to prevent her being conveyed to France. With all the ardour of a friend, and the zeal of a partisan, he congratulated William on his landing, and supported his claims to the throne in the house of lords, and at last consecrated him, and fixed the crown on his head. Every step, however, which he pursued was tintured with moderation, but because he wished the reconciliation of the dissenters, and opposed the prosecution of Sacheverell, he has been branded with the epithets of a weak and bigoted partisan. He died at the age of 81, July 7th, 1713, and was buried at Fulham churchyard. He was an eminent divine as well as an able statesman, strongly attached to the constitution, and displaying the sincerity of his profession by a pious and exemplary life. He wrote some theological tracts, justly esteemed for soundness of doctrine, and for moderation, and was a great encourager of botany, as the patron of Ray, Plukenet, and other naturalists. His garden was much admired for his fine collection of exotics.

CONANT, John, D.D. an English divine, was born at Yeaterton, Devon, 18th October, 1608, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford, of which he became fellow and tutor. During the civil wars he left the university, but in 1649, he was unanimously elected rector of his college; he was also divinity professor, and in 1657, was admitted vice chancellor. At the restoration he appeared in London, at the head of the university, to congratulate the king; but though he assisted at the Savoy as one of the commissioners, he refused to comply with the act of uniformity, and was consequently deprived of all his preferments in 1662. He was afterwards re-admitted into the bosom of the church, 1670, being ordained by Reynolds bishop of Norwich, whose daughter he had married, and by whom he had six sons and six daughters. He was soon after made minister of St. Mary, Aldermanbury, which he exchanged for All-saints in Northampton, a place to which he was strongly attached. He became archdeacon of Norwich 1675, and in 1681, had a prebend in the church of Worcester. In 1686, he had the misfortune to lose his eyesight, and died seven years after, 12th March, 1693, and was buried in his church, Northampton. He was a man of great piety, of extensive learning, and of singular modesty. Six volumes of his sermons have been published.

CONCA, Sebastian, a painter born at Gaeta. He died 1761, aged 82. His pieces were much esteemed and many of them are in the possession of the king of Naples.

CONCANEN, Matthew, a native of Ireland, bred to the law. He came to London as a literary adventurer, and he gained a livelihood and some reputation by writing in support of the measures of the ministry. His attack upon Pope procured him a respectable place in the Dunciad; but the patronage of the duke of Newcastle advanced him to the lucrative office of attorney-general for Jamaica. In this appointment, for 17 years, he conducted himself with all the integrity and honour of a man of virtue, and after acquiring a respectable and independent fortune, he returned to England, with the flattering intention of spending the rest of his life in Ireland. He fell, however, into a rapid consumption, and died at London 22d Jan. 1749. He wrote Wexfordwells, a play, besides some songs, in the Musical miscellany, and a well-known letter addressed to Warburton.

CONCINA, Daniel, a Dominican of Venice, celebrated as an eloquent preacher, and as a man of abilities, often consulted by Benedict XIV. He was author of a system of Christian theology, 2 vols. 4to.—and other pieces on practical and casuistical subjects, and died at Venice 1756, aged 70.

CONCINI, better known by the name of marshal d'Ancre, was a Florentine, and came to France in the suite of Mary de Medicis wife of Henry the great. By his intrigues and those of his wife Eleonora Galigay, he became, from a gentleman of the bed-chamber, a marquis, and a marshal of France. The enemies which his elevation and his pride procured, contrived his ruin, Lewis XIII. was prevailed upon to get rid of this dangerous favourite, and Concini was shot by Vitry and his accomplices on the Louvre bridge, 24th April, 1617, and his body was ignominiously insulted by the populace. His wife also lost her head, and his son was declared incapable to hold any office in the kingdom. When his wife was accused of witchcraft, in influencing the mind of the queen, she said, her magic was only the influence of a great mind over a weak one.

CONDAMINE, Charles Marie de la, born at Paris 1701, was knight of St. Lazare, and member of several learned academies. He early travelled to the eastern parts of the world, and in 1736, he was chosen with Godin to go to Peru, to determine the figure of the earth at the equator. On his return he visited Rome, and was, by the dispensation of the pope, permitted at the age of 55, to marry his niece. He died 4th Feb. 1774, in consequence of an operation for the removal of a hernia. He was a man of great eminence as a mathematician, though his fondness of flattery rendered him too often regardless of the solid praise which should belong to a man of merit, modesty. He was acquainted with many learned persons, and perhaps more from ostentation than the real wish to advance the cause of science. His works are, distance of the tropics—relation of a voyage to America—observations, &c. on the inoculation of the smallpox—on education—tracts through Italy—measure of the three first degrees of the meridian.

CONDE, Lewis, first duke of, son of Charles of Bourbon, duke of Vendome, was distinguished for his valour at the battle of St. Quintin, and afterwards by his intrigues, as the leader of the rebellious Huguenots. Active and vigilant during the civil wars of that period, he was wounded at the battle of Dreux, and seven years after fell at that of Jarnac 1569, aged 39. His memoirs of his own times appeared after his death, and possess merit. The best edition is that of 1743, 6 vols. 4to.

CONDE, Henry, prince of, was known in the court of Henry IV. of France, by whose influence he became a catholic. He was sent to the Bastile 1616, and liberated three years after. The death of Lewis XIII. restored him to public favour, he became minister to the regent, and displayed his valour and his abilities in the service of his country, and died at Paris 1646, aged 58.

CONDE, Lewis, prince of, duke of Enghein, son of the preceding, deserved the name of the great. He was born at Paris 1621, and Richelieu observed in his earliest years his promising abilities, and foretold his future greatness as a general and as a man. Though but 22 he defeated the Spaniards at the famous battle of Rocroi, and after taking Thionville and other fortified towns, he entered Germany as a conqueror. His attempts afterwards upon Lerida in Catalonia proved abortive, but in Flanders he acquired fresh honours, by the defeat of the Imperialists, and the submission of an extensive tract of country. In the civil wars of France, he espoused the cause of the court, though afterwards he opposed the views of Mazarin and of the monarchy, and, in the spirit of indignation and unyielding pride, he entered into the service of the Spaniards in Flanders against his country. The peace of the Pyrenees, 1659, reconciled him to his country, and enabled him to atone for the injuries which his desertion had inflicted on his honour and France. He was afterwards employed against the prince of Orange: but though wounded at the passage of the Rhine, he completed the conquest of Franche-compte, and spread terror into Germany, after the resignation of Turenne. He died of the gout at Fontainebleau 1686, aged 65, leaving two sons by his wife, who was the niece of cardinal Richelieu.

CONDE, Henry Julius de, prince of, son of the great Condé, distinguished himself under his father, at the passage of the Rhine, and at the battle of Senef. He was a liberal patron of men of letters, and died 1709, aged 66.

CONDER, John, D.D. was born in Cambridgeshire, 1714, and was educated as a dissenter. He was a minister of a congregation at Cambridge, and afterwards kept a school at Mile-end, and in 1761, succeeded to the meeting on the Pavement, Moorfields. He died 1781, aged 67. He printed several sermons, besides an essay on the importance of the clerical character.

CONDILLAC, Stephen Bonnot de, of the French academy, born at Grenoble, was preceptor to the infant son of the duke of Parma. He died at Flux, near Baugenci, 2d Aug., 1780, of a putrid fever. He was a man of great erudition, strong sense, and austere manners. He wrote in 3 vols. 12mo. essay on the origin of human sciences—on animals—on the sensations, &c.—besides a course of study for the instruction of his pupils in 16 vols. 12mo.—and commerce and government considered in their mutual relations, &c. 12mo. These volumes display great philanthropy, though often they are devoid of warmth and vivacity. He is accused by some of favouring the principles of the materialists.

CONDORCET, John Anthony Nicholas Caritat, marquis of, one of the founders of the French republic, was born 17th Sept., 1743, at Ribemont, in Picardy, of a noble family. He preferred the pursuits of literature to the military profession, and studied mathematics and belles lettres at the college of Navarre, and at the age of 21, he gained the applauses of the learned, by his ingenious memoir on the calcul différentiel, which was received by the academy of Paris with marked approbation. He afterwards became the friend of d'Alembert, and of Voltaire, and corresponded with the king of Prussia, and when made secretary of the academy of sciences, he distinguished himself by the spirited eulogies which he pronounced on the meritorious services of his departed brethren. In the constituent assembly he was made governor to the dauphin, but his zeal in favour of republican principles overpowered the respect which he owed to majesty, and though patronised by Lewis XVI. he ventured to recommend the abolition of monarchy, and the triumph of liberty. But though hostile to the monarchy, he showed some compassion for the king, and opposed his violent trial; but his measures were viewed with jealousy by Robespierre and his party, and he was regarded as a hypocrite, who, under the mask of moderation and philosophy, aspired at the sovereign power. He was therefore condemned 28th July, 1793, as one of the Girondists, and for a while concealed himself at Paris, but afterwards sought refuge at the house of a friend in the country. His friend unfortunately was absent, and he was obliged to hide himself for several nights in some quarries, till hunger forced him to seek relief in a neighbouring tavern. His long beard, squalid appearance, and the voracious appetite with which he devoured the bread placed before him, rendered him suspected, he was arrested, and might have escaped under the character of a distressed servant, but a Horace found in his pocket, proved him to be a man of education, and of consequence. On the morrow the jailer found him dead, a sacrifice either to excessive fatigue and continued want, or to poison, 28th March, 1794. In his character, Condorcet was weak but ambitious, fond of novelty, and, in pursuit of imaginary happiness, little attentive to the feelings of humanity, the calls of virtue, and the precepts of Christianity. He was, according to d'Alembert, a volcano covered with snow. His writings were respectable. Besides a sketch of the progress of the human mind—a treatise on arithmetic—a tract on calculation, and on the problem of the three bodies—analytical affairs, &c. he wrote eulogies on Bernouilli, d'Alembert, Euler, Jussieu, Buffon, and others, which possessed great merit, though that on Voltaire is considered as turgid and insignificant. His publications were twenty-six in number.

CONDREN, Charles de, a doctor of the Sorbonne, priest of the congregation of the oratory, and confessor of the duke of Orleans, is known for his influence in producing a reconciliation between the king and Orleans. Satisfied with a life of privacy, and the humble dignity of general of his order, he nobly refused a bishopric and the hat of a cardinal, and died 1641. His discourses, letters, &c. have appeared in 2 vols. 12mo.

CONFUCIUS or CONG-FU-TZE, a celebrated Chinese philosopher, born at Chanping, of a noble family, about 550 B. C. At the age of three he lost his father, but his education was honourably superintended by the kind care of his grandfather, and his wisdom and abilities displayed themselves with such advantage, that he became the prime minister of the kingdom of Lu. His labours were ardently directed to the reformation of manners, but the dissipation of the king, who attached himself to several concubines, displeased him, and he indignantly resigned his offices, and retired to privacy, and the cultivation of philosophical pursuits. So extensively spread was his reputation, that he was frequented by above 3000 disciples, whom his examples and precepts formed to virtue and morality. He taught his disciples that the first duties were to serve, obey, and fear God, to love their neighbour as themselves, and to curb their passions to the guidance of reason. Thus deservedly respected and beloved, Confucius selected ten of his pupils, to whom he communicated the vast resources of his mind, and all the precepts which might render and preserve them happy in the possession of wisdom and virtue. He returned afterwards to the kingdom of Lu, where he died, aged 73. The king no sooner heard of his death, than he exclaimed, "that the gods had removed him from the earth, because they wished to punish her inhabitants." His memory was honoured in the most solemn manner, he was regarded as a departed saint, and public edifices were raised to celebrate his services to mankind. His books on morals have been translated into French, and they possess excellent rules for virtue and morality. He married, when young, but though he lost his wife some years after, he disdained to follow the example of his countrymen, who kept concubines. His descendants are still revered in China, and are regarded as mandarins of the first order of the kingdom.

CONGREVE, William, an English dramatic writer, born in Staffordshire, 1672. He was educated at Kilkenny school, and Dublin college, whence many have supposed him to be a native of Ireland. After the revolution he came to London, and entered at the Middle temple, but soon relinquished the profession for the cultivation of the muses. His first production was "Incognita, or love and duty reconciled," a novel of some merit, though the composition of a youth of 17. His first play was the Old Bachelor in 1693, which was revised and applauded by Dryden, and deservedly recommended the author to the patronage of lord Halifax, by whose influence he became commissioner for licensing hackney-coaches, and held other offices worth 600*l.* a-year. The next year appeared his Double-Dealer, but with not so much popularity. On the death of queen Mary, Congreve wrote a delicate and much admired pastoral, called the Mourning muse of Alexis, and in 1695 he produced his popular comedy of Love for Love, and the same year, an ode on the taking of Namur. The next production was the Mourning Bride, a tragedy, which was first acted in Lincoln's-inn fields theatre, and was universally applauded. The reputation of Congreve, but more particularly the licentiousness of his plays, drew upon him the censures of Jeremy Collier, the zealous reformer of the stage, and though Congreve defended himself, yet truth must own the charge of immorality too well established to be refuted. Though dissatisfied with the public cry raised against him, yet he produced another comedy, The way of the world, which was condemned by the critics of the times, but nevertheless possesses great merit. Though he now withdrew from public life as an author, his friends were occasionally complimented with his able assistance, he wrote epilogues, and assisted Dryden in his Virgil, and contributed the whole of Juvenal's 11th satire. The last 20 years of his life, Congreve spent in ease and retirement. He was at last afflicted severely with the gout, which, together with a bruise he received in being overturned in his chariot, hastened his death. He died in Surry-street, Strand, 19th January, 1729, and was buried with great solemnity in Westminster-abbey, where a monument was erected to his honour by Henrietta, dutchess of Marlborough. Congreve enjoyed in his time, much of what can render life agreeable, easy, and happy. His appointments and the secretaryship of Jamaica yielded him not less than 1200*l.* a year, and with an easy and independent fortune he was flattered with the friendship of the great and of the learned, and had Dryden, Steele, and Pope, among his most devoted admirers. He died very rich, the fruit of his great, but not unbecoming economy. His comedies, says Johnson, are the works of a mind replete with imagery, and quick in combination, though of his miscellaneous poetry little can be said that is favourable. Voltaire, who knew and admired him, says that he raised the glory of English comedy to a greater height than any writer before or after him; but his grand defect was entertaining too mean an idea of the character of an author, though to that he was indebted totally for his fame and fortune.

CONNOR, Bernard, a physician, born in the county of Kerry, 1666. As his friends were catholics, he was not regularly edu-ated in Ireland, but in 1686, he went over to France, and at Montpellier and Paris, distinguished himself for his assiduity, and his great knowledge of anatomy and chymistry. He afterwards travelled through Germany as the tutor of the two sons of the chancellor of Poland, and on his arrival at Warsaw, recommended himself so much by his skill in the knowledge and cure of diseases, that he became physician to the king, John Sobieski. After collecting much valuable information on the natural history and other curiosities of Poland, he left Warsaw in 1694, as physician in the suite of the king's daughter, who was going to espouse the duke of Bavaria at Brussels, and from Holland, he came to England in 1695. He now began to read lectures on anatomy, chymistry, and physic, at Oxford, and acquired such celebrity that he was elected into the royal society, and the college of physicians. He also delivered lectures in London and Cambridge with equal success, but his evangelium medici, divided into sixteen sections, published in 1697, drew upon him the imputation of irreligion and even atheism, and though he probably intended no attack upon revelation, the work deserves censure for its skepticism. On the death of Sobieski, and the tumults which a Polish election generally produced, Connor was induced to gratify the public curiosity by the publication of his history of Poland in two vols. which, though finished with more rapidity than correctness, contains many valuable and interesting particulars concerning that now ill-fated kingdom. Whilst in the enjoyment of public celebrity and rising eminence, Connor was attacked with a fever, which quickly carried him off, October, 1698, in his 32d year. Though born and educated a catholic, he embraced the doctrines of the church of England, and died in her communion. His funeral sermon was preached by Dr. Hayley, rector of St. Giles in the fields, where his remains were deposited.

CONON, an Athenian general, defeated by Lysander. He afterwards defeated the Spartans, and was reconciled to his countrymen. He was betrayed to Tiribazus, and put to death, 393 B. C.

CONON, an astronomer of Samos, the friend of Archimedes. He flattered Ptolemy by saying that the hair of queen Berenice was become a constellation in the heavens.

CONRAD I. count of Franconia, and king of Germany, 912. He opposed the Huns who had invaded Germany, at the solicitation of Arnoul duke of Bavaria, and at last purchased their retreat with a sum of money and a yearly tribute, and died 918.

CONRAD II. son of Harman duke of Franconia, was made king of Germany, 1024, and crowned emperor at Rome three years after. He was successful against his opponents, and added to his dominions the kingdom of Burgundy according to the will of king Rodolphus. He died 1039.

CONRAD III. son of Frederic of Suabia, was duke of Franconia, and elected emperor of Germany. Though violently opposed in his elevation, he had the good fortune to disperse or reconcile his enemies, and afterwards went to the crusades against the Saracens. As the Greeks had poisoned the fountains in the holy land, he nearly lost his whole army, and with difficulty returned to Europe. He died at Bamberg, 1152.

CONRAD IV. duke of Suabia, succeeded his father Frederic II. as emperor, 1250. His elevation was opposed by Innocent IV. who claimed the high privilege of disposing of crowns and kingdoms, upon which he invaded Italy, and took Capua, Naples, and other places. His victories would soon have dispossessed the ambitious pope of his dominions, but he died suddenly, and as it is suspected of poison, 1254.

CONRADIN or CONRAD, son of the fourth Conrad, was only three years old when his father died. His uncle Mainfroi became his regent in the kingdom of Naples, but pope Urban IV. bestowed the crown to Charles of Anjou, who defeated his youthful rival, 1268, and soon after beheaded him at Naples, when only sixteen years old.

CONRART, Valentin, secretary to the French king's council, was born at Paris, 1603, and died September 23, 1675. To his taste, his influence, and his love for literature, the French ascribe the origin of their French academy, of which he is deservedly styled the father, as her first learned men held their first meetings in his house from 1629 to 1634. Though Conrart knew nothing of Greek, and little of Latin, he yet published some pieces not entitled however to great merit. He owes his celebrity to the affability of his manners, the goodness of his heart, the hospitable asylum which he gave to men of learning, and especially his being regarded as the founder of the academy.

CONRI, Florence, a Franciscan friar, born in Connaught, Ireland, but educated in Spain. Philip III. sent him under the title of titular bishop of Tuam, to his native country, that he might reconcile the disaffected Irish to the prospects of a Spanish invasion. His perfidious schemes were however defeated, and he returned to Madrid, where he died 1629. He was author of the mirror of the Christian life,—an Irish catechism, Louvain, 1626, besides some Latin pieces on Augustine, &c.

CONRINGIUS, Hermannus, professor of the law, was born at Norden, in Frisia, 1606, and died at Helmstadt, where he was professor of physic and politics, and senior of the university, in 1681. He was well skilled in history as well as law, and enjoyed the friendship of some of the princes of Germany. His works, which are chiefly on law and history, were printed at Brunswick in six vols. folio, 1731.

CONSTANT, David, a native of Lausanne, and there professor of philosophy, Greek, and divinity. He wrote an abridgment of politics,—on the passage of the Israelites through the red sea,—on Lot's wife,—the bush of Moses,—the brazen serpent,—a system of theology, &c.—besides editions of the classics. He died at Lausanne, 1733, aged 95.

CONSTANTIN, Robert, professor of physic, and belles lettres at Caen university, where he was born, died of a pleurisy in 1605, aged 103, after enjoying to the last all the faculties of his mind and body. His knowledge of Greek was very extensive, as his learned works fully evince, especially his valuable Lexicon, Greek and Latin. He wrote, besides three books on Greek and Latin antiquities,—a dictionary of abstruse Latin words,—a thesaurus rerum, &c. utriusque linguæ.

CONSTANTINE the Great, a Roman emperor after his father Constantius. He was an able general, a sagacious politician, and a benevolent prince. He is chiefly celebrated for the building of Constantinople on the site of old Byzantium, and for being the first emperor who embraced Christianity. He died 337, aged 66.

CONSTANTINE II. son of the great Constantine, was born at Arles, and became after his father's death master of Spain, Gaul, and Britain. He made war against his brother Constans, and was slain at Aquileia, 340.

CONSTANTINE III. son of Constantius II. was surnamed Pogonatus, or the bearded, and was crowned emperor 668. He was successful against the Saracens, who besieged Constantinople, and he destroyed their ships with the Greek fire. Though valiant, he was ambitious and intriguing. He avenged his father's murder, but he showed himself wantonly cruel by the murder of his brothers Tiberius and Heraclius, who had been raised by the army to a share of the imperial power. He condemned the heresy of the Monothelites in a council at Constantinople, and died 685.

CONSTANTINE IV. CAPRNYMUS, succeeded his father Leo the Isaurian, 752, and displayed his zeal against image worship. He defeated the Saracens, and Artavasdes his brother-in-law, who had made an insurrection against him, but he was afterwards routed by the Bulgarians, though in another battle he regained the victory. He died 775.

CONSTANTINE V. succeeded his father Leo IV. in 780, though only ten years old, under the guardianship of his mother Irene. He had the good success to thwart his mother's schemes, who wished to make herself sole sovereign; but during an invasion of the Bulgarians, he was defeated, and was deprived not only of his power, but of his eyes, by the order of his cruel mother, 792. He died some years after in obscurity.

CONSTANTINE VII. PORPHYROGENITUS, son of Leo the wise, was born 905, and ascended the throne at the age of seven, under the guardianship of his mother Zoe. When of age he showed himself valiant and active; he defeated the Lombards in Italy, and drove the Turks by threats and by money from the borders of his empire. He was afterwards governed by his wife Helena, who oppressed the people and rendered herself odious. He was poisoned by his son Romanus, 959. He was a learned man, and wrote the life of Basilus the Macedonian,—the geography of the empire,—a treatise on the affairs of the empire,—de re rusticâ, &c.

CONSTANTINE IX. son of Romanus, succeeded to the throne with his brother Basil II. after John Zimisces, 976. He died 1028.

CONSTANTINE X. MONOMACHUS or GLADIATOR, a Greek, who married Zoe, daughter of Constantine IX. and ascended the throne 1042. Insurrection and a Turkish war were the striking features of his reign. He died 1054.

CONSTANTINE XI. or DUCAS, was adopted as successor by Isaac Commenus, 1059. His reign was turbulent and unhappy in consequence of the invasion of the Scythians, and the destruction of some of his cities by an earthquake. He died 1067.

CONSTANTINE XIII. son of John Paleologus, succeeded his brother John in 1448. He possessed bravery, and honourably fell in the defence of Constantinople when besieged and taken by the Turks 1453. In him ended the Greek empire.

CONSTANTINE, Flavius Julius, a private soldier, who by intrigue and great success invested himself with the imperial purple in Britain, and added Gaul and Spain to his dominions by his arms. He was besieged at Arles, where he had fixed his residence, by Constantius the lieutenant of Honorius, and when reduced to extremity he offered to surrender provided his life was spared. The conditions were accepted, but inhumanly violated. He was put to death, and also his son, 411.

CONSTANTINE, a native of Syria, raised to the papal chair 708. He travelled into the east, and died 715. The antipope who opposed Stephen III. bore also this name. He was driven from Rome and died in a monastery.

CONSTANTINE, of Carthage, in Africa, was a physician of the 11th century. He travelled into the east, where he resided 30 years. He is supposed to be the first who brought the Arabian and Greek physic into Italy. After his return to Carthage he went to settle at Reggio, and at last became a monk of Monte Casino. His works appeared at Basil, 1539, in folio.

CONSTANTIUS, Chiorus, father of the great Constantine, was made colleague to Galerius on Dioclesian's abdication. He died at York, 306.

CONSTANTIUS, Flavius Julius, the second son of the great Constantine, succeeded with his two brothers Constans and Constantine to the empire of Rome. He defeated Magnentius who had murdered his brother Constans, and became sole emperor. He died 361.

CONTARINI, Gaspard, a native of Venice, engaged in various embassies, and made a cardinal, 1538, and sent as legate to the council of Trent, 1541. He wrote some Latin treatises on the immortality of the soul—the seven sacraments,—against Luther,—on the office of pope, &c.—with great elegance and spirit, and died at Bologna, 1542.

CONTARINI GIOVANNI, a Venetian painter, who died 1605, aged 56. He was eminent in his profession, and a great imitator of Titian.

CONTARINI, Vincent, professor of eloquence at Padua, died in his native town, Venice, 1617, aged 40. The most known of his learned works are de re frumentaria, de militari Romanorum stipendio varia lectiones, &c. in 4to.

CONTE, Jacobino del, a Florentine portrait painter, patronised by pope Paul III. He died 1598, aged 88.

CONTI, Guisto di, an Italian poet who died at Rimini about the middle of the 16th century. His poems are greatly esteemed, they were collected and published, Venice, 1592, in 4to. Florence, 1715, and Verona, 1753, in 4to.

CONTI, abbé Anthony, a noble Venetian, who died 1749, aged 71. By the extent of his travels he not only formed a numerous acquaintance with the learned of every country, but he greatly improved the powers of his mind. He is author of some tragedies, and of some poems which abound more with metaphysics than poetical elegance. His works in verse and prose were published at Venice, two vols. 4to. 1739, and another 1756. During his visit to England, Conti became acquainted with Newton, and long esteemed and venerated the abilities and friendship of that great man.

CONTI, Armand de Bourbon, prince of, quitted the church for a military life, and warmly espoused the party of the insurgents against his brother, the great Condé, during the civil wars of France. These two hostile brothers were both together sent prisoners to Vincennes by Mazarin. Conti was made in 1654 governor of Guienne, commander of the armies in Catalonia, and governor of Languedoc 1662. He wrote in French, treatises on the duties of the great—on comedies and plays, &c.—on the duties of provincial governors, &c.—three vols. 12mo. Paris 1667. He died 1668.

CONTI, Francis Lewis de Bourbon, son of the preceding, distinguished himself at the siege of Luxemburg, in the campaign in Hungary, at the battles of Steinkerk, Fleurus, and Nerwinde. He was elected king of Poland 1697, but soon supplanted by the elector of Saxony. He died at Paris 1709, aged 45. His grandson Lewis Francis was distinguished in the wars of Italy and Flanders, and died at Paris, 2d August, 1776, aged 59.

CONTO-PERTANA, Don Joseph, a Portuguese poet, of great merit, and inferior only to Camoens. His Quitterie la Sainte, is a valuable epic poem. He died at Lisbon 1735.

CONYBEARE, John, a learned English prelate, born at Pinhoe, near Exeter, 31st January, 1692. He was educated at Exeter grammar college, and Exeter college, of which he became fellow, and afterwards tutor. In 1730 he was appointed rector of his college, and on the same year he published, by the advice of bishop Gibson, an answer to Tindal's Christianity as old as the creation, which proved him to be not only a great champion in the cause of revelation, but an able and acute scholar, and sound divine. In 1732 he was appointed dean of Christ church, and in 1750 he succeeded Butler in the see of Bristol. He did not however long enjoy this new dignity, as he was a great martyr to the gout, under which he at last sunk 13th July, 1755. He was buried in Bristol cathedral. Two volumes of his excellent sermons were published after his death.

COOK, James, a celebrated navigator, born at Marton, in Cleveland, near Great Ayton, Yorkshire, and christened 3d November, 1728. His father was a poor cottager, who afterwards was employed as a hind or upper servant on the farms of Thomas Skottowe, esquire, at Great Ayton, where his son was engaged in the labour of the plough till the age of 13, when he acquired some knowledge of arithmetic and figures at the village school. At the age of 17 young Cook was bound apprentice for four years to a grocer at Snaith, but his fondness for the sea overturned his father's plans, and after one year and a half's service the indentures were cancelled by the kindness of his master, and in July, 1746, he was bound for three years in the service of Mr. Walker, a ship owner at Whitby. He was thus engaged to the great satisfaction of his employer in the coasting and coal trade, till 1752, when he was made mate of one of Walker's vessels, and the next year he quitted his master's service, though he was offered the command of one of his ships, and entered on board the Eagle, a king's frigate, of 28 or 30 guns, being desirous, as he said, "to try his fortune that way." Between 1753 and 1760, when he received a lieutenant's commission, he was successfully employed in improving himself, and storing his mind with that knowledge of navigation and mathematics, which he afterwards displayed in so remarkable a degree. The skill, firmness, and ability which he showed while employed in America and on the Jamaica station, recommended him, not only to the notice of Sir William Burnaby the commander, but to the approbation of the admiralty, and when in 1767 the Royal Society insisted on the propriety of observing the transit of Venus over the sun's disc, from some of the islands of the Pacific ocean, lieutenant Cook was appointed to command the ship Endeavour in that new and distant expedition. He was in consequence raised to the rank of captain, and sailed down the river on the 30th July, accompanied in this important voyage by Sir Joseph Banks, Dr. Solander, and Mr. Green. On the 13th April, 1769, he reached Otaheite, where the observations were directed to be made, and after remaining there till the 13th July, he set sail for New Zealand, and after discovering several islands he reached Batavia 10th October, 1770. After losing many of his men in this horrid climate, where he was obliged to remain till the 27th December for the repairs of his ship, he proceeded to the Cape of Good Hope, and anchored in the Downs on the 12th June, after an absence of nearly three years. The great abilities which captain Cook had evinced in this expedition recommended him to the command of the two ships intended to explore the coasts of the supposed southern hemisphere. On the 9th of April, 1772, he sailed from Deptford, on board the Resolution, with captain Furneux, who had the command of the other ship, the Adventure. They reached the Cape of Good Hope 30th October, and leaving it on the 22d November, they proceeded towards the south, in pursuit of discovery. The vast fields of ice which, however, presented themselves in those southern latitudes, and the imminent dangers to which they hourly exposed the ships, convinced the captain that no land was to be found, and that further attempts were not only useless but perilous, and therefore on the 17th January, 1773, he sailed towards the South Sea, and on the 21st March, 1774, returned to the

Cape, and reached England on the 14th of July. During this dangerous voyage of three years and 18 days, the captain lost only one man in his crew of 118, though he navigated in various climates from 52 degrees north to 71 degrees south. The discoveries of islands in the southern seas had now engaged the attention of the nation, and another project was formed to find out a north-west passage, and thus unite the great Pacific ocean with the north of the Atlantic. On this occasion Cook, again eager to serve his country, and advance the knowledge of geography, bid adieu to his domestic comforts, and a third time, with ardent zeal, embarked to surround the world. He set sail in the Discovery in July, 1776, and after visiting several of the islands of the Pacific ocean, he penetrated towards the north, explored the unknown coasts of western America, and turned back only when his further progress was impeded by vast fields of ice. Unable, in consequence of the advanced season, to go further, he visited the Sandwich islands, and stopped at Owyhee, where he unfortunately lost his life. During the night the Indians carried away the Discovery's cutter, and Cook, determined to recover it, adopted the same measures which on similar occasions he had successfully pursued, and he seized the king of the island, to confine him on board his ship till restoration of the vessel was made. In the struggle which took place, the captain and his men were assailed by the Indians, who viewed with resentment the captivity of their monarch, and before he could reach the boat Cook received a severe blow on the head, which brought him to the ground, and unable alone to resist a multitude of savage foes, while his men in the boat and on the shore seemed intent in defending themselves, he was overpowered by the strokes of his assailants. His body was treated with savage barbarity, and a few bones were recovered, which his mourning and disconsolate companions committed to the deep. This melancholy event happened on the 14th February, 1779. The account of the death of this worthy navigator was received with general sorrow. The services which he had rendered his country, the humanity which he had always showed in his intercourse with the Indians, and the benevolence and concern with which he watched over the health of his men, duly entitled him to universal respect. Soon after his departure the Royal Society voted him a golden medal, with the most honourable and most deserved testimony of their esteem and gratitude; and though he had not the happiness to receive, before his death, this proof of public affection, yet posterity views and records with admiration and reverence the homage due to the merits of a great and a good man. Cook left by his wife, who long survived him, several children. On the widow the king bestowed a pension of 200*l.* and on each of the children 25*l.* a reward scarce adequate to the many and immortal services of the father. Cook, though cradled in poverty, yet improved himself by diligence and assiduous labour. He possessed great natural abilities, and they were not abused; but reading, meditation, and severe application rendered them not only respectable but shining. Of his first voyage the account was compiled by Dr. Hawkesworth, perhaps not with sufficient justice. George Forster, son of Dr. Forster, was the narrator of the second voyage, and as he had shared the adventures of the naval hero, his relation must be considered not only as accurate but very interesting. Among the compilers of the last voyage men of ability and reputation are mentioned, especially Dr. Douglas bishop of Salisbury, captain King, who was one of the officers in the expedition, and Mr. Anderson. The principal islands discovered by Cook were New Caledonia, New Georgia, Sandwich-land, and other less important places, and thus by his labours and perseverance he established the non-existence of a southern continent, and the impracticability of a northern passage between the Pacific and Atlantic oceans.

COOKE, Sir Anthony, was born at Gidding-hall, Essex, about 1506. As his name is not mentioned by Wood, it is probable that he was educated at Cambridge. He so distinguished himself by his learning, and the respectability of his character, that he was thought worthy to preside over the education of the young king, Edward VI. In Mary's reign he lived in exile; but he returned under Elizabeth, and died at his seat 1576. His daughters were all happy in their matrimonial connexions. Mildred married lord Burleigh; Anne, Sir Nicholas Bacon; Elizabeth, Sir John Russell, son of the earl of Bedford; and Catharine, Sir Henry Killigrew.

COOKE, Robert, was born at Beeston, Yorkshire, and educated at Brazen-nose college, Oxford, where he became proctor of the university. He was an able divine and a good scholar, well skilled in the knowledge of ecclesiastical history. He retired upon the vicarage of Leeds, in Yorkshire, and died in 1614.

COOKE, Thomas, a poet, born at Braintree, Essex, about 1707, and educated at Felsted school. In his 19th year he edited Andrew Marvel's works, and, by an elegant dedication, introduced himself to the knowledge and patronage of lord Pembroke, who not only esteemed him, but even assisted him with valuable notes in his translation of Hesiod, published in 1728. Cooke translated besides, Terence, and Cicero de natura deorum, and the Amphitryon of Plautus. He wrote also five or six pieces for the stage, which, however, gained him neither fame nor money. He was concerned with Motley in writing Penelope, a farce, which being considered as throwing ridicule on Pope's Odyssey, just then published, greatly irritated the poet, who, in consequence of this gave Cooke a respectable place in the Dunciad. Cooke died very poor, about 1750. Some memoirs of him were published by the late Sir Joseph Mawbey, in the Gentleman's Magazine.

COOKE, Elisha, a physician of Boston, Massachusetts, was graduated at Harvard college in 1657. In 1689 he went to England as agent of Massachusetts to procure the restoration of the charter. He afterwards, during the contentions between the legislature of the colony and the royal governors, respecting the charters, distinguished himself by advocating the rights of the people. He possessed a strong mind, and was bold and patriotic. After having held various important offices in the province for more than 40 years, he died in 1715. [F L.]

COOKE, Elisha, son of the preceding, and also a distinguished politician, was graduated at Harvard college in 1697. He commenced his political career in early life, and it was marked like his father's, by violent contentions with the governors of the province. He was for many years at the head of the popular party, and held the offices of counsellor, speaker of the house of representatives, justice of the court of common pleas, and agent to the court of Great Britain. He died in 1737. [F L.]

COOPER, Anthony Ashley, earl of Shaftesbury, was born 22d July, 1621, at Winborne St. Giles's, Dorsetshire. He studied for two years at Exeter college, Oxford, and afterwards removed to Lincoln's-inn, where for some time he applied himself to the law. He was member for Tewkesbury in the parliament of 1640; and at the beginning of the civil wars he seemed inclined to favour the side of the king. He, however, retired in disgust from Oxford, and soon after took a commission in the parliamentary army. In 1645, he was sheriff for Norfolk, and the next year for Wilts: and he afterwards as member of the house of commons, had the boldness to charge Cromwell with tyranny and arbitrary government. The opposition which he had manifested against the usurpation rendered him a fit person to solicit the king's return, and he accordingly was one of the twelve who carried the invitation of the commons. On the restoration, his services were rewarded with a peerage, he was sworn a privy counsellor, and made chancellor of the exchequer, and one of the lords of the treasury. In 1672, he was raised to the dignity of lord chancellor; which, however, he resigned the following year, by the intrigues of his enemies, and especially of James, duke of York. From a partisan of the court, he now became a violent opponent; and the eloquence of his speeches, and the firmness of his conduct, had such effect, that the earl of Danby was unable to carry the test bill, and other measures, through parliament, which the government recommended; and a prorogation followed. On the meeting again of parliament, Shaftesbury, with others, insisted that the house was dissolved; and so offended was the king, that he sent him, together with Buckingham, Salisbury, and Wharton, to the Tower, where he remained for thirteen months. When set at liberty his opposition did not cease; and at last a change of ministry placed him at the head of the council board. This triumph was short. The duke of York was so enraged at the measures which Shaftesbury had pursued in recommending the exclusion bill, that he not only procured his dismissal from office, but obtained his being committed, for high treason, to the Tower. After four months confinement, he was tried and acquitted; but so sensible was he of the power and injustice of his enemies, that he fled from their persecution, in 1682, and reached Holland, where he proposed to end his days in peace and retirement. His days, however, were shortened by the attack of the gout, which fell on his stomach. He died 22d January, 1683, aged 62. His remains were conveyed to Winborne, where a handsome monument, erected by his great-grandson, records his character. Shaftesbury was a man of no steady principles, of great ambition, and little political fidelity. Charles II. who not only said, but bore with great good humour, sallies of raillery, once talking to him of his amours, told him, "I believe, Shaftesbury, thou art the wickedest fellow in my dominions." "May it please your majesty," replied Shaftesbury, with a grave face, "of a subject, I believe I am." At which the merry king laughed heartily. Shaftesbury at one time aspired to the dignity of king of Poland; and in consequence of his fickleness in his political connexions, he was not improperly called Shiftsbury, and not Shaftesbury. He married three wives. By the second only he had issue: an only son, Anthony, born 1651, January 16, who was the father of the personage next to be mentioned.

COOPER, Anthony Ashley, earl of Shaftesbury, known as the author of the Characteristics, was born February 26, 1671, at Exeter-house, London. He was educated under the eye of his grandfather, who placed about him a person who was well versed in the learned languages, so that at the age of 11 he could read Latin and Greek with great ease and fluency. In 1686 he began his travels, and highly improved himself in Italy and France in the acquisition of every polite accomplishment. He was member for Poole in the Parliament of 1694; but he declined sitting at the succeeding election, on account of his health. He then passed over into Holland, where, under an assumed name, in the company of le Clerc, Bayle, and other ingenious men, he spent a year, in the most perfect friendship and all the ease of literary intercourse. On his return into England he succeeded to the earldom of Shaftesbury; but he valued little the acquisition of a seat in the house of lords, where he seldom appeared. The enthusiastic extravagance of the French prophets about this time began to engage the attention of the nation; and Shaftesbury, who dreaded the evils of persecution, published his letter concerning enthusiasm, addressed to lord Somers. In 1709 he married a daughter of Thomas Ewer, Esq. of Lee, Herts, by whom he had one son. The precarious state of his health, which was always delicate, induced him to remove to a warmer climate; and after being about a year in Italy, he died at Naples, 4th February, 1713. The 3 volumes of his Characteristics were the only works which he wished to present to the public, of which the most correct edition is that of 1713. His name, however, in literature, was so respectable, that his letters to a young man in the university, were, in 1716, presented to the public; and in 1721, Toland also published letters from lord Shaftesbury to Robert Molesworth, Esq. As a philosopher, lord Shaftesbury gained high reputation; but his principles were warmly combated by able and indefatigable opponents. Leaving the purer principles of Christian doctrine, he, in his admiration for the learning and language of the ancients, regarded the character and the precepts of Socrates and Democritus as more than human, and while he considered man as a political being, under the guidance of a providence, whose government excludes general evil and disorder, he disregarded the important doctrines of revelation and atonement.

COOPER, Maurice Ashley, brother to the author of the Characteristics, translated the Cyropædia, addressed to his sister, the mother of Mr. Harris of Salisbury. This work appeared in 2 vols. 8vo. 1728, soon after his death, and was highly esteemed, so that a third edition of it was printed in 1770.

COOPER, Thomas, a learned English preacher, born at Oxford. 1517, and educated at Magdalen college school. He was elected fellow of the college in 1540. In 1546 he quitted his fellowship, and began to study physic, apprehensive, it is said, of the persecution of queen Mary, as after her death he returned to divinity, and took his degree of D.D. 1567. He was dean of Christ-church about this time, and two years after dean of Gloucester, and the next year, 1570, bishop of Lincoln. In 1584, he was translated to Winchester. When bishop of Lincoln, he had been active against those public exercises called prophesyings, which tended so much to introduce puritanism, and now at Winchester he was equally zealous against the catholics, who were both numerous and powerful. He died at Winchester, April, 1594, and was buried in the cathedral. He has been greatly commended by Wood, Harrington, and others, for his great learning, eloquence, gravity, and holiness of life. His writings are, chronicles from the 17th year after Christ to 1560—thesaurus linguæ Romanæ et Britannicæ, a work highly patronised by queen Elizabeth—and dictionarium historicum poeticum, &c.—an exposition of the chapters read in the Sunday service—admonition to the people of England—besides sermons, &c.

COOPER, Samuel, an English painter, born in London, 1609. He was bred under his uncle Hoskins, but he gained so much from the works of Vandyck, that he was called Vandyck in little. His chief excellence was in the representation of the features of the head. His works were highly esteemed on the continent; and he was intimately acquainted with the most celebrated painters of his age abroad. The king of France paid great attention to him when at Paris; but he could not obtain his Oliver Cromwell, though he offered 150*l.* for it. His best pieces were, O. Cromwell and one Swingfield. He died in London, 1672, aged 63, and was buried in St. Pancras' church. His elder brother, Alexander, was equally known as a limner. He went over to Sweden, and became painter to queen Christina.

COOPER, John Gilbert, Esq. born at Thurganton, Nottinghamshire, was educated at Westminster school, and Trinity college, Cambridge. He married Miss Wright, daughter of the recorder of Leicester, and resided on his family seat, where he died, April, 1769, after a long and tedious illness, arising from the stone. His chief work is his life of Socrates, in which he was assisted by his friend Mr. Jackson, of Leicester. He wrote besides remarks on Warburton's edition of Pope's works, and translated the Ver Vert of Gresset. His other works are, letters on taste—a father's advice to his son—some papers in "the world,"—and some fugitive pieces in Dodsley's collection.

COOPER, Samuel, a congregational minister, was born at Boston, Massachusetts, in March, 1725. He was graduated at Harvard, in 1743, and in 1746 was ordained pastor of the Brattle-street church, Boston. After an unusually popular ministry of near 37 years, he died in December, 1783. He was distinguished for the extent of his learning, the force and elegance of his style, and the energy and tenderness of his delivery. He was an ardent friend of the cause of liberty, and did much to promote it, corresponded extensively with eminent men abroad, and was a zealous patron of literary and charitable institutions. ¶ L.

COOPER, Mylcs, D.D. president of King's (now Columbia) college, New-York, was an Englishman, and educated at Oxford, where he was graduated in 1760. He came to New-York in 1762, and was immediately appointed professor of moral philosophy in the college, and on the resignation of Dr. Johnson, the next year was elected president. He continued in that station till 1775, when his friendliness to the royal cause rendering him unpopular, he resigned and returned to England. He was afterwards settled in the Episcopal chapel at Edinburgh, and died in that city in 1785. His talents and learning were respectable. ¶ L.

COOTE, Sir Eyre, an English general, born in 1726. He devoted himself to the profession of arms, and served in the king's troops in the rebellion of 1745. In 1754 he left Ireland for India, where he distinguished himself at the reduction of Hughley and Chandanagore, at the battle of Plassey, and the siege of Pondicherry. This last place, after an obstinate siege, though defended by Lally, yielded to the English, and thus fell the French power in the east. The services of Colonel Coote were handsomely acknowledged by the East India Company, who voted him a diamond-hilted sword, value 700*l.* In 1770 he was appointed commander-in-chief in the company's settlements; but resigned the office in consequence of a dispute with the governor of Madras. On his return to England he was invested with the order of the bath, and made governor of Fort St. George in Scotland; and on the death of General Clavering he went again to the east as commander-in-chief. In July 1781, he, with only 10,000 men, defeated Hyder's army consisting of 150,000 men, and obtained further successes over this active and formidable enemy. The weak state of Sir Eyre's health did not prevent his taking the field again in 1783; but he sunk under his complaints, and, two days after his arrival at Madras, he died, 26th April, 1783. His remains were brought to England, and buried in Rockwell church, Hants, 14th September, 1784. The East India Company have erected a monument to his memory in Westminster abbey.

COOTWICH, John, a doctor of laws, of Utrecht, known for his travels in the east, and for the account of it which he published, called travels into Jerusalem and Syria, in Latin, 4to. 1619, containing many curious particulars.

COPERNICUS, Nicholas, a celebrated astronomer, born at Thorne, in Prussia, 19th January, 1472. He studied the learned languages at home, and applied to philosophy and physic at Cracovia. In his 23d year he set out for Italy, in search of knowledge; and so great was his reputation, that on his arrival at Rome he was appointed professor of mathematics. After some years' absence he returned home, and began to apply the vast knowledge which he possessed to the examination and correction of the Ptolemaic system, then universally adopted and followed. The opinions of preceding philosophers were weighed with accuracy and judgment; but of all the systems of ancient times, none pleased the illustrious mathematician so much as that of Pythagoras, for its beauty, simplicity, and ease. In his 35th year, Copernicus bent all the powers of his mind to this intricate subject; and after twenty years' laborious study, the cycles and epicycles of former astronomers were removed from the machine of the universe, and the sun was nobly and independently placed in the centre, to illuminate and govern the whole. But though convinced of the truth of his hypothesis, the philosopher yet dreaded the bigotry and persecution of the times. His work lay long concealed, till the importunities of his friends prevailed upon him to publish; but a few hours after the first copy was brought to him, he was seized with a violent effusion of blood, which terminated his life, 24th May, 1543, in his 70th year. This truly great man, who, to the extensive knowledge of a comprehensive mind, united the mild virtues and the innocence of private life, was canon of Worms; an appointment which he obtained from his mother's brother, Wazelrodus, the bishop of the place. Copernicus was not only a mathematician, but a painter, and it is said that by the help of a looking-glass he drew an excellent picture of himself.

COPPA, Cavalier, a disciple and imitator of Guido, who died 1665, aged 70.

COQ, Peter le, a French ecclesiastic, born at Ifs, near Caen, 29th March, 1723. He became superior of the Eudistes, and remarkable for his piety, learning, and modesty. He wrote letters on ecclesiastical discipline, 12mo.—treatise on funds—on different kinds of property—on the usury of commercial loans, &c. He died of a paralytic stroke, 1st September, 1777.

COQUES, Gonzalo, a Flemish painter, who died 1684, aged 66. He successfully imitated Vandyck, and particularly excelled in historical conversations. He acquired both riches and reputation, and his pieces in his lifetime were eagerly sought by the princes of Germany, and by Charles I. A very remarkable clearness of colour appeared in the heads and hands of his pictures.

CORAM, captain Thomas, was born about 1663, and bred to the sea. From seeing many children exposed, his humanity prompted him to relieve them; and to him we are indebted for the Foundling hospital, for which, after seventeen years' benevolent attention, he obtained a charter. His charitable views were extended to America; he established a place for the education of Indian girls, and thus paved the way for a reconciliation between the natives and the settlers. His disregard for private economy, whilst engaged in public good, at last reduced his circumstances so much that he lived on the benevolent contributions of his friends, at the head of whom appeared Frederic prince of Wales. He died in London 29th March, 1751, aged 84, and was, according to his desire, buried in the Foundling chapel.

CORAS, John de, a native of Realmont, who became public professor of law at Toulouse at the age of 18. He was afterwards professor at Angers, Orleans, Paris, Padua, and Ferrara, and then returned to Toulouse, and became counsellor of the parliament, and chancellor to the queen of Navarre. He was imprisoned for his adherence to the protestant religion, and orders were sent from the king to put him to death; but while the parliament resisted the arbitrary mandate, some assassins broke into the prison and murdered him, with above 200 other prisoners, 1572. He wrote various works on civil law, which were published together, Lyons, 1558, 2 vols. fol.

CORAS, James de, author of the life of the preceding, was a native of Toulouse, and author of Jonah and Nineveh penitent, a poem of little merit. He died 1677. His works appeared in 1665, 12mo.

CORBET, John, a native of Gloucester, educated at Magdalen-hall, Oxford. He obtained the living of Bramshot, in Hampshire, from which he was ejected in 1662, for nonconformity. He died of the stone, in London, 1680. He is author of a historical relation of the military government of Gloucester during the rebellion, 4to. besides self-employment in secret, 12mo. 1681, a work of merit. He was a zealous nonconformist, and had once, at Chichester, a warm debate with bishop Gunning, on conformity, which ended without mutual conviction.

CORBET, Richard, an English poet and divine, born at Ewell, in Surrey, and educated at Westminster-school and Christchurch, Oxford, of which he became dean, in 1620, by the favour of king James. In 1629 he was made bishop of Oxford, and in 1632 translated to Norwich. He died 28th July, 1635, and was buried in the cathedral of Norwich. After his death, his poems were published, under the title of Poetica stromata, 1648, 8vo. and another edition 1672, 12mo.

CORBULO, Domitius, a Roman general, who carried arms against the Parthians, and placed Tigranes on the Armenian throne. He destroyed himself when he heard that Nero, envious of his glory, had ordered his assassination, A. D. 67.

CORDAY D'ARMANS, Mary Anne Charlotte, a native of St. Saturnin, near Seez, in Normandy, of respectable parents. She was brought up at Caen, where her beauty and accomplishments were seen and admired by Belsunce, the major of a regiment quartered in the town. The death of this worthy favourite, who was murdered by some assassins, excited the vengeance of the youthful heroine, and when she saw her lover branded with the name of conspirator, in a paper published by Marat, she hastened to Paris, determined to sacrifice to her resentment the man who had so shamefully abused the object of her affections, and had defended the condemnation of the deputies of merit and virtue in the convention. She was refused admittance at the house of Marat; but she obtained it by writing a letter, in which she informed him that she wished to disclose some secret of importance; and while the tyrant was engaged in conversation with her, she stabbed him to the heart, and he fell at her feet. Undismayed, and glorying in the deed, she refused to fly, and was dragged to the Abbaye, and then to the revolutionary tribunal, where she heard the sentence of condemnation with tranquil composure. The serenity and dignity of her features were so commanding, as she walked to the scaffold, that Adam Lux, a deputy from Mayence, captivated by her beauty, requested of the bloody tribunal to follow her to death; and he had the singular satisfaction of expiring by the same guillotine. Charlotte suffered July, 1793. She was 24 years and nine months old; and it is said that by the female line she was descended from Peter Cornelle.

CORDEMOI, Geraud de, a French academian, and a great partisan of Des Cartes's system. He was reader to the dauphin; and died 8th October, 1684, at an advanced age. He wrote a general history of France, during the two first races of kings, besides some metaphysical and other tracts, 4to. His son Lewis Geraud was abbot of Femiers monastery. He wrote some controversial pieces, and assisted his father in his history of France. He died 1722.

CORDUS, Aulus Crementius, a Roman, author of a history of the civil wars of Rome, much commended by Tacitus and Seneca. He destroyed himself when he heard that Sejanus meditated his death, by a false accusation before Tiberius.

CORDUS, Euricius, a German physician and poet, who died at Bremen 24th December, 1535. He was intimate with Erasmus and other learned men. His Latin poems appeared at Leyden 1623, in 8vo. He wrote also botanologia, and some medical treatises.

CORDUS, Valerius, son of the preceding, was born at Hesse Cassel 1515. He devoted himself to the learned languages, but particularly to the study of botany. He traversed the mountains in Germany, and visited Padua, Pisa, and Florence; but receiving a dreadful kick from a horse, he died in consequence of it, at Rome, 1554, aged 29. He published remarks on Dioscorides, 1561, fol.—historia stirpium, 2 vols. fol.—dispensator. pharmacor. omnium, 12mo. He was as respectable in private as in public life.

CORELLI, Arcangelo, a famous musician, born at Fusignano, near Bologna, in 1653. He preferred secular to ecclesiastical music, and was so fond of the violin, that he was considered as the first performer on it in the world. After visiting the north of Europe, and receiving the applauses which his merit deserved, in the German courts, after five years' absence, he returned to Rome, where he was patronised by cardinal Ottoboni. He died at Rome 1713, aged nearly 60, and was buried in the Pantheon. He left his property, amounting to about 6000*l.* and his large collection of pictures, to his great patron, who, with becoming benevolence, bestowed all the money on the relations of the deceased. Corelli is considered as the author of new and original harmonies, in a style noble, elegant, and pathetic.

CORINNA, a Greek poetess, called the Lyric muse, from her obtaining five times the prize over Pindar.

CORIO, Bernardine, a historian of Milan, born in 1460. He was employed by Lewis Sforza to write the history of his country; but when the Milanese was overrun by the French, and himself taken prisoner, he died of grief, in 1500. His history is much esteemed. The best edition is that of Paris, 1646, 4to. His nephew Charles wrote a "portrait of the city of Milan."

CORIOLANUS, Caius Marcius, a celebrated Roman general, who, when disgraced by his countrymen, fled to Tullus king of the Volsci, whose armies he led against Rome. His wife and mother interfered, and at their request he marched back; in consequence of which he was murdered by Tullus, B. C. 485.

CORNARIUS, or HAGUENBOT, John, a German physician, born at Zwickow, in Saxony. He early distinguished himself as a scholar; and when a licentiate in medicine, he rejected the prescriptions of the Arabian physicians, and restored the mode practised by the Greeks. He was fifteen years engaged in translating the works of Hippocrates, Ætius, &c. He practised with great success at Frankfort, Marburg, Jena, &c. and died of an apoplexy 1558, aged 58. He wrote some medical tracts, besides translating some of the fathers.

CORNARO, Lewis, a noble Venetian, known for his great age. He died at Padua 1565, more than 100 years old. He wrote a treatise on the advantage of a temperate life, in his 81st year; and in this valuable little book he ingenuously confesses the irregularities of his younger years, and recommends to his youthful inquirers, at whose request he had undertaken the work, the practice of regularity and temperance, by which he enjoyed all the comforts of lively spirits and uninterrupted health. In his reformed mode of living, he never took more than twelve ounces of food and fourteen of wine. He wrote besides a treatise on waters, especially the Lagunes, near Venice. His wife nearly equalled him in longevity.

CORNARO, Helena Lucretia, a learned Venetian lady, who was educated at the university of Padua, where she took her degrees and was made a docteur, and received the title of unalterable. At Rome she was admitted at the university, and was intitled the humble. She made a vow of perpetual celibacy, that she might with more intense application devote herself to literary pursuits; and so great was the reputation of her learning, that the most illustrious characters who travelled through Venice were more anxious to see her than all the curiosities of the city. Her great application brought on infirmity and disease, and hastened her death, which happened in 1685, in her 35th year. Her death was recorded by poetical effusions from the learned of Europe, and a magnificent funeral solemnity was performed in her honour at Rome. An eloquent oration was also pronounced, in which she was celebrated as triumphing over three monsters, pride, luxury, and ignorance. She wrote nothing, though capable to instruct and improve mankind by her pen.

CORNAZZANI, Anthony, a native of Placentia, in the 15th century. He wrote the lives of the Virgin Mary and Jesus Christ, in verse, besides sonnets, of some merit; and died at Ferrara.

CORNBURY, lord, son of the earl of Clarendon, was appointed governor of New-York by king William, and commenced his administration in May, 1702. He was pre-eminently avaricious, unjust, bigoted, and despotic, and soon became universally detested. He was superseded in 1708, and returned to Europe. L. L.

CORNEILLE, Peter, a celebrated French poet, born at Rouen, June 6th, 1606. He was brought up to the bar; but he soon abandoned it as a profession not congenial to his genius. His first play was Melite, a comedy, which originated in an affair of gallantry; but so great was its popularity, during those degenerate days of the French stage, that Corneille was encouraged to contribute more liberally to the public amusement. His next piece was Medea, a tragedy; and after many others, appeared the Cid, in 1637, his chef d'œuvre, a tragedy which drew against him the persecution and obloquy of rival wits and unsuccessful poets, among whom was even cardinal Richelieu himself, though he had granted a pension to the author. Corneille was chosen member of the French academy, in 1647; and he died 1684, aged 79. He was a man of great merit in private life, liberal, humane, and devout, and rather of a melancholy turn of mind. His poetical works are among the sublimest effusions of the French muse.

CORNEILLE, Thomas, a French poet, brother to the preceding. He was member of the French academy, and of that of inscriptions. Though inferior to his brother, yet his plays possessed merit. They were published with those of his brother, Paris, 1738, in 11 vols. 12mo. He translated also Ovid's metamorphoses, and some of the epistles,—and wrote remarks on Vaugelas—a dictionary of arts, 2 vols. fol.—a universal geographical dictionary, 3 vols. folio. He died at Andeli, 1709, aged 84.

CORNEILLE, Michael, a painter, born at Paris, 1642. He was honoured in consequence of obtaining a prize, with the king's pension, and travelled to Rome, where he greatly improved himself. He studied particularly the antique, in which he equalled the Caracci. He was, however, deficient in colouring. On his return to Paris, he was made professor of the academy, and his pencil was employed in adorning the noble edifices of Versailles and Trianon. He died at Paris, 1708.

His brother, John Baptist, was also an eminent artist, and member of the academy.

CORNELIA, a Roman lady, daughter of the elder Scipio Africanus, and wife of Sempronius Gracchus. She devoted herself to the education of her two sons, Tiberius and Caius, who alone survived of the twelve children she had had; and when they were sacrificed to the public resentment she bore their loss with Spartan fortitude.

CORNELISZ, Lucas, a painter of Leyden, who became chief painter to Henry VIII. of England. The portraits of the constables of Queenborough-castle, by him from Edward III. to his time, are preserved at Penhurst, in Kent.

CORNELISZ, James, a Dutch painter of the 16th century. His picture on the descent from the cross, preserved in the old church, Amsterdam, is much admired.

CORNELISZ, Cornelius, of Haerlem, was eminent as a painter. His deluge is much celebrated.

CORNELIUS, bishop of Rome, after Fabian, 251, in opposition to Novatian. This produced a schism; but under the persecution of Gallus, Cornelius was banished, and died soon after, 252.

CORNETO, Adrian, an Italian ecclesiastic, sent as legate by Innocent VII. to Henry VII. who bestowed on him the bishoprics of Hereford and Bath and Wells. He afterwards was employed as legate in France, and was made a cardinal by Alexander VI. The pope, who knew and dreaded his abilities, determined to poison him at a supper; but fell himself a victim to his own diabolical purposes. Corneto left Rome on the succession of Julius II. but though recalled by Leo X. he again soon after went into exile, where he died. He was author of a learned treatise de sermone latino—and de verâ philosophiâ—a poem on the chase, &c. and deserves to be mentioned with respect, as one of the zealous restorers of the purity of Latin language.

CORNUTUS, a grammarian and philosopher of merit, tutor to the poet Persius. He was put to death by Nero, A. D. 44.

CORNWALLIS, Sir Charles, second son of Sir W. Cornwallis, was a man of superior abilities, employed by James I. as his ambassador in Spain. He wrote the life of Henry, prince of Wales, to whom he had been secretary; and died about 1630. His son William wrote some essays, printed 1632, 8vo.

CORNWALLIS, Charles, marquis, an English general, born 31st December, 1738. He early devoted himself to the military profession, and in 1758, obtained a captain's commission in the light infantry.

In 1761, he became aid-de-camp to the marquis of Granby, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and went to Germany till the conclusion of the campaign. He succeeded in 1762, his father in the earldom of Cornwallis, and three years after was made aid-de-camp to the king, and one of the lords of the bed-chamber. He obtained the 33d regiment of foot in 1766, and two year after married Miss Jones, a lady of large fortune, who died of a broken heart, when unable to dissuade him from his attendance in the campaigns against the Americans. In the new world he displayed great spirit; but whilst he laboured for the subjection of the rebellious colonies, he treated the people with humanity. The seizure of Philadelphia by his forces was followed by the reduction of South Carolina, and by the defeat of general Gates, with an inferior force; but these advantages were tarnished by the surrender of the whole army at York-town, 1781, to the united forces of America and France. Though this event proved so disastrous to the British interests in America, lord Cornwallis was never blamed for want of courage, prudence, or sagacity; but the gallant conduct he had at all times shown in this unfortunate war recommended him to the ministry, in 1790, as the fittest person to fill the government of British India. The fall of Bangalore was quickly followed by the defeat of Tippoo, who at last consented to make peace with the conquerors, by yielding a great part of his dominions, and by putting his two sons into the hands of the general, in proof of his sincerity. Lord Cornwallis, after a mild and vigorous administration in India, returned to Europe, and was for his services created a marquis, and made master-general of the ordnance. His next employment was in the civil and military government of Ireland, where he had the felicity to destroy rebellion, to capture an invading enemy in the very bosom of the country, and, by the wisest and most temperate measures, to restore confidence and harmony, where distrust, mutual hatred, and secret violence, had long reigned with impunity. After completing the union between the two kingdoms, lord Cornwallis returned to England, soon to negotiate the short-lived peace of Amiens. In 1805, he was prevailed upon to accept again the government of India, where the strong and pacific measures of his former administration were so much required. He was no sooner arrived at Calcutta, than, without recovering from the effects of his voyage, he set out on a visit to the northern provinces, where his presence was necessary. Confinement in a boat, without regular exercise, and the heat of the weather, produced such debility that he was at last obliged to stop at Ghazepore, in the province of Benares, above 1000 miles above Calcutta, where he expired, 5th October, 1805. His remains were interred at Ghazepore, and every mark of respect paid to his memory, not only by the British, but by the natives of India, who regarded him as a humane and benevolent governor. His lordship left a son and a daughter.

CORONEL, Paul, a native of Segovia, professor at Salamanca. His great abilities were employed by cardinal Ximenes in the publication of his Polyglott Bible. He died about 1524.

CORONELLI, Vincent, a Venetian geographer, made, in 1685, cosmographer to the French king. He founded an academy of cosmography at Venice, where he died, 1718. He published above 400 geographical charts, &c. and other works, much valued.

CORRADINI, Peter Marcellinus, a learned civilian and cardinal, born at Sezza, in 1658. He was the favourite of pope Clement XI. and wrote a curious work, vetus Latium profanum et sacrum, 2 vols. fol. and a history of Sezza, in 4to. He died at Rome, 1743.

CORRADUS, Sebastian, a grammarian and professor of belles lettres of Bologna, died 1556. He wrote quaesturae que Ciceronis vita refertur,—and de lingua Latinâ.

CORREGIO, Antonio da, a celebrated painter, born at Corregio, a town near Modena. Vid. ALLEGRI.

CORROZET, Giles, a bookseller, who died at Paris, 15th June, 1568, aged 58. He wrote various things which possessed merit.

CORSINI, Edward, a monk, born at Fano, 1702. He died of an apoplexy at Pisa in 1765, where he was professor of philosophy. He was a man of great erudition and of astonishing perseverance. He published some valuable works in criticism, philology, and literature; the chief are, philosophical and mathematical institutions, 6 vols. 8vo.—a course of geometrical elements, 2 vols. 8vo.—the fasti of the archons of Athens, 4 vols. 4to.—a course of metaphysics—the history the university of Pisa—dissertation on the games of Greece, &c.

CORT, Cornelius, an eminent engraver, born at Hoorn, in Holland, 1536. He travelled into Italy, and at Venice saw and assisted the celebrated Titian. He settled at Rome, where he died, 1578, aged 42. His engravings are excellent, the very best ever produced in Holland. They amount, according to Marolles, to 151.

CORTESI, William, a French painter, born at Franche Comté. He studied at Rome, and was employed and liberally rewarded by Alexander VIII. He died 1679, aged 51.

CORTESI, Giovanna, a paintress of Florence, who died 1736, aged 66. Her miniatures are greatly admired.

CORTEZ, Ferdinand, the conqueror of Mexico, was born of a respectable family at Medellin, in Estremadura, 1485. He quitted the study of belles lettres, and of the law, for the profession of arms, and, fired with the adventurous spirit which animated his country, he, in 1504, went to Hispaniola, where one of his relations was governor. In an expedition to Cuba, in 1511, he displayed such bravery, that Velasquez, the governor, intrusted him with the command of the fleet which was destined to make new discoveries on the continent. On the 18th November, 1518, the new commander set sail from San Jago, in Cuba, with 11 small vessels, on board of which were embarked 617 men, soldiers and sailors, with 18 horses, and 10 field-pieces, but only 13 firelocks. With this small force he landed at Tabasco, which he took after a dreadful slaughter of the inhabitants, and afterwards advancing to St. Juan de Ulva, he was met by the ambassadors of Montezuma, the king of Mexico, who by entreaties and presents earnestly solicited him to cease from his enterprise, and not penetrate into the country. Cortez knew the terror which his arms had inspired; the fire of his artillery was compared to the thunder of the heavens, the horses on which the Spaniards rushed to the battle were unknown and irresistible monsters, and the huge vessels, which, floating on the bosom of the ocean, had brought these strangers, were all such extraordinary objects in the eyes of the terrified and superstitious Indians, that the Spaniards were regarded as more than human beings. After building a small fort at Vera Cruz, and burning his ships, that he might inspire his followers with confidence, Cortez advanced through the provinces to the capital of Mexico, supported by the co-operation of the Zempoalans, and other tribes, which were dissatisfied with the government of Montezuma. With only 500 men badly armed, and 15 horses, he defeated the Tlascalans, who presumed to dispute his progress, and after rewarding the hospitality of the inhabitants of Cholula with rapine and slaughter, the conqueror presented himself at the gates of Mexico. He was received with great pomp and every mark of friendship by Montezuma; but though treated with confidence, Cortez acted with duplicity, and seizing the person of the unsuspecting monarch, he compelled him in the rigour of confinement to acknowledge himself the vassal of the crown of Spain. Thus absolute in Mexico, Cortez soon heard that Velasquez, jealous of his glory, had sent an expedition under Narvaez, to bring him back in chains to Cuba; but noways dismayed at the intelligence, he left one of his officers, Alvarado, governor of the capital, and hastened back to Vera Cruz. With the sagacity of an intrepid soldier he surprised and defeated Narvaez, and by his conciliating conduct he had the art to convert his enemies into friends, and to return to Mexico supported by those who had come to destroy his hopes. During his absence Alvarado had been guilty of excesses towards the natives, and instead of submission Cortez found the most determined hostility. Unable by force or by persuasion to quell the tumult, he caused Montezuma, arrayed in his royal robes, to appear before his incensed subjects, but the Mexicans disregarded the interference of their captive monarch, who during the battle received a mortal wound. Yielding to the storm the Spaniards retired from Mexico, and though they had lost the half of their little army, they determined on revenge. On his way towards Tlascala, Cortez was met by a large army of the natives, whom he defeated with dreadful slaughter at Otumba, and after recruiting his forces with 550 infantry and 40 horses, and a number of allies from Tlascala, and other neighbouring towns, he marched back to Mexico, December, 1520. The conquest of Texcuco, the second city of the empire, was followed by the siege of Mexico, which the new sovereign Guatimozin, the nephew of Montezuma, a brave prince, ably defended. The artillery of the Spaniards however prevailed over the feeble weapons of the Indians, and after three months' resistance, Guatimozin was seized in a canoe as he attempted to escape on the lake, and his captivity was followed by the fall of the capital, and the destruction of the Mexican empire. Above 200,000 Indians made their immediate submission to those few bold adventurers; but they were not satisfied with the immense treasures of the plundered city, and the unfortunate monarch was exposed to tortures, that he might confess where the hidden riches of Montezuma were deposited. It was at this dreadful moment when the monarch lay exposed with one of his ministers to the fury of burning coals, that he heard the cry which the poignancy of his sufferings, and not the wish of making a discovery, extorted from his favourite, and looking at him with an air of upbraiding indignation, he exclaimed, "what! am I on a bed of roses." Guatimozin was saved from the flames to be shot by his inhuman persecutors, with some of his ministers, on a charge of conspiracy. Master of a populous and opulent empire, Cortez, though cruel and avaricious, began to display the character of a prudent and beneficent governor. Mexico, which had been destroyed during the siege, rose from ruins, and in 1529 assumed the form of the noblest of European cities. But while these successes enlarged the dominions of Spain, the conqueror was an object of envy at home, and he was soon recalled to give an account of his conduct, and after enduring for a while the resentment of his enemies, he had the good fortune to procure the favour of his sovereign, and a grant of new and enlarged powers. When he pressed to Charles V. for an audience, and was asked who he was, the bold adventurer replied, "I am the man who has given you more provinces than your father left you towns." Besides the dignity of marquis, the conqueror of Mexico received the grant of large domains in New Spain, and after visiting his conquests in 1530, and continuing there some years, he returned to Europe, and died in his native country, 2d Dec. 1554, aged 63. He left several legitimate children, and some besides by his two Indian mistresses, one of whom was a daughter of Montezuma. Great and heroic as the character of Cortez appears, he deserves the execration of posterity for the cruelties which he exercised on the inoffensive natives. It was not only on pretence of extorting their riches that these wretched men were exposed to persecution and death, but the most cruel methods were pursued to convert them to Christianity by men who in every action of their life violated the precepts of the gospel. On one occasion sixty caciques and above 400 leading men were committed to the flames, and so horrid were the practices of these fierce conquerors, that as they expired, the Indians indignantly rejected the promises of another and a happier life, when they heard that the regions of paradise were to contain their unfeeling murderers. The best account of the conquests of Cortez is by Antonio de Solis in Spanish translated into French, two vols. 12mo. 1775, and into English.

CORTEZI, Paul, a learned Italian, born, 1465, at St. Geminiano in Tuscany. He was a great patron of literature and a learned man, and died bishop of Urbino, 1510, aged 45. He wrote a dialogue on the learned men of Italy, besides other ingenious treatises.

CORTI, Matthew, a native of Pavia, where he was professor of physic, and afterwards at Pisa and Padua. His celebrity recommended him to Clement VII. who appointed him his physician, and after his death, he retired to Bologna, from whence he settled at Pisa, where he died 1544, aged 69. He wrote treatises, de curandis febribus—de venæ sectione, in aliis affectibus et in pleuritide, and other works.

CORTICELLI, Salvatore, a monk of Bo logna, professor of the Belles lettres in St. Paul's college there, fellow of the Crusca academy, and provincial of the Barnabite order. Among other works, he published his Italian grammar in 1745, which was universally approved, and particularly noticed by Benedict XIV. his fellow-townsmen, who observed, in a letter to him, that it was a wonder their native city should speak Italian so ill, and yet teach it so well. He died about 1770.

CORYATE, Thomas, son of a clergyman, born at Odecombe, Somersetshire, 1577, became known for his extravagancies. He studied for three years at Gloucester-hall, Oxford, and then was taken into the family of Henry prince of Wales, where he was the whetstone of the wits of those times. In 1608 he travelled through France, Italy, and Germany, &c. and on his return, published an account of his adventures, which he called Crudities, in 4to. The work was recommended by the verses of Ben Jonson, Harrington, Inigo Jones, Donne, Drayton, and others, and so pleased was the author with his success, that he determined to spend ten years in the visiting of foreign countries. With this intention, he set out in 1612, and after visiting Constantinople, the coast of Asia Minor, Egypt, and all the Levant, he advanced far into Persia, and the dominions of the Great Mogul. He was attacked at Surat in the East Indies, by a flux, which carried him off 1617. Coryate was not devoid of understanding; but his affectation, and his great self-consequence, exposed him to the ridicule of the wits of the age, and turned the best intentions into levity and contempt. It is unknown what became of his notes and papers. During his absence, some letters, &c. were published as from him, but no regular account of his adventures, in his last travels, has appeared before the public.

COSBY, William, governor of New-York, and New-Jersey, was appointed in 1731, arrived in August, 1732, and continued in office until his death, March 7, 1736. He had previously been governor of Minorca, and of the Leeward Islands, and was colonel of a regiment in the army. His administration was turbulent and unpopular, particularly towards the close of it. New-York was at that time distracted by parties, at the head of one of which was Lewis Morris, whom the governor removed from the office of chief justice. He appointed Delancey his successor, a man of intrigue, who attached himself to the governor. He held in contempt the elective franchise, and continued the same assembly six years without permitting its dissolution. [F] L.

COSIERS, John, a painter, born at Antwerp 1603. He was patronised by many crowned heads, and his historical pieces deserved universal commendation.

COSIMO, Andrew and Peter, Italian painters, of whom the first excelled in the chiaro-obscuro, and the other in ludicrous pieces. Peter died 1521, aged 80, of a paralytic stroke; he was a singular character, very irascible, and very superstitious. He had for his pupils del Sarto and de Sangallo.

COSIN, John, an English prelate, born in Norwich 30th Nov. 1594, and educated at the free-school there, and at Caius college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He was patronised by Overall, bishop of Lichfield, and after his death by Neal, bishop of Durham, who gave him a prebend, and the rich rectory of Branspeth. His collection of private devotions, drawn up at the request of Charles I. as well as his frequent intercourse with Laud, drew upon him the censures of the puritans, who loudly exclaimed against his popish principles. In 1623 he took his degree of D.D. and in 1634 he was elected master of Peterhouse, and in 1640 he was made dean of Peterborough. The same year a complaint was made against him, in the house of commons, by Smart, a man whom he with others had ejected from his prebend at Durham, for preaching a seditious sermon, and in consequence of this, he was deprived by a vote of the house, of all his ecclesiastical preferments, and two years after expelled from the mastership of Peterhouse, because his persecutors suspected him of popish innovations. Upon this he left the kingdom, and during the civil wars resided at Paris, where he officiated as a protestant minister, and was assisted by a small pension from queen Henrietta. At the restoration he was replaced in all his preferments, and the same year raised to the see of Durham. In this elevated situation he employed himself in repairing and beautifying the cathedral and the palace, and in erecting schools and hospitals for the most benevolent purposes. Besides the large endowment which he settled, it is known that this humane prelate, during the 11 years in which he was at Durham, spent not less than 2000*l.* a year in charitable and pious uses. He died of a pectoral dropsy, 15th Jan. 1672, aged 78, and was buried in the chapel of Bishops' Aycland. He left the many legacies for charitable purposes by his will. He had one son and four daughters, and he had the misfortune to see his son, in consequence of his education among the Jesuits at Paris, turn catholic; and though he attempted to reclaim him, and even disinherit him, if he persevered in his religious tents, he never succeeded. The various books which he wrote display much learning, solid judgment, and extensive information. Though he was falsely accused of being a papist, yet he was the friend of magnificence and pomp in the outside of religion, and like all the adherents of Laud's principles, he dwelt much on vain and insignificant ceremonies.

COSME, John Baseillac, a feillant friar, who, however, followed his father's profession of surgeon, and became eminent as a lithotomist. His instrument for dividing the neck of the bladder, of which he gave an interesting account in the journal des Sçavans for 1748, though once much approved by the faculty, is now neglected. His forceps for breaking stones in the bladder was once in general use; and so great was his celebrity as an operator, that the surgeons, through mere jealousy, prevailed upon the French king to banish him. He died at Paris, 18th July, 1786, aged 79.

Cosmo I. son of John de Medici, was born in 1519. When his cousin Alexander was murdered, he had the art to procure his election to the supreme authority of the state; and he behaved with such firmness and sagacity, that all the conspiracies formed against his person and government by the seditious of Florence proved abortive. He assisted the emperor, in 1553, in the reduction of Sienna, which was annexed to his own territories by Philip II. and, in 1569, he was raised by the pope Pius V. to the sovereign title of grand duke of Tuscany. Cosmo, thus successful abroad, and the judicious patron of literature, in the re-establishment of the university of Pisa, and in the promotion of the arts, found himself unhappy in his family. His son John, who was a cardinal, and a man of merit, was, in a hunting party, secretly stabbed by his brother Garcia, who pretended ignorance of the foul deed. The father suspected the inhuman son; and when he confessed it, he, overpowered by a fit of passion, stabbed him with the same dagger which had robbed him of his other son. This tragic scene so affected the mother that she died a few days after, a victim to silent overwhelming grief. Cosmo died 1574, and left several children to uphold the sovereign power which he had so firmly established in Florence.

Cosmo II. grandson of the first Cosmo, succeeded his father Ferdinand, 1609, and during his reign displayed the virtues of a benevolent prince, eager to advance the happiness of his people, to cultivate literature, and promote the fine arts. He died 1621.

Cosmo III. succeeded his father Ferdinand II. as grand duke of Tuscany, 1670. He married the daughter of the duke of Orleans, from whom he was afterwards divorced, and he annexed to his other dignities, with the consent of the emperor and of the pope, the title of royal highness. He is represented as so superstitious that he took orders, at the Roman jubilee, for the privilege of saluting the handkerchief which, according to monkish traditions, our Saviour gave to Veronica, impressed with his own image. Cosmo was, like the princes of his house, a liberal patron of letters, and particularly attached to the study of chymistry. He was one of the richest sovereigns of Europe, and died 1723, after a happy reign of 54 years. His son and successor, John Gaston, died 1737, without issue; and the sovereignty of Florence descended to the queen of Spain, as sprung from the second Cosmo; and she exchanged it with France for the kingdom of the two Sicilies, which was bestowed on her son don Carlos.

COSNAC, Daniel de, a native of Limousin, noticed by the prince of Conti, and raised by his interest to the see of Valence, and afterwards to that of Aix, and other ecclesiastical honours. He died at Aix 1708, aged 81. Though a man of great abilities, he was very deformed in his person.

COSPEAU, Philip, a French prelate, born at Hainault. He was very eloquent in the pulpit, and substituted to the quotations from the classics more appropriate texts from the Bible. He died 1646, aged 78, author of some theological tracts.

COSSART, Gabriel, a native of Pontoise, who died at Paris 18th September, 1674, aged 59. He was a Jesuit, and assisted Labbe in his grand collection of councils, which appeared in 1672, in 18 vols. fol. He wrote besides, poetry, &c.

COSSE, Charles de, marshal de Brissac, a celebrated French general, born at Anjou, of a noble family, of Neapolitan descent. He devoted himself to the profession of arms, and distinguished himself in the wars of Italy and Piedmont, and at the siege of Perpignan 1541. His services were noticed and acknowledged by the French king, who sent him as ambassador to Charles V. and afterwards made him, in 1550, marshal of the kingdom, governor of Piedmont, and grand master of the artillery. His valour and sagacity as a general were so conspicuous, that several princes and nobles placed themselves under him as in a school of honour, where the tactics of war, and the evolutions of campaigns, could best be learned. He died at Paris 31st December, 1563, aged 57. He was a man of such honour and integrity, that when the government refused to pay the debts contracted by the army, he sold part of his estates to satisfy the just demand.

COSTANZO, Angelo di, born at Naples 1507, after 53 years of perseverance and labour, published a history of his native city in Italian, folio. He was also a poet of some consequence, and his sonnets and other pieces were collected at Venice 1752, in 12mo. He died at a very advanced age, about the year 1590.

COSTA, Christopher, a Portuguese, native of Africa, who devoted himself to botany, and in his travels in Asia was seized by some of the uncivilized natives, and long detained in slavery. On his return to Europe, he published an account of Indian plants, &c. translated into Latin by Clusius, &c.

COSTA, Emanuel, a Portuguese lawyer, professor at Salamanca, 1550. His works were published in 2 vols. fol.

COSTA, John, professor of the law at Cahors, wrote some notes on Justinian's Institutes, and died at Cahors, 13th Aug. 1637.

COSTA, Margaret, an Italian poetess, who published her works at Paris, which she dedicated to cardinal Mazarin.

COSTARD, George, an English scholar, born about 1710. He was fellow and tutor of Wadham college, and in 1764, he obtained the vicarage of Twickenham from the chancellor Northington. He died January 1782, and his books and oriental MSS. were sold by auction, the following March. He wrote fifteen different treatises, chiefly on astronomical subjects, and on the book of Job. They are enumerated in Nichols's anecdotes of Bowyer, and prove him to have been a man of great learning and extensive information.

COSTE, Peter, a native of Uzez, who fled to England on account of his religion, and died at Paris 1747, at an advanced age. He translated Locke's essay on the human understanding, and on the reasonableness of Christianity, and Newton's optics, into French, and wrote besides, the life of the great Condé—notes on Fontaine's fables, and Montaigne's essays—and a defence of Bruyere.

COSTER, Lawrence, an inhabitant of Haerlem, supposed by the Dutch to be the inventor of printing, about the year 1430. The best authorities, however, support that the art of printing was first invented at Mayence, though Meerman of Rotterdam, with great ingenuity and erudition, maintains the claims of his countrymen. Coster died 1440.

COSTINA, Ben Luca, a Christian philosopher of Balbec in Syria, in the 250th year of the hegira. He translated several Greek books into Arabic, and wrote some original works on physic, astronomy, and mathematics, of which Casiri in his biblioth. arab. de l'escorial has given a catalogue, COTA, Rodriguez, a native of Toledo, whose tragi-comedia de Calisto et Melibœa has appeared in Latin and French translations. He flourished 1560.

COTELERIUS, John Baptist, a learned

Frenchman, born at Nismes 1627. very early displayed great abilities in knowledge of the learned languages, and the age of 12, was able to construe the New Testament in Greek, and the Old in Hebrew, with great ease, at the first opening of the book. He was professor of Greek and member of the Sorbonne. He published the works of all the fathers who lived in the apostolic age, with a new translation and learned notes, two vols. fol. 1672. He published besides, momenta ecclesiæ Græcæ, of which he completed three volumes before his death. His great application had undermined his constitution, so that he was snatched away by an inflammatory disorder in his breast in his 59th year, 10th August, 1686. Besides extensive learning, he possessed the amiable virtues of private life; he was modest, unassuming, and devoid of all pride and affectation.

COTES, Roger, an English mathematician and astronomer, born at Burbach, Leicestershire, 10th July, 1682. At Leicester-school and St. Paul's, London, he was well initiated in classical literature and at Trinity college, Cambridge, he began early to display that fondness for mathematics which in his earlier years had appeared in his family. He became, 1705, fellow of his college, and had the tuition of the sons of the marquis of Kent, to whom he was related. In 1706, he was made Plumian professor of astronomy, and in 1713, took orders, and that same year, at the recommendation of Bentley published Newton's mathematica principia with the improvements of the author, to which he prefixed an excellent preface. He increased further his astronomical reputation, by his description of the great fiery meteor seen March 16, 1716. This great and rising genius died at the age of 33, or the 5th June, 1716, to the regret of the university, and of every lover of science and goodness. He was buried in Trinity chapel. His harmonia mensurarum was published in 1722, 4to. by his successor, Dr. Robert Smith, and also, by the same his valuable hydrostatical and pneumatological lectures, in 1737.

COTES, Francis, an English painter in oil and crayons. He was pupil to Kneller; and died 1770, aged 45.

COTIN, Charles, a French writer, died at Paris 1678. He was member of the French academy, was an eloquent preacher, a good scholar, and a respectable prosaic writer and poet. He is known, however more for the severity of Boileau and Moliere's satires against him, than for his own excellence.

COTOLENDI, Charles, a native of Aix or Avignon, was advocate in the parliament of Paris, and respectable as an author. He translated the Spanish history of Persia into French, 2 vols. 12mo.—the life of Columbus—the life of de Sales—besides dissertations on the works of St. Evremond, and the life of the dutchess of Montpensier.

COTTA, John, a Latin poet, born near Verona. He was made prisoner by the French at the battle of Ghiara d'Adda, in 1499. He died 1511, at Viterbo, of a pestential fever, aged 28. His epigrams and orations are printed in the carmina quinqueveterum, Venice, 1548, 4to.

COTTE, Robert de, an architect born at Paris, 1657. He was elected director of the royal academy of architecture, and made architect to the king, and intendant of the royal gardens, edifices, &c. His genius was advantageously displayed in adorning the public buildings of Paris, the palaces of Versailles and St. Denys, and the colonade of the Trianon. The chief beauties of his works were lightness, elegance, and delicacy. He died at Paris, 1735, and was succeeded by his son, Julius Robert, who was equally ingenious.

COTTEREL, Sir Charles, groom-porter to Charles I. and master of the requests to Charles II. He was well skilled in modern languages, and possessed all the manners and accomplishments of a gentleman. He resigned his office of master of the ceremonies to the king, to his son Charles Godowick. During the exile of his royal master, he translated Cassandra, the famed romance, and was also concerned in the translation of Davila's civil wars of France.

COTTIN, Sophia de, an ingenious lady, whose maiden name was Ristau, was born in 1772, at Bourdeaux. At the age of eighteen, she married M. Cottin, a banker at Paris, who left her a widow when she was twenty-two. She died at Paris in 1807. Her novels are—1. Claire d'Albe, 2 vols. 2. Malville, 4 vols. 3. Amelia Mansfield, 2 vols. 4. Mathilde, 6 vols. 5. Elizabeth, ou les Exiles de Siberie, 2 vols.—W. B.

COTTINGTON, Francis lord, chancellor of the exchequer, and first lord of the treasury, in the reign of Charles I. was an eminent minister, and employed for some time as an ambassador in Spain. On the breaking out of the civil wars he left his country for Spain, where he died, at Valladolid, but 1651, aged 77. In his political character, he displayed great dissimulation, with all the formal solemnity which he had imbibed at the Spanish court.

COTTON, or COTON, Peter, a Jesuit, born 1564, at Neronde, near the Loire, early distinguished for his zeal in converting heretics, and for his eloquence in the pulpit. He became confessor to Henry IV. of France, and possessed so much of his confidence that it was a public expression, that the king was good, but that he had cotton in his ears. Cotton refused an archbishopric and a cardinal's hat, which his master's partiality offered him. After Henry's death, he was confessor to Lewis XIII. but he soon left the court, and retired into the country. He died 19th March, 1626, aged 63. He wrote some sermons, besides controversial and divinity tracts.

COTTON, Sir Robert Bruce, an eminent English antiquary, born at Denton, Huntingdonshire, 22d June, 1570. He was of Trinity college, Cambridge, where he took his bachelor's degree, and then removed to London, where he became a member of the antiquarian society, and soon distinguished himself for his zeal in the search of antiquities. He was knighted by James I. and so high was his reputation for learning, information, and integrity, that not only the most leading men of the times consulted him on affairs of state, but the king himself employed his pen on several occasions. At James's request, he vindicated the character of Mary queen of Scots, he also examined what punishments should be inflicted on papists, and defended the ecclesiastical institution against the innovations of the puritans. On the creation of baronets, in 1611, by James, Sir Robert Cotton appeared as the thirty-sixth in the new dignity. But though such a favourite with the court, he, in the succeeding reign, joined the commons in the cry for the redress of grievances, though he recommended mild and gentle measures, which, in establishing the privileges of the people, might not endanger the safety of the sovereign. In 1629, Sir Robert became an object of persecution to the court. A manuscript, "which," it is said, "laid down a plan how the kings of England might oppress the liberties of their subjects, and for ever enslave them and their posterity," was lent out of his library, and being in a surreptitious copy laid before the privy council, produced his arrest and confinement in the Tower, and the seizure of his valuable library. Sir Robert with difficulty extricated himself from the violence of his persecutors; but he still felt the indignities offered to his person and character; and the treatment he received in some degree undermined his constitution, and broke his heart. He died of a fever, at Westminster, 6th May, 1631, aged upwards of 60 years. Sir Robert was not only an able antiquarian, but the friend and patron of men of learning; and to his munificence, his able assistance, and valuable communications, Knollis, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Francis Bacon, Selden, Speed, Camden, and other respectable authors, have with gratitude acknowledged themselves indebted. Though distinguished as a man of letters, and a skilful antiquarian,

Sir Robert is particularly entitled to the admiration of posterity for the valuable library which now remains for the information of the public, an immortal proof of his munificence and indefatigable zeal in the cause of science and of mankind. That his pursuits were directed to such objects is a happy circumstance for the public. In his time, the many records and important manuscripts which had been plundered from the dissolved monasteries were scattered with profane indifferance, and some friendly hand was wanted to collect and preserve them for the information of the learned. This valuable collection, improved still by his son Sir Thomas, and by his grandson Sir John, was, after being removed into various places, at last deposited in the British museum, in 1753.

COTTON, Charles, born in Staffordshire, of a respectable family, became known for his burlesque verses and ludicrous poetry, in the reign of Charles and James II. He translated with great spirit and success, Montaigne's essays, which he inscribed to lord Halifax, a nobleman, who highly valued the performance, which he had the capacity and the good sense to appreciate. Cotton published the wonders of the peak in Derbyshire—Virgil travestied—Lucian burlesqued; of which poems an edition was printed in 1751. He died about the time of the revolution, but the exact year is unknown.

COTTON, John, one of the most eminent of the early ministers of New England, was born at Derby, England, in 1585, and was educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, of which he afterwards became a fellow and head lecturer. In 1612, he was settled in the ministry at Boston in Lincolnshire, and laboured there twenty years with distinguished diligence, ability, and success. He was at length impeached for nonconformity, and came to Boston, Massachusetts, in 1633, and was settled as teacher of the church there. He died in 1652. He possessed good talents, and was an accomplished scholar, particularly in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. He was a man of ardent piety, an impressive preacher, and was highly successful in his ministry in the new as well as the old world. L.

CORROX, John, a congregational minister of Massachusetts, and the son of the preceding, was born in 1638, and graduated at Harvard College in 1657. In 1669, he was ordained pastor of the church at Plymouth, and continued there till 1697. He removed the next year to Charleston, South Carolina, and there formed a church to which he preached till his death in September, 1699. He held a respectable rank among his associates in the ministry in talents, learning, and diligence. He was accurately acquainted with the language of the Indians of Martha's Vineyard, among whom the Mayhews laboured, preached to them for some time previous to his settlement at Plymouth, and superintended the printing of Elliot's Bible in that language.

COTYS, a king of Thrace, in the age of Alexander, died about 356 B. C.—Another, who favoured the cause of Pompey.—Another, who lived in the age of Augustus, and to whom Ovid addressed one of his elegies. His son bore the same name, and exchanged Thrace for the kingdom of Armenia, A. D. 88.

COUDRETTE, Christopher, a French ecclesiastic, strongly attached to the partisans of the Port Royal, and to Boursier, against the Jesuits, by whom he had been educated. He opposed, with great ability, the papal bull unigenitus, for which he was sent to the Bastile for twelve months, in 1738. He died at Paris 4th August, 1774. He wrote memoirs sur le formulaire, two vols. 12mo.—histoire et analyse du livre de l'action de Dieu, &c. His chief work is the history of the Jesuits, in four vols. 12mo. 1761, to which he added a supplement of 2 vols. 1764.

COVEL, John, an English divine, born at Honingshearth, Suffolk, 1638, and educated at St. Edmundsbury and Christ college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He was chaplain to the embassy at Constantinople, where he continued for seven years. On his return home, 1679, he took his degree of D. D. and was chosen Margaret preacher of divinity. The next year he was presented to the living of Littlebury, in Essex, and in 1687, made chancellor of York, and the next year master of Christ College, Cambridge. He died in 1722, aged 85. During his residence at the Porte, he devoted himself to the examination of the ancient and present state of the Greek church; and he gave to the world, a few years before his death, a curious and useful publication on the subject, in folio.

COVERDALE, Miles, a native of Yorkshire, educated at Cambridge. From a friar, he became a protestant at the reformation, and was made bishop of Exeter, by Edward VI. During the persecuting reign of Mary, he was ejected from his see, and permitted to go into exile, at the interference of the king of Denmark. When Elizabeth ascended the throne, he returned, but he declined to reassume his bishopric, as his principles were now puritanical. He afterwards received the living of St. Magnus, London, from which he was ejected for nonconformity. He died poor, but respected, 20th May, 1567, aged 81. He assisted William Tindal in the English version of the Bible published in 1537, and corrected it afterwards in the edition of 1540, with notes.

COULON, Lewis, a French priest, who left the Jesuits' society in 1640. He died 1664. His geographical works are greatly esteemed, especially his historical treatise of all the rivers in France, 2 vols. 8vo. He wrote besides, lexicon Homericum, and some historical performances, &c.

COUPERIN, Francis, a Frenchman, organist of the chapel of Lewis XIV. He was much admired for his execution on the harpsichord. He died 1733, leaving two daughters, who were equally eminent as musicians. His two brothers, Lewis and Charles, were also good performers. He wrote some pieces for the harpsichord, in 4 vols. fol.

COUPLET, Philip, a Jesuit, of Malines, who went as missionary to China in 1659, and returned in 1680. He died on his second voyage to the same place, 1693. He wrote some works on the Chinese language and in Latin. His Confucius Sinarum philosophus, 1687, folio, is a valuable and curious work, in which the history of China, the manners and religion of the inhabitants, are ably treated.

COURAYER, Peter Francis, a French divine, born at Vernon, Normandy, 1681. While canon and librarian of St. Genevieve, Paris, he after some correspondence with archbishop Wake, published his "defence of English ordinations," printed in Holland, 1727. This book exposed him to the persecution of the catholics; so that he took refuge in England, where the university of Oxford granted him a doctor's degree, and the crown settled a pension upon him. He died in 1776, after two days' illness, at the age of 95, and was buried in the cloisters of Westminster abbey. He died in the faith of the catholic church, though at Ealing, where he sometimes resided, he attended the English service regularly, declaring he received great satisfaction in the prayers of the church. He wrote several things all in French. Those best known are Paul's history of the council of Trent, 2 vols. fol. dedicated to queen Caroline, who raised his pension from 100*l.* to 200*l.*—Sleidan's history of the reformation. After his death appeared his declaration of his last sentiments, &c.

COURCELLES Stephen de, a native of Geneva, divinity professor at Amsterdam, after Episcopius, whose works he published, with a life prefixed. He died 1658, aged 72, author of various divinity tracts, published by Daniel Elzevir, 1 vol. fol. 1675.

COURT DE GEBELIN, Anthony, a native of Nismes, for some time protestant minister at Lausanne, and afterwards superintendent of one of the museums of Paris. He wrote monde primitif, compared with the monde moderne, in 9 vols. 4to. a work of merit and great erudition. He wrote besides, the history of the war des Cevennes, 3 vols. 12mo. &c. He was a strong advocate for animal magnetism, which exposed him much to ridicule. He died at Paris 13th May, 1784, aged 39.

COURTANVAUX, Francis Cæsar marquis de, a French nobleman, who distinguished himself in the wars of Bohemia and Bavaria under his uncle, the duke of Noailles. He was also eminent as a philosopher and as an ingenious mechanic, and deserved by his valuable communications a place in the academy of sciences. He died 1781, aged 63.

COURTEN, William, son of a tailor at Meninx, in the Netherlands, escaped with difficulty from the tyranny and persecution of Olivarez duke of Alva, and in 1568 reached London, where he settled his family. Their business was the making of French hoods, which were in those days in great reputation, so that by industry, the Courten family increased their connexions and property, and at the death of the father and mother, which happened about the end of Elizabeth's reign, or the beginning of James I. they were opulent and respectable merchants in the trade of silk and fine linen. In the year 1631, their returns were averaged at 150,000*l.* a year; and so highly respected was the family, that William and Peter received the honour of knighthood. Under the active and able management of Sir William, the concerns of the company were greatly increased, so that not only the commerce of the nation was extended, but even the king's dignity supported, as it is said, that by their loans to James I. and to Charles I. the firm of Courten had a claim upon the crown of not less than 200,000*l.* The extensive concerns of this extraordinary family were, however, lessened by the intrigues of lord Carlisle, who seized, as a grant from the crown, the island of Barbadoes, where Sir William had settled a factory, as on a place which had been discovered by his own ships, and been protected at his own expense. His property likewise suffered some years after by the murder of his factors at Amboyna, in the Spice Islands, by the Dutch, and by the total loss of his property in that part of the world. Though thus persecuted by the frowns of fortune, he yet engaged with new ardour in the Chinese trade; but the loss of two ships richly laden completed his disasters, and reduced him to poverty. He survived not long this heavy loss. He died 1636, about the beginning of May, aged 64, and was buried in the church of St. Andrew Hubbard.

COURTEN, William, the last male descendant of the family just mentioned, was born in Fenchurch parish, London, 28th March, 1642. It is supposed that he lost his father and mother before he was fourteen years old; but though his father, in consequence of his insolvency, left the kingdom, in 1643, and never again saw his son, yet he was, it is imagined, carefully educated under the eye of those many rich, independent, and noble relatives which remained to him in England. He early began to travel, and displayed a great genius for natural history, which he much improved by a residence at Montpellier. In this delightful spot, so congenial to his studies, he cultivated the acquaintance of learned men, particularly of Tournefort and of sir Hans Sloane. When of age, he returned to London, to pursue his claims to the shattered wreck of the fortune of his family, and in improving his income, also to render more comfortable his sister, who had lived upon only thirty pounds a year. During his minority, a person of the name of George Carew had obtained letters of administration, and now he sued for the restitution of his property; but the arts of the usurper, who was a lawyer and a courtier, prevailed over the simplicity of the petitioner. Carew prevailed in his intrigues, and Courten not only gave up all claims to his paternal estates for an unknown compensation, which he acknowledged to receive, not de jure, but ex gratiâ, but he exchanged his family name, and, under the appellation of William Charleton, he retired from England to his favourite Montpellier. How long he staid on the continent is not exactly known. After his return to England he lived for fourteen or fifteen years in chambers at the Temple, and died at Kensington Gravel-pits, March 26, 1702, aged 63. The partiality which Mr. Courten showed to natural history was not employed in frivolous pursuits, or unavailing researches. He began early to make a collection of whatever was curious, important, and remarkable, in medallie and antiquarian history; and not less than 38 vols. in folio, and 8 in 4to. remain as proofs of his great industry and indefatigable attention. His curious collection, after being about fifty years in the possession of his executor and residuary legatee, was purchased in 1763 for the use of the public, and deposited in the British Museum. It is singular, that though to his industry and perseverance the nation is indebted for so valuable an acquisition, no mention was made of him as the first and most scientific collector. The sum paid by the public was 20,000*l.* which equals scarce the value of the coins and precious stones. Besides those learned friends already mentioned, Courten was intimate with the great Locke.

COURTENAY, John, an Irish writer, was originally a captain in the military service, and patronised by the first marquis Townsend, who appointed him his secretary, and surveyor of the ordnance. He also obtained a seat in parliament, and on the death of Mr. Pitt was made a commissioner of the treasury. This situation, however, he soon lost, and then retired from public life. He died in 1816, aged 75. His publications are—1. A Tract on the Duke of Richmond's Plan of fortifications, 8vo. 2. A Poetical Review of Dr. Johnson's Character, 8vo. 3. Reflections on the French Revolution. 4. Poetical Epistles on the Manners of France, Italy, &c. 8vo. W. B.

COURTILZ, Garien de sicur de Sandras, born at Paris 1614, where he died 6th May, 1712. He was in the army, and was some time in Holland, and on his return was confined in the Bastile for his political works, and remained there nine years. He was author of different works, the best known of which are his life of Coligni—the conduct of France since the peace of Nimeguen—history of the Dutch war—political testament of Colbert—the life of Turenne—annals of Paris and of the court in 1697-8.

COURTIVRON, Gaspard marquis de, a native of Dijon, who died 4th October, 1785, aged 70, known as a soldier and a scholar. He was wounded in the campaigns of Bavaria, while exerting himself to save the life of marshal Saxe; and he afterwards devoted himself to literature. He wrote a treatise on optics, 4to. 1752, and some other works.

COURTNEY, William, archbishop of Canterbury, was the fourth son of Hugh Courtney, earl of Devonshire, by Margaret, grand-daughter of Edward I. He was educated at Oxford, and though possessed of abilities, owed his elevation in the church to the consequence of his family. When 28, he was made bishop of Hereford, and afterwards translated to London, where he summoned before him the great Wickliffe, in St. Paul's cathedral, 1377. The bold reformer was on this occasion attended by his friends John of Gaunt and lord Percy, who, in supporting his tenets, treated the prelate with such asperity, that a tumult was excited among the citizens of London. Courtney was made chancellor 1381, and afterwards raised to the see of Canterbury. He was a violent persecutor of the Wickliffites, and condemned their tenets in a synod. He died at Maidstone 1396, aged 55.

COURTOIS, James, a native of Franche Compté, eminent as a painter, and called le Bourgnignon. He studied under his father, who was also a painter; and in the French campaigns of Italy he employed himself in delineating the battles in which he had been present. His merits were noticed and patronised by Guido and by Albano; and he afterwards settled at Florence, where he married a painter's daughter. The sudden death of his wife, of whom he was known to be very jealous, threw upon him the false accusation of having murdered her; in consequence of which calumny he entered into the order of the Jesuits. He died 1676, aged 55.

COURTOIS, William, a brother of the preceding, was the pupil of Peter de Cortona, and was patronised by Alexander VII. His pieces were much admired, especially his Battle of Joshua. He died 1673, aged 45, in consequence of taking improper quack medicines for the gout.

COUSIN, John, a French painter, born at Sucey, near Sens, well skilled in mathematics. He wrote on geometry and perspective, and chiefly excelled in painting on glass. Many beautiful specimens of his skill in painting exist in the churches of Sens and Paris, and especially in St. Gervase's church. For his eminence, he is called great. He was a favourite with four kings; Henry II. Francis II. Charles IX. and Henry III. He was living in 1689; but the time of his death is uncertain.

COUSIN, James Antony Joseph, a mathematician, was born at Paris in 1739. In 1766, he was appointed professor of natural philosophy in the college of France, which situation he filled thirty-two years with great reputation. In 1769, he became professor of mathematics in the military school; and in 1772, was admitted a member of the academy of sciences. In 1777, he published his lessons on the Calcul Differential et Calcul Integral, 2 vols. 12mo.; afterwards reprinted in 2 vols. 4to. In 1787, appeared his Introduction à l'Etude de l'Astronomie Physique, 8vo.; and in 1798, his Elemens d'Algebre, 8vo. He died in 1808.—W. B.

COUSTON, Nicholas, sculptor to the French king, was born at Lyons, and died at Paris 1st May, 1733, aged 75, member of the academies of painting and sculpture. He possessed great genius and a very delicate taste. His pieces adorn the palaces of Paris, Versailles, and Marly. His Commodus in the character of Hercules is particularly admired.

COUSTON, William, brother to the preceding, director of the academy of painting and sculpture, died at Paris 22d February, 1746, aged 69. He was distinguished as an able sculptor. He had a brother of the same name, who died at Paris, 1746, aged 68, whose works were the mausoleum of Dubois, and two groups of horses, at Marly.

COUSTON, William, son of the last mentioned, improved himself by studying the arts at Rome. He was rising into employment, and had just finished the mausoleum of the dauphin, deposited in the cathedral of Sens, when he died suddenly in July, 1777, aged 61. His other works are the apotheosis of Xavier—an Apollo—Venus and Mars, &c.

COUTHON, Georges, a native of Orsay, in Auvergne, who was brought up to the bar. At the revolution, he became member of the national assembly and of the convention, and there displayed the most ferocious and vindictive conduct. He lent all his powers to procure the destruction of the monarchy, and the disgrace and death of the king; and afterwards, as the friend and associate of Robespierre, he recommended the adoption of the most bloody and atrocious measures. In his zeal against crowned heads, he proclaimed death to tyrants, and peace to the cottage, and wished that kings might no longer have an earth to support, nor a sun to enlighten them. When sent as deputy to Lyons, he struck with a hammer the columns of the noblest edifices, exclaiming, "Down, ye monuments of pride, I condemn you to destruction." His savage conduct was so well known, that when once complaining of thirst, during a long debate in the convention, one of the members observed, he ought to have a cup full of blood. The fall of Robespierre, whose crimes he had shared, was his own. He was guillotined 28th July, 1794. Though of so ferocious a heart, the features of his countenance were mild and pleasing; but his body was deformed, so that the convention permitted him to sit while speaking.

COUVREUR, Adrienne le, a French actress, born at Fismes in Champagne, 1698. She first appeared in 1717, in the character of Electra, and was received with universal applause. Her best character was Phædra. She died 20th March, 1730. She was for some time mistress to marshal Saxe, whom, when reduced to distress in the acquisition of his dukedom of Courland, she assisted with a large sum of money raised upon her jewels.

COWARD, William, a medical writer, born at Winchester, and educated there at the college, and at Hart-hall, Oxford, from which he was removed to Wadham. In 1680 he was chosen fellow of Merton, and two years after he translated Dryden's Ab-salom and Ahithophel into Latin, which, however, did not much contribute to his fame, as it was surpassed by the rival translation of Atterbury. He took his medical degrees in 1685 and 87, and after settling at Northampton for some time, he removed to London 1694. But not more devoted to physical pursuits than literature, he soon drew the public attention to his publication, called Second Thoughts concerning the human Soul, in which, with great learning and metaphysical knowledge, he united sentiments, which were repugnant to the opinions of the best divines. Though he was a sincere believer in the gospel, yet his ideas about the immateriality and immortality of the soul, drew upon him the censure of the public, and he was ranked with Toland, Tindal, and Gildon, as an enemy of the Christian religion. This work as well as his other book, called the grand essay in defence of it, not only drew the attacks of several writers, such as Dr. Nichols, Broughton, and Turner, but the animadversions of the house of commons, who, on the 17th March, 1704, voted the books to be burned by the hands of the common hangman, as containing doctrines contrary to the church of England, and subversive to the Christian religion. Afterwards Dr. Coward applied himself to the pursuits of his profession, and published his tract called Ophthalmiatria, which appeared with the approbation of Sir Hans Sloane. From the persecution which attended his writings, it is supposed that Dr. Coward removed from London, as a hiatus occurs in his history, for about twelve years. His heroic poem on Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, whether skeptical or censorious, published about this time, was little attended to, and is now totally unknown. His licentia poetica discussed, appeared in 1709, but though introduced with the poetical flattery of Aaron Hill, of John Gay, and of Barklay, it possessed little merit, and found few admirers. In 1718 Dr. Coward is mentioned in the college of physicians' list, as residing at Ipswich, where it is supposed he died about 1725. Though his writings no longer engage attention, it must be acknowledged, that he was not devoid of learning, judgment, and abilities. Though skeptical in his religious opinions, he still was exemplary as a Christian, and a firm believer in the mercies offered to mankind by the gospel.

COWELL, John, an eminent civilian, born at Ernsborough, Devon, 1554, and educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge. He became fellow of his college, professor of civil law in the university, and master of Trinity-hall. His Interpreter, was published in 1607, in 4to. undertaken at the request of Bancroft the archbishop. This book displaying great and extensive knowledge, for some time remained uncensured, but at last, it was observed that the author had spoken with great freedom and severity of the common law, and of its professors, especially Littleton, and had "disputed too nicely on the mysteries of the monarchy," and asserted that the monarch might make laws, without the consent of parliament, and in consequence of this, the house of commons proceeded with great violence against him; but James, with becoming zeal, interposed his influence, and saved him from persecution. After this Cowell retired to Cambridge, where he underwent an operation for the stone, which proved fatal 11th Oct. 1611. He was buried in Trinity-hall chapel. He wrote besides Institutes of the laws of England—and a tract de regulis juris, which last was never published.

COWLEY, Abraham, an English poet, born in London, 1618. He was educated at Westminster school, and the accidental perusal of Spenser's works, so much roused his poetical genius, that he published his "poetical blossoms," before he was removed to the university. He entered at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he wrote some poems, and planned the design of those masculine pieces, which have immortalized his name. The loyalty of his sentiments, and the noble independence of his conduct, however, proved displeasing to the republicans of his college, and he was with some others ejected from the university, and came to St. John's college, Oxford, where he published his satire of the Puritan and Papist. His attachment to the royal cause, as well as his literary merits recommended him to the notice of the great; he was intimate with lord Falkland, and confidently engaged in the king's service. During the civil wars, he was settled in the duke of St. Alban's family, and was absent from England about 10 or 12 years, and during that time, performed some very dangerous journeys to Jersey, Scotland, Flanders, Holland, and other places, while he managed the correspondence between the king and his consort, and the various bodies of loyalists dispersed through the kingdom. In 1656, he ventured to come into England with great secrecy, but he was arrested, though by mistake, and was restored to liberty only by giving bail for 1000*l*. After Cromwell's death he returned to France, and at the restoration he determined to retire to solitude and learned ease. His intentions were favoured by the liberality of the duke of Buckingham and lord St. Albans, who gave him an estate, and the last eight years of his life were spent in that comfortable retirement, which he so much admired. He lived some time at Barn-Elms, but as the situation was not healthy, he removed to Chertsey, where, in consequence of exposing himself too long to the cold air, he was attacked by a violent defluxion and stoppage in his breast and throat, which by being at first disregarded, in a fortnight proved fatal. He died 28th July, 1667, aged 49, and was buried in Westminster abbey, near Chaucer and Spenser, and a monument was erected to his honour, by George, duke of Buckingham, 1675. Cowley took his doctor's degree in medicine at Oxford, 1657, and as it was under the republican government, some have doubted the sincerity of his attachment to the royal cause, but his object was not of a political nature. He wished to study medicine as a science, and for that purpose a degree was necessary. His books of plants were published in 1662, and as he had employed himself not only in anatomical dissection, but to the laborious consideration of simples, and the deep researches of botany, his works on those subjects, are the thoughts of a master. Besides the works already mentioned, he published a new edition of his poems, miscellanies—the Mistress—Pindaric odes—Davideis—the Cutter of Coleman-street, a comedy, &c. Besides poems, he wrote in prose, a proposition for the advancement of experimental philosophy—and a discourse on the government of Cromwell. Cowley is very respectable as a poet, and his verse, though sometimes uncouth and inelegant, does not want fire and majesty. He abounded, as Addison observed, above all others in genuine wit. Dr. Johnson places him at the head of metaphysical poets.

COWPER, William, born at Perth, was educated at Edinburgh, where he became professor of philosophy. Though originally a strict presbyterian, he renounced his sect, and embracing the doctrines of the church, was made bishop of Galloway, 1614. He died three years after, aged 53. He was an able divine. His works were printed in one vol. folio.

COWPER, William, D. D. youngest son of earl Cowper, was born in London, and educated at Trinity college, Cambridge. After possessing some small living, he was made dean of Durham, which he held till his death, 1772, in his 59th year. He wrote an able treatise on geometry, besides eight sermons, and an advice to a lady much esteemed.

COWPER, William, M. D. a physician of reputation at Chester, who died 20th Oct., 1767. He published some antiquarian treatises, and was preparing at the time of his death, a history of Chester.

COWPER, William, a celebrated English poet. He was the son of Dr. Cowper, chaplain to George II. and rector of Berkhamstead, Hertfordshire, where he was born, 1731. He lost his excellent mother when he was only six years old, and after learning the rudiments of language at Market-street, Hertfordshire, he removed to Westminster-school, where he continued till his 18th year. As the great nephew of chancellor Cowper, he was marked for eminence in the law, and after being for some time in the office of an attorney, he entered at the Inner-temple, and at the age of 31 he was appointed clerk in the house of lords. This honourable office his great timidity prevented him from accepting, and when afterwards nominated clerk of the journals, which seemed to require no personal attendance, his agitation of mind became excessive when called upon, at the bar of the house, on an unusual occasion, to perform the duties of his place, and he resigned under the greatest depression of spirits. Weakness of nerves, produced debility of body and of mind, but by the friendly attention of Dr. Cotton of St. Alban's, his melancholy terrors gradually subsided, and from a dejected gloom he rose to the purer use of his mental faculties and to the enjoyment of rational conversation, and the cheering and serene understanding of the hopes of revelation. In 1765, he settled at Huntingdon, and became the friend and the intimate of Mr. Unwin, a neighbouring clergyman, after whose unfortunate death, by a fall from his horse, in 1767, he retired to Olney, Bucks, with his widow, whom he regarded with all the affection of a mother. His time in retirement was spent, not only in devotion, but in literature, and he contributed sixty-eight hymns to the collection which his friend Mr. Newton, the curate of Olney, and an eloquent supporter of the doctrine of Calvin, gave to the world. In 1782, he appeared himself before the public by the publication of a volume of poems, and in 1785, the general voice of approbation was raised towards him on the appearance of his second volume. He afterwards engaged in a translation of Homer's Iliad and Odyssey in blank verse, and in the opinion of some judges the work, though inferior to the versification of Pope, possesses great merit, and presents to the English reader a more pleasing and perfect picture of the great original. In 1786, he removed with Mrs. Unwin to Weston, Northamptonshire, and afterwards turned his thoughts to a life of Milton, and to a complete edition of his poems, and after he had made some little progress he was introduced to Mr. Hayley, who had been engaged on the same subject, and thus arose an intercourse of friendship which continued to the last period of life. The poet had communicated so much pleasure and instruction to the world by the sweetness of his lines, and the pure precepts of morality and benevolence which every where captivate the reader, that the king honourably bestowed upon him a pension of 300*l.* per annum, in 1794; but the compliment, so flattering to a man of talents, and so becoming the sovereign of an enlightened nation, gave more satisfaction to his friends than to himself. The wretched poet was again sunk into dejection and religious melancholy, and few intervals of reason beamed upon the afflicted mind of this amiable man. For a while indeed he amused himself in the revision of his Homer, but again relapsed into that depression of spirits which robbed him of all the comforts and the serenity of a reflecting mind. He died 25th April, 1800, at Dereham, Norfolk, where a handsome monument in the church marks the spot where his remains were deposited. In exhibiting a story in poetical numbers Cowper possessed a peculiarly happy genius; his John Gilpin, which was related to him by his friend lady Austin, to amuse him in a tedious hour of melancholy, when converted into verse by his pen proved a most popular ballad, and has since continued to please and amuse the nation. In his manners, though reserved, he was pleasing, his conversation was cheerful, and Mrs. Unwin, lady Austin, lady Hesketh, and Mrs. Throgmorton and others, were not only honoured with marks of his friendship, but immortalized by the happy effusions of his delicate and sportive muse. The singular subjects of one of his best pieces was undertaken at the request of lady Austin, who called forth his powers of composition by bidding him write, on a sofa. The sofa must be regarded as a most valuable composition, and though in that and in his other larger poem, The Task, there is perhaps no well-digested plan or regular connexion, the whole must be considered as the effort of a great genius, assisted by the feelings of a truly humane, virtuous, and benevolent heart. An elegant and pleasing account of the life and writings of this extraordinary man has been published by his friend Mr. Hayley.

Cox, Richard, an English prelate, of mean parentage, born at Whaddon, Bucks, about 1500. He was educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow. He was invited by Wolsey, to form one of the chosen few, on his new foundation at Oxford, but after some time his open avowal of Luther's principles, rendered him obnoxious to the censures of the university, and he was stripped of his offices and imprisoned. Afterwards he was made master of Eton school, and by the favour of his patron and friend Cranmer, he was raised to the offices of archdeacon and prebendary of Ely and Lincoln, and of dean of Christ church. As tutor to king Edward VI. he became a great favourite at court, was made privy counsellor, and chancellor of the university of Oxford, canon of Windsor, and dean of Westminster. During the bloody reign of Mary he left England, and maintained on the continent his reputation for learning, and for adhering to the protestant faith. On Elizabeth's accession, he returned to England, and gained such popularity by his eloquence and zeal against popery, that he was raised to the see of Ely, over which he presided for 21 years. His opposition to the catholics, drew upon him the resentment of his enemies, and even the queen herself showed herself unfriendly to him. Exposed to the persecution of chancellor Hatton, who wished to strip him of all his ecclesiastical domains, he at last offered to resign his dignities, provided that 200*l.* per annum were allowed him, to support him in his retirement and solitude. None, however, could be found to succeed upon those disgraceful terms, and he held the bishopric till his death, 1581, in his 83d year. He was a great advocate for the marriage of the clergy, and he was the first who brought a wife to live in a college. He wrote several theological tracts, but he is chiefly known for the active part which he took in the compilation of the liturgy. The four gospels—the Acts of the apostles—and the epistle to the Romans, were also translated by him, in the share which he had in the Bible, now called the Bishops' Bible. He was also concerned in the compilation of Lily's grammar.

Cox, Sir Richard, chancellor of Ireland, was born at Brandon, county of Cork, 25th March, 1650. Though left an orphan under the age of three, he yet, under the protecting care of his grandfather and of his uncle, evinced great natural abilities. For three years he practised as an attorney, but coming to Gray's inn in 1671, he studied for the bar. In consequence of an early marriage, he had a large family, and the cares which they brought upon him, roused him from the obscurity where for seven years he had been lost as a farmer, and by the interest of sir Robert Southwell, he was elected recorder of Kinsale. He now practised with great success in the law, but removing from the convulsion which agitated the protestants, he came to Bristol, where, from his many avocations, he devoted himself to the completion of his history of Ireland. At the revolution he was made under secretary of state, afterwards recorder of Waterford, in 1690 second justice of the common pleas, and the next year governor of the county and city of Cork. In this singular character, uniting the office of judge with military duties, he behaved with great spirit and propriety, he was knighted in 1692, and the next year made chancellor of Ireland, and in 1706 created a baronet. On the accession of George I. he as well as some of the Irish judges, were removed from office, but while he hoped to spend the rest of his life in literary and independent retirement, he found himself exposed to the censures of the Irish parliament, who, however, never proceeded further against him. In April, 1733, he was seized with a fit of apoplexy, which ending in a palsy, carried him off the following 3d May, in his 84th year. He was esteemed not only as an able lawyer, and impartial historian, but as a humane and beneficent man. Besides his Hibernia-Anglicana in folio, he wrote an inquiry into religion, and the use of reason in reference to it, 8vo.—an address to those of the Roman communion in England, 12mo.

COX, Leonard, a grammarian, born at Monmouth, and educated at Cambridge. He was for some time, and with great reputation, master of Reading school, after which he travelled through France, Germany, Poland, and Hungary, where as a teacher of the learned languages, he acquired much fame. He died at Caerlton, Monmouthshire, 1549. He wrote some Greek and Latin treatises, besides a commentary on Lily's grammar.

COXETER, Thomas, born at Lechlade, Gloucestershire, Sept. 1639, entered at Trinity College, Oxford, from whence he removed to London, to study the law, but the death of his patron sir John Cook in 1710, overturned his hopes of high distinction. Left without any plan to pursue, he became the friend and companion of authors and booksellers, and began to make a curious collection of old plays. He proposed to write the biography of the old English poets, but did not proceed far in the work. He gave in 1739 a new edition of Baily's life of bishop Fisher, and circulated proposals for publishing ancient plays, a plan which was afterwards adopted by Dodsley. He was in 1737 secretary to a society for the encouragement of English history, under whose auspices Carte's history of England, first volume, appeared. He died April 19th, 1749, aged 59.

COXIS, Michael, a painter of Mechlin, who died 1592, aged 95. His imitations of Raphael are greatly admired, as well as his designs.

COYER, l'Abbé Gabriel Francis, a French writer, who was born at Baumelles Nones, Franche Comté, and died at Paris July 18th, 1782, in an advanced age. Originally a Jesuit, he abandoned the order, and lived by his pen. His works possess vivacity, ease, and wit. He wrote Bagatelles morales,—the history of John Sobieski, 3 vols. 12mo.—travels in Italy and Holland, 2 vols.—observations on England,—treatise on preaching, and on public education, besides a translation of Blackstone's commentaries.

COYPEL, Charles Anthony, a celebrated painter, who died at Paris, his native city, 1752, aged 58. He was painter to the duke of Orleans and to the king, and by his amiable manners and extensive endowments he deserved and enjoyed the friendship of the great. He was author of some theatrical pieces, which were performed in private theatres, and he also composed several dissertations on painting, and some academical lectures. He was very charitable, and for his many virtues was highly esteemed by the duke of Orleans. He erected a preparatory school at Paris for students before they went to Rome, and he also projected the exhibition of the pictures in the Luxemburg gallery. His father Anthony, who died in 1722, aged 61, was also an eminent artist, and painter to the king, and his grandfather Noel had been equally celebrated at Paris, and at Rome, where he was director of the French academy of painting. He died 1707, aged 79.—Noel Nicholas, the son of Noel, was also known not only as a painter of fine church pieces, but as an able professor in the academy. He died 1735, aged 43.

COYSEVOX, Anthony, a French sculptor, born at Lyons. He died 1720, aged 80, chancellor and regent of the academy of painting and sculpture. Versailles was embellished by the finest of his pieces. At Marly his Neptune and Amphitrite, and at the church of St. Eustachius the statue of Colbert, are likewise fine specimens of his great powers.

COYTIER, James, physician to Lewis XI. of France, is remarkable for the great ascendancy which he obtained over the superstition and timidity of that monarch, who seemed greatly terrified at the thought of death. This influence he artfully exerted to advance his interests and those of his family.

COZZA, Francesco, a painter, born at Palermo, in Sicily. He was pupil to Dominichino, and eminent in fresco and in oil painting, and employed himself in several of the great works which adorn Rome, where he died 1664.

CRAASBECK, Joseph Van, a painter, born at Brussels, 1608. He died 1668. He was pupil to Brouwer, and chiefly excelled in vulgar scenes, where he represented drunkenness and alehouse quarrels with great spirit.

CRAB, Roger, an English hermit, born in Buckinghamshire in the beginning of the 16th century. He left his occupation of hatter, and with a mind influenced by fanaticism and the love of singularity, he disposed of his property, and distributed it to the poor, and building a small hut at Ickman near Uxbridge, he lived there in great austerity. His reputation for sanctity and abstinence was such that he was visited by many respectable persons, who consulted him as a seer and prophet. He is said to have foretold the restoration, and the elevation of the house of Orange to the British throne.

CRABB, Habakkuk, an eminent dissenter, born at Wattisfield, Suffolk, and educated under Dashworth at Daventry. He officiated as minister at Stowmarket, and afterwards at Cirencester, and then joined his brother-in-law Fenner in the care of a school at Devizes. On the death of his friend the well-known Thomas Hanner, he was invited by his congregation, but his principles were not appreciated with that liberality which he expected in his native place; and as being accused of departing from the faith of the dissenters, he retired from his ministry to Royston, where the loss of his wife added to other disappointments, brought on a nervous fever which hurried him to his grave, two years after his wife, Dec. 25th, 1795. He left several manuscript sermons, some of which have been published. He was a respectable man, and for 45 years a very exemplary character, who while he dissented from the church, yet respected the opinions of his neighbours, and preached religion without disseminating faction.

CRADOCK, Samuel, rector of North Cadbury, Somersetshire, was ejected for nonconformity in 1662. He was a respectable man, and his principal works display considerable ability. He published the history of the Old and New Testament,—the apostolical history—the harmony of the four gospels, &c. He died Oct. 7th, 1706, aged 86.

CRADOCK, Luke, a painter of great natural genius. His birds were greatly admired, and rose in value to three or four times their original price, after his death. He worked generally for dealers, and refused to employ his pencil for the great, observing that they restrained his fancy. He died 1717, and was buried in St. Mary's, Whitechapel.

CRAIG, Nicholas, a learned Dane. He was born at Ripen in 1541, and was regent of the school at Copenhagen in 1576. He died 1602, aged 61. He was engaged by the king of Denmark in some important negotiations, which he fulfilled with great credit and satisfaction. He wrote a learned book on the republic of the Laedæmonians, reprinted at Leyden, 1670, 8vo. besides the annals of Denmark in six books, reprinted at Copenhagen in 1737, folio.

CRAIG, Sir Thomas, a learned Scotch lawyer, born at Edinburgh, 1548, where he died 1608. He acquired eminence at the bar. He is well known for his "Jus Feudale," a learned work universally admired. He wrote also a treatise on the sovereignty of Scotland, and in another work proved the legality of James's succession to the English crown.

CRAIG, James, a Scotch divine, born at Gifford, East Lothian, and educated at Edinburgh. He was much admired as a popular preacher. He died at Edinburgh 1744, aged 62. He published 3 vols. of sermons, chiefly on the heads of Christianity, besides 2 vols. of divine poems, much esteemed.

CRAIG, John, a Scotch mathematician, who became known by his "theologiæ Christianæ principia mathematica," in 36 pages, 4to. printed at London 1699, and reprinted at Leipsic 1755. In this small work he entertains curious reveries, and attempts to prove, by mathematical calculation, that the Christian religion will last only 1454 years from the date of his book. This work was refuted by the abbé Houteville, in his Christian religion proved by facts. He had also a dispute with J. Bernoulli on the quadrature of curved lines, and curvilinear figures, and also on an algebraic question, in which he acknowledged, very candidly, in the philosophical transactions, the fallacy of his own suppositions.

CRAIG, William, a Scotch divine, born at Glasgow, Feb. 1709, and educated at the university there. Early devoted to the pursuits of classical literature, and highly sensible of their beauty and simplicity, he with the approbation of his friends Clerk and Hutcheson, transfused their most striking passages, not only into his conversation, but his pulpit oratory, which was solemn, elegant, and correct. The popularity of his preaching recommended him to the notice of Mr. Lockhart, of Cambusnethan, who presented him to that parish. After refusing the honourable invitations of some other patrons, he at last removed to Glasgow, where, in the circle of his friends, and in the midst of an applauding audience at St. Andrew's church, he pursued his ministerial career with earnestness, animation, and success. Though some of his cotemporaries preferred to hear the abstruse tenets of speculative theology, and all its mysterious doctrines, enlarged upon in the pulpit, he applied himself to bring home to his hearers their duties, and the knowledge of their character, according to the precept and the example of the great Saviour. Mr. Craig was sensibly affected by the death of his wife, 1758, with whom he had lived happily 16 years, and though afterwards he married again, he never recovered his wonted spirits. The death of his second wife and of his eldest son increased his dejection, and he at last sunk gradually into the grave, 1783, aged 75.

CRACKANTHORP, Richard, was born at Strickland, Westmoreland, and educated at Queen's College, Oxford. He was an eloquent preacher, well acquainted with divinity, and much admired by the puritans. He went as chaplain to an embassy to the emperor, and afterwards was presented to the rectory of Braintree in Essex. He died in 1624, at his rectory of Black-Notley. His works are Justinian defended against Baronius—a defence of Constantine—a treatise on the 5th general council, &c.—five books of logic—a defence of the Anglican church, &c.

CRAIK, James, M.D. was a native of Scotland, and educated in that country for the medical service of the British army. He came to Virginia in early life, and accompanied Washington in his expedition against the French and Indians in 1754, and general Braddock in 1755. After the close of that war he continued his profession in Virginia till 1775, when he received an appointment in the medical department of the revolutionary army, and continued in the service till the conclusion of the war, greatly respected by the commander-in-chief, and by the army, for his talents and fidelity. After the war he settled near Mount Vernon, and was again appointed to a place in the medical staff in 1793. He was the physician of Washington's family, and attended him during his last illness. Dr. Craik died February 6th, 1814, in his 84th year. ☞ L.

CRAMER, John Frederic, a learned professor at Duisburg, resident for the king of Prussia at Amsterdam, died at the Hague, 1715. He was well skilled in civil law, languages, and medallic history. He translated Puffendorf's introduction to history, and wrote vindiciæ nominis Germanici contra Gallos, &c.

CRAMER, Gabriel, an able mathematician, born at Geneva, 1694. He was the pupil of John Bernouilli, and became known over Europe for his great skill in mathematics. He destroyed his health by excessive application, and died at the baths of Languedoc, in 1752. He published some works, besides an edition of the two Bernouilli's works, published 6 vols. 4to 1643.

CRAMER, Nicholas, a Flemish painter, who died 1710, aged 40. His pieces are much admired for taste and correctness.

CRAMER, Daniel, a native of Beltz, in Brandenburg, professor of eloquence at Wittemberg, and afterwards dean and consistorial professor at Stellen, where he died 1598, aged 30. He was an able divine, and wrote also on the logic and metaphysics of Aristotle—scholæ prophetiæ—arbor hereticæ consanguinitates, &c.

CRAMER, John James, a native of Elgg, professor of the Oriental languages at Zurich, and afterwards at Herborn, where he also filled the chair of divinity and ecclesiastical history. He wrote exercitationes de arâ exteriori secundi templi, 4to.—theologia Israelis, 4to.—and died 1702, aged 29. His brother, John Rodolphus, Hebrew and divinity professor at Zurich, and dean of the college of the canons, was author of some valuable works on Hebrew antiquities, dissertations, harangues, &c. He died at Zurich, 1737, aged 59.

CRAMER, John Andrew, a native of Quedlinburg, who first reduced the art of assaying in metallurgy into a system, and wrote on it elementa artis docimasticæ, Svo. 1739. He wrote besides, elements on metallurgy, 2 vols. folio—introduction to the care, &c. of forests, with a description of the method of burning charcoal, &c. 1766, fol. He died near Dresden, 1777, aged 67.

CRAMER, John Andrew, a German writer, who, after studying at Leipsic, and giving public lectures, and editing a weekly paper called the Guardian Spirit, removed 1754 to Copenhagen, as chaplain to the court. He was made professor of divinity 1765; but the disgrace of Struensee was fatal to his fortunes for a while, yet though dismissed, he was again recalled from Lubeck, where he had taken refuge, and he died divinity professor at Kiel, 1788, aged 65. He was not only an able divine, but a poet of considerable merit. Besides a spirited version of the psalms, odes, and other poems, he wrote the life of Gellert, sermons, miscellanies, &c. and translated the best part of Chrysostom into German, and Bossuet's universal history, with dissertations.

CRANE, Thomas, a nonconformist, born at Plymouth, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford. Cromwell gave him the living of Rumpesham, in Dorsetshire, from which he was ejected in 1662. He died 1714. He published a treatise on divine providence.

CRANFIELD, Edward, governor of New-Hampshire, was an Englishman, and received his commission 1682. He was unprincipled, and acted so deceitful and arbitrary a part that he was soon recalled. He was afterwards collector of Barbadoes. ☞ L.

CRANIUS, Luca, a painter of Bamberg, who died 1553, aged 83. His pieces, though once admired, are now no longer esteemed. His son imitated his manner of painting, and died 1586, aged 76.

CRANMER, Thomas, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Aslacton, Nottinghamshire, 1489. He was educated at Jesus college, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow. By his marriage he lost his fellowship, but recovered it in consequence of the early death of his wife in childhood, and he took his degree of D.D. in 1523. The freedom and ability with which he canvassed the king's marriage with his brother's widow, recommended him to the notice of the court, and Henry soon employed his abilities in defence of his views. Cranmer went to Rome with the book which he had written in support of the invalidity of the king's marriage, and offered to dispute, with any ecclesiastic whom the Roman pontiff might appoint, but the challenge was not accepted. He now continued in Germany as ambassador from the king, and married a second wife, a niece of Osiander, at Nuremberg. Upon the death of Warham he was raised to the vacant see of Canterbury, but without acknowledging the pope's supremacy; and two months after, May, 1533, he pronounced the divorce between Henry and queen Catharine of Arragon, and married the king to Anne Boleyn. Thus at war with the authority of the pope, he began earnestly to labour for the advancement of the reformation, by the translation of the Bible into English, and by inveighing against the vices and the usurpation of the court of Rome. In 1536 he divorced Henry from Anne Boleyn, but though seemingly the favourite of the king, he boldly opposed his measures for the confiscation of all the monasteries into the royal treasury, whilst he wished to convert those immense spoils for the advancement of literature and religion, by the appointment of readers of divinity of Greek and Hebrew in every cathedral in the kingdom. After the death of Cromwell he retired from public affairs, but his influence was such, that he procured the passing of laws for the promotion of true religion, and the modification of the six articles, which proved so obnoxious to the clergy. His enemies, however, were not silent in these times of popish intrigue and corruption, and the commons, as well as the privy council, severally reprobated his conduct, till Henry interposed, and saved him from further prosecution. At the king's death, he was one of the regents of the kingdom and executors of his will, and he crowned Edward VI. whose godfather he was. He now laboured assiduously in the reformation. The homilies were composed, and some by Cranmer himself; the six offensive articles were repealed, the communion was given in both kinds, the offices of the church were revised, the visitation of the clergy regularly enforced, and the book of common prayer was completed, and established by law. The elevation of Mary to the throne now threatened Cranmer with persecution. Though he originally opposed the views of lady Jane Grey, he now espoused her cause, and the successful queen, irritated at his conduct, and perhaps more at his consequence among the protestants, summoned him before the council, and soon after he was sent to the tower. He was attainted for high treason, Nov. 3d, 1553, and found guilty, but at his earnest solicitation, he was pardoned for the treason, and arraigned by his persecutors for heresy. He was removed in April, 1554, with Ridley and Latimer, to Oxford, to dispute and make his defence before popish commissioners; but on the refusal of himself and his venerable friends to subscribe to popery, they were condemned as heretics. In September, 1555, he was again arraigned in St. Mary's, Oxford, of blasphemy, perjury, incontinency, and heresy; and while they pretended to summon him to Rome, to make his defence within 80 days, they secretly determined his execution. Cranmer, though firm to his faith, yet yielded before the terrors of death, and in a moment of weakness and despair, he was prevailed to sign his recantation, and to re-embrace popery. But notwithstanding this concession, his enemies resolved to commit him to the flames, and when he was brought to St. Mary's church, in order to make a profession of his faith, he surprised his persecutors by an awful appeal to heaven and their consciences, and by a solemn renunciation of the tenets he had lately, in a moment of error, embraced, emphatically exclaiming, "that, that one thing alone wrung his heart, and that the hand which had falsely signed the dishonourable deed, should first perish in the flames." This manly conduct surprised and enraged his enemies; he was immediately dragged over against Baliol college, where, standing in his shirt, and without shoes, he was fastened to the stake. The fire was soon kindled, and the venerable martyr stretching his right hand into the flames, exclaimed, "this hand hath offended, this unworthy hand." His miseries were soon over, and his last words were, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." This happened 21st March, 1556, in his 67th year. Cranmer, as the great promoter of the reformation, is deservedly respected; but his learning, his perseverance, and his zeal, are not more remarkable than the integrity of his heart, the gentleness of his disposition, and the humane virtues of his character. He patronised learned men; under his protection, Bucer and Fagius settled at Cambridge, and Peter Martyr at Oxford, and John a Lasco, Ochinus, Tremellius, and others, were enabled to advance the interests of science and of religion. His works were chiefly on the religion and the controversies of the time, and besides 26 different publications, which are mentioned as written by him, there are some manuscripts preserved in the king's library purchased for 50*l.* besides those in the Cotton collection, and other private repositories.

CRANSTON, Samuel, governor of Rhode-Island, son of John Cranston, who was governor in 1679, was an impartial, good man, and held the office from 1698 to 1727, a period of 29 years. ☞ L.

CRAPONE, Adam, a native of Salon, known for the canal which still bears his name, which he formed between Arles and the Durance. He had projected the canal of Languedoc, which was afterwards finished by Lewis XIV. He was poisoned through envy at Nantes, in his 40th year, 1598.

CRASHAW, Richard, an English poet, born in London, and educated at the Charter-house, and Pembroke-hall, Cambridge. He was afterwards fellow of Peterhouse, but was ejected during the rebellion, for denying the covenant, and soon after was converted, or as Pope says, out-witted, to the catholic faith. He went to Paris in quest of preferment, but his distresses and poverty became very great, till the benevolence of Cowley not only relieved him, but recommended him to queen Henrietta. By her influence he went over to Italy, and was made secretary to an Italian cardinal, and soon after obtained a canoury in the church of Loretto, where he died 1650. He was an excellent scholar, well acquainted with Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Italian, and Spanish. He wrote Steps to the temple—the delights of the muses—carmen Deo nostro, &c. He is best known by the encomiums of Pope, who not only admired his poetry, but borrowed some passages from it. An edition of his works appeared 1785.

CRASSO, Lawrence, baron of Pianura, wrote a history of the Greek poets, 1678, commended by the Italians, but severely censured by the French. He also published the eulogiums of the literati of Venice, two vols. 4to. 1666.

CRASSUS, Lucius Licinius, a Roman orator, greatly commended by Cicero. He died about 92 B.C.

CRASSUS, Marcus Licinius, one of the triumvirs with J. Cæsar, and Pompey, was surnamed the rich. His wish to increase his opulence by the conquest of Parthia proved his ruin. He was defeated and killed in Syria B.C. 53.

CRATES, a philosopher, B.C. 328. He was disciple to Diogenes the cynic, and prided himself on his poverty, and the meanness of his behaviour.

CRATES, an academic philosopher of Athens B.C. 272.

CRATESIPOLIS, a queen of Sicyon, celebrated for her valour after the death of her husband*Alexander, B.C. 314.

CRATINUS, a poet of Athens, who wrote 21 plays, &c. He died B.C. 431, aged 97.

CRATIPPUS, an Athenian philosopher, best known as the instructor of Cicero's son.

CRATO, or de CRATHEIM, John, a native of Breslau, physician to the emperor Ferdinand I. Besides medical tracts, he wrote some poems; and as he was intimate with Luther, the little work called Luther's table-talk, has been extracted from his writings. He died 1585 at Breslau, aged 66.

CRAVEN, Charles, governor of South Carolina, succeeded colonel Gibbes in 1712.

He had previously been secretary to the proprietors for that colony. During his administration, it was twice involved in war with the Indians. In 1715 it was in danger of total destruction from them, acting at the instigation, and with the aid of the Spaniards. Governor Craven placed himself at the head of the militia, and by the judicious measures which he adopted, and the bravery of his troops, succeeded in driving them from the province. He returned to England in 1716, leaving Robert Daniel at the head of the administration.

CRAWFORD, David, a Scotch lawyer, born at Drumsoy, 1665. He was made historiographer of Scotland by queen Anne, and devoting himself to his favourite study of historical antiquities, he published memoirs of Scotland, during the times of the four regents—a peerage, in folio,—the history of the royal family of Stuart,—and a description of the county of Renfrew. He wrote besides the life of Guithery bishop of Dunkeld, and began the history of Scottish affairs. He died in his native place, 1726, aged 61.

CRAWFORD, William, a divine, born at Kelso, and educated at Edinburgh. In 1711 he opposed vigorously the settlement of ministers by presentations, in which he was supported by some of the clergy. He died 1742, aged 66. He wrote "dying thoughts," besides sermons, published 2 vols. 12mo.

CRAYER, Gaspar de, a painter, born at Antwerp in 1585. He studied under Raphael Coxis, whom he soon surpassed in the boldness of genius, and in the graceful exertion of his pencil. His portrait of cardinal Ferdinand, brother to the king of Spain, was so exquisitely finished a performance, that the monarch sent the artist a golden chain, and a medal, and settled a handsome pension upon him. He was greatly esteemed by Rubens and by Vandyck. Though he was indefatigable in his application, he lived to a great age, supported by constant temperance and regularity. Though he chiefly excelled in portrait painting, yet his historical pieces were much admired. His centurion alighting from his horse to prostrate himself at the feet of Christ, was seen with undisguised approbation by Rubens, and is admired as a masterly performance. He died 1669.

CREBILLON, Prosper Joliot de, a French tragedian, ranked next after Corneille and Racine, was born at Dijon, 1674. He originally studied the law, but the impetuosity of his passions thwarted the views of his friends, and at last he produced a tragedy which met with applause, and encouraged him in the career of a theatrical writer. He married, but in consequence of it, lost his father's protection, who disinherited him, though the cruel will was revoked on his death-bed. In 1711 Crebillon lost his wife, whose death he feelingly deplored, and he long continued, like most men of letters, exposed to distress and poverty, till a place in the French academy and the office of police censor rendered his circumstances affluent. He lived to a great age, highly respected and admired for his virtues, as well as literary abilities. He died 1762, aged 88. Being asked one day which of his productions he thought best; "I do not know," said he, "which is the best; but this (pointing to his son) is certainly my worst." His best plays are his Atreus, Electra, and Rhadamistus.

CREBILLON, Claude Prosper Joliot de, son of the preceding, was born at Paris, February 12th, 1707, and died there 12th April, 1777. He is known as a writer of novels, some of which are licentious and immoral. His works were collected in 11 vols. 12mo. 1779. Crebillon might be called the Pretonius of France, as his father was denominated the Æschylus. "The father," says D'Alembert, "paints in the blackest colours the crimes and wickedness of man, whilst the son draws with a delicate and just pencil the refinement, the shades, and even the graces of our vices." Crebillon was censor royal. Though he lived in friendly terms with his father, yet he highly displeased him for a little time by his marriage with an English woman.

CREDI, Lorenzo di, an Italian painter, born at Florence. He died 1530, aged 78. He studied under Verocchio, where da Vinci was a pupil with him.

CREECH, Thomas, an English poetical translator, born near Sherborne, Dorset, and educated at Sherborne, and Wadham college, Oxford. He distinguished himself by his classical learning, and his translation of Lucretius rendered him so respectable, that he was elected fellow of All-souls. In 1701 he was presented by his college to Welwyn rectory in Herts, but before he went to reside on his living, he put a period to his existence at Oxford. The causes of this unfortunate event are not known. Some say that the contemptuous treatment which he received from a woman, with whom he was in love, so stung him that he hanged himself in his study, where three days after he was found: but Jacob ascribes his death to the moroseness of his temper. Besides his Lucretius, he translated Horace in 1684, and turned the satires to our own times, observing that Rome was now rivalled in her vices, and that parallels for hypocrisy, profaneness, avarice, and the like, were easy to be found. His inferior works are translations of Theocritus, some of Ovid's epistles, the 13th satire of Juvenal, the lives of Solon, Pelopidas, and Cleo-menes, from Plutarch, and of Pelopidas, from Cornelius Nepos, &c. On his father's monument he is called the learned, much admired, and much envied Mr. Creech.

CRELL, Lewis Christian, a native of Neustadt, who studied at Leipsic, and there obtained the rectory of St. Nicholas's school, and the philosophy professorship. He wrote de civis innocentis in manus hostium ad nervum traditione—de Scythalâ Laconicâ—de providentiâ Dei in regibus constitutiendis, &c.—and died 1735, aged 64.

CRELLIUS, John, a Socinian, born near Nuremberg, 1590. As his opinions were not tolerated in his own country, he settled in Poland, 1612, where he became professor to the unitarians. He died at Racovia of an epidemic fever, in his 43d year. He was a man of very extensive learning. He wrote among other things several tracts upon the New Testament, and an answer to Grotius's book of satisfactione de Christi, against Socinus, which Grotius treated with respect, and acknowledged to be drawn up with moderation. His works form two vols. folio.

CREMONINI, Cæsar, an Italian philosopher, who was born at Cento in the Modenese, and died at Padua of the plague at the age of 80, 1630. He was professor at Ferrara and Padua, and he published several works in Italian on philosophy, in support of the doctrines of Aristotle, in which he maintained the materiality of the soul.

CRENIUS, Thomas, a native of Brandenburg, corrector of the press at Rotterdam and Leyden. He died at Leyden, 1728, aged 89. His writings, which are in Latin, are very numerous, and chiefly on philological subjects.

CREQUI, Charles de, prince de Foix, duke de Lesdiguières, was marshal and peer of France, and distinguished himself by his duel with don Philippin, bastard of Savoy, to whom in the first encounter he granted his life, but slew in the second. His valour was displayed against the Spaniards at the relief at Ast and Verrue, at the taking of Pignerol and the Maurienne, and at the battle of Thesin. He was killed by a cannon ball at the siege of Bremen, 1638, in his 60th year. He was also an able and eloquent negotiator, as these verses made on his death affirm:

*Qui fuit eloquii flumen, qui flumen in armis
Ad flumen, Martis, flumine, clarus obit.*

He married successively two daughters of the constable de Lesdiguières, by the first of whom only he had children.

CREQUI, Francis de, great grandson of the foregoing, was marshal of France, and a man of heroic courage. Though defeated in 1675 near Consarbrie on the Sarne, he flew to the relief of Treves, and chose rather to surrender at discretion than capitulate. In the campaigns of 1677 and 1678, he displayed prodigies of valour. He defeated the duke of Lorraine at Kochersberg, took Friburg, pursued his dispirited enemies toward Offenburg, and burnt the bridge of Strasburg. He took Luxemburg in 1684, and died three years after, February 4th, 1687, aged 63. He was commander of the galleys since 1661.

CRESCENS, a cynic philosopher, who attacked the Christians, and prevailed upon the people to put Justin to death, because he had refuted his opinions, in the second century.

CRESCEMBENI, John Maria, an Italian, born at Maurata in Ancona, 1663. He was founder of the celebrated Arcadian academy for the reformation of learning, taste, and criticism. He was its first director in 1690, and continued so till his death, 1728. He was eminent both as a poet and a prose writer. His chief works are, a valuable history of Italian poetry, reprinted, six vols. 4to. Venice, 1731—and a history of the academy of Arcadia, with anecdotes of its members, seven vols. 4to.—history of vulgar poetry, &c. seven vols. 4to.

CRESCENTIUS, Peter de, a native of Bologna in the 14th century, who, to avoid the troubles of his country, travelled for 30 years as a law practitioner. On his return he published his valuable work on agriculture, called opus ruralium commodorum, dedicated to Charles II. of Sicily. The best edition is Gesner's, Leipsic, 1735. It has been translated into various languages.

CRESPI, Daniel, a Bolognese painter who died 1630, aged 38. His portraits have great merit, and especially his church paintings.

CRESPI, Guiseppe Maria, a painter of Bologna, who died 1747, aged 82. His method of painting was in a darkened room, with a few rays from the sun or from the light of a flambeau, by which he gave greater vivacity to his subjects, and a more judicious distribution of light and shade.

CRESSY, Hugh Paulin, an English divine, born at Wakefield, Yorkshire, and educated there and at Oxford, where he became fellow of Merton college. He was chaplain to Thomas lord Wentworth, and afterwards to Lucius lord Falkland in Ireland, from whom he obtained the deanery of Laughlin, and a canonry of Windsor, which however he never enjoyed. After the death of Falkland he travelled with Bertie, afterwards lord Falmouth; but in Italy, listening to the persuasions of the catholics, he became a convert, and made a public profession of his faith at Rome, 1646. From Rome he came to Paris, and was taken under the protection of Queen Henrietta, and afterwards retired to the college of Douay, where he changed his name to Serenus de Cressey, and during seven years residence published several valuable and laborious works. At the restoration he came to England, and was chaplain to queen Catharine, and resided in Somerset-house, Strand. Though a catholic, he was however respected universally, as he never interfered with the intrigues and politics of the times. His pen indeed was frequently engaged in the defence of his faith, but whilst his friends considered him as their ablest champion, the protestants respected him as a learned, judicious, and candid writer. His attack on one of Stillingsfleet's works raised against him the censures of his old friend Clarendon, whom he answered with spirit but moderation. The unpopularity of popery at last induced him to spend the last period of his life away from the capital, and he retired to East Grinstead in Sussex, where he died soon after, 10th of August, 1674, aged 70. His mild, humane, and humble deportment had endeared him to all ranks of people. The most known and valuable of his works is his ecclesiastical history, of which only one volume was published, as the second, in which he meant to bring down the history to the dissolution of monasteries, was left incomplete at his death.

CRESTI, Dominico, a historical painter, the pupil of Zuccherò, known by the name of Passignano, from the place of his birth, near Florence. He died 1638, aged 80.

CRETIN, William du Bois, surnamed, a French poet, whose chief merit was puns, low wit, and equivoques. He was historian royal under Charles VIII., Lewis XII., and Francis I., and died in 1525. Marot admired him greatly; but the judgment of posterity is not so favourable. His works were reprinted in 12mo., 1724, at Paris.

CREVIER, John Baptiste Lewis, professor of rhetoric at Paris, is known as the pupil of Rollin, and the finisher of his Roman history. He published an edition of Livy, 6 vols. 12mo.—the history of the Roman emperors to Constantine, 12 vols. 12mo.—the history of the university of Paris, 7 vols. 12mo.—rhetorique Francoise, &c. He died 1765, in an advanced age, respected as a man of talents and of extensive knowledge.

CREW, Nathaniel, bishop of Durham, was born, Jan. 31, 1634, and succeeded to the title of lord Crew on the death of his brother. He was educated at Lincoln college, Oxford, was proctor of the university, 1663, afterwards clerk of the closet to Charles II., dean of Chichester, bishop of Oxford, 1671, and three years after translated to Durham. On the accession of James II. he was admitted of the privy council, and showed himself very friendly to all the measures of the court, in religion and politics. He paid particular respect to the pope's nuncio, when he came to London, and refused to introduce dean Patrick to the king, because he was too zealous against popery. The unpopularity of James's government, and the landing of the prince of Orange, however, made great alterations in the bishop's conduct. He withdrew from the king's councils, and, upon the abdication, he expressed a wish to resign his ecclesiastical dignities to Dr. Burnet, with an allowance of 1000*l.* for life. He afterwards left his retirement, and appeared in parliament; but his name was excepted from the act of indemnity of 1690. His pardon, however, at last was procured by the intercession of his friends, and he passed the remainder of his days in peace. He died September 12th, 1721, aged 88. Notwithstanding his adherence to the violent, illegal, and arbitrary measures of a corrupted court, he was a liberal patron, and his munificence in favour of the indigent, and of public bodies, is a convincing proof of the goodness of his heart.

CRICHTON, James, a Scotchman of the 16th century, whose adventures and personal endowments, have procured him the name of "the admirable Crichton." He was born in 1551, or according to lord Buchan, in 1560. His father was lord advocate of Scotland, and by his mother, who was a Stuart, he was descended from king Robert II. He was educated at Perth, and at the university of St. Andrews, where, under the tuition of professor Rutherford, he made such wonderful progress, that at the age of 20 he had run through the whole circle of science, and could write and speak to perfection 10 different languages. Thus gifted with mental endowments, and aided by all the advantages of a graceful person, elegant manners, and polite accomplishments, he travelled to Paris, where he publicly challenged the most renowned scholars, to dispute with him in any art or science which they pleased, and in 12 languages. On the appointed day he appeared at the college of Navarre, and from 9 in the morning till 6 in the evening, he so defeated his opponents, and astonished his auditors, that the president, in admiration, with four of the most eminent professors of the university, presented him with a diamond ring, and a purse of gold, as a token of their approbation. The next day, not exhausted by preceding exertions, he appeared at the Louvre, and exhibited such feats in tilting, that, in the presence of the princes of the court, he carried away the ring 15 times successively, and broke as many lances on the Saracens. At Rome he challenged the wits and the learned of that city, to propose any question to him, to which he would give an immediate answer, and in the presence of the pope, the cardinals, and great men of the place, he obtained in his defence as much eclat as he had received at Paris. Boccacini however asserts, that his challenge was received with pasquinades, and that he retired from Rome in disgust. From Rome he passed to Venice, where he introduced himself by an elaborate poem, to the notice and friendship of the learned Aldus Manutius. He gained also the friendship of Laurentius Mussa, Spero, Speronius, John Donatus, and other learned persons, and after he had been honoured with an audience from the doge and the senate, in which he astonished them by the rapidity of his eloquence, and the gracefulness of his manners, he visited Padua. At Padua he pronounced an extempore poem, on the beauties of the university, and after disputing for six hours, with the most celebrated professors, and refuting the doctrines of Aristotle, he concluded by delivering an oration in praise of ignorance, which excited universal applause. He further exposed the errors of Aristotle, in the presence of the university, and for three days astonished his hearers, supported his propositions, and obtained the praises and the acclamations of the most crowded audiences. At Mantua he displayed his bodily agility by attacking and killing a gladiator, who had foiled the most skillful fencers in Europe, and had lately slain three antagonists; and with great benevolence, this admirable Scotsman bestowed the reward he obtained for this exploit, upon the widows of the three persons who lately had lost their lives. The duke of Mantua was so pleased with him, that he appointed him tutor to his son Gonzaga, a youth of dissolute manners, and of an unprincipled heart. Crichton, to show his gratitude, and to support his fame, wrote in consequence of this, a comedy, in which he acted in 15 different characters, and all with inimitable success. In the midst of his popularity, while walking during the carnival, and playing upon his guitar in the streets of Mantua, he was suddenly attacked by six men in masks. Their number proved no defence against the superior dexterity of Crichton, they were all disarmed, and the leader falling on his knees, begged for life. It was Crichton's pupil, to whom the astonished master, recollecting his rank, immediately presented the sword, with every apology for the opposition which he had made. Instead of accepting the generosity, the perfidious prince buried the sword into his defenceless bosom. The cause of this brutal and cruel action in Gonzaga, is ascribed by some to jealousy, because Crichton was a greater favourite in the eyes of some admired lady: but others attribute it to a drunken frolic, leaving it undetermined whether the meeting was designed or accidental. This happened July, 1583, though lord Buchan fixes it on the preceding year, and asserts that he was then 22, though others with greater probability make him 32 years old. His death was universally lamented, the people of Mantua mourned for him three-fourths of a year, and his picture appeared in the chambers and houses of every Italian. To the character already mentioned, it may be added, that Crichton's memory was universally retentive, and he was naturally endowed with great powers for declamation, unexhausted fluency of speech, and unusual readiness to reply.

CRILLON, Lewis de Berthon de, a French General, knight of Malta, descended from a noble Italian family, was born 1541. At the age of 15 he merited the notice of Henry II. by his valour at the siege of Calais, and he distinguished himself afterwards against the Huguenots, at the battles of Dreux, Jarnac, and Moncontour. At the battle of Lepanto, in 1571, his valour was conspicuously displayed, as well as in the other encounters of these warlike and perilous times, so that he was deservedly called by Henry IV. the brave Crillon. At the peace of Vervins he retired to his estates at Avignon, where he died 2d December, 1615, aged 74. Bening, a Jesuit, pronounced his funeral oration in a bombastic style, and Madame de Lussou published his life in 2 vols. 12mo. Besides great and incomparable valour, Crillon possessed integrity, honour, and virtue, and when invited by Henry III. to murder Guise, he answered that he would fight him, but be no assassin.

CRILLON MAHON, N. duke de, distinguished himself in the seven years' war, and afterwards quitted the service of France for that of Spain, where he was made a grandee of the first order. In the war between England and Spain, he was placed at the head of the armies, and had the good fortune to take Minorca, in 1732, in consequence of which he assumed the name of Mahon, from the capital of the island. In his attempts to reduce Gibraltar he was more unfortunate, and saw the measures he adopted all baffled by the superior valour of the English, and the vigilant care of General Elliot. In the revolutionary war he would take no part in the cause of Spain, but remained neuter. He died at Madrid, 1796, aged 80.

CRINESIUS, Christopher, a native of Bohemia, professor of theology at Altorf, where he died, 1626, aged 42. He wrote a dissertation on the confusion of tongues, — Exercitationes Hebraicæ, — Lexicon Syriacum, 4to. 2 vols. — lingua Samaritica, &c.

CRINITUS, Petrus, a native of Florence, professor of belles lettres, after Angelus Politianus. He was a man of great learning, but addicted to the basest sensualities. He died 1505, aged 40. He wrote lives of the Latin poets, and de honestâ disciplina, besides poems of no great merit.

CRISP, Tobias, the champion of Antinomianism, was educated at Eton, and took his bachelor's degree at Cambridge, and afterwards removed to Baliol, Oxford, where he took his degrees of D.D. He was rector of Brinkworth, Wilts, in 1627, and there he lived in a hospitable manner, regular, virtuous, and devout. He came to London in 1642, where his tenets respecting grace opposed him in a controversy with 52 divines. He died 27th February, 1642. His sermons were reprinted 1689. He asserted in his discourse, "Christ alone exalted," that salvation was completed on the cross, and that belief was all that was required of the happy elect.

CRITIAS, one of the thirty tyrants appointed over Athens by Lysander. He fell in battle B. C. 400.

CRITO, one of the pupils and friends of the great Socrates.

CRITOBULUS, a physician, who is said to have extracted the arrow which wounded the eye of Philip of Macedonia.

CRITOLAUS, a Greek historian.

CRITOLAUS, a native of Tegea in Arcadia, who fought against the Pheneans. When defeated by the Romans he poisoned himself, B. C. 146.

CROESE, Gerard, a protestant divine of Amsterdam, author of the history of the quakers, translated into English, and of Homerus Hebraus. He died 1710, aged 68, near Dordrecht.

CRÆSUS, last king of Lydia, is famous for his opulence and his liberal patronage of learned men. He was defeated by Cyrus, king of Persia, B. C. 548, and reduced to privacy.

CROIUS or DE CROI, John, a native of Uzez, who became there a protestant minister. He wrote Specimen conjecturarum, and observationum in quædam Origenis, Irenæi, et Tertulliani loca, 1682, — observationes sacræ et histor. in Nov. Testam. 1644, &c. He died 1659.

CROFT, Herbert, an English prelate, descended from an ancient family, was born at Great Milton, Oxfordshire, 18th October, 1603, at the seat of sir William Greene. At 13 he was sent to Oxford, but upon the conversion of his father to popery, he was removed from the university, and placed in the monastery of Douay, and afterwards in the college of St. Omer's. A visit to England on family affairs introduced him to the acquaintance of Morton, bishop of Durham, who prevailed upon him to return to the protestant faith, and by the advice of Land, he again entered at Christ-church, Oxford, where he took his degrees. He was now preferred to a living in Gloucestershire, and to another in Oxfordshire, and in 1639, he was made prebendary of Salisbury, and the next year took his degree of D.D. He was afterwards prebendary of Worcester, canon of Windsor, and in 1644 dean of Hereford, but he suffered like all loyal subjects during those troublous times, till in 1659, by the death of his two elder brothers, he succeeded to all the estates of his family. At the restoration he was raised to the see of Hereford, 1661, which he refused to quit for higher preferment, employing himself in deeds of charity, benevolence, hospitality, and frequent exhortation from the pulpit. His small treatise "the naked truth," printed at a private press, was published in 1675, when the papists hoped to take advantage of the quarrels of the nonconformists with the church of England, and it became a popular work, which not only drew the attention of parliament to the subject, but produced some severe attacks against it. One of these by Dr. Turner of St. John's college, Cambridge, was answered by Andrew Marvell, who applauded the bishop's works, and ably defended his principles. Besides this, the bishop published some occasional sermons, religious tracts, a legacy to his diocese, and in 1685, animadversion on Burnet's theory of the earth. In the latter part of his life he wished to resign his bishopric from some scruples of conscience. He died at Hereford, 18th May, 1691, and was buried in the cathedral. His only son Herbert was made a baronet by Charles II. in 1671, and died 1720.

CROFT, William, a musician, born at Nether-Eatington, Warwickshire. He was pupil to Dr. Blow, whom he succeeded as master of the children, and composer to the chapel royal, and organist at Westminster abbey. In 1712 he published his divine harmony, and in 1715 he became D. Mus. and in 1724 he published by subscription his "musica sacra," two vols. He died August, 1727, aged 50, from an illness occasioned by his attendance at the coronation of George II. He was buried in Westminster abbey.

CROFTON, Zachary, an Irish nonconformist, educated at Dublin. During the Irish troubles he came to England, and obtained the living of Wrenbury in Cheshire, from which he was expelled in 1648, for refusing to take the engagement. He afterwards held St. Botolph's near Aldgate. At the restoration he engaged in a controversy with bishop Gauden, who combated the superiority of his learning by imprisoning him in the tower, from which he was with difficulty liberated. He afterwards lived in Cheshire, and lastly opened a school near Aldgate, where he died 1672. He was author of some controversial pamphlets.

CROIX DU MAINE, Francis Grude de la, a learned French writer in the 16th century. He was passionately fond of literature, and made a most valuable collection of books. He published, in 1584, his French library, or a general account of all authors who wrote in that language. The time of his death is unknown.

CROIX, Francis Petit de la, secretary and interpreter to the French king, in the Turkish and Arabic, died November 4th, 1695, aged 73. He was a man of great integrity, and refused to be bribed by the Algerines, to make a treaty with them favourable to their interests. He digested Thevenot's voyages to the East-Indies, he made an accurate catalogue of all the Turkish and Persian books in the French king's library, and composed besides two dictionaries for the French and Turkish languages, and also a learned history of Genghis Khan, with a good map of the north of Asia. His son added an abridgment of the lives of those authors from whom it was extracted, which was translated into English, 1722, in 8vo.

CROIX, John Baptiste de la, second Catholic bishop of Quebec, was a native of Grenoble, and first almoner of Louis XIV. He arrived in Canada in 1685, and died in 1727. He founded three hospitals, and distributed large sums in charity to the poor.  L.

CROMPTON, William, M.A. was born at Barnstaple, of which, after an Oxford education, he became minister. He was ejected after the restoration for nonconformity, but his manners were so inoffensive, and his conduct so virtuous, that he was respected by his congregation, among whom he still preached in private houses, till his death, 1696. He published a remedy against superstition, and other small tracts.

CROMWELL, Thomas, earl of Essex, an eminent statesman under Henry VIII. was son of a blacksmith at Putney, Surrey, and born about 1490. His education like his origin was low, but he possessed strong natural parts, which he improved by indefatigable application. He was at Antwerp for some time, as clerk to the English factory, and he afterwards travelled on the continent, as the private agent of the king, and in the character of a soldier, he was engaged with Bourbon in the sacking of Rome. On his return to England, he was admitted into Wolsey's family, and completely gained his confidence and friendship, which he repaid with the strongest attachment, and by a most able and eloquent defence of him in the house of commons, when he was impeached. After Wolsey's fall he served the king with equal fidelity, and was rewarded with honours and riches. He gradually rose to be a privy counsellor, chancellor of the exchequer, secretary of state, master of the rolls, keeper of the privy seal, earl of Essex, and high chamberlain of England. His zeal in the reformation was very pleasing to the king, and he not only directed his vengeance in the dissolution of the abbeys and monasteries, but largely shared in the spoils of the plundered church. In destroying the relics of popery, he was the means of introducing good regulations, and he provided that the Bible should be read in English, in the several churches, and also that a register of births, marriages, and burials should be regularly kept. The prosperity, however, which he had long enjoyed, was now all at once destroyed, by the active part which he took in procuring the marriage of his master with Anne of Cleves. Henry, dissatisfied with his new queen, wreaked his vengeance on his favourite, who had promoted his union, and Cromwell, unpopular for the dissolution of religious houses, and the large subsidies which he had extorted from the people, was now arrested, and arraigned as a traitor. Though forsaken by all his former friends, except the undaunted Cranmer, and unable to find one defender, for fear of the royal resentment, he yet pleaded for mercy in a letter to the king in such moving terms, that Henry read it three times, and probably would have pardoned him, had not his passion for Catharine Howard kindled his fury. Cromwell suffered on Tower-hill, after six weeks' imprisonment, July 16th, 1540. Though abused by the papists as cruel, ambitious, and crafty, he is represented as preferring men of learning and abilities, more than any of his predecessors ever had done. His son was created lord Cromwell.

CROMWELL, Oliver, the celebrated protector of England, was born of a very respectable family at Huntingdon, 25th April, 1599. He received his education in the grammar-school of his native town, and in 1616 was admitted as fellow commoner at Sidney college, Cambridge. He did not however here pay much attention to academical studies, as foot-ball, cricket, and other exercises, were more congenial to his pursuits, and therefore his mother, now become a widow, sent him in 1618 to Lincoln's Inn. Irregularities here prevailed, and licentious and intemperate pleasures engaged his attention more than the law, till at last when 21 he married Elizabeth the daughter of sir James Boucher, of Essex, and retired to lead a regular life at Huntingdon. Some time after he removed into the isle of Ely, where his uncle had left him an estate of 400*l.* a year, and then he relinquished the principles of the church of England, and became a zealous puritan.

He was elected into parliament in 1628, and distinguished himself by his violence against the bishops; but the warmth with which he supported ministers of his own persuasion soon reduced his fortunes, and obliged him to take a farm at St. Ives. For five years he endeavoured to improve his income in agricultural pursuits, but instead of increasing it, he nearly ruined himself, and in 1637 he formed the plan of passing over to New-England, which he was prevented from doing by a proclamation from the king, against migration. As he had acquired some distinction among the puritans for his gift of preaching, praying, and expounding, he had the interest by means of the people of his persuasion to recommend himself to the corporation of Cambridge, and to be chosen their representative in the parliament of 1640. In the house he was a frequent speaker, but, without art or elocution, he exclaimed warmly against grievances in church and state, and zealously promoted the remonstrance of November 1641, which laid the basis of civil war. Courted by the leading men of opposition, by his relation Hampden, by Pym, and others who knew his firmness and his devotion, he became well acquainted with the intrigues of the times, and when the parliament resolved in 1642 to levy war, he went to Cambridge, where he raised a troop of horse, of which he took the command. His severity to the royal members of the university, who contributed their plate to the service of the king, was very culpable; but his wish was to destroy every thing which tended to support the royal cause, and in this attempt he evinced such zeal and activity that in a few months he acquired the character of a good officer, and his soldiers were the best disciplined troops in the kingdom. After various proofs of his devotion to the republican party, Cromwell, who was now become a lieutenant general, had an opportunity of distinguishing himself at the battle of Marston-moor, 3d July, 1644, where his cavalry, called Ironsides, changed the fortune of the day, and ensured victory wherever they appeared. At the second battle of Newbury, his intrepidity again appeared conspicuous, his valour and services were regarded as so extraordinary, that he was called the saviour of the nation, and in the self-denying ordinance which was passed by the parliament, for the exclusion of officers from seats in the house, Cromwell alone was excepted. His successes continued to ensure the approbation of the republicans, and the fatal battle of Naseby, 14th June, 1646, established his triumph as the ablest general of the times, and the firmest supporter of the public liberties of the state. He was thanked by the parliament, and rewarded with a pension, but while the popular leaders considered him as fully devoted to their services, they soon saw cause to doubt his sincerity. When the king had thrown himself into the hands of the Scotch, and had been shamefully sold to the English, the parliament began to regard the army whose services had ensured them the victory as useless and dangerous, and therefore ordered part of it to be disbanded, but Cromwell by his intrigues prevented the execution of their plans, and whilst he stepped forth as the advocate of their rights against the tyranny of the parliament, he secured fully to his person the attachment of the soldiers. No sooner was the king lodged in Holmby Castle than the artful general made himself master of his person by means of Cornet Joyce, and thus, by declaring himself the arbiter of his fate, he was courted and flattered, both by the unfortunate Charles, who wished for his own release, and by the parliament, who laboured for his destruction. After rendering the king more unpopular with the parliament, and the parliament suspected to the army, Cromwell at last took the bold measure of excluding from the house of commons those members whom he knew to be averse to his schemes of ambition, and the trial of the devoted monarch soon after followed. Cromwell acted openly as one of his judges, and he signed the warrant for his execution, and by this bloody deed thus paved the way to his own greatness. The government was now placed in the hands of a council of state, whose decisions were directed by the artful general; but while he considered himself as secure, his power was threatened by rebellion in the army, and even in his own favourite regiment. With his usual presence of mind he appeared among the rioters, supported by some regiments on whom he could depend, and calling four men by name, out of the ranks, he made them cast dice for their life, and obliged the two that escaped to shoot the others. Having thus restored tranquillity, he was received every where with marks of respect, and satisfied that the spirit of insubordination was subdued in England and Scotland, he embarked with an army for Ireland, 1649. He quickly here routed the enemies of the republic, and with such acts of inhumanity that his very name became a terror to the Irish. In 1650, he returned to London, and was publicly thanked for his services by the submissive commons, who invested him with the chief command of the army in Scotland, where Charles II. had been acknowledged king. He marched to the north with his usual rapidity, and on the 3d September, 1650, he defeated the Scotch army in a dreadful battle, at Dunbar, and the next year, on the same auspicious day, he completed the ruin of Charles's fortunes by the crowning victory, as he said, at Worcester. His success was regarded as so important that a general thanksgiving was appointed, and the third of September declared an anniversary state holyday. In the midst of these public honours Cromwell never lost sight of his ambitious projects. Though commander-in-chief of the whole island, and lord lieutenant of Ireland, he found that his power depended on the will of the parliament, and therefore he determined to dismiss them. Whilst the commons and the council of the officers were distracted by opposite opinions on subjects of government, Cromwell forwarded secretly his own views, and all at once rising up in his seat in the house, he bade the speaker leave the chair, and the whole body be gone and give place to honest men; and filling the room with armed soldiers he turned the whole assembly out, and locking up the doors, he retired to Whitehall. The dismissal of the parliament was followed by that of the council of state, and the appointment of a body of officers, subordinate to the usurper's authority. Though he permitted a mock assembly to be called, under the name of council of state, he was soon after displeased with their conduct, and by the voice of his general officers, he assumed the title of protector of the commonwealth of England, and was invested with the new office, 16th Dec., 1653, in the chancery court, Westminster-hall. Thus absolute in the government, he appointed a council of state, consisting of men of superior wisdom and sagacity, and adopted such measures as could give stability to his power, and add to the security and independence of the kingdom. Peace was made with Sweden, Holland, Portugal, and France, the most upright judges filled the courts of Westminster-hall, and liberty of conscience was tolerated with the most magnanimous moderation. Notwithstanding the popularity of his measures, however, he met with opposition from the people, and the parliament, which he assembled with great solemnity, presumed to dispute the legality of his office, and were dismissed with a severe reprimand. In 1655, though threatened with conspiracies, he supported with a vigorous hand the honour of the nation. Blake conquered Jamaica, and humbled the native powers on the Mediterranean shores, who had plundered the British commerce, and a treaty of offensive alliance was formed with France against the Spaniards in the Netherlands, and Dunkirk was taken possession of by the English. The expenses of government were, however, such, that the protector called another parliament, 19th Sept., 1656, but to ensure their obedience, he obliged them at the door of the house to swear allegiance to his person. This had due effect, the members awed into deference for his power, not only voted him supplies, but decreed new statutes for the security of his authority, and bestowed upon him the title of king, which by the advice of his friends and relations, and much against his inclination, he declined. He, however, assumed the power of creating peers, and again, to give greater dignity to his authority, he was in 1657, a second time inaugurated protector in Westminster-hall, with all the pride and pomp of a coronation. At the end of a year his fears were alarmed by the publication of "killing no murder," a pamphlet by colonel Titus, which directed against him the dagger of every bold assassin, and in 1658 he felt not a little disappointment at the conduct of his parliament, which he addressed as composed of lords and commons, in the usual language of the kings of England, though none of the ancient nobility condescended to appear among them. These open insults, together with the secret machinations of his enemies and the general odium of the people, was increased by the death of his favourite daughter Mrs. Claypole, who on her death-bed bitterly reproached him with the tyranny of his conduct. The severe agitations of his mind at last undermined the powers of his constitution, and his deportment became altered, he grew reserved and suspicious, and the attacks of a slow fever were succeeded by a tertian ague. Though the disorder seemed at first not alarming, his physicians perceived his danger, but regardless of their intimations, he depended upon the prayers of the godly for recovery, and hoped that the interference of heaven would be exerted for his preservation. His disorder proved fatal, 3d September, 1658. He was carried with great funeral pomp from Somerset-house, and buried in the chapel of Henry VII. in Westminster-abbey, but after the restoration his body was taken up and hung on the gallows. Though a usurper and a tyrant, Cromwell possessed great powers of mind, and contributed much to the prosperity and glory of the nation. Not only Milton defended his government, but Waller, Sprat, Dryden, and Cowley, celebrated his virtues and the triumph of his protectorate. How blame-worthy soever he might have been in the acquisition of his power, observes one of his biographers, he certainly rivalled the greatest of the English monarchs in glory, and made himself courted and dreaded by the nations around him. In his religious opinions he was a wavering fanatic, and though grave and demure he had the hypocrisy to adopt such tenets only as tended best to secure his usurpation. Of all his children, only six lived to maturity: Richard his successor, who held the protectorate with feeble hands, and resigned it for a life of ease and obscurity, was born 4th October, 1626, and died at Cheshunt, July 13th, 1712: Henry, born 20th January, 1627, was lieutenant of Ireland, and died 25th March, 1674: Bridget, who married Ireton, and afterwards general Fleetwood: Elizabeth, his favourite daughter, who married Mr. Claypole, of Northamptonshire: Mary, who married lord Fauconberg, and is supposed to have interested herself warmly for the restoration of Charles II. and died March, 1712: and Frances, the youngest, who married Mr. Rich, grandson to lord Warwick, and afterwards Sir John Russel of Chippenham, Cambridgeshire. His mother lived with him at Whitehall, but in the midst of the splendours of absolute authority she enjoyed it not, and was filled with terror for the fate of her son, whom she never considered safe, except she saw him twice a day. His wife was a woman of masculine powers of mind, and she gloried in the elevation to which her husband's guilty ambition, spurred on by her constant exhortations, had raised her family. She survived for some years the downfall of his power, and of that of her son, and died in retirement, 1672.

CRONECK, John Frederic baron de, born at Anspach, died of the smallpox, 1758, aged 27. He distinguished himself as a sensible and ingenious poet. He travelled over Europe, and at Paris gained the friendship of the learned and the great. His works were printed in German, at Leipsic, 1760.

CRONSTEDT, Axel Frederic, a native of Sudermania, in Sweden, educated at Upsal, where he applied himself to natural history. He was employed as inspector of the mines, 1744, and in 1753, was elected member of the Royal academy of sciences at Stockholm. He published various works on the arrangement of minerals, and the fossil productions of nature. He died, 1765, aged 43.

CROOK, Sir George, was born at Chilton, Bucks, and educated at Oxford, and the Inner-temple. He rose to the offices of king's serjeant, justice of the common pleas, and chief justice of England. In the commons, he voted against ship-money. He died at Waterstock, Oxfordshire, 1641, aged 82. He founded and endowed a hospital at Beachley, in Buckinghamshire, where also he built a chapel.

CROSBY, Brass, lord mayor of London, was born at Stockton-upon-Tees, in 1725, and early came to London, where he practised as an attorney. He purchased the place of remembrancer to the city, in 1760, which he sold again the next year, and in 1764, he was elected sheriff, the next year alderman, and in 1770, lord mayor. In this high office he distinguished himself by his opposition to the court in the prosecution of Wheble and other printers; and he spiritedly supported Wilkes and Oliver, for which he was sent to the Tower. During his confinement, his conduct was applauded by the city, and various addresses came to him from some counties and respectable towns. He was released, 23d July, by the prorogation of parliament, and conducted to the mansion-house in great pomp by the populace, and honoured, at the expiration of his office, by the thanks of the corporation, and the vote of a cup of 100*l.* value. He died 14th February, 1793.

CROSS, Michael, an English artist, who was employed by Charles I. to copy the best pictures of Italy. It is said, that being permitted by the doge of Venice to copy the Madonna of Raphael, in St. Mark's church, he left his copy behind, and brought away the original, which, in the time of the republic, was sold to the Spanish ambassador, and now adorns the Escurial.

CROSS, Lewis, a painter, who died 1724. He retouched a picture of Mary, queen of Scots, in the possession of the duke of Hamilton, and with such effect, that several copies have been taken from it.

CROUSAZ, John Peter de, a mathematician of eminence, born at Lausanne, 13th April, 1663. He was intended for the army by his father; but his inclinations were bent to literature; and the perusal of Des Cartes's works totally directed his attention to mathematics and philosophy. After travelling over Europe, he was elected professor, and, in 1706, made rector of the academy of Lausanne, and, in 1724, mathematical professor at Groningen. He was afterwards preceptor to Frederic of Hesse Cassel, nephew to the king of Sweden, and, after being engaged in some embassies, he returned to Lausanne, where he died, 1748, aged 85. He wrote essay on logic, afterwards enlarged to 6 vols. 8vo.—a treatise on beauty, 2 vols. 12mo.—on the liberty of thinking—on ancient and modern pyrrhonism, folio—sermons—commentary on Pope's essay on man—miscellaneous works—and pieces on philosophy and mathematics.

CROWNE, John, a native of Nova Scotia, who came over to England, eager to acquire fame and independence by the powers of his mind. His distresses at first were so great, that he became upper servant in an old lady's family, from which he soon extricated himself by the wit and humour of his writings. He became a favourite with the court, and was employed by Charles II. at the request of Rochester, to write the masque of Calypso. Upon the discovery of the popish plot, he embraced the part of the Tories, and wrote his "city politics," to satirise the Whigs, a comedy, which, while it procured him applause, excited against him the resentment of a powerful faction. Anxious now to retire from the intrigues and persecutions of politics, he petitioned the king for a place for life; to which Charles assented, provided he wrote another comedy. Even the king himself assisted him, by recommending him to borrow from the Spanish comedy of "non pued esser;" from which was produced the play of Sir Courtly Nice; but on the last day of rehearsal, before the comedy could be acted, the king died, and all the hopes of the poet were dashed to the ground. Instead of independence, Crowne now had recourse to his wit for maintenance. He died about 1703, author of 17 plays, besides the "church scuffle," a heroic poem, and two other poems, Pandion and Amphigenia, and the Dæneids.

CROXALL, Dr. Samuel, was born at Walton-upon-Thames, Surrey, and educated at Eton school, and St. John's college, Cambridge. At the university he wrote the fair Circassian, which he dedicated to Mrs. Anna Maria Mordaunt, of whom it is said he was deeply enamoured, but as the poem was a licentious imitation of Solomon's Songs, he carefully avoided disclosing himself to be the author, before he applied for ordination. He obtained the living of Hampton, Middlesex, the parishes of St. Mary, Somerset, and Mountshaw, London, and became chancellor, prebendary and canon of Hereford, and afterwards added the archdeaconry of Salop and the living of Sellek to his other preferments. As the church of Hereford was governed by him during the old age of Bishop Egerton, he very improperly pulled down an old chapel adjoining the palace, to build a house for his brother. His politics inclined to the Whigs, and hence in queen Anne's reign he wrote in their support, and published his two cantos in imitation of Spenser, to satirise Harley's administration. He wrote besides "the Vision," a poem addressed to Lord Halifax,—the fables of Æsop,—scripture politics,—the royal manual,—and all the dedications prefixed to "Select Novels." He died at a great age, February 13, 1752.

CROZE, Mathurin Veyssiere la, born at Nantes, 1661, became a Benedictine monk in 1678, and distinguished himself by his extensive learning. A bold and independent mode of thinking, added to disgust and disappointment, induced him to abandon his order and his religion in 1696. He made his recantation at Basil, and employed himself in Berlin as an instructor of youth, as librarian to the king, and as professor of philosophy. He died 1739, aged 78. He wrote some valuable works, dissertations historiques, &c.—an Armenian dictionary, 4to. compiled after twelve

CRUCIGER, Gaspar, a protestant of Leipzig, author of some commentaries on Scripture. He died at Wittemberg, 1548, aged 45.

CRUDEN, Alexander, M.A. was born at Aberdeen, and educated at the Marischal college there. He settled in London in 1728, and kept a bookseller's shop under the royal exchange; but maintained himself chiefly by superintending publications for the press. In 1737, his Concordance was published, and it again appeared improved in 1761, as a most valuable book. Cruden was occasionally deranged. About the year 1738 he went on a romantic view to reform the English universities, and was soon after confined at Chelsea. He was a second time in confinement in a mad-house, and was at last found dead, in a praying posture, at Islington, 1774, aged 70. He was a worthy, pious, and inoffensive man.

CRUSIUS, or KRANS, Martin, a native of Bamberg, professor of belles lettres at Tübingen, and the first who taught Greek in Germany, died at Estringen 1607, aged 81. He is the learned compiler of Turco-Græciæ, libri octo, 1584—annales Suevici ad ann. 1549—Germano-Græciæ, libri sex, 1585, fol.

CRUZ, Juana Inez de la, an ingenious lady, born at Mexico. She was naturally endowed with great powers of mind, which were carefully cultivated, and rendered her well skilled in philosophy, history, mathematics, poetry, and every branch of literature. The poems which she published possessed great merit, according to the opinion of father Feyjod. The best part of her life was spent in the seclusion of the monastery of St. Geronimo, where she died, after 27 years' residence, aged 44, in 1695.

CRYPTOPYLUS, Metrophanes, a Greek, who studied the Latin and English languages at Baliol college, Oxford, and returned in 1622 to his own country, where the patriarch of Constantinople made him his secretary and chancellor. He was raised to the see of Alexandria on the translation of Cyril Lucar. The confession of faith attributed to Cyril, and published in Greek, 1629, was written by him. He died after 1641.

CTESIAS, a Greek physician in the service of Artaxerxes, king of Persia. He wrote a history of Persia.

CTESIBIUS, a mathematician of Alexandria, B. C. 125, known as the inventor of the pump, the water-clock, &c.

CTESIPHON, an Athenian, whose attempt to decree a golden crown to Demosthenes, was opposed by Æschines, and produced the two famous orations of the rival orators de coronâ.

CUDWORTH, Ralph, a celebrated divine, born 1617, at Aller, Somersetshire, where his father was rector. He was of Emanuel college, of which he became fellow and tutor, and where he had among his pupils sir William Temple. In 1641 he was presented to the rectory of North Cadbury, Somersetshire, and the following year he published his "discourse concerning the true notion of the Lord's supper," and afterwards his treatise, "the union of Christ and the church, a shadow." In 1644, he took his degree of B.D. and was that year appointed master of Clare-hall, and the year after regius professor of Hebrew. In 1647, he preached before the house of commons, for which he received the thanks of the house. In 1651, he took his degree of D.D. and 3 years after was elected master of Christ's college, at which time he also married. He was, in 1657, one of those who were consulted by parliament about the English translation of the Bible, and by his learning and consequence he gained the friendship of Whitelocke, and of Thurloe, the able secretary of the two protectorates. At the restoration, Cudworth wrote a copy of congratulatory verses to the sovereign, and, in 1672, he was presented by Sheldon, bishop of London, to the vicarage of Ashwell, Hertfordshire. In 1678, he was installed prebendary of Gloucester, and he then published in folio his famous work "the true intellectual system of the universe, wherein the reason and philosophy of atheism are confuted, and its impossibility demonstrated." This work, from its nature and importance, had many assailants; but it is acknowledged by Dryden, Bayle, and Shaftesbury, that he was so fair and moderate in his principles that he almost betrayed the cause which he meant to defend. A warm dispute was raised in consequence between him and le Clerc. The work was translated into Latin in 1733, by the learned Mosheim, and the original was republished in 1743, in 2 vols. 4to. by Dr. Birch, with great additions, and with an accurate statement of all the quotations, and a life of the author by the editor. Cudworth died at Cambridge 26th June, 1688, and was buried in Christ college chapel. Of his posthumous works, which were a continuation of his intellectual system, one was published by Chandler, bishop of Durham, 1731, called "a treatise concerning eternal and immutable morality," intended chiefly against Hobbes, and others. His other MSS. were on moral good and evil—a book of morality with Hobbes's philosophy explained—discourse on liberty and necessity—de libero arbitrio—on Daniel's prophecy of the 70 weeks—of the verity of the Christian religion, against the Jews —Hebrew learning, &c. Cudworth was a man of extensive erudition, well skilled in the languages, an able philosopher, an acute mathematician, and a profound metaphysician. Though he embraced the corpuseular philosophy, and considered Plato as a guide with respect to the Deity, he was a deservedly esteemed for his virtues, his piety, his moderation, and humanity. His only daughter, Damaris, married sir Francis Masham, and was distinguished as much for her learning and genius as for all the amiable virtues of her sex.

CUERENHERT, Theodore Van, a singular character, born at Amsterdam 1522. He was a man of science, and had a turn for poetry; but he chiefly maintained himself at first by engraving, in which he displayed skill and genius, though he was too hasty and volatile in his execution. He settled at Haerlem, and was honourably employed several times as ambassador to the prince of Orange. Such, at last, were his extraordinary ideas about religion, that he asserted no one could officiate as a minister without a supernatural mission, and that it was unworthy a Christian to enter a place of public worship. These wild ideas, in the indulgence of which he would hold no communication with papists or protestants, procured his banishment from the country. He died at Tergont, 1590, aged 68. His works were published 3 vols. folio, 1630. As an artist, he worked with the Galles, and had Henry Goltzius for his pupil.

CUEVA, Alfonsus de la, known by the name of Bedmar, was ambassador from Philip III. to the Venetian republic. In this sacred character he plotted the seizing of the city; but when the conspiracy was discovered, and the conspirators put to death by drowning, the author of the horrible scheme, out of respect to the Spanish king, was secretly dismissed by the senate to avoid the fury of the populace. Cueva fled to Flanders, where he became president of the council, and received a cardinal's hat. In consequence of the severity of his government he retired from Flanders to Rome, where he died, 1665. He was a man of astonishing powers of mind, great political sagacity, an acute judge of the manners and prejudices of mankind, composed in the most violent and popular agitations, and such a master of the knowledge of the human passions, that his conjectures about futurity seem almost prophetic. Some attribute to him a treatise against the republic of Venice, though Veller is supposed to be the author.

CUFF, Henry, a celebrated wit, unfortunate for his connexion with Essex, was born at Hinton St. George, Somersetshire, 1560. He was educated at Trinity college, Oxford, where he became fellow; but a joke upon the well-known humorous dishonesty of its founder drew upon him the resentment of the president, and he was ejected from the society. His merit, however, was so universally known, that he was admitted at Merton, and two years after, 1588, was elected one of its fellows. He was afterwards Greek professor and proctor of the university; and then travelled abroad to improve himself for some active scene of life. His many qualifications, and the interest of his friends, recommended him at last to the earl of Essex, whose secretary and confidant he became. This proved a most fatal engagement. When Essex was condemned, he accused Cuff as being the author of his misfortunes, and Sir Henry Neville confirmed afterwards the accusation, in consequence of which the wretched secretary, perhaps no otherwise guilty than as the tool of a bold and ambitious favourite, was arraigned, and, though he defended himself with great animation, he was condemned, and executed at Tyburn, 30th March, 1601. He was a man of great learning and genius, and though his memory has been censured by Bacon, Wotton, and even by his friend Camden, he had some amiable qualities. He wrote a curious philosophical piece, which appeared 1607, called the differences of the ages of man's life, together with the original causes, progress, and end thereof, 8vo.

CUGNIERES, Peter de, an upright magistrate, advocate of the parliament of Paris in 1329, who supported the rights of Philip Valois against the clergy.

CUJACIUS, James, an eminent lawyer, born at Toulouse 1520. He was of mean origin; but the greatness of his genius compensated for his obscurity, and by his indefatigable industry, without the assistance of a master, he made himself perfect in the knowledge of Greek and Latin literature, and particularly in civil law. He was meanly refused the professor's chair in his native town; but his abilities attracted pupils from every country; and to his superior talents in education, France owed the ablest and the most expert of her lawyers and magistrates. He settled at Cahors, and afterwards at Bourges, which he would not quit, though honoured by the king of France, and invited to Turin by the duke of Savoy, and to Bologna by pope Gregory XIII. He was so kind to his pupils, and so communicative and familiar, that he was called the father of his scholars. He died at Bourges 1590. His works were published at Paris, 10 vols. fol. 1659, by Fabrot.

CULLEN, William, the celebrated physician, was born in Lanerkshire, and served his time with a surgeon and apothecary at Glasgow, and then went as surgeon on a vessel from London to the West Indies. On his return he settled at Shotts, and afterwards at Hamilton, where an accidental introduction to the duke of Hamilton laid the foundation of his advancement. By the advice of his patron he removed to Glasgow, where he obtained an appointment in the university. It was about this time that he had formed an intimacy and partnership with William Hunter, afterwards equally celebrated. In 1740, Cullen took his degree of M.D. and in 1746, he was appointed lecturer in chymistry at Glasgow, and in 1751, was nominated king's professor of medicine. His practice was now very extensive, and his reputation as a lecturer proved by the increasing number of his pupils. In 1756, he was invited by the university of Edinburgh to the vacant chair of chymistry, and in this new office he displayed such powers, and such knowledge, that an opposition was raised against him by those who envied his fame, and could not rival his abilities. His character, however, became more respectable from opposition; the mildness of his manners recommended him not less than his professional knowledge; and so well established was his merit, that he was made professor of medicine by the magistrates of Edinburgh, on the death of Dr. Alston, in 1763. He published the lectures which he delivered, in consequence of the appearance of a surreptitious copy. He at last resigned his office to Dr. Black, in consequence of his growing infirmities, though he afterwards joined Dr. Gregory as candidate for giving lectures on the practice of physic. These illustrious coadjutors lectured alternately till the death of Dr. Gregory, and then Dr. Cullen succeeded to the care of all the pupils, which he continued to do till within a few months of his death. He died 11th October, 1790. He married Miss Johnston, the daughter of a clergyman, by whom he had a numerous family. She died 1786. His other works were, lines of physic, 4 vols. 8vo.—synopsis nosologiæ methodicæ, 2 vols. 8vo.—a treatise on the recovery of drowned persons, &c. 8vo.

CULLUM, Sir John, was born 21st June, 1733, and educated at Bury-school and Catharine-hall, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He died at Hardwicke-house, 9th October, 1785, rector of Great Thurlow, Suffolk, and member of the royal and antiquarian societies. He published the history and antiquities of Hawsted, Suffolk.

CULMER, Richard, a violent fanatic, educated at Magdalen college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree. He was expelled from the living of Goodneston, in Kent, for refusing to read the book of sports, and then became lecturer at Canterbury, and was afterwards employed by the parliament in breaking down and defacing images, pictures, &c. from all places of worship. In his indiscriminating zeal, he demolished the beautiful painted window of Canterbury cathedral, of which he gave an account; and for his meritorious services in the cause of republicanism he was promoted to the vacant living of Minster in Kent, from which he was ejected at the restoration. He was a most abusive and litigious character, and from his fondness for fighting, he was called the blue-skin Dick.

CULPEPER, Nicholas, son of a clergyman of that name, after a few years spent at Cambridge, was bound to an apothecary. He engaged himself deeply in the study of astrology, of which he became professor. He died in Spitalfields, 1654. He wrote several books, the best known of which is his "herbal," in which he describes the good and bad qualities of plants, as if by casting their nativities.

CULPEPER, Thomas, lord, son of Sir John, baron of Culpeper, of England, arrived in Virginia, as lieutenant and governor general in 1679. Sir H. Chicherley had previously been at the head of the administration, and succeeded him on his return to England. In 1684, lord Howard was appointed governor. Lord Culpeper brought with him an act of indemnity for all offences committed during the late rebellion, which contributed much to recommend him to the people. This was manifested by the assembly in making a large addition to his salary, and consenting to the establishment of a regular duty for supplying his table, contrary to the custom which had previously prevailed. He was one of the persons to whom a grant was made in 1649, of the territory between the Potomack and the Rappahannock. In 1669, he purchased the rights of his associates, and in 1673, obtained from the crown a lease of the quit rents of the whole for thirty-one years. He died in 1719, leaving no male heirs, but a daughter married to lord Fairfax, to whom the title of the estate descended.

CUMBERLAND, Richard, a learned prelate, son of a citizen of London, where he was born July 15, 1632. He was educated at St. Paul's school, and Magdalen college, Cambridge, where he became fellow. He took his degree of M.A. 1656, and two years after, he was presented to Brampton rectory, Northamptonshire. He was drawn from his solitude, in which he diligently discharged all the pastoral duties, by the elevation of his friend Orlando Bridgman to the seals, 1667, from whom he received the living of All-hallows, Stamford. He published in 1672, his work de legibus naturæ disquisitio philosophica, &c. which has been translated into English by Tyrrel and by Maxwell. This performance greatly raised his reputation for science and for knowledge; and he was further distinguished for the exercises which he performed when he took his degree of D.D. in 1680. In 1686, he published his essay on Jewish measures and weights, a work of great merit, and full of accurate calculation. In 1691, he was raised to the see of Peterborough by William, without solicitation or interest, but merely from the eminence of his learning, his exemplary manners, and his strong attachment to the protestant faith. In his episcopal duties he was indefatigably vigilant, observing to his friends who dissuaded him from exertions which might injure his health, "that he would fulfil his duties as long as he could, and that a man had better wear out than rust out." Some part of his time, however, was devoted to literature, he was a sound mathematician, well acquainted with oriental learning, and perfectly informed in all the branches of science and philosophy. In his pursuits to discover the true causes of idolatry, he paid great attention to the shattered Phœnician history of Sanchoniathon; but though great labour was bestowed on the subject, and a book prepared for the press, his bookseller objected, on account of the times, to the publication, which was deferred till after his death, when his son-in-law, Mr. Payne, gave to the world, in 1720, his Sanchoniathon's Phœnician history, from Eusebius' præpar. evangel. &c. and in 1724, his second work, his origines gentium antiquissimæ. The bishop lived to a good old age, and to the last retained the great powers of his mind. He died October 9, 1718, in his 87th year, in consequence of a violent attack of the palsy, which proved immediately fatal. He was buried in his own cathedral.

CUMBERLAND, William, duke of, second son of George II. was born 1721. He was at the battle of Dettingen with his father, and distinguished himself so much, that at the battle of Fontenoy, he might have ensured a most glorious victory, had he been ably supported by the Dutch troops. His next services were the defeat of the pretender at the battle of Culloden, 1746, for which he was highly applauded by the parliament and by the nation. In 1747, he lost the battle of Val, by the hesitating assistance of the Dutch. He died 1765.

CUMBERLAND, Henry Frederic, duke of, son of Frederic, prince of Wales, was created duke in 1766, and in 1771, married Ann Horton, daughter of lord Carhampton, and widow of Mr. Horton. This union was the cause of the royal marriage act. He was grand master of the freemasons, and died September 1790, aged 45.

CUMBERLAND, Richard, a dramatic and miscellaneous writer, was born Feb. 19, 1732. He was educated at Bury-school, and next at Westminster till he was fourteen, when he became a student of Trinity college, where, in 1750, he obtained his bachelor's degree, and two years afterwards, he passed his examination for a fellowship. About this time, he became private secretary to lord Halifax, with whom he went to Ireland, when that nobleman was appointed to the viceroyship. On his return to England, he obtained the place of clerk of reports in the office of trade and plantations; and afterwards was appointed secretary to that board. In 1780, he went on a mission to Lisbon and Madrid, but was recalled the year following, having, as was said, exceeded his powers. He was also deprived of his situation at the board of trade, and from this time his circumstances were much contracted. He now retired to Tunbridge Wells, where he lost his wife; upon which he removed to London, and died there May 7, 1811. Mr. Cumberland's talents were considerable, and his vanity not much less, which exposed him to the attacks of some satirists, particularly Sheridan, who drew his portrait in the character of "Sir Fretful Plagiary." His chief merit was as a dramatist, and the best of his numerous plays are the "West Indian," the "Jew," and "The Wheel of Fortune." Of his poetical performances none are likely to be long remembered, except "Calvary." His novels of "Arundel;" "Henry," and "John De Lancaster," possess merit, and his "Observer," a series of miscellaneous papers, which holds a distinguished rank among the British classics. Besides these works, he published many fugitive pieces and tracts; "Anecdotes of Spanish Painters," in 2 vols., and the Memoirs of His own Life, from which this is extracted.—W. B.

CUMING, William, an eminent physician, born at Edinburgh, 1714, and educated at the high school and university of that city. After residing some time at Paris and Leyden, he came to London, from whence he removed to Dorchester. In this situation, from which he refused to retire for the more extensive practice of London, he soon gained universal reputation, and recommended himself to his patients as well by the gentleness of his manners and his probity, as by his learning and his skilful management of diseases. Though he did not commit any thing to the press, he was particularly attentive to assist his friends, among whom Mr. Hutchins, the historian of Dorsetshire, has paid very handsome and deserved compliments to his abilities and kind assiduity. Dr. Cuming was afflicted with great weakness in his eyes, which, though it lessened, did not damp, his pursuits after knowledge. He was fellow of the London and Edinburgh societies of antiquarians, and he was also fellow of the college of physicians. He died of a dropsy, 25th March, 1788, aged 74.

CUNÆUS, Peter, a learned lawyer, professor at Leyden, was born at Flushing, 1586. He was educated for the church; but the rancour of the theological disputes of the times disgusted him, and he applied himself to belles lettres and to the law. He was a man of great learning, and deservedly commended by Vossius, Casaubon, Scaliger, and others. He died 1638. He wrote, among other valuable works, de republicâ Hebræorum—satira Menippæâ, in sui sæculi homines inepte eruditos—remarks on Nonnius' Dionysiaca—a translation of Julian's Cæsars, &c.

CUNEGONDE, daughter of Sigefroi count of Luxembourg, married the emperor Henry II. by whom she had no children. Some historians accuse her of incontinence, while others regard her as ill treated by her husband, after whose death, in 1024, she retired to a monastery.

CUNITIA, Maria, a learned lady in the 17th century, born in Silesia. She possessed a perfect knowledge of ancient and modern languages, but particularly excelled in mathematics and astronomy, on which she wrote some ingenious treatises, especially her Urania propitia, in 1650, in Latin and German, dedicated to the emperor Ferdinand III. This work contains astronomical tables, calculated on Kepler's hypothesis, and displays her powers as a scholar and mathematician to have been very great and most respectable. She married a physician, Elias de Lewin, and died at Pistehen 1664, much regretted as a person of science, and highly beloved as a woman of an amiable character.

CUNNINGHAM, William, a physician, who, as bishop Tanner informs us, resided in Coleman-street, London. He lived at Norwich about 1559; but, in 1563, was a public lecturer in Surgeon's hall, London. He was a man of great learning as an astronomer and physician, and was equally eminent as an ingenious engraver on copper.

CUNNINGHAM, Alexander, a Scotch historian, born at Etrick, near Selkirk, in 1654. He was educated in Holland, where no doubt he imbibed all the principles of government then fashionable, and where he became acquainted with the fugitive lords Sutherland and Argyle. He came over with William at the revolution, and maintained an intimacy with the most popular members of government. He was for many years employed as travelling tutor to lord Hyndford and his brother William, and afterwards to lord Lorne, and viscount Lonsdale; and during his visits to the courts on the continent, he had the means of making important observations on the manners and politics of various countries, which he communicated in confidence to the king and to his ministers. To this may be attributed the vast information which he manifests in his writings, and the great military knowledge which he displays, and which he derived from the friendship of his pupil lord Lorne, afterwards so famous as John duke of Argyle. At the accession of George I. Cunningham, by the partiality of his friends, Argyle, Sunderland, and Walpole, was sent as envoy to the Venetian republic, where he resided five years, till 1720. He afterwards lived in studious retirement, respected as a politician and as a man of letters. From an inscription in St. Martin's church over an Alexander Cunningham, supposed to be his, he died 15th May, 1737, in the 83d year of his age. His history of Great Britain, from the revolution to the accession of George I. appeared in 2 vols. 4to. 1787, translated into English from the Latin manuscript, by Dr. W. Thomson. The work had passed into the hands of Dr. Hollingberry, and was recommended, from its valuable contents, for publication, by lord Hardwicke, and Dr. Douglas bishop of Salisbury. It is indeed a work of merit, and it relates the particulars of an important period with accuracy, spirit, and impartiality; though, in the drawing of some characters, especially that of Burnet, the author shows himself prejudiced and uncandid. To our author some have likewise attributed the celebrated criticisms on Horace, 2 vols. 8vo, 1721, and those posthumous remarks on Virgil published 1742; but by those who have examined the matter with great care and nicety, the matter is left doubtful. It appears, indeed, that the historian and the critic were both of the same name, both Scotch, both lived in the same times, both educated in Holland, both eminent for their skill in the game of chess, both employed as travelling tutors, and both attained to an advanced age. The coincidence is so remarkable, that the character should be considered as belonging solely to the Venetian envoy, whose learning was adequate to the most refined criticism, and the deepest observations on ancient times and manners.

CUNNINGHAM, John, son of a wine-merchant in Dublin, displayed early evidences of poetical genius. At 17 he wrote his "love in a mist, or the lass of spirit;" from which Garrick drew the prominent features of his "lying varlet." He was for several years of his life engaged as a strolling player, in the north of England and in Scotland. He settled at last in Newcastle-upon-Tyne, a place to which he was very partial, and where he died 18th September, 1773, aged 42.

CUNY, Lewis Anthony, a Jesuit of Lancaster, who died 1755. He is known by three funeral orations, on the dauphin of France, the queen of Poland, and cardinal Rohan.

CUPANO, Francis, a Sicilian ecclesiastic, who published, 1667, a catalogue of the plants of Sicily, and also a valuable history of the island.

CUPERUS, Gisbert, professor of history and burgomaster of Daventer, was born at Hemmen, in Gueldres, 1644. He died at Daventer 1716. He wrote observations criticae et chronologicae 3 vols. 4to.—apothecosis Homeri, 4to.—history of the three Gordians—a collection of letters.

CUREUS, Joachim, a German physician, born in Silesia. He improved himself greatly by travelling, and died 1573, aged 41. He wrote in Latin, the annals of Silesia and Breslau, in folio.

CURCELLÆUS, Stephen, an eminent divine, born at Geneva, died at Amsterdam 1658, aged 72. After residing some time in France, he settled at Amsterdam, where he was followed by the Arminians, and where he succeeded Episcopius as divinity professor. He was an able critic and a great linguist, and wrote several theological tracts. He published a new edition of the Greek Testament, with various readings, and with a copious dissertation, in which he properly observes, that none of the readings affect in the least degree the articles of faith. Polemburg, the successor of Curcellæus in the professor's chair, has prefixed an account of his life to the folio edition of his works.

CURIO, an orator of Rome, who called Cæsar the man of all the women and the woman of all the men. His son was also eminent as an orator and as the friend of Cæsar.

CURIO, Cœlius Secundus, was born at San Chirico, in Piedmont. His abjuration of the Romish religion, for the tenets of Luther exposed him to the persecution of the catholics, and he was seized and confined in the prison of Turin by the bishop. He however escaped from his enemies, and fled to Salo and Pavia; but the influence of the pope still persecuted him over Italy, till he took refuge at Lausanne in Switzerland, where he became principal of the college. He afterwards removed to Basil, where for twenty-two years, till his death, 1569, at the age of 67, he continued respectably to fill the chair of eloquence and belles lettres. His work, "de amplitudine beati regni Dei," 1550, in 8vo. is a curious composition. He wrote besides, "opuscula," 8vo.—letters—Calvinus judaisans, &c.

CURIUS, Dentatus Marcus Annii, a Roman consul, distinguished in the wars against Pyrrus. He preferred poverty to riches, and rejected with disdain the offers of the Samnites, who solicited him with large bribes, about B. C. 272.

CURL, Edmund, a bookseller, whose name has obtained immortality in Pope's Dunciad. He was born in the west of England, and, from low beginnings, kept a shop in the neighbourhood of Covent garden, where the books he published were generally enlarged by wretched notes, forged letters, and bad plates. He lost his ears for publishing "the nun in her smock," and other licentious pieces. He died 1748.

CUROPALATE, John, an officer in the household of the Greek emperor of that name. He wrote a Greek history from the time of Michael Curopalate to the reign of Alexius, from 813 to 1051. This work has been most shamefully pillaged by Cedrenus, who wrote an abridged history from the beginning of the world to the reign of Isaac Comnenus. Syncellus, Theophanes, and others, have also borrowed from him.

CURRADI, Francesco, an Italian painter, who died 1660, aged 90. He was very correct in his historical pieces, and had a perfect knowledge of the chiaro-obscuro.

CURRIE, James, an eminent physician. He was born, 1756, at Kirkpatrick-Fleming, Dumfriesshire, and, after receiving a proper education at Dumfries school, he was sent to Virginia in a commercial capacity. The intricacies of commercial business, however, had no attraction for him, and he returned with eagerness to study medicine at Edinburgh, where, after three years residence, he took his degree of M. D. He settled at Liverpool, and acquired deserved celebrity, not only from his practice, but the candour and benevolence of his heart, his classical taste, and his general information. He afterwards removed to Bath, on account of ill health, and died at Sidmouth, Devonshire, 31st August, 1805. Dr. Currie was well known as the author of a letter, commercial and political, to Mr. Pitt, published under the assumed name of Jasper Wilson, 1793, which passed through several editions, and attracted much of the public attention from its own merits, and from the answers which were made to it. Besides his medical reports on the effects of water, cold and warm, as a remedy in febrile diseases, 8vo. 1797, with an additional volume 1804, he wrote some valuable papers in the Manchester transactions, the collections of the London medical society, and the philosophical transactions. He also edited Burns's poems in 1800, with a pleasing account of the poet's life, and a learned criticism on his writings.

CURSON, or CORCEONE, Robert, an Eng-glishman, who studied at Oxford and Paris. He became chancellor of Paris university, and was made a cardinal by Innocent III. in 1212. He was active in preaching the Crusades, and died at Damietta 1218. He wrote on the question whether Origen be saved or not. The work is now lost.

CURTIUS, Martius, a Roman, who is said to have sacrificed his life for the good of his country, by leaping into a gulf, which could close only when Rome had thrown into it whatever she held most precious, about 362 B. C.

CURTIUS, Quint. Rufus, a Roman historian, whose life of Alexander the Great, in 10 books, is much admired. The age in which he lived is not accurately ascertained, though some place him in the reign of Trajan.

CURTIUS, Michael Conrad, professor of history and rhetoric at Marburg, was born in 1724 at Techentin in the dutchy of Mecklenburg. He studied at Rostock, after which he became a private tutor in different families of distinction, till 1759, when he was appointed professor of logic and metaphysics in the academy of Luneburg, from whence in 1767 he removed to Marburg, where in 1795 he became principal of the faculty of philosophy, and twice had the office of pro-rector of the university. He died in 1802. He published—1. "Commentarii de Senatu Romano, sub imperatoribus." 2. A translation of Columella on agriculture. And some other works.—W. B.

CUSA, Nicholas de, a cardinal, born at Cusa, of mean parentage. His great merit, and his extensive knowledge of law and of divinity, recommended him to the notice of pope Nicholas V. who made him a cardinal 1448, and bishop of Brixia two years after. He was sent by the pope to Germany as legate, in 1451, to preach the crusades against the Turks, in which he was unsuccessful. He died at Todi, in Umbria, 1464, aged 63. His works, which were numerous and valuable, were collected and printed in three vols. Basil, 1565. They contain, besides controversial and metaphysical tracts, some geographical and astronomical pieces, and Cribratio alcorani, a treatise intended against the spreading of Mahomet's doctrines after the fall of Constantinople.

CUSHING, William, LL.D. judge of the supreme court of the United States, was the son of the honourable John Cushing, and was born at Scituate, Massachusetts, in March, 1723. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1751, and studied law under the direction of the celebrated Jeremy Gridley, and practised with great reputation. He held the office of judge of probate, previous to the death of his father in 1772, when he was appointed to succeed him as a judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts. He was remarkable for the secrecy of his opinions, and by that means kept up his reputation with both the court and republican party, during all their contentions. He was strongly attached to the cause of liberty during the revolution, and was vice president of the convention of Massachusetts, which ratified the federal constitution, and presided during a great part of the session. In 1789 he was appointed an associate judge of the supreme court of the United States, in which office he continued until his death. His long life was spent in the public service, and was marked by great industry and integrity, for which he was more distinguished than for brilliancy of talents. He was remarkable for great simplicity and purity of manners. He died at the place of his nativity, September 13th, 1810.  L.

CUSHING, Thomas, LL.D. lieutenant governor of Massachusetts, was born at Boston in 1725, and graduated at Harvard in 1744. He was for a number of years one of the leaders of the popular party in the state, and a speaker of the house of representatives. In 1774 he was elected to a seat in congress; and on the establishment of the constitution, chosen lieutenant governor of the state, and continued in the office till his death in 1789. He was a man of talents, a patriot, a friend of learning, and a Christian.  L.

CUSHING, Nathan, a member of the council of Massachusetts, and judge of the supreme court of the state, was graduated at Harvard college in 1763. He resigned the office of judge in 1800, and died at Scituate, November 2d, 1812, aged 70.

CUSPINIAN, John, a German, who was born at Sweinfurt, and died at Vienna 1529, aged 56. He was physician to the emperor Maximilian I. by whom he was employed in some important negotiations. He wrote a learned Latin history of the Roman emperors from Julius Cæsar to the death of Maximilian I.—a history of Austria—a history of the Turks, and of their cruelty towards the Christians.

CUSSAY, N. governor of Angers, is known for his noble reply to the duke of Guise, who had ordered the protestants of Anjou to be massacred on the fatal day of St. Bartholomew. "Tell the king," answered he, "that my fellow-citizens are brave and loyal, but not assassins."

CUSTINES, Adam Philippe count de, was born at Metz, 4th February, 1740, and distinguished himself in the seven years' war. In the American war he assisted the revolted colonies at the head of his regiment, and in the national assembly he espoused warmly the popular party. When placed in the command of the army of the Rhine, he took the cities of Spire, Mentz, Frankfurt, &c. but a reverse of fortune obliged him to fall back. Want of success was in the eyes of a jealous tribunal considered as treason, and Custines perished on the scaffold 27th Aug. 1793. He was weak in his conduct, proud in prosperity, but a coward in adversity. His son, with greater firmness than his father, met the stroke of the guillotine 3d January, 1794, aged 25.

CUTHBERT, an English saint, born in the north, and educated by the Scottish monks in the abbey of Icolmkill. He settled in the island of Lindisferna, four miles from Berwick, now called Holy-Island; from whence he came to the court of Egfred king of Northumberland, whom, with many of his nobles, he converted to Christianity, and baptized. He was made bishop of the Northumbrian Saxons; but, from his fondness for solitude, he retired to Holy-Island, where he founded a monastery, and where he died 686, leaving behind him a great number of pupils, and a deserved character of sanctity, virtue, and devotion.

CUTLER, Timothy, D. D. president of Yale college, Connecticut, was a native of Charlestown, Massachusetts, and graduated at Harvard in 1701. He was ordained minister of the congregational church at Stratford, Connecticut, in 1709, and 10 years after elected president of Yale college, where he continued till 1722, when becoming an episcopalian, he was dismissed, and settled in a church of that denomination in Boston. He was one of the first among his cotemporaries in talents and learning, and enjoyed the highest respect of all in the several stations which he was called to fill. He died in 1765.  L.

CUTLER, Manasseh, LL.D. a congregational minister of Massachusetts, was graduated at Yale college in 1765, and settled pastor of a church in Ipswich, Massachusetts, September 11th, 1771. He distinguished himself by his attention to several branches of natural history, particularly by making the first essay towards a scientific description of the plants of New-England, an account of several hundred of which communicated by him was published by the American academy, of which he was a member. In 1800 he was elected to a seat in congress, and retained it till 1804, when he declined any further political employment from its interference with his professional duties. He died July 28th, 1823, aged 81.  L.

CUTTS, John lord, was born of an ancient family at Matching, in Essex, and distinguished himself in the wars of William III. He was early in the service of Monmouth, and signalized himself greatly under the duke of Lorraine, in Hungary, and at the taking of Buda by the imperialists. At the revolution he had a regiment of foot, was created baron in Ireland 1690, governor of the Isle of Wight 1693, and complimented by Hopkins as one to whom a double crown was due, as a hero and a poet. On queen Anne's accession he was made lieutenant general of the forces in Holland, commander of the forces in Ireland in 1705, and afterwards one of the lords justices of that kingdom; an appointment which broke his heart, because it removed him intentionally out of the sphere of active enterprise. He died at Dublin, 26th of January, 1707, and was buried in Christ-church cathedral. He wrote a poem on queen Mary's death, and published, 1687, poetical exercises, written on several occasions—a poem on wisdom—another on Waller. The poetry, though not deserving to rank very high, yet possesses merit, and justifies the praises of Waller and others.

CUTTS, John, president of New-Hampshire, was a principal merchant of great probity and esteem in Portsmouth, where he was one of the earliest settlers. He was deputy to the general court during the union with Massachusetts, and was one of the committee of Portsmouth, appointed under the jurisdiction of Massachusetts, and against the claims of Mason. In 1679, however, a new government was established, and Mr. Cutts was appointed president. He held the office until his death, March 27th, 1681.  L.

CYAXARES I. king of the Medes after Phraortes, died 585 B.C.

CYAXARES II. king of Media, is supposed to be the famous Darius, who died 536 B.C.

CYGNE, Martin du, a learned Jesuit, professor of eloquence, born at St. Omer, died 1669, aged 50. He wrote explanatio rhetoricæ—ars metrica et ars poetica—fons eloquentiæ, &c. 4 vols. 12mo.—comædiæ 12 cum Terent. tum Plaut. concinnatæ, 2 vols. 12mo.

CYNÆGIRUS, an Athenian, who at the battle of Marathon, pursued the flying Persians to their ships, and in swimming after them had both his arms and his head cut off.

CYNEAS, a Thessalian philosopher, who accompanied Pyrrhus in his invasion of Italy. He called the Roman senate an assembly of kings.

CYPRIAN, Thascius Cæcilius, one of the fathers of the church, born at Carthage. He was bishop of Carthage, and suffered martyrdom 258. He wrote some valuable works, edited by Dr. Fell, and translated into English by Marshall.

CYPRIANI, or CIPRIANI, an Italian painter, who settled in England, and died in London 1785. He possessed great merit in his profession, and his pieces spread over Europe by the graver of Bartolozzi, are well known and admired for grace, beauty, and expression. In private life he was highly and deservedly esteemed for his many talents and virtues. His son inherited his virtues.

CYRANO, Bergerac, a French author, born in Gascony 1620. He early entered the army, where his valour distinguished him in the field as well as in duelling, and procured him the appellation of the intrepid. He was shot through the body at the siege of Mouzon, and run through the neck at that of Arras in 1640; but his prospects of promotion were so small, compared to the dangers and difficulties to which he exposed himself, that he abandoned the army, to wield the pen of wit and poetry. Though fond of independence and liberty, he attached himself to marshal Gassion, and afterwards to the duke of Arpajon. He died in 1655, aged 35, in consequence of a blow received on the head by the fall of a piece of timber. His works consist of a tragedy on the death of Agrippina, mother of Germanicus—the pedant, a comedy—besides a comic history of the states and empires of the sun and of the moon—letters—dialogues—and fragments of physic, &c. He abounded in wit and humour, he wrote with great facility, and interwove in his philosophical romance the system of Des Cartes. In many parts, from his fine strokes of satire on the wild inquiries of the philosophers of the age, he has, says lord Orrery, directed the plan which Swift afterwards pursued.

CYRIL of Jerusalem, one of the fathers, who was bishop of Jerusalem. He died 386, author of some works.

CYRIL of Alexandria, bishop of that see, died 444. He was violent in his measures to banish the Jews and Novatians from Alexandria; and wrote various works, edited at Paris, 7 vols. fol.

CYRILL, Lucar, was born in Candia 1572, and educated at Padua and in Germany. He was made bishop of Alexandria, and afterwards, 1621, patriarch of Constantinople. He was deposed, for his attempts to reform his clergy, and at last was strangled, by order of the grand signior, in 1638. His confession of faith and his letters were published, Amsterdam, 1718.

CYRUS, the elder, king of Persia, was son of Mandane, the daughter of Astyages. He dethroned his grandfather, established the Persian empire, and was at last killed in the battle against Tomyris, queen of the Massagetæ, B.C. 530.

CYRUS, the younger, son of Darius, revolted against his brother Artaxerxes, and was defeated by him in the plains of Cunaxa, 401. Had he not been too rash, he might have obtained the victory. The retreat of the 10,000 Greeks who accompanied him is celebrated in ancient history.

CYRUS, a Latin poet, in the reign of the younger Theodosius. He afterwards became a Christian and bishop of Phrygia.

DAC

DAC, John, a German painter, born at Cologne 1556, and employed by the emperor Rodolph, who rewarded his great abilities with honours and with opulence. His pictures are all in a grand style.

DACIER, Andrew, a French philosopher and critic, born at Castres, in Upper Languedoc, 6th April, 1651. His parents were protestants, and he was educated at Castres, and Puyousens, but chiefly at Saumur, under the celebrated Tanaquil Faber, whose daughter he married. At Paris he was recommended to the duke of Montausier, and was placed in the number of those who were to publish the classics for the use of the young dauphin. His first work was the edition of Pompeius Festus, 4to. 1681, greatly improved in the edition of 1699. His Horace, with a French translation, appeared in 1681, in 10 vols. 12mo. and has frequently been reprinted. He next published St. Anastasius's contemplations, with notes and a Latin translation, in 1682. The next year he married Faber's daughter; and, in 1685, he with her abjured the protestant religion. He published nothing afterwards till 1691, when his moral reflections of Marcus Antoninus, 2 vols. 12mo. appeared; and in 1692 Aristotle's poetics, with a translation and critical remarks, in 4to. which some have considered as his best performance. In 1693 he published a translation of the Oedipus and Electra of Sophocles; in 1694, the first volume of Plutarch's lives; in 1697, the translation of the works of Hippocrates, 2 vols. 12mo.; in 1699, that of Plato's works, 2 vols.; in 1706, the life of Pythagoras, his symbols, golden verses, &c. 2 vols.; in 1715, Epictetus, 2 vols.; and in 1723, the lives of Plutarch were completed, in 8 vols. 4to. Besides these, Dacier published notes on Longinus, a dissertation on the origin of satire, speeches in the French academy, answers to some critics who had censured his person and manners, &c. besides a commentary on Theocritus, and a treatise on religion, never published. As he had been concerned in the compilation of the medallic history of Lewis XIV. the monarch settled on him a pension of 2000 livres, and appointed him keeper of his books in the Louvre. In 1713 he was made perpetual secretary to the French academy, and in 1717 he obtained a reversionary grant of 10,000 crowns, as library keeper to the king, which was afterwards to devolve to his wife if she survived him. Her death, in 1720, prevented her enjoyment of a grant so very honourable to her merits. Dacier, though greatly afflicted for the loss of his wife, yet would have married a second time had not death prevented it. He was carried off by an ulcer in his throat, which he had disregarded, as not dangerous, September 18, 1722, in his 71st year. He was a man of great and extensive learning, who applied the powers of his mind, and the most indefatigable industry, to infuse into his native language all the beauties and all the graces of some of the best writers of ancient times.

DACIER, Anne, wife of Andrew Dacier, daughter of Tanaquil Faber, or le Fevre, was born at Saumur, 1651. When she was 11 years old her father discovered the strong natural powers of her mind, and immediately laid the foundation of a learned education, which was happily completed. In 1674 she published an edition of Callimachus, in 4to. and in consequence of her extensive knowledge, she was engaged in the editing of the classics for the use of the dauphin. Her Florus appeared in 1674, in 4to. and her Aurelius Victor 1681. In the mean time her reputation was so universally spread, that Christina, queen of Sweden, wrote her some pressing letters, and invited her to embrace the Romish religion, and to come to settle at Stockholm, where every mark of respect and patronage would be shown to her. These offers she declined, and continued her labours in the service of the dauphin. In 1681 her translation of Anacreon and Sappho appeared, so much commended by Boileau, and in 1683 were published Eutropius, 4to. and a French translation of the Amphitryo, Epidicus, and Rudens of Plautus, three vols. and the next year the Plautus and Clouds of Aristophanes, 12mo. with Dictys Cretensis and Dares Phrygius. In 1683 she married Dacier, a scholar with whom she had shared the instruction of her father, and two years after she joined him in a recantation of the protestant tenets. It has been indeed insinuated that she had been previously married to Lesnier, a bookseller of her father, and that she ran away from him for the society of Dacier, to whom she never was regularly married, an imputation too gross and illiberal to be credited. After her conversion, by the influence of the duke of Montausier, a pension of 1500 livres was settled on her husband, and 500 on herself. In 1688 she published her translation of Terence's plays, with notes, 3 vols. 12mo. the best edition of which is that of 1717. She also assisted her husband in his Marcus Antoninus and his Plutarch, and in 1711 she published her translation of Homer's Iliad, with notes, 3 vols. 12mo. In 1714 she wrote a defence of Homer against de la Motte, and two years after against Hardouin, in which she displayed much erudition, great taste, and not a little acrimony. She was, however, afterwards reconciled to de la Motte. Her last work, the Odyssey of Homer, translated from the Greek, appeared in 1716, 3 vols. 12mo. The two last years of her life she sunk into disease and debility, and died August 17th, 1720, aged 69. She had a son and two daughters, the son died young, one of the daughters was a nun, and the other, who possessed the virtues and accomplishments of her sex, died in her 15th year. Besides learning, Madame Dacier was graced with the noblest ornaments of human nature, with generosity, firmness, mildness, and exemplary piety. She had so much modesty that she never discoursed on literature, to display her superiority; but when requested to write her name and a sentence, in the book of a northern scholar, according to the custom of the country, she strenuously declined to enrol herself among the most illustrious characters of the age. When at last prevailed upon, she wrote her name with a verse from Sophocles, expressive that silence is the best ornament of the female sex. To the universal respect of Europe, the academy of Ricovatri at Padua added the honour of enrolling her name among their members in 1684.

DAGAR, Jacob, a native of Paris, the pupil of Vouet, and eminent as an historical and portrait painter. He was patronised by Christian V. of Denmark, at whose court he long resided, and then he visited London, and returned to Copenhagen, where he died, 1716, aged 76.

DAGGET, Naphthali, D.D. president of Yale College, Connecticut, was a native of Attleborough, Massachusetts, and was graduated at the institution over which he afterwards presided, in 1748, after having laboured in the ministry for several years at Smithtown, Long Island, he received an appointment in 1753, to the professorship of theology in Yale college, and from the resignation of Mr. Clap, in 1766, officiated as president until 1777, when he resigned that office, but continued in the professorship till his death, in 1780. He was an accomplished classical scholar, and a learned divine.

DAGOBERT I. succeeded his father Clotaire II. as king of France 628. He made war against Saxony, Britany, and Gascony, but stained by cruelty the laurels which he obtained in the field of battle. He divorced his wife, and not satisfied to marry three others to whom he gave the name of queens, he kept a great number of concubines. It is said that after conquering the Saxons he caused all those to be put to death whose stature exceeded the length of his sword. He died at Epemay 638, aged 36, and was the first monarch buried at St. Denys, which he had founded six years before.

DAGOBERT II. son of Sigebert II. was prevented from ascending his father's throne by the influence of Grimoald, mayor of the palace, who caused his own son Chilbert to be crowned king. He afterwards obtained the kingdom of Austrasia, and was assassinated five years after, 679, and was buried at Stenay.

DAGOBERT III. succeeded as king of Neustria to his father Chilbert. He died four years after, 17th Jan. 715.

DAGOBERT, N. a French republican general, who distinguished himself in Italy and against the Spaniards. He died in the midst of his victories beyond the Pyrenees, 21st April, 1794.

DAGOUMER, William, professor of philosophy, and rector of the university of Paris, was born at Pont-audemer, and died at Courbevoye, in 1755. He published a course of philosophy in Latin, a French work against the advertisements of Languet archbishop of Sens. He is ridiculed by Le Sage in Gil Blas under the name of Guillomer.

DAHL, Michael, a Danish painter patronised by queen Anne and George prince of Denmark. He died in England 20th October, 1743.

DAHLBERG, Eric, a Swedish engineer, whose excessive application compensated for the early loss of his parents, and the misfortunes of a neglected education. He prepared for the brave defence of Thorn, and accompanied Gustavus Adolphus in his Polish expedition, and advised him to march his army across the Great Belt when frozen, and thus penetrate into the very heart of the Danish kingdom, and besiege the capital. His great services were rewarded in 1660, with the rank of nobility, and he was successively raised to the command of Malmo, the care of the fortifications, and the government of Livonia. He died at Stockholm 1703, aged 78. He wrote Succia antiqua et hodierna, three vols. fol. 1700, and distinguished himself so much as an engineer that he was deservedly called the Vauban of Sweden.

DAILLE, John, an eminent protestant divine, born at Châtelleraut, sixth January, 1594. His father intended to place him in his own situation as receiver of the consignations at Poitiers, but the fondness of the boy for books and literature turned his thoughts to another channel, and he educated him in the schools of Poitiers and Saumur. At the age of eighteen he was admitted into the family of du Plessis Mornay to be the tutor of his two grandsons, and in this situation he continued seven years before he began to travel, and received, as it is said, more instruction from the learned conversation and company of the grandfather than he communicated to his pupils. He began his travels in 1619, and with his two pupils passed through Geneva, Piedmont, Lombardy, and Venice, where he was introduced to the acquaintance and friendly intimacy of father Paul. While at Mantua one of his pupils was taken ill, and soon after died, so that Daille with difficulty and great danger conveyed the body concealed as a bale of goods under the care of two servants to the burial place of his father, from the suspicious eye of the inquisitors, who viewed with jealousy the conduct of the protestants. With the other pupil he continued his travels, and after visiting Switzerland, Germany, Flanders, Holland, and England, they returned to France late in 1621. In 1623, Daille was ordained, and first officiated in the family of the venerable Mornay, who died soon after in the arms of his beloved and reverend friend. The year 1624 was employed in digesting some papers which afterwards were published as memoirs, and in the following year Daille became minister of the church of Saumur, where he spent the rest of his life. In 1628 he wrote his celebrated book, "on the use of the fathers," which lord Falkland and his friend Chillingworth greatly valued, and began to translate, but left unfinished; but it appeared in 1651, in an English dress by the hands of Thomas Smith of Cambridge, and in Latin by Mettayer of St. Quintin. In 1633 he published his apology for the reformed churches, which he also translated into Latin, and Mr. Smith into English in 1658. These books, from their importance, and the masterly manner in which the subject was treated, excited a great outcry among the catholics, but they maintained their character against all the attacks and insinuations of popery. Daille was at the synod of Alençon in 1637, where his authority was ably exerted to reconcile the protestants in the then disputed tenets about universal grace. These principles he warmly embraced, and indeed published in 1655 a Latin work against Spanheim the Leyden professor, as "an apology for the synods of Alençon and Charenton." This great and good man died at Paris 15th April, 1670, after enjoying through life, except from a small attack of apoplexy for 10 days, the most uninterrupted good health, and with it the undiminished faculties and powers of his mind. His reputation was so high that the protestants in France declared they had seen no better writer since the days of Calvin. He wrote besides several works which were chiefly of a controversial nature, and which equally evinced his learning, erudition, and dexterity of argumentation. He married in 1625, but lost his wife six years after, by whom he had only one son, Hadrian, who distinguished himself as an able divine. He was invited to Rochelle as a minister, and after five years' residence he was chosen minister of Paris, with his father, 1658. At the revocation of the edict of Nantes he retired to Switzerland, and died at Zurich, May, 1690. His MS. and some of his father's works were deposited in the public library.

DALE, Samuel, an apothecary of Braintree, Essex, who became by his merit in 1730, a licentiate of the college of physicians and fellow of the royal society. He wrote Pharmacologia, seu manuductio ad materiam medicam, often printed,—the antiquities of Harwich and Dover court, in 4to. improved from the works of Silas Taylor, besides some valuable papers in the philosophical transactions, &c. He died at Bocking, where he had settled as a physician, 1739, aged 80.

DALE, Sir Thomas, was sent out to Virginia as high marshal, in 1609, and a second time in May, 1611, with three hundred colonists, supplies, and new laws, with the execution of which he was intrusted. His administration was rigorous and excited great disaffection, but the interests of the colony were advanced under it. He built the town of Henrico, on James river, and conquered that of the Appomattox Indians, at the mouth of the river of that name. In August, 1611, Sir Thomas Gates succeeded him in the government. He continued, however, to take an active part in the affairs of the colony, and on the return of Gates to England, in 1614, the chief command again devolved on him. He returned to England in 1616. He afterwards went to the East-Indies, and there died.

DALECHAMPS, James, a learned physician, born at Caen, 1513. He died at the age of 75, at Lyons, where he had practised from 1552 to 1588. He wrote a general history of plants, three books de peste, besides Pliny's natural history with valuable notes, and also translated into Latin, Athenæus, in the completion of which he was engaged thirty years.

DALEN, Cornelius Von, an eminent Dutch engraver, who flourished about 1640. He engraved a great variety of portraits, and some antique statues, all in a masterly style.

DALENS, Dirk, a landscape painter of Amsterdam, who died 1688, aged 29. He is happy in the expression and faithful delineation of his pieces.

D'ALIBRAL, Charles Von, a Parisian who abandoned the profession of arms for the muses. He was of a dissipated turn of mind, and fond of merry society, and he declared that he would die by the mouth of the bottle rather than by the mouth of the cannon. As he had a moderate income, and was free from ambition, he enjoyed with great contentment what he had, and employed his sportive muse as fancy or occasion directed. In the latter part of his life he lived much in the country, and died at an advanced age about the beginning of 1655. His works appeared in 1553, in 8vo, divided into six parts, containing bacchanalian, satirical, heroical, moral, and Christian poems, of no great merit indeed, but frequently happy in delineation of character and in flashes of wit. He also translated Perez's letters, and 73 epigrams, against Montmaur.

DALIN, Olaus de, a learned Swede, born at Winsberg in 1708. He is deservedly called the father of Swedish poetry, by his two poems on the liberty of Sweden, and the tragedy of Brunhilda. He rose by his genius to fame and fortune, and was appointed preceptor to prince Gustavus, and at last became chancellor of the court. He wrote, at the request of the government, the history of Sweden, which he brought down to the death of Charles IX. He wrote besides, epistles, fables, satires, panegyrics, &c. and translated Montesquieu's book on the declension of the Romans.

DALLAS, Alexander James, secretary of the treasury, and of war, of the United States, was born on the Island of Jamaica, June 21st, 1759. His father was from Scotland. Alexander came to the United States in 1783, and settled in Philadelphia; where he studied law, and established himself in its practice. For several years, his professional business not being extensive, he employed much of his time in literary pursuits, and beside many contributions to the periodical works of the day, prepared a system of Law Reports, which were published in four volumes. In January, 1791, he was appointed secretary of Pennsylvania, and held the office till 1801, when he became attorney of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania. In October, 1814, he was appointed secretary of the treasury of the United States, and in March of the following year, undertook to discharge the additional functions of secretary of war, and performed the duties of those stations with distinguished ability and acceptance. In November, 1816, he resigned his offices, and resumed the practice of law at Philadelphia. He died on the 16th of January, 1817. His mind was richly gifted by nature, and highly cultivaied. He was polished in his manners, a learned and ingenious advocate, and an able statesman.

DALLINGTON, Sir Robert, author of the aphorisms of Tacitus, was born at Geddington, Northamptonshire, and educated at Pembroke-hall, Cambridge. He was secretary to Francis earl of Rutland, knighted by queen Elizabeth, and made master of the Charter-house. He died 1637. He wrote besides a survey of the great duke's estate in Tuscany, 4to. method for travel, or a state of France, in 1598, 4to.

DALMATIN, George, a Lutheran minister of Laybach in Carniola, from which he was expelled by the violence of the catholics, 1598. He was protected in his disgrace by the baron of Aursperg, in whose house it is said he died. He translated the Bible into the Sclavonian language, 1584, and wrote some tracts.

DALMATIUS, a bishop of Cyzicum, who attended the council of Ephesus, and wrote the acts of the synod of Nice.

DALRYMPLE, David, son of Sir James Dalrymple, bart. auditor of the exchequer for Scotland, was born in Edinburgh, 29th October, 1726. His mother was Christiana, daughter of Earl Haddington. He was educated at Eton, from whence he removed to Utrecht, where he continued till 1746. In 1748 he was called to the bar, and soon distinguished himself as an advocate. His name as a lawyer was so eminent that he was raised in 1766 to the dignity of one of the judges of the court of session, when he assumed, as is usual, the appellation of lord Hailes, by which he is best known among the learned. He became, however, conspicuous, not less by his learning, and his writings, than by his integrity, candour, and firmness, as a judge. In 1773 he published remarks on the history of Scotland, and in 1776 and 1779, annals of Scotland, 2 vols. 4to. containing the history of 14 Scottish kings; which valuable work, however, the author did not complete. He published besides, memorials and letters relating to the history of Britain, in the reign of James I. and Charles I. 2 vols. 1762 and 1766—a catalogue of the lords of session from 1532—biographia Scotica—remains of Christian antiquity, 3 vols. and numerous other tracts on antiquities, history, divinity, &c. Lord Hailes, though infirm in health, sat on the bench till within three days of his death, which happened 29th Nov. 1792, in his 66th year. He left no male issue, but only two daughters by two different wives.

DALRYMPLE, Alexander, was born in 1737, at New Hailes, near Edinburgh, the seat of his father, Sir James Dalrymple, bart. His mother was the daughter of the earl of Haddington, and had sixteen children, of whom Alexander was the seventh.

He was educated at Haddington; and in 1752 went to the East Indies, as a writer in the company's service. While in the East he applied to the study of hydrography; and in 1759 undertook a voyage of observation, in which he gave great satisfaction to his superiors. In 1763 he returned to England, when it was intended to engage him in the service on which captain Cook was afterwards employed, but some objections arising in a matter of form, the appointment did not take place. In 1775 he went out again to Madras, and returned in 1780. In 1795 he was made hydrographer to the admiralty, as well as to the India Company, but in 1803 he lost his place under government, and died the same year. His principal works are—1. Discoveries in the South Pacific Ocean, 8vo. 2. Collection of South Sea Voyages, 2 vols. 4to. 3. General View of the India Company's Affairs, 8vo. 4. Relation of Expeditions from Fort Marlborough to the Islands of the West Coast of Sumatra, 4to. 5. Collection of Voyages in the South Atlantic Ocean, 4to. 6. Account of the loss of the Grosvenor Indiaman, 8vo. 7. Plan for promoting the Fur Trade, 4to. 8. Memoir of a Map of the land round the North Pole, 4to. 9. Journal of the Expeditions to the North of California, 4to. 10. A collection of songs, 8vo. 11. The Oriental Repertory, 2 vols. 4to. He also wrote a number of tracts, political and commercial.

W. B.

DALTON, Michael, an English lawyer, born in Cambridgeshire, and bred at Lincoln's-inn. He wrote a well known book on the office of a justice of peace, and on the duty of sheriffs. He was queen's counsel in 1599, and died before the civil wars.

DALTON, John, D.D. was born at Deane in Cumberland, where his father was rector, 1709. He was educated at Lowther, and at Queen's college, Oxford, and became tutor to lord Beauchamp. He employed himself in the mean time, in adapting Milton's masque at Ludlow-castle to the stage, which he rendered, by a judicious selection of songs from other works of the author, and some of his own, a very popular piece, still known and admired under the title of "Comus." During the celebrity of this performance, he sought out Milton's grand-daughter, who was overwhelmed with old age and poverty, and honourably exerted his influence to procure her a benefit, which produced her 120*l.* His ill health afterwards prevented him from attending his noble pupil, who unfortunately died of the smallpox at Bologna. After being elected to a fellowship in his college, he took orders, and was presented some time after, by the duke of Somerset, to the living of St. Mary at Hull, and by his influence to a prebend at Worcester, where he died 1763. He published a volume of sermons, 1757—two epistles, 4to.—a descriptive poem on the coal mines near Whitehaven—remarks on 12 historical designs of Raphael. His brother Richard was librarian to the king, and published a description of some prints, from drawings of his own, of the procession to Mecca.

DALTON, Tristram, a senator of the United States, was born at Newburyport, Massachusetts, in 1738, and received his education at Harvard college, where he was graduated in 1755. After having been speaker of the house of representatives, and a member of the senate of the commonwealth, he was transferred on the adoption of the federal constitution to a seat in the senate of the United States. He afterwards received the office of surveyor of the ports of Boston and Charlestown, and held it till his death in 1817. He was distinguished for gentleness and elegance of manners, mental cultivation, and integrity.

DALZELL, Andrew, an eminent Greek scholar, born at Ratho, near Edinburgh, about 1750. From his village school he came to Edinburgh, and studied with such zeal and application, that he became professor of the Greek language in the university, keeper of the university library, and one of the secretaries of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, &c. His literary acquirements were such, that he was selected to superintend the education of the present lord Lauderdale, whom he accompanied on the continent. As a professor, Mr. Dalzell possessed great abilities and powerful eloquence, and his lectures were so popular, that the study of the Greek language, which had long been neglected in Scotland, became, under his auspices, a favourite pursuit with the youthful students of the university. To facilitate the labours of his pupils, he devoted much of his time in the composition of valuable notes, in the elucidation of the Greek classics, which he published under the name of Analecta minora et majora, &c. He wrote besides, some papers on biography, and on literary subjects in the Edinburgh Society transactions, and recommended to the English student Chevalier's description of the plain of Troy, by giving an elegant translation of it, enriched with learned notes. He also edited the posthumous works of his father-in-law, Dr. J. Drysdale, whom he succeeded as principal clerk to the general assembly of the church of Scotland. This amiable man and elegant scholar died 8th December, 1806.

DALZIEL, Thomas, a Scotch officer, taken prisoner at the defeat at Worcester, and confined in the tower, from which he escaped to Russia, where the czar made him a general. At the restoration he returned to England, and Charles II. made him, for his many services, commander-in-chief of all his forces in Scotland. He was a singular man in his dress and appearance. He had been brought up hardy, and after the death of Charles I. he never shaved his beard, which grew white and bushy, and descended to his middle. His bald head was generally covered with a beaver hat, the brim of which was not more than three inches broad. He generally came to London once or twice a year, to kiss the king's hand, who had great regard for him; but whenever he appeared in the capital, the singularity of his dress and appearance drew crowds of boys around him. The time of his death is unknown.

DAMASCENUS, John, a learned father of the church, born at Damascus. He died about 750. His works were edited, 2 vols. fol. 1712, Paris.

DAMASCIUS, a stoic philosopher, pupil to Isidorus, whose life he wrote. He flourished about 540, A.D.

DAMASUS I. a Spaniard, raised to the papal throne, 366. Though warmly opposed by Ursin, the antipope, he was acknowledged by the Italian bishops, and by the council of Aquileia, who condemned his opponent. He was a zealous enemy to the tenets of the Arians, and died 384, aged 80. Some of his letters have been published.

DAMASUS II. bishop of Brixen, was elected pope on the day of the resignation of Benedict IX. He died at Palestrina, 23 days after his election, 1048.

DAMBOURNEY, N. was born at Rouen, 10th May, 1722, and died there, 2d June, 1795. He distinguished himself, not only as a merchant, but as a man of science, well acquainted with philosophy and chymistry. He made some curious experiments on plants, &c. and published valuable tracts.

DAMIEN, Peter, cardinal and bishop of Ostia in the eleventh century, was originally a Benedictine monk, whom his superiors and not his ambition raised to places of eminence and dignity. He publicly condemned the wars which the popes carried on against the emperors, and asserted, from the example of our Saviour, that the ecclesiastics were to oppose their enemies, not by the arms of the flesh, but by the sword of the spirit. He was equally severe against the licentious manners of his age, which he attempted to correct and reform. His works were printed at Paris, 1663. He died about 1073.

DAMIENS, Robert Francis, a Frenchman, known for his attempt to assassinate Lewis XV. He was executed 28th March, 1757, in a manner most horrible and wantonly barbarous. Vid. CHASTEL.

DAMO, the daughter of Pythagoras, was well skilled in the philosophy of her illustrious father.

DAMON, a Pythagorean philosopher, celebrated for his friendship with Pythias, which Dionysius the tyrant saw, and desired to share.

DAMON, an Athenian musician, the friend of Socrates.

DAMOCLES, a flatterer in the court of Dionysius, who, for a while, assumed the dress and dignity of the tyrant, to experience what happiness existed on a throne.

DAMOCRITUS, a Greek historian, author of a treatise on tactics, and of another on the Jews, whom he accused of worshipping the head of an ass.

DAMOURS, Lewis, a French lawyer, who died 16th Nov. 1788, author of a life of Ninon de l'Enclos, and other works of little merit.

DAMPIER, John, a native of Blois, who entered among the cordeliers, and was director of a nunnery at Orleans, where he died before 1550. His Latin poems, after the manner of Catullus, are elegant and valuable, and are published in the first volume of the deliciæ poetarum Gallorum.

DAMPIER, Capt. William, a famous navigator, born at East Coker, in Somersetshire, 1652. He early went to sea, and joined captain Cook, in order to cruise against the Spaniards. They accordingly proceeded to the South Seas, through the Straits of Magellan, where they took several prizes, and where Cook died, 1684, and was succeeded in command by Davis. They afterwards attacked and burned the town of Plata, and then advanced to the bay of Panama, near which they took a Spanish ship, sent with despatches to Lima, and from the intelligence received on board, they meditated an attack on the plate ships, which ended unsuccessfully. Their next attack was against Leon, on the Mexican coast, which they destroyed, and also Rio Leja, and there Dampier left Davis, and sailed with Captain Swan, to examine more fully the northern parts of the Mexican shore; but meeting with no success, and being disappointed in their wishes to seize the rich Manilla ship, they sailed across the great Pacific ocean for the East Indies. After visiting St. John's island, New Holland, Triest, and Nicobar, Dampier left his companions, and arrived at the English factory at Achan, where he afterwards engaged with captain Weldon in trading voyages for 15 months, and then entered as gunner at a factory at Bencoolen. In 1691 he made his escape from the vigilance of the governor, and brought all his papers and journals with him, and reached the Downs, Sept. 16th. As he was now in want of money he sold his share in an Indian prince, whom his companions carried about for exhibition. He was afterwards engaged for three years, till 1711, in a voyage under the British merchants to the South Seas, of which he has recorded several curious and very interesting particulars. His voyage round the world has been frequently published, and is considered as an accurate and valuable performance. The time of Dampier's death is unknown. A good likeness of him is preserved in Trinity-house, Tower-hill.

DAMPIERRE, N. a French general, who distinguished himself under Dumourier at the battle of Jemappe. Though active and warlike, he was driven from Aix-la-chapelle, and was beaten by the allies at Quivrain. As he was examining the works of the enemy his thigh was carried off by a cannon ball from an English battery before the camp at Famars, and he died two days after, 10th May, 1793.

DAN, the fifth son of Jacob, by Bilhah the maid of Rachel, was the head of a tribe, whose territories were on the shores of the Mediterranean, between Joppa and Ascalon.

DANA, Francis, LL.D. chief justice of Massachusetts, was born at Charlestown, August, 1742. His father was the Hon. Richard Dana, an eminent magistrate of the county of Middlesex. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1762, and prosecuted his legal studies under the care of judge Trowbridge. In 1776 he was appointed one of the delegates of Massachusetts to congress, and continued in that station until appointed minister to Russia, where he remained till the close of the war. He was elected a member of the convention which framed the constitution of the United States in 1787, but was prevented from being present during the discussions of that body. To the constitution formed he was warmly attached. In 1792 he was appointed chief justice, and discharged the duties of that station in such a manner as to justify the public confidence in his learning and talents, assiduity, integrity, and attachment to the religious and political institutions of the country. He resigned the office in 1806. In 1797 he was selected as one of the envoys extraordinary to France, to be associated with Messrs. Marshall and Pinckney, but declining the office, Mr. Gerry was appointed. In 1808 he was one of the electors of president and vice president for Massachusetts. He was one of the founders of the American academy of arts and sciences, and a vice president of that institution. He died at his seat at Cambridge, April 26th, 1811, aged 68.

DANCER, Daniel, a well-known miser, born near Harrow, Middlesex. The love of money was the ruling principle of his family, and when he inherited his paternal estate, which was considerable, he pursued the same plan of rigid mean parsimony. His intercourse with the world was merely in the selling of his hay, and the other products of his farm, and the winter comforts of his fireside, in his inhospitable house, arose from the scanty supplies laboriously collected from the hedges, or the scattered boughs on the neighbouring common. On the death of his sister, from whom he received some property, he exchanged the hay bands which hitherto had protected his legs, for a second-hand pair of black worsted stockings, which were the only tokens of his mourning. This singular character died 1794, aged 80, and left the whole of his property to lady Tempest, who, it seems, had behaved towards him with charity, in the hope of alleviating his apparent poverty.

DANCHET, Anthony, a French poet, born at Riorn, 1671. At 19 he became professor of rhetoric at Chartres, and four years after he came to Paris, where he devoted himself to write for the theatre. He was member of the French academy and of that of inscriptions, and had also a place in the king's library. He died 1748, universally esteemed as much for his private character as for his writings. His works, consisting of tragedies, songs, operas, &c. were printed at Paris, 1751, 4 vols. 12mo.

DANDINI, Jerome, a Jesuit, born at Cesena, in Italy, 1554. He was the first of his order who taught philosophy at Paris. He was in consequence of his learning, rector of the colleges of Ferrara, Forli, Bologna, Parma, and Milan. He also taught philosophy at Perugia, 1596, when he was appointed by pope Clement VIII. to be his legate to the Maronites of mount Libanus. He wrote an account of his journey in Italian, which Simon translated into French. Dandini died at Forli, 1634, aged 80. His commentary on Aristotle's three books de animâ, appeared at Paris, 1611, folio, and his ethics at Cesena, 1651.

DANDINI, Pietro, an eminent painter, born at Florence, 1646. He studied under Valerio Spada, and his uncle Vincentio Dandini, and after travelling through Italy, he resided for some time at Venice, and also at Parma and Modena, that he might more carefully view and copy the finest pieces of the greatest masters. On his return to Florence he was employed by the grand duke in adorning his palaces from subjects from sacred and fabulous history, as well as in fancy and caricature pieces. His genius was great, and he displayed astonishing powers in the imitation of Titian, Veronese, and Tintoretto. He died, 1712. His son Octavio was equally eminent as a painter.

DANDINI, Cæsare, a historical painter of Florence. He was extremely correct in his drawings, and his pieces were all finished in a superior style. His altar pieces at Florence are greatly admired, especially that of the chapel l'Annonciata. He was brother to Vincentio and uncle to Pietro.

DANDINI, Hercule Francois, professor of law at Padua, died 1747, aged 56. He was author of several learned works, de scribendi ratione, de servitutibus prædiorum interpretationes per epistolas, &c.

DANDOLO, Henry, a Venetian, raised to the rank of doge of his country, 1192. Though then 84 years old, vigour, wisdom, and activity marked his government. He conquered Zara, which had revolted, engaged in the crusades, and displayed astonishing valour at the siege of Constantinople. He was in consequence of his services created lord of Romania, and died 1205.

DANDOLO, Andrew, doge of Venice, made an alliance with Egypt, which produced a rupture with the Genoese, who were jealous of his prosperity. He died 1354, aged 44. He wrote a history of Venice, and as the friend of literature, corresponded with Petrarch and other learned men.

DANDRE BARDON, Michael Francois, known as a painter and as a writer, was born at Aix, in Provence, 22d May, 1700, and died 14th April, 1783. He was professor of the academy of painting, and was admired for his historical pieces. He wrote, besides some poetry of inferior merit, the life of Carlo Vanlo, 12mo. 1765—treatise on painting, sculpture, &c.—well-known anecdotes on the death of Bouchardon—conference on the utility of history to artists.

DANDRIEU, John Francis, a famous musician, who died at Paris, 1740, aged 56. He composed three books of pieces for the harpsichord, one for the organ, with pieces for Christmas, much admired by connoisseurs.

DANEU or DANÆUS, Lambert, a Calvinist preacher, who was born at Orleans, and died at Castres, in 1596, aged 66. He taught theology at Leyden, and published commentaries on Matthew and Mark, a poetical system of geography, aphorismi politici et militares.

DANES, Peter, born at Paris, studied at the college of Navarre, and was Greek professor at the college Royal for five years. He was tutor to the dauphin, afterwards Francis II. and he was present at the council of Trent, where he delivered a celebrated speech in 1546. During his stay at Trent he was made bishop of Lavour. He died at Paris, 23d April, 1577, aged 80. He was a prelate of extensive learning, commanding eloquence, great gravity of manners, and genuine piety. He wrote several things, but never set his name to them. The 10th book of Paulus Æmilius's history of France is attributed to him. His opuscula, with his life, were published by his kinsman Peter Hilary Danes, in 1731, 4to.

DANET, Peter, a French abbé, among those learned men who published the classics for the use of the dauphin. He published Phædrus with notes, besides a dictionary, and other works, and died at Paris, 1709.

DANFORTH, Thomas, president of the district of Maine, was a native of England, and born in 1622. On coming to America, he settled at Cambridge, Massachusetts, and was chosen an assistant and deputy governor of that colony, and distinguished himself by defending the rights of the people against the encroachments of the crown. In 1679, he was appointed president of the district of Maine, and held the office till the arrival of Andross, in 1686. He was a man of prudence and piety, and did himself honour by opposing the proceedings of the courts against those who were accused of witchcraft. He died in 1699.

DANFORTH, Samuel, minister of Taunton, Massachusetts, was born in 1666, and graduated at Harvard college in 1683. He was distinguished among his cotemporaries for learning and usefulness. Some account of his success as a minister is contained in his letters, inserted in Prince's History. He left in manuscript an Indian Dictionary, formed apparently from Elliot's Indian Bible, a part of which is preserved in the library of the Massachusetts Historical Society.

DANGEAU, Louis Courcillon de, member of the French academy, and abbot of Clermont and Fontaine-Daniel, was born at Paris, Jan. 1643, and died there, Jan. 1st, 1723. He usefully devoted his time to facilitate the study of belles lettres, history, and geography, for which he invented several new and ingenious games. He published a new method to learn historical geography, two vols. folio.—the principles of heraldry, in 14 plates, 4to.—historical games of the kings of France—reflections on the parts of grammar—of the election of the emperor. His principal work is the dialogues on the immortality of the soul, attributed by some to the abbé de Choisi. He was master of a great variety of languages, but his benevolence was equal to his learning. By economy he was in possession of a respectable income, which was liberally applied to the relief of indigence and distress.

DANGEAU, Philip de Courcillon, marquis de, brother of the preceding, was born in 1638. He was a great favourite at the court of Lewis XIV. for his many accomplishments, and his taste for literature procured him a seat in the French academy and in that of Sciences. He died at Paris, 1720, at the age of 82, grand master of the military orders of N. dame du mont Carmel, and Lazarus, of Jerusalem. His conversation, manners, disinterestedness, and many other virtues, were the admiration of the age. He left some memoirs in MS. from which Voltaire, Henault, and la Beaumelle, have drawn some curious particulars. There is also another MS. in which he exhibits in a very interesting manner the character of Lewis XIV. among his courtiers.

DANHEWER, John Conrad, a native of the Brisgaw, of the Lutheran persuasion. He was theological professor at Strasburg, where he died, 1666, aged 63. He was author of some theological tracts, and violently opposed the intended union between the Calvinists and the Lutherans.

DANICAN, Andrew, a native of Drieux, near Paris, nicknamed Philidor by the king of France. He was a great chess player. He published at London, 1749, his analyse du jeu des echecs, and his musical composition of the carmen seculare of Horace, so much admired, was performed at Freemasons-hall, 1779, as also Congreve's ode to harmony. He was esteemed for his many private good qualities, as well as his singular dexterity at chess. He played, not two months before his death, two games at the same time and blindfolded, with two of the best chess players of the country, and was declared victorious. His infirmities were increased by a malevolent insinuation that he was a person suspected by government, and he gradually sunk into the grave, after a long residence in England, 31st August, 1795, aged above 70.

DANIEL, the last of the four great prophets, was of the royal blood of Judah, and was carried away a captive to Babylon, 606 B. C. He was there educated to become one of the favourites of Nebuchadnezzar, and his name was changed to Belteshazzar. So rapid was his progress in the sciences and the language of Chaldea, and so great his wisdom, that the king intrusted him with the government of Babylon, and made him chief of the magi, upon his true explanation of the dream of the mystic statue, which prefigured the four great empires of Assyria, Persia, Alexander, and his successors. He acquired singular celebrity by explaining the writing upon the wall under Belshazzar, and under Darius he became prime minister. His favour with the king, however, excited the envy of the courtiers, and he was by their intrigues thrown into the den of lions, for refusing to honour Darius with divine homage. His preservation in this dreadful situation restored him to the royal favour, and brought on the destruction of his enemies. The book of Daniel is written partly in Hebrew, and partly in Chaldee.

DANIEL, Arnauld, a native of Taraseon, under Alphonsus I. count of Provence. He wrote several poems, from which Petrarch received great assistance. He died about 1189.

DANIEL, Peter, a learned advocate of Orleans, died at Paris, 1603. He published the anularia of Plautus, and commentaries on the sevulus of Virgil. His library, which was very valuable, was afterwards conveyed partly to Stockholm, and partly to the Vatican.

DANIEL, Samuel, an English poet and historian born at Taunton in Somersetshire, 1562. He entered at Magdalen college, Oxford, but after three years' residence left the university without a degree, and by the influence of his brother-in-law, John Florio, he became groom of the privy chamber to Anne, queen of James I. He had succeeded Spenser as poet laureate, and by his genius and learning he gained the friendship of the most eminent men of the times, such as Camden, Sir John Harrington, Spelman, Cotton, Ben Jonson, Owen, Stradling, &c. He lived, while near the court, at a house in Old-street, where he composed many of his dramatic pieces, but in his old age, he went to reside at a farm which he had at Beckington, Somersetshire, where he ended his days in peace and retirement, 1619. His poetical works, consisting of dramatic and other lighter pieces, besides a poem in 8 books on the wars of York and Lancaster, were published in 2 vols. 12mo. 1718. His history of England to the end of Edward III. in 2 vols. 4to. continued afterward by Trussel, was written, it is said, "with great brevity and politeness, and his political and moral reflections are very fine, useful, and instructive." This history, as Langbaine observes, is the crown of all his works. There is another Samuel Daniel, mentioned by Wood, as publisher, in 1642, of "archiepiscopal priority established by Christ," and of "the birth, life, and death, of the Jewish Unction."

DANIEL, Gabriel, a learned Frenchman, born at Rouen, 8th February, 1649. At the age of 18, he was admitted among the Jesuits, and early began to display his abilities by delivering lectures on literature, philosophy, and theology. One of his first performances was a voyage to the world of Des Cartes, a romance, most ingenious and excellent, as Bolingbroke observes, which ridiculed the Cartesian system, and which became so celebrated as to be translated into several languages. His great work is his history of France to the death of Henry IV. published at Paris, in 3 vols. folio, 1713, and afterwards corrected and enlarged in 7 vols. 4to. 1722. This work was afterwards continued to the death of Lewis XIV. but in an inferior style. Father Daniel wrote besides several theological and other tracts, one of which, "dialogues between Cleander and Eudoxus," passed through 12 editions in less than 2 years. All these smaller tracts were collected in two vols. 4to. This very learned and amiable Jesuit, died at Paris, 23d June, 1728.

DANIEL, Robert, a Landgrave of Carolina, under the first constitution, was sent from England, after the return of governor Arehdale with a new constitution for that colony. In 1703, he succeeded Mr. Walker, as president of the council of North Carolina. Thomas Cary, deputy governor, succeeded him in the administration. On the departure of governor Craven for England, in 1716, he was appointed deputy governor of South Carolina. The preceding year he had been intrusted with the protection of Charleston, while Craven was engaged in an expedition against the Indians. Governor Johnson succeeded him in 1717.  L.

DANTE, Alighieri, a celebrated Italian poet, born at Florence, 27th May, 1265, of an ancient family. He early displayed his poetical talents, but the ambition of being elevated among the ruling men of his native city, engaged him in all the troubles and miseries of violent faction. His friends were defeated in the tumult, and he sought with them safety in banishment. In his exile at Ravenna, he vented the severest shafts of his resentment against his enemies, and because the pope and Philip of Valois, brother to the French king, had been instrumental in his downfall, he ridiculed them in his writings, and intimated that Hugh Capet, the progenitor of the monarch, was risen from the mean occupation of a butcher. He also incited the prince of Verona to make war against the Florentines, and to procure his recall, but all to little purpose. In his honourable exile, at the court of Guy Polentano, prince of Ravenna, he was sent by that sovereign to negotiate with the Venetians, who wished to make war against him, but the magistrates of Venice treated the ambassador with contempt, and refused to admit him within their walls. This arrogant conduct had such an effect upon the sensible and irritable heart of Dante, that at his return to Ravenna, unable to survive the affront, he died July, 1321, aged 57. To his misfortunes perhaps we are indebted for his poems, for, unable to revenge himself by force, he drew the pen of satire in his own defence. His triple poem, of paradise, purgatory, and hell, displays astonishing powers of genius, and at once exhibits the sweetness and graces of poetry with the bitterness of insatiable enmity.

The reputation and the usurped power of the pope, Boniface VIII. the pedigree of the French king, and the prostituted venality of Florence, that den of thieves, are the subjects which engage and inflame the virulence of the poet. He every where displays spirit, fire, and sublimity, and from his compositions, succeeding poets have learned not only how to point the shaft of satire, but to write with elegance, dignity, and grace. His works were collected and printed at Venice, 1564, with the notes of Christopher Landini, and various and improved editions have since that time appeared. He wrote also a Latin work on monarchy, and another de vulgari eloquentiâ.

DANTE, Peter Vincent, a native of Perouse, who died 1512. He so successfully imitated the verse of the famous Dante, that he was called by his name. He was eminent for his skill in mathematics and architecture, and he invented several useful machines, and wrote a commentary on Sacrobosco's sphere.

DANTE, Vincent, grandson to the preceding, was well known as a painter, and sculptor, and mathematician. He died at Perouse 1576, aged 46. His statue of Julius III. is much admired. He wrote the lives of those who excelled in drawings for statues. He refused the invitations of Philip II. of Spain to finish the paintings of the Escorial.

DANTE, Ignatius, a descendant of the great poet, was born at Perugia, and became known for his skill in mathematics as well as in divinity and philosophy. He read lectures on geography at Bologna, and was engaged by Gregory XIII. to draw geographical maps and plans. He evinced such dexterity in this that the pope raised him to the bishopric of Alatri. He died 1586. He published in 1569, at Florence, a treatise on the astrolabe, besides notes on the universal planisphere. He made a sphere of the world in five tables. The meridian line, which he drew through St. Petronius' church in Bologna 1576, was afterwards finished by Cassini.

DANTE, John Baptiste, of the same family as the preceding, was born at Perugia, and distinguished himself by his mechanical powers in making a pair of wings with such nicety that he could support himself in the air, and fly across the lake Thrasy-menus. In one of his exhibitions before the people of Perugia, one of the wings broke and he fell on the top of a church, and shattered his thigh. He was afterwards professor of mathematics at Venice, and died before he was forty years old, about the end of the 15th century.

DANTON, George James, a native of Arcis-sur-Aube, born 26th October, 1759. He was originally a lawyer, but the revolution drew him into public notice, as the associate of Robespierre and Marat. To an unprincipled hatred against Lewis XVI. he added the most ferocious spirit, and after viewing the massacres of September with pleasure, he prepared to organize the public bodies of the state to resist the invasion of the Prussians. Undismayed amidst the general terror, he opposed the project of removing the convention beyond the Loire; but while he permitted the cruelties of anarchy, he secretly paved the way for his own elevation to the sovereign power. For a while Robespierre was his friend, but when he saw his superior eloquence, and his influence among the Jacobins, he marked him for destruction. Dragged before the bloody revolutionary tribunal which he had himself established, Danton showed firmness and indifference. He was guillotined the first day of April, 1794. Indolent yet cruel, ambitious, and vulgar, this bloody tyrant possessed with a stentorian voice, the imposing powers of persuasion, and while devoted to wine and low pleasures, he gained the good opinion of his guilty associates by gross ribaldry and licentious wit.

DANTZ, John Andrew, a learned Lutheran divine, born at Sanhusen near Gotha. After travelling in Holland and England, he settled at Jena, where as professor of the oriental tongues, and of theology, he distinguished himself. He died of an apoplexy, 1727, aged 73. He wrote Hebrew and Chaldee grammars—sinceritas sacræ scripturæ veteris testamenti—translations of rabbinical writings, dissertations, &c.

DARAN, James, a native of St. Frajon in Gascony, who became surgeon general in the imperial army at Turin and Milan. He refused the honourable offers of Amadeus to settle in Italy, and returned to France, where he died 1784, aged 83. He wrote a treatise on the virulent gonorrhœa—observations on the diseases of the urethra, &c. He was very expert in his operations in diseases of the bladder, of the urethra, &c.

DARCEY, N. an able chymist and physician of France, who was professor in the national institute, and died at Paris 1801, aged 75. He made some curious experiments with Rouelle and Macquer, and published some valuable memoirs on potteries, and on the various kinds of earth to be used in those manufactories. He also analyzed minerals, and gave to the public the state of the Pyrenees, with conjectures on the causes of their gradual wasting away, &c.

DARCI, Patrick count, a celebrated philosopher and engineer, born in Ireland 1725. As he was attached to the Stuart family, he removed to Paris in 1739, and at the age of 17 he distinguished himself by a new solution of the problem of the curve of equal pressure, in a resisting medium. He was engaged in the war of 1744, and was taken prisoner by the English. In 1760 he published his essay on artillery, with curious experiments on the charges of powder, &c. and in 1765 appeared his memoir on the duration of the sensation of sight. This is the most ingenious of his works, and proves him to be an accurate experimentalist. His memoir on hydraulic machines, and also his other works on experimental philosophy, evince a great genius, and a man who to the patience of observation united great and quick discrimination, and solidity of judgment. Though an exile he was attached to his country, and loved the name of an Irishman. He died at Paris, of a cholera morbus in 1779.

D'ARCON, John Claudius Eleonore Limicaud, a French engineer, was born at Pontarlier in 1733. He served in the seven years' war, and particularly at the defence of Cassel. In 1780 he was employed in conducting the siege of Gibraltar, where he displayed extraordinary talents. On the French Revolution he joined the popular side, and died in 1800. His works on Fortification and the Attack and Defence of Places, are numerous and valuable.—W. B.

DARGONNE, Dom. Bonaventure, a learned Carthusian monk, who died 1704, aged 64. He is author of un traité de la lecture des peres de l'église—des melanges d'histoire et de littérature—and other things.

DARIUS, the Mede, supposed to be the same as Cyaxares the son of Astyages, who died at Babylon, about 348 B. C.

Darius I. son of Hystaspes, was king of Persia after Cambyses, and after the destruction of the usurper Smerdis. His selection out of the seven nobles, who had united to dethrone the impostor, was owing to the neighing of his horse. He destroyed Babylon, and restored the captive Jews to their country. His forces were defeated at Marathon by Miltiades, and he died B. C. 485, as he prepared to invade Greece.

DARIUS II. king of Persia, after his father Artaxerxes, was father of Artaxerxes and Cyrus the younger. He died in the 19th year of his reign, B. C. 404.

DARIUS III. the last king of Persia, was defeated by Alexander the great, in the dreadful battles of Granicus, Issus, and Arbela, and was murdered as he fled from the field by Bessus, about 331 B. C.

DARKE, William, an officer in the war of the American revolution, was born in Pennsylvania in 1736. Removing to Virginia while young he joined the army of general Braddock, and was in the unfortunate battle in which that general fell. At the commencement of the war with Great Britain he received a captain's commission, and continued in the service till the peace, when he held the rank of major. In 1791 he was advanced to the command of a regiment in the army of general St. Clair, and distinguished himself in the disastrous battle of the 4th of November. After returning to Virginia he was appointed major general of the militia of that state. He died in November, 1801.

DARQUIER, Augustine, an eminent astronomer, born at Toulouse, 23d Nov. 1718. He early paid attention to mathematical and astronomical pursuits, and as he was blessed with a comfortable independence, he provided himself with the best instruments, and built an observatory in his own house. More generally to diffuse his extensive knowledge, he took pupils, whom he ably instructed in astronomy. He paid the expense of calculations to give greater accuracy to his observations, and received no pecuniary assistance whatever from the government. This learned and patriotic man died in his native town, 18th Jan. 1802, after escaping the storms of the revolution, and being admitted member of the national institute. He wrote 2 vols. of observations, published at his own expense—Lambert's cosmological letters, translated and printed at Utrecht—elements of geometry from Simpson—observations on the solar eclipse of 1778, from the Spanish of Ulloa—letters on practical astronomy. His last observations to March, 1798, appeared in La Lande's histoire celeste.

DARWIN, Erasmus, an English poet and physician, born at Newark in Nottinghamshire, 1732. As his family was respectable, he received a liberal education, and then entered at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he took his degree of M. B. 1755. From Cambridge he went to Edinburgh, where he more particularly devoted himself to the study of physic, and where he took his medical degrees. He afterwards settled at Lichfield, where he acquired great celebrity in his profession. His first wife was Miss Howard of Lichfield, who bore him three sons, and after her death, which happened in 1770, he married the widow of col. Pole, a lady of agreeable manners, and possessed of a handsome fortune, by whose persuasion, in 1781 he retired to Derby. He died at Derby very suddenly, 18th April, 1802. In private life Dr. Darwin was amiable and benevolent, in his conversation easy and entertaining, and in his manner affable. The best known of his works are his botanic garden with philosophical notes, in two parts—the economy of vegetation—the loves of the plants, 2 vols. 8vo.—zoo-nomia, or the laws of organic life, 4 vols.

Svo.—phytologia, or the philosophy of agriculture and gardening, 4to. He wrote besides, treatise on female education, 4to.—some papers in the philosophical transactions, on medical and philosophical subjects—a thesis on the movement of the heart and the arteries in consequence of the stimulus of the blood—the system of vegetables of Linnæus, published by the Lichfield botanical society, &c. As a poet and botanist, the name of Darwin is respectable, his verses display elegance, grace, and beauty, but they seldom rise to sublimity, and they please more by the easy flow of number, than by the fire of description. His graces are the tinsel of ornament, not the animated, the fiery language of the muse. In his system he branches out too much into the fields of fancy, and he seems delighted in informing his readers that his notions of religion were vague and unprincipled. Ovid, in another age, had changed men into trees and plants; but the poet of Lichfield transforms his flowers into human beings, and with all the feeling of carnal passion he describes the inhabitants of his parterre and of his green-house, as conveying their amorous sighs, and their tender glances, with all the art and coquetry of modern times.

DARWIN, Charles, son of Dr. Darwin, was born at Lichfield 1758, and educated at Christ's church, Oxford, and at Edinburgh, where he obtained the first prize medal from the Esculapian society in a treatise on the means of distinguishing pus from mucus. He wrote in Latin, an account of the retrograde motions of the absorbent vessels of animal bodies in some diseases, which his father published in English. He died 1778, at a time when his father promised himself much happiness from the exertions of his great and extensive abilities in the medical world.

DASSIER, John, medalist to the republic of Geneva, struck a series of the English kings, with a hope of procuring an establishment in the English mint, which however did not succeed. His nephew, James Anthony, in 1740, was appointed second engraver to the mint in London, but returned to Geneva five years after. The family were ingenious. They executed a set of the reformers in brass, small, and also large medals of the great men then living. Their bronze medals of Roman history are valuable.

DASSOUCI, a French musician and poet of the 17th century. He obtained celebrity by his buffoonery, and was introduced to the court of Lewis XIII. and XIV. He left Paris in 1655, and travelled through Lyons, where he was noticed and entertained by Moliere, and afterwards visited Turin, and other places, where, by his wit, drollery, and artifices, he maintained himself, and procured the patronage of the great. He died at the latter end of the 17th century. In 1674 he published two small volumes, composed in the Chatelet prison. He was ridiculed by Boileau, and severely lampooned by Cyrano de Bergerac, under the name of Soucidas.

DATAMES, an illustrious general of Persia, who, after the most meritorious services, was treated with contempt and suspicion, and in consequence revolted against his sovereign. He was assassinated by Mithridates, 361 B. C.

DATI, Augustin, a native of Sienna, where he became teacher of rhetoric and of the classics, and afterwards first magistrate. He wrote a treatise on the immortality of the soul—epistles—orations—the history of Sienna, &c. printed in 1 vol. fol. 1503, and he died 1478, aged 58.

DATI, Carlo, a native of Florence, professor of literature there. He was remarkable for the civility he showed to strangers who visited his native city, and he became known by his works, which consisted of Italian poems on Lewis XIV. and other things. He proved in one of his tracts, that Marsennus is not the inventor of the cycloid, but Galileo, and he also ascribes great merit to Toricelli, for the explanation of the suspension of quicksilver in a glass tube. His chief work, according to Boyle, is the life of four of the illustrious painters of ancient times, Zeuxis, Parrhasius, Apelles, and Protogenes. Dati died 1675, respected for his amiable manners not less than for his extensive erudition.

DAVAL, Peter, a barrister of the Middletemple, known as an able mathematician. He translated cardinal de Retz's memoirs, 1723, and died 8th Jan. 1763, being then accountant general to the court of chancery. His opinion on elliptical arches, at the time of building Blackfriars bridge, is recorded in the London Magazine, March, 1760.

DAVANZATI, Bernard, a native of Florence, who translated Tacitus into Italian, and wrote besides, treatises on Tuscan agriculture—history of the English schism—an account of exchanges, &c. and died 1606, aged 77.

DAUBENTON, John Lewis Marie, an eminent anatomist, born at Montbard in Burgundy, May, 1716. When he had completed his medical studies, he became the active associate of Buffon, in the preparation and the completion of his valuable natural history, and published besides instruction for shepherds—a treatise on trees and shrubs—and many curious and interesting memoirs on subjects of mineralogy—on the improvement of wool, &c. He was at first keeper of the royal museum, and in 1744 was elected member of the academy of sciences, and in 1799 he was chosen member of the conservative senate. He died 31st Dec. of the same year.

DAUBENTON, William, a Jesuit of Auxerre, confessor to Philip V. of Spain. It is supposed, that he enjoyed so much the royal confidence, that the monarch intrusted him with his intention of abdicating his throne, an important secret which the favourite disclosed to Orleans, regent of France. He died of an apoplexy, 1723, aged 75. He wrote some funeral orations—some sermons, 2 vols. folio, &c.

DAVENANT, John, bishop of Salisbury, was born in Watling-street, 1576, where his father was a merchant. He was educated at Queen's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow in 1597. He took his degree of D.D. 1609, and the same year was elected lady Margaret's divinity professor, and in 1614 was chosen master of his college. His learning recommended him to James I. who sent him with other eminent divines to the synod of Dort, 1618, and he was in 1621 raised to the see of Salisbury. He however incurred the king's displeasure, by treating in a discourse on predestination. He died of a consumption, 20th April, 1641, and was buried in his cathedral. He was a learned divine, and very exemplary in his manners, but a strong Calvinist. He published an exposition of the epistle to the Colossians,—questions on which he had disputed in the schools, in numbers, 49—animal versions on Hoard's treatises—and other theological tracts.

DAVENANT, William, an English poet, born at Oxford, 1605. As his father kept an inn there, and his mother was a great beauty, malevolence has wantonly insinuated that to Shakspeare, who generally stopped there on his road between London and Stratford, our author was indebted for his life and his poetical talents. Young Davenant received his grammar learning at Oxford, and then entered at Lincoln college; but his love of poetry led him from the university, and he became page to the dutchess of Richmond, and afterwards to lord Brooke, who himself had some poetical talents. In 1628 he began to write plays, and soon recommended himself to the friendship of the wits of the age. In consequence of a criminal intercourse with a black female in Axeyard, Westminster, he had about this time the misfortune to lose his nose; but though disfigured, and though ridiculed for the adventure, he did not part with his merriment, or the cause of his disgrace. In 1637, he succeeded Ben Jonson as poet laureate, but his attachment to the king's person produced an accusation against him, and he was charged with an attempt to seduce the army. He was bailed, and immediately withdrew to France, and afterwards on his return he was knighted by the king, near Gloucester, 1643. At the beginning of the civil troubles, he again retired to France, where probably to please the court, he changed his religion, and in consequence of the weight he thus acquired he was commissioned confidentially by the queen to persuade Charles to give up the church for his security, an intimation which highly displeased the king, who forbade Davenant ever to appear before him again. The queen afterwards employed him to transport some artificers from France to Virginia, but the ship was seized by the English cruisers, and Davenant thrown into prison, and threatened with persecution and death, from which, however, the friendship and interference of Milton and others saved him. After two years' confinement in the tower he was liberated, and now to maintain himself, he began, as tragedies were considered as profane, to exhibit moral virtues in verse, and to perform in recitative music. At the restoration he obtained a patent for acting plays in Lincoln's-Inn-fields. He died 17th April, 1668, aged 63, and was interred in Westminster abbey, where these words record his name, "O rare Sir William Davenant." His works were published by his widow in 1673, and dedicated to James duke of York. They consist of plays and poems in which is the famous Gondibert, in which his favourite black female is introduced.

DAVENANT, Charles, eldest son of the preceding, was born in 1656, and educated at Cheam, Surrey, and Baliol college, Oxford. He took no degree, and at the age of 19, he distinguished himself by the acting of the only tragedy he wrote, Circe, which appeared with great applause at the duke of York's theatre. From the theatre, however, where he had some interest from the property left by his father, he turned his thoughts to civil law, and had the degree of doctor conferred on him by Cambridge. He served for St. Ives in the parliament of 1685, and in 1698, and 1700, for Great Bedwin. He was appointed by James II. to inspect all plays, and preserve the decorum of the stage, and he afterwards held for 16 years the office of commissioner of excise, and lastly that of inspector general of the exports and imports, till his death, which happened sixth November, 1714. Dr. Davenant's knowledge of the constitution, and his great skill in figures, rendered him an able political and financial writer. Though some of his pamphlets for their freedom, their independence of language, and severity of censure, drew upon him the attacks of some able opponents, yet his abilities were universally acknowledged, and his opinion always highly respected. His first political work was an essay upon the ways and means of supplying the war, 1695, and he treated the subject in so masterly a manner, that whatever he afterwards wrote was sought with avidity, and read with deference. His other works are all upon political and financial subjects. They were the best part collected and revised by Sir Charles Whitworth in five vols. 8vo. 1771.

DAVENANT, William, fourth son of Sir William, was educated at Magdalen-hall, Oxford, where he took his degree of M.A. 1680, and entered into orders. He translated into English, la Mothe le Vayer's animadversions on Greek and Latin historians. He was presented to a living in Surrey by his friend Robert Wymond Sole, esquire, and it was in the company of this gentleman, that he visited Paris, where he was unfortunately drowned, as he was swimming for his diversion in the summer of 1631.

DAVENPORT, Christopher, a learned Englishman, born 1598, at Coventry, where he received his grammar education. He entered at Merton college, Oxford, and two years after went to Douay and Ypres, where he changed his religion and assumed the habit of a Franciscan. He afterwards travelled into England under the name of Sancta Clara, and was chaplain to queen Henrietta. In this office he was very active in advancing the cause of popery, by persuasion as well as by writing; and indeed so formidable did his influence appear, that one of the articles of impeachment against Laud, was his holding conferences with this dangerous Franciscan. During the civil wars Davenport was a fugitive residing sometimes abroad, and sometimes in London and Oxford, but after the restoration he was appointed chaplain to Catharine of Portugal, Charles's queen, and he was a third time made provincial of his order in England. He died 31st May, 1680. He wrote, among several works, paraphrastica expositio articulorum confessionis Anglicæ, et Deus, Natura, Gratia, in which he attempted to reconcile the king, the church, and the articles of religion, to the church of Rome.

DAVENPORT, John, elder brother to the preceding, was born at Coventry 1597, and entered at Merton college 1613. He did not, like his brother, become a papist, but a most zealous puritan. After being minister of St. Stephen's church, Coleman-street, and admired for his oratory, he passed over to Amsterdam, where the minister of the English church, John Paget, prevented his associating with his congregation, a measure which produced a controversy between the two divines. At the breaking out of the rebellion he returned to England, but soon after embarked for America, where he became minister of New-Haven. He died at Boston 1669. He wrote sermons—a catechism containing the chief heads of the Christian religion—and other theological tracts.

DAVENPORT, Addington, judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts, was graduated at Harvard college in 1689, and after having visited England, Spain, and the West Indies, returned to Boston, and sustained successively several of the most responsible offices in the government. He was clerk of the house of representatives and of the supreme court and court of common pleas, a member of the council, and in 1715, was appointed a judge of the supreme court. He died April 2d, 1736, aged 66.  L.

DAVID, king of Israel, was born at Bethlehem 1085, B. C. and anointed by Samuel, whilst he was keeping the flocks of his father Jesse. His courage in killing the giant Goliath, with a sling and a stone, rendered him conspicuous in Israel, but Saul, who at first wished to patronise him, grew jealous of his popularity, and pursued him with the intention of putting him to death. Thus expelled from his country, David wandered among the neighbouring nations, always respected for valour and integrity, and at the death of Saul, he was acknowledged king of the tribe of Judah. After some time, on the death of Ishbosheth the son of Saul, who had been placed on his father's throne by the intrigues of Abner, David was received as sole monarch by all the tribes of Israel, and his reign for thirty years was marked by prosperity, glory, and fame. He extended his dominion over some of the adjoining countries, and took Jerusalem the city of the Jebusites, which he called the city of David; but his reputation was stained by his adulterous intercourse with Bathsheba, and his foul murder of Uriah her husband. In a moment of arrogance too he caused the people to be numbered, which was severely punished by the visitation of a plague. His transgressions were also visited by dissension in his own family, and by the revolt of his favourite son Absalom who proclaimed himself king. The death of this prince, who was slain by Joab, greatly affected the mourning father, who in his old age resigned the government into the hands of Solomon his son. David died aged 70, B. C. 1015, highly respected for his character of benevolence, courage, and piety. The psalms which he composed, in a strain of great sublimity and commanding eloquence, are strong proofs of his devotion as well as of his trust in the Divine Providence.

DAVID, Saint, the patron of Wales, was a native of the province, and educated at Bangor in the 5th century. He founded several monasteries in Wales, where his monks maintained themselves by their labour and industry. He governed the see of St. David's 65 years, and was buried in the cathedral there. The symbol of the leek attributed to him is supposed to originate in the custom of Cymbortha, still observed among the farmers of the country, where in assisting one another in ploughing the land, they bring each their leeks to the common repast of the whole party.

DAVID, an Armenian philosopher, in the middle of the 5th century, who studied at Athens. He translated some of the works of Plato and Aristotle, and other learned Greeks, which are preserved in the French king's library.

DAVID, de Dinant, a disciple of Amauri, in the beginning of the 13th century, who taught that God was original matter, a system afterwards nearly adopted by Spinoza.

DAVID, George, a fanatic of Ghent, educated as a glazier. In 1525 he began to preach as the true Messiah, the third David, the nephew of God. This strange doctrine created followers and persecution, and he fled to Friesland, and afterwards to Basil, where he died 1556. He prophesied that after three days he would rise again, and about that time the magistrates of Basil, in contempt of his opinions, dug up his body, which, together with his writings was burnt by the executioner.

DAVID, de Pomis, a Jewish physician of the 16th century, who pretended to be descended from the true stock of Judah. He wrote de senum affectibus, 8vo.—a rabbinical dictionary, Hebrew and Italian, Venice, folio, 1587, very useful and learned.

DAVID, Gantz, a Jewish historian of the 16th century, author of a Hebrew chronicle, 4to. part of which was translated into Latin by Vorstius, with notes, Leyden 1644, 4to.

DAVID, of Hirazug, a Welsh divine and poet, called the black, about 1350. He altered and improved the grammar and prosody of Edeyrn, at the time of the conquest of his country by Edward I. and according to the new institutions and manners which that era produced, the missal or the office of the Virgin was translated by him into Welsh, and is still preserved.

DAVID EL DAVID, a Persian Jew, in the 12th century, who pretended to be the Messiah, and prevailed upon some of his countrymen to support his imposture. He was at last defeated and beheaded in the king's presence, who ordered the Jews to be massacred through the empire.

DAVID AB GWILIM, a celebrated Welsh bard, patronised by Ivor the Generous.

His poetry, which possessed beauty, fire, and sublimity, was chiefly on subjects of love, and 147 of his poems were inscribed to the fair Morvid his mistress, who however proved unkind to his merits, and married Rhys Gwgan, an officer, who distinguished himself in the English army at the battle of Cressy. His works were edited at London 1789.

DAVID, emperor of Trebizonde, after John his brother, was of the imperial family of the Comneni. He was defeated by Mahomet II. who insolently offered him the choice either of being converted to Mahometanism, or to suffer death. He heroically chose death, and suffered 1461.

DAVID AP EDMUND, a Welsh poet in the 15th century, born at Hanmer in Flintshire. He was the president of an assembly of bards, who met at Caermarthen, at the request of Edward IV. and were opposed by a poetical band from another province. At that meeting a number of canons of poetry were established and agreed upon.

DAVID I. earl of Northumberland and Huntingdon, was king of Scotland, after his brother Alexander the Fierce 1124. He was brought up in England, and married Maud the grand niece of William the conqueror, and after the death of the first Henry, he maintained with spirit the claims of the empress Maud to the English throne against Stephen. To enforce her pretensions he entered England, and seized Carlisle, which, though conquered afterwards at the battle of North Allerton 1138, he was permitted to retain. He died at Carlisle 11th May, 1153, universally respected as a mild, popular, and benevolent king.

DAVID II. king of Scotland, was son of Robert Bruce, whom he succeeded when five years old. During the invasion of his country by Baliol, he was conveyed to France, but returned after the defeat of his enemies, 1342. He was in 1346 taken prisoner by an English army, after a valiant resistance, and sent a close prisoner to the tower, from which, after a long confinement of 10 years, he was liberated on paying a heavy ransom. He died 1371, aged 47, leaving no issue by his wife Jane, daughter of Edward II. of England.

DAVIDIS, Francis, a Hungarian, who at various times embraced the tenets of the Roman Catholics, the Lutherans, the Calvinists, the Unitarians, &c. As he opposed both Socinus and Blandrata, and declared that no worship was due to Christ, he was accused of favouring Judaism, and was in consequence thrown into prison, where he died 1579. He wrote some tracts on the millennium, and other theological subjects.

DAVIDSON, William, brigadier general in the army of the American revolution, was born in Pennsylvania in 1746. He removed in early life to North Carolina, and at the commencement of the war with Great Britain, was appointed major in one of the regiments of that state, and served with it in the army under Washington, in New-Jersey, till 1779, when being advanced to a lieutenant colonelcy, he was detached to reinforce the southern army. He escaped being captured with his corps at the surrender of Charleston, and was soon after appointed, with the rank of brigadier general, to command the militia of North Carolina, which were called into service. He fell at the ford of the Catawba, in endeavouring to prevent the passage of Cornwallis. He was a brave and skilful officer. Congress expressed the high respect in which they held him by voting to erect a monument to his memory. [F L.]

DAVIE, William R. governor of North Carolina, was born at the village of Egremont, England, June 20, 1756. He came to South Carolina in 1763, and received his education at Princeton, where he graduated in 1776. After studying law a short time, he entered the army as a lieutenant in the cavalry attached to the legion of Pulaski, and was wounded in the attack on the British at Stono. He afterwards raised a legionary corps for North Carolina, and commanding it with the rank of major, protected the country near Camden. He was at length appointed colonel of the cavalry of the state, and when general Greene took command of the southern army, he was made commissary, and discharged the arduous duties of the office with great ability. After the peace, he established himself in Halifax as a lawyer, and rose to eminence in the profession. He was not long after chosen a delegate to congress, and in 1787, a member of the convention which formed the constitution of the United States. Unavoidable absence prevented his affixing his name to that instrument. He approved of it, and did much to promote its ratification by North Carolina. In 1790, he was appointed judge of the district court of the United States, but declined the office, and on the organization of the provincial army in 1798, received the commission of brigadier general. He was the same year chosen governor of the state, and in 1799, appointed one of the commissioners for negotiating a treaty with France. Soon after returning from that mission, he retired from public life, though he still rendered himself a highly useful member of society by his exertions to promote the progress of the arts and sciences. He died at Camden, November 8th, 1820, aged 64. He was uncommonly dignified in his person and manners, greatly distinguished for intrepidity and skill as a soldier, for ability and uprightness at the bar, and for amiableness, affability, and hospitality in private life.

DAVIES, Sir John, a lawyer and poet, born at Chisgrove, Wilts, 1570. He was of Queen's college, Oxford, and then removed to the middle temple, where he was called to the bar. He was member of parliament in 1601, and on the queen's death went with Lord Hunsdon and others to Scotland to congratulate James, who knowing the character of his writings, received him with great cordiality and respect. He was solicitor and attorney-general to the king in Ireland, and also speaker of the Irish house, and on returning to England in 1612, he was made an English sergeant at law, afterwards one of the judges, and in 1626 lord chief justice of the king's bench. He died, however, suddenly of an apoplexy before his installation. He was a man of great spirit, of extensive erudition, but more distinguished for wit and learning than as an able lawyer. His nosce teipsum, on the nature and immortality of the soul, a poem dedicated to queen Elizabeth, has gone through several editions. He wrote, besides smaller poems, orchestra—on dancing—hymns of Astrea, &c. edited 1773, in 12mo. and some law tracts—an abridgment of sir Edward Coke's reports—jus imponendi vectigalia, &c. edited 1786, 8vo. Sir John married Eleanor, daughter of lord Touchet, by whom he had a son, an idiot, who died young, and Lucy, who married lord Huntingdon. Lady Davies pretended to be a prophetess, and the Sunday before her husband's death, she suddenly burst into tears, which she declared were his funeral tears. She died in London 1552, and was buried at St. Martin's in the fields, near her husband. An account of her wonderful and strange prophecies was published in 1649.

DAVIES, John, was born at Llanveres in Denbighshire, and educated at Ruthin school by Morgan, afterwards bishop of St. Asaph. He was of Jesus, and afterwards of Lincoln college, Oxford. He took his doctor's degree 1616, and became rector of Mallwyd and canon of St. Asaph. He was an excellent scholar, and well acquainted with the history and antiquities of his country. His works are—Antiquæ linguæ Britannicæ, nunc dictæ Cambro-Britannicæ, &c. rudimenta, 1621, 8vo. Dictionarium Latino-Britannicum, folio, 1632. Adagia Britannica, &c. He also assisted his friends bishops Morgan and Parry, to translate the Bible into Welsh. He died 1664.

DAVIES, John, an eminent critic, born in London 22d April, 1679. He was educated at the charter-house and Queen's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow in 1701. In 1711, he was made rector of Fen-ditton, near Cambridge, and prebendary of Ely, and 1717, chosen master of his college and created D.D. He died 7th March, 1732, aged 53, and was buried in the chapel of his college. He was the learned editor of the works of Maximus Tyrius, Cæsar, Minucius Felix, Cicero's philosophical pieces, &c. Lactantius, &c. Though universally admired as the editor of these valuable classics, yet the abbé d'Olivet has censured Dr. Davies as a puerile, weak, and injudicious annotator.

DAVIES, John, a poet and writing master. He was educated at Oxford, and afterwards resided in Fleet-street. Most of his poetical pieces are mentioned by Wood. He wrote also the scourge of folly, in epigrams, and the anatomy of fair writing, a copy-book, &c. He died about 1618.

DAVIES, Samuel, president of the college of New-Jersey, was a native of Delaware, and born the 3d of November, 1724. He entered the ministry at an early age, and immediately rendered himself conspicuous by his eminently popular talents. In 1748, he was settled in Hanover county, Virginia, and laboured there with remarkable success till 1759. He was then chosen president of the college, a station for which he was most happily fitted, by his superior intelligence, fervid eloquence, and ardent piety. He had several years before gone to England, and obtained considerable benefactions to the seminary. He died January 1761, at the early age of 36. He was distinguished alike by a superiority of genius, love of knowledge, patriotism, and devotedness to his professional duties, and enjoyed the highest rank among his contemporaries in usefulness and popularity. A selection of his sermons have been published in 3 volumes, octavo.  L.

DAVIES, Thomas, a bookseller. He was in 1728 at the university of Edinburgh, and in 1736 appeared as an actor at the Haymarket theatre. He then commenced bookseller in Duke's court, but soon returned to the theatre, and after strolling over the country he appeared in 1752 at Drury-lane, with his wife, a Miss Yarrow, a woman of great beauty and unspotted virtue. In 1762, he again commenced a bookseller in Russel-street, and in 1773 became a bankrupt, but the influence and friendship of Dr. Johnson, and a benefit at Drury-lane from Mr. Sheridan, restored him to the comforts of independence. In 1780, he published his life of Garrick, which improved his income and enlarged the number of his friends. He also wrote memoirs of Henderson, a life of Massinger, of Dr. John Eachard, Mr. Lillo, sir John Davies, and also dramatic miscellanies, 3 vols. besides some fugitive pieces in the newspapers. He died 5th May, 1785, and was buried in the vault of St. Paul's, Covent-garden.

DAVILA, Henry Catherine, a celebrated historian, born at Cyprus, from which he fled when that island was subdued by the Turks, 1571. He came to Avila in Spain, where he understood his family originated, and he afterwards passed to France, where he became a favourite at the court of Henry III. The death of the monarch disconcerted the plans of Davila, who expected there for himself, his brother, and two sisters, a permanent settlement, and though he remained for a little while in the service of Henry IV. he went to Venice, where he was honourably received. On his way to Verona, on the affairs of the Venetian republic, he was grossly insulted by a person who at last discharged a pistol at him, and wounded him mortally. The son of Davila, a youth of 18, revenged his death, and immediately cut the assassin to pieces. During his residence at Venice, Davila wrote in Italian his history of the civil wars of France in fifteen books, from the death of Henry II. 1559 to 1598. This history, considered by Bolingbroke as equal to Livy's annals, is highly esteemed for its authenticity, correctness, and the elegance of the composition. The best edition is that of London, 2 vols. 4to. 1755.

DAVILA, Peter Francis, a famous Spanish naturalist, who in the pursuit of conchyliology and mineralogy, corresponded with the most learned men in Europe. He died at Madrid 1785. An account of his valuable cabinet was published in 3 vols.

DAVIS, Henry Edwards, a native of Windsor, 11th July, 1756. He was educated at Ealing, Middlesex, and at Baliol college, Oxford, of which he became fellow and tutor. In 1778 he wrote his examination of Gibbon's decline and fall of the Roman empire, a work which, though the production of a young man, was considered as so respectable, that of many attacks it was the only one which the historian deigned to answer. He died 10th February, 1784, of a lingering illness, and left behind him a most respectable character for erudition, for goodness of heart, and amiableness of manners. He was buried at Windsor.

DAVIS, John, a native of Sandridge, Devonshire, early inured to a sea life. He obtained in 1585 the command of some vessels to discover a northwest passage to the East-Indies, and he gave his name to the straits which he visited, and the next year he proceeded in his spirit of discovery to the coast of Greenland, and as high as the 73d degree of north latitude. He was with Cavendish in 1591, in his expedition to the South Seas, and afterwards he was employed in five voyages to the East-Indies. He was not only an able seaman but a correct writer, as appears by the account of his voyages which he published. He was unfortunately killed on the shores of Malacca in a quarrel with some Japanese, 1605.

DAVISON, Jeremiah, born in England, of Scotch parents, was pupil to Lely, and excelled in painting satyrs. He died 1745.

DAUMIUS, Christian, a native of Misnia, regent of the college of Zwickau, where he died 1687, aged 75. He gave proofs of his learning in his tractatus de causis amissarum linguæ Latinæ radicum, 8vo.—epistolæ, 4to.—indagator et restitutor linguæ Græc. radicum,—and poems.

DAUN, Leopold count, a great general, born in 1705. He was colonel in 1740, and distinguished himself in the wars of Maria Theresa, and afterwards with greater glory in the relief of Prague, &c. against the king of Prussia, whom he defeated at Chotchemitch in 1757, to commemorate which great victory the empress instituted the military order which bears her name. He again distinguished himself at the battle of Hochkirchen in 1758, and at the siege of Dresden, but he was totally defeated at Siplitz near Torgau, in 1760. The peace of 1763 restored him and the country to tranquillity, and he died at Vienna 5th February, 1766, at the age of 61, leaving behind him the character of a brave and circum-spect general, a humane and benevolent man, and a devout Christian.

DAUNOIS, Countess, acquired some celebrity, by her romances and travels in Spain. She died 1705.

DAURAT, John, a French poet, born near the head of the Vienne, 1507. He so ably distinguished himself by his learning and application, that he became Greek professor at Paris, and evinced the superiority of his mode and powers of education, by the number of able and illustrious scholars who studied under him. Though learned, he was careless of his affairs, and consequently poor. Charles IX. made him his poet laureate, and was frequently delighted with his conversation. Daurat restored the custom of writing anagrams, in which he was very successful, and so prolific was his muse, that it is said he wrote in Greek and Latin, not less than 50,000 verses, besides poems in French. He was, as Scaliger observes, a good critic; but he foolishly employed the last years of his life in finding out the Bible in Homer's verses. After losing his first wife, by whom he had some children, he at the age of 80 married a young girl, by whom he had a son. He died at Paris 1588, aged 81.

DAWES, Sir William, an English prelate, born at Lyons near Braintree, Essex, 12th

September, 1671. From Merchant-tailors' school he went to St. John's college, Oxford; but about two years after, in consequence of the death of his two elder brothers, and his inheriting the estates of his father sir John Dawes, bart. he removed to Cambridge, as nobleman of Catharine-hall. Soon after taking his degree of M.A. he married Frances, daughter of sir Thomas Darcy, and at the proper age entered into orders, and in 1696, after being made D.D. by royal mandate, he was elected master of his college. King William, who was pleased with one of his sermons, gave him a prebend of Worcester, and he was afterwards made rector and dean of Bocking, Essex, in every situation recommending himself to the good opinion of his neighbours, by his affable, benevolent, and charitable conduct. On the accession of queen Anne, he was made one of the royal chaplains; but a sermon which he preached offended some of the ministers, and the see of Lincoln, intended for him, was conferred on Wake, 1705. Two years after, however, the queen named him for the see of Chester, and in 1714 he was translated to York. He died of a diarrhœa, and an inflammation of the bowels, 30th April, 1724, and was buried near his lady in Catharine-hall. He had seven children, three of whom only survived him. This respectable and worthy man published an anatomy of Atheism, a short poem, 1693—the duties of the closet—sermons preached on several occasions—the duty of communicating, &c.—a preface to Blackall's works. His whole works were collected in 1733 in 3 vols. 8vo.

DAWES, Richard, the celebrated author of Miscellanea Critica, was born in 1708, and educated under the famous Anthony Blackwall, and afterwards at Emanuel college, Cambridge. In 1736 he published a specimen of a Greek translation of Paradise Lost. His attack upon Bentley, is censured by Toup. He was elected master of Newcastle-upon-Tyne school, 1738, which he resigned eleven years after, and died in 1766 at Heworth near Newcastle. His miscellanea critica has been very learnedly edited by bishop Burgess, Oxford, 1781.

DAWSON, John, a mathematician, was born at Garsdale, in Yorkshire, in 1734. He was bred to the medical profession; but afterwards he became an eminent teacher of mathematics at Sedburgh, where he instructed many who afterwards stood high as senior wranglers at Cambridge. In the early part of his life he had a controversy with Emerson on Newton's system of analysis; another with Dr. Stewart on the distance of the sun; and latterly one with Mr. Wildbore on the discharge of fluids from vessels in motion. He also wrote a tract against Priestley on the doctrine of Philosophical Necessity. He died Sept. 20, 1820.—W. B.

DAY, John, an eminent printer, who had a shop in Aldersgate-street, and another at the west door at St. Paul's. He died 23d July, 1584. His name deserves to be commemorated, not only as the printer of a Bible dedicated to Edward VI. of Latimer's sermons, of Tyndall's works, of the book of martyrs, &c. but as a man whose great diligence in his profession, widely disseminated knowledge, and advanced, not in a slight degree, the progress of the reformation.

DAY, Thomas, an eminent writer, born in London, 22d June, 1748. His father was a collector of the customs, and at his death left him an unprotected infant, but with an income of 1200*l.* a year. After being eight or nine years at the Charterhouse, he entered at Corpus Christi, Oxford, where he, however, took no degree. He afterwards wished to apply himself to the study of medicine, from which he was dissuaded by his friend Dr. Small, of Birmingham, and he at last entered at the Middle temple, and was called duly to the bar, but never practised. In his opinions of mankind he was romantic, he was an enthusiastic admirer of virtue, and had such detestation of female seduction that he challenged, to no effect, a nobleman whom report described as a vile and licentious violater of virgin innocence. In his schemes of visionary perfection, he selected two girls from the poor-house at Shrewsbury, with the intention of educating them after the principles of Rousseau, and of selecting one of them for his wife; but the conduct and affection of the two young women did not answer his sanguine expectations, though he honourably performed his engagements towards them, and presented them with 500*l.* each, when respectably married, the one to his friend Mr. Bicknell, and the other to a creditable tradesman. In the beginning of the American war, he embraced the part of the colonies, against the conduct of the mother country, and he published some political tracts, and two poems called the devoted legions, and the desolation of America. Though long regardless of the sex, and afterwards disappointed in his addresses, he married Miss Esther Milnes, and retired to the enjoyments of domestic life and of agricultural pursuits on his estates in Essex and Surrey. In the association for the redress of grievances, Mr. Day was frequently a leading man, and an eloquent speaker, and in 1756 he published a pamphlet against the increase of taxes, and another concerning the bill in parliament for the exportation of wool. The work which has gained him celebrity, is his Sandford and Merton, in three vols. published separately, in 1783, 86, and 89, for the information of youth, a composition of singular merit, which, to simplicity of diction, and interesting anecdotes, unites respect for virtue, morality, and religion. On the 28th Sept. 1789, Mr. Day attempted, with more boldness than prudence, to ride a favourite but untamed horse, which by a sudden plunge, threw off his rider, and by a violent kick on the head, put an immediate end to his existence. Mrs. Day heard the afflicting intelligence with horror; she closed the curtains of her bed, and never again suffered the light of the sun to visit them, and after two years spent in this melancholy retirement, she followed her husband to the grave. The epitaph which Mr. Day had written and designed for his friend Doctor Small's tomb, was inscribed on his own.

DAYTON, Elias, a revolutionary officer, was appointed by congress colonel of a New-Jersey regiment in Feb. 1778; and at the close of the war was promoted to the rank of brigadier general. His services were particularly useful when the enemy under Kniphausen penetrated into Jersey, in directing the execution of the measures adopted for their annoyance; after the war was concluded, he held the office of major general of the militia. In private life he sustained a high reputation. He died at Philadelphia, July, 1807, aged 71.

DAYTON, John, governor of South Carolina, after having held several subordinate stations, was elected to that office in 1800, and again in 1808. He was afterwards appointed district judge of the United States, and held the place till his death, at Charleston, November 27th, 1822, in his 61st year. He published a view of South Carolina, and memoirs of the revolution in that state.

DEACON, James, an English gentleman, known for his skill in music, drawing, and painting. He died May, 1750.

DEAGEANT, de ST. MARCELLIN, Guichard, a French writer, at first in the service of marshal d'Ancre, and afterwards of the duke of Luynes, whom he assisted against his first patron. He was employed as an able negotiator by the court, and when he became a widower, Lewis XIII. wished to make him bishop of Evreux, but he preferred a second wife and politics to ecclesiastical honours. In the fluctuations of court favours, he was at last disgraced and sent in exile to Dauphiny, where he died 1639, in a good old age. He wrote some memoirs of state from the time of Henry IV. to the year 1624, which, though inelegant, contain some curious particulars.

They were printed by his grandson at Grenoble in 12mo. 1668.

DEANE, Silas, minister of the United States to the court of France, was born at Groton, Connecticut, and educated at Yale college. He was elected a member of the congress of 1774, and two years after sent to France as a commercial and political agent; but not discharging the duties of the station satisfactorily to the American government, he was superseded in 1777, and returned. Failing to vindicate himself from the charge of having embezzled the public money, he lost his reputation, and returning to Europe, died in poverty at Deal, England, in August, 1789.

DEBORAH, a prophetess of Israel, who prevailed on Baruch to attack Sisera the general of Jabin. When her countrymen had obtained the victory, she composed a beautiful ode, B.C. 1285.

DE BURE, William Francis, a bookseller at Paris, well known for his bibliographic instructive, 7 vols. 8vo. 1763, &c. He died at Paris, 15th July, 1782, aged 50.

DECATUR, Stephen, captain in the navy of the United States, was born on the 5th of January, 1779, in Maryland, and educated in Philadelphia, the residence of his parents. He entered the navy in 1798, and first distinguished himself in 1804, when he held a lieutenancy, by planning and accomplishing the destruction of the American frigate Philadelphia, which had fallen into the hands of the enemy. That bold adventure procured him the rank of post captain. At the bombardment of Tripoli the next year he signalized himself by the capture of two of the enemy's boats. His principal naval actions during the last war with Great Britain, were with the British ship Macedonian, in October, 1812, which he captured; and on the 15th of January, 1815, with the Endymion, when in consequence of the presence of several other British vessels, he was forced to surrender. He soon returned to the United States, and in the summer of that year was despatched with a squadron to the Mediterranean, for the purpose of compelling the Algerines, who were harassing the commerce of the United States, to a peace. On his passage he captured a ship of 46, and a brig of 22 guns, belonging to that nation; and on arriving before Algiers succeeded in obtaining a peace honourable to the American nation. On returning to the United States he was appointed a member of the board of commissioners for the navy, and held the office until the 22d of March, 1820, when he unhappily deprived himself of the high reputation he had before enjoyed, and lost his life, by engaging in a duel with captain James Barron. In consequence of his having "died in the violation of the laws of God and his country," congress, which was in session at the time, refused officially to yield him the marks of respect which are customarily paid to persons of distinction who die at the seat of government.

DECEBALUS, a king of Decia, who by his valour in defeating the Roman legions, obtained a yearly tribute from Domitian and Nero. Trajan, more warlike, refused to pay the disgraceful subsidy, and conquered Decabalus, and reduced his country to a Roman province, 105.

DECEMBRIO, Peter Candido, a native of Pavia, secretary to the pope, and afterwards to Alphonsus king of Arragon. He wrote lives of Philip Maria Visconti, and Francis Sforza, dukes of Milan,—and besides, published Italian translations of Quintus Curtius, and Livy—and a Latin version of Diodorus Siculus, of Appian, and of part of Homer. He died at Milan, 1477, aged 78.

DECHALES, Claudius Francis Milliet, an eminent mathematician and astronomer, born at Chamberry, 1611. He was not less respectable in private life than as a man of learning. He read public lectures at Paris for four years, and afterwards taught navigation at Marseilles, and died professor of mathematics at Turin, 28th March, 1678, aged 67. His works, containing an edition of Euclid's elements—discourses on fortification and navigation—architecture—optics—hydrostatics—trigonometry, &c. were first collected in three vols. folio, called Mundus mathematicus, as a complete course of mathematics, and they were afterwards improved and published in 4 vols. 1690, at Lyons.

DECIO, Philip, a native of Milan, lecturer in jurisprudence at Pisa, Pistoia, and other places in Italy, where he acquired such celebrity that no one could dispute with him. He afterwards settled in France, but died at Pisa, 1635, aged 82.

DECIVS, a Roman consul, immortalized in the annals of his country, for devoting himself to the gods manes in the midst of a battle against the Latins, and thus ensuring the victory to his army. His son and grandson on similar occasions followed his glorious example, and thus obtained the victory for their country.

DECIVS, a Roman emperor after Philip. He defeated the Persians in battle, but unfortunately perished in a morass with his army, in a fight against the Goths, 251, A.D.

DECKER, or DECKHER, John, a learned Jesuit, born at Hazebruck, in Flanders, was professor of theology at Douai and Louvain. He was sent on an embassy into Nitra, and was made chancellor of Gratz university, where he died 1619, aged 69. He wrote Veliñatio seu theoremata de anno ortus ac mortis domini, 4to.—tabula chronographica a captâ per Pompcium Jerosolymâ ad deletam a Tito urbem, 4to. in which he displayed great erudition and extensive knowledge of chronology.

DECKER, Thomas, a poet, in the reign of James I. He acquired some celebrity by the satire of Ben Jonson, who ridiculed him, in his Poetaster, under the name of Crispinus. Decker resented the affront in his play of Satyromastix, where Jonson, under the name of young Horace, is the hero of the piece; and so successful and popular was the poetic invective, that the play was universally followed. Decker wrote three of his plays in conjunction with Webster, and one with Rowley and Ford; and though his abilities were not of a superior degree, yet he was admired, and his "honest whore," and "old Fortunatus," are said to possess merit equal to any of the compositions of other theatrical writers, Shakspeare excepted. The time of his birth and death is unknown, though it is certain he was alive after 1638.

DE COETLOGON, Charles Edward, an English divine, was the son of Dr. De Coetlogon, a French physician, and the author of a history of the arts and sciences. He was brought up in Christ's hospital, and delivered the speech to their late majesties when they went to dine with the lord mayor, in 1761. He soon after removed to Pembroke-hall, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, and on entering into orders became assistant to Mr. Martin Madan, at the chapel of the Lock-hospital. He was afterwards presented to the rectory of Godstone, in Surrey, and died Sept. 16, 1820. Mr. De Coetlogon was a strict Calvinist, and at one period highly popular as a preacher. His principal works are—1. Portraiture of a Christian Penitent, 2 vols. 8vo.—2. Ten Discourses delivered in the mayoralty of Alderman Pickett.—3. Theological Miscellany, 6 vols. 8vo.—4. The Temple of Truth, 3 vols. 8vo.—5. Character of the late king, 8vo.—W. B.

DEDEKIND, Frederic, a German of the 16th century, who published a very ingenious ironical eulogium on incivility and rudeness, intituled, Grobianus, sive de incultis moribus et inurbanis gestibus, Franckfort, 8vo. 1558.

DEE, John, a mathematician of eminence, born in London, 18th July, 1527. He was educated at Chelmsford, and St. John's college, Cambridge, where, for three years, he says he devoted each day 4 hours to sleep, 2 to meals and exercise, and 18 to study. He went to the low countries in 1547, and on his return he was made fellow of Trinity college, just founded by Henry VIII. His attention to mathematical studies, so closely connected with astronomy, and, in those days, to astrology, brought upon him at this time the suspicion of magician; and, to avoid this, he retired to Louvain, in 1578, where it is supposed he took the degree of LL.D. In 1551 he visited Paris, where he read lectures on Euclid's elements; but the most flattering promises could not prevail upon him to settle there. He therefore returned to England, 1551, and was so highly respected that he was presented to the king, and made rector of Upton-upon-Severn. In Mary's reign his correspondence with Elizabeth's friends exposed him to the suspicions of treason, and therefore he was arrested, and at last with difficulty set at liberty. He paid his court to queen Elizabeth, who flattered him with compliments; but the general belief of his being a conjurer was in the way of his promotion, and the books which he published countenanced the imputation, from the mysterious language and incomprehensible subjects which they contained. In 1564 he left England to present a work to the emperor Maximilian; and, in 1571, the queen paid such respect to his celebrity that she sent two physicians to attend him when confined by sickness in Louvain. On his return to England he settled at Mortlake, where he collected a choice library of above 4000 volumes; which, however, during his absence, in 1583, was plundered by the populace, who firmly believed that he had a familiar connexion with the devil, by his magical incantations. The appearance of a new star in 1572, and of a comet in 1577, gave him opportunities of distinguishing himself as an astronomer; and he engaged the queen's patronage by his able assertion of her right to the countries discovered by her subjects, and by his ingenious plans for the reformation of the calendar. In 1581 he began his attempts to penetrate more deeply into futurity, and, assisted by Kelly, a young man of Worcestershire, he launched forth into those extravagancies in mystery and superstition by which he pretended to hold intercourse with departed spirits. For two years he was engaged in these unbecoming pursuits, and was at last persuaded by Albert Laski, a Polish lord, who entertained the same notions of astrology, to pass over to the continent, more securely to indulge their mysterious incantations. After travelling through Germany, the three conjurers reached Poland, and, after an introduction to the emperor Rodolph, and to Stephen king of Poland, Dee and Kelly were at last, after the exhibition of some magical tricks, banished from the country by the interference of the pope's nuncio. The noise of this fanatical adventure reached Elizabeth, who desired Dee to return. He obeyed, and travelling with great pomp and becoming solemnity, reached England 23d November, 1589, and a few days after was presented to the queen, who received him graciously. But though so powerful over supernatural agents, Dee was poor, and therefore he petitioned the queen for a liberal subsistence. Two commissioners were appointed to examine his papers and the transactions of his life; and though their report was favourable, he yet obtained no relief. At last, however, by the interference of lady Warwick and archbishop Whitgift, he obtained the chancellorship of St. Paul's, and two years after the wardenship of Manchester college, where he spent seven years in a disturbed and unquiet manner. In 1604 he petitioned James that he might be tried, and that all aspersions of magical incantations might be wiped away from his character; but the king, knowing the habits of his life, disregarded it; and Dee at last removed to Mortlake, where he began again to practise his mysterious arts. Though old and infirm, Dee still believed in his astrological calculations, and the vanity and ostentatious ambition which for above fifty years he had displayed forsook him not when sinking into the grave. He died miserably poor, in 1608, aged 80, and was buried at Mortlake. He was twice married, and he left a numerous family. The eldest of his sons, Arthur, was brought up under Camden, and was physician to Charles I. His writings were very numerous; but besides what he published, several MSS. are preserved in the Cotton library and in the Ashmolean museum. His notes and preface to Billingsley's Euclid, and some other works, prove him to have been a very able mathematician. An account of his communications with spirits, and his conferences with the emperor of Germany and the king of Poland, written by his own hand, was published, with a curious preface, by Dr. Merie Casaubon, in 1659, fol. and it attracted for some time the public attention. Dr. Hooke, some years after, attempted to show that Dee was not an astrologer, but that he was a spy, and that the figures and hieroglyphics he used were not those of an enthusiast or magician, but of an artful man, employed to watch the conduct and develop the measures of government. To this conjecture, however, few assented.

DEFESCH, William, a German, eminent for his skill on the violin. He was leader of the band at Marybone-gardens, and also composed for Vauxhall. His musical compositions, songs, and ballads, were much admired. He died about 1750, aged 70.

DE FOE, Daniel, was born in the parish of St. Giles's, Cripplegate, about 1668, where his father, James Foe, was a butcher. He was educated among the dissenters, and warmly embraced their tenets; and he probably prefixed De to his name to conceal the obscurity of his origin. He was early an author, and published, 1680, a pamphlet on the contest between the Turks and Austrians. In 1683 he followed in arms the fortunes of Monmouth, and escaped, much to the wonder of all his historians, the sanguinary grasp of Jeffries. He became a liveryman of London, 1688, and zealously favoured the revolution. About this time he was a hosier, though he afterwards denied the occupation; and in 1692 he was so reduced, either by misconduct or by the unfavourable circumstances of the times, that he fled from his creditors, though he afterwards very honourably discharged the best part of his debts. Though offered a respectable commercial situation at Cadiz by his friends, he determined to live by his pen. In 1695 he was made accountant to the commissioners of the glass duty, in which he continued till the suppression of the tax in 1699. He now published various pamphlets on political and temporary subjects, one of which, his "true-born Englishman," a satire, in verse, in defence of the revolution, recommended him to the notice of king William. His "shortest way with the dissenters," in 1702, as it reflected on the government and the church, was noticed by the house of commons, and he was sentenced to stand in the pillory, to be fined, and imprisoned. He was liberated from his confinement in 1704, by the friendship of Harley and of Godolphin, and immediately retired to St. Edmundsbury, where his pen was again employed on political subjects. In 1706 he produced some essays to remove the prejudices of the Scotch against the union; and so great were his services considered, that he was sent by Godolphin to Edinburgh to confer upon the subject with the leading men of Scotland. Upon the conclusion of the union, he was rewarded for his services, and two years after, 1709, he published the history of the union, in a manner so satisfactory, that, in 1786, the same pamphlet was republished, when the Irish union was projected. In 1713 some of his publications were considered as jacobitical, in consequence of which he was prosecuted, but at last liberated from Newgate by the influence of his friend lord Oxford. He found himself so neglected on the accession of the house of Hanover, that he published his appeal to honour and justice, the last of his political tracts, as he was seized with an apoplexy before the work was finished, and as he afterwards devoted himself only to useful and general instruction. In 1715 he wrote the family instructor; and in April, 1719, appeared the first part, and August following the second part of Robinson Crusoe; a work which, though abused by some of his contemporaries, has survived by its merit the malevolence of criticism, and triumphed over the opposition of party, and stands now as the most lasting monument of literary fame and merits of the author. It is said by some, indeed that this interesting book was dishonestly borrowed from the papers of Alexander Selkirk, a Scotchman who lived four years and four months in an uninhabited island, till relieved by captain Wood Rogers in 1709. Selkirk's adventures, indeed, appeared before the public in the captain's voyage; and therefore, though the idea of a man thrown upon a desert island might be borrowed from Selkirk's adventures, yet the rest of the story evidently belongs to the genius and superstructure of De Foe. This respectable writer died at his house at Islington, 1731, leaving one daughter, who married Mr. H. Baker, the naturalist. The publications of De Foe are very numerous, and possessed great merit, and, at the time in which they appeared, they were considered as very powerful engines in the hands of party. His attempts to write poetry were not successful, after the noble strains of Waller and Dryden; and if his verses were read, it was more in consequence of the satire which they conveyed than the merit and beauty of the numbers. The life of a political writer must be exposed to the attacks of open and secret enemies, a circumstance which De Foe's political career sufficiently evinced, but whatever might have been the provocations which he gave to his opponents, it is to be observed, to the discredit of Pope, that, without the most distant imputation of offence, De Foe appeared disgraced in 1728, in the libellous lines of the Dunciad.

DEGHUY, an ingenious French engraver, who died 1748. He engraved the pieces of some of the greatest masters, among whom are the names of Rembrandt, Vernet, Aved, Tintoretto, &c.

DEJAURE, N. a French poet, who died young, and suddenly, October, 1800. His pieces, called le franc Breton—Montano—Lodoiska, an opera, have been received on the stage with applause.

DEIDIER, Anthony, a medical professor of Montpellier, who published in 1723, a curious dissertation, de venereis morbis, in which he supposes that the disease is communicated by a number of small animalcules.

DEJOTARUS, tetrarch and king of Galatea, espoused the cause of Pompey in the civil wars, for which he was dethroned by Cæsar.

DELAMET, Adrian Augustin de Bussy, an ecclesiastic, born of a noble family in Picardy. He attended his relation cardinal de Retz in his travels, and then settled at the Sorbonne at Paris, where he died, 20th July, 1691, aged 70. He wrote, among other things, a resolution of cases of conscience, afterwards republished by Treuve, under the name of dictionary of cases of conscience, 2 vols. fol.

DELANCY, James, lieutenant governor of New-York, was the son of a protestant refugee from Caen, in Normandy, and was sent to Cambridge, England, for his education. On his return to New-York in 1729, he was appointed a member of Montgomery's council, and after studying law, obtained the appointment of judge of the supreme court, and in 1733, in consequence of his attachment to governor Cosby, was advanced to the office of chief justice. He possessed commanding talents, and an extensive knowledge of law, was ambitious and intriguing, and was for a long time one of the most influential characters in the colony. In 1753 he was appointed lieutenant governor. Under his administration the charter of King's college was granted. He was at the head of the association which founded that institution, and one of the first board of trustees. He died August 2d, 1760, aged 57.

DELANY, Patrick, an eminent divine, born in Ireland about 1686. His father was originally a servant in the family of Sir John Rennel, the judge, and afterwards rented a small farm. Young Delany was brought up as sizar at Trinity-college, Dublin, of which he became fellow. At this time he formed a very intimate acquaintance with dean Swift, and soon distinguished himself as a popular preacher, and as an active and successful tutor in his college. The part, however, which he took in supporting two young men who had, for misconduct, been expelled, proved offensive to the provost and to Boulter the primate, who wished to oppose his advancement. Lord Carteret, in 1727, presented him to the chancellorship of Christ-church, and a prebend in the cathedral of St. Patrick. In 1729 he began the periodical paper called the Tribune, continued to 20 numbers; and in 1731 he came to London, to publish his "revelation examined with candour," a work to which he added a second volume, and, thirty years after, a third, and which was universally and deservedly admired. When in London, he married Mrs. Margaret Tenison, a rich Irish widow, who died December 6, 1741. In 1738 he published his "reflections upon polygamy," a curious work, which was followed, in 1740 and 1742, with an historical account of the life of David king of Israel, in 3 vols. a performance which, while it displayed the ingenuity, learning, and judgment of the author, little contributed to the honour of the sacred writings, whose authenticity and character cannot rest upon the labours of men. In 1743, 9th June, he took for his second wife the widow of Alexander Pendarves, a woman of great excellence and known genius; and the following year he was raised to the deanery of Down. The most considerable of his productions after he became dean, was his "remarks on the life of Swift by lord Orrery." This publication set in fairer colours the character of Swift, and exhibited him in a more amiable view, from the recollections of friendship and intimacy, than that of lord Orrery. His labours, however friendly, did not pass uncensured from the pen of Dean Swift, Esq. who reflected with petulance and abuse, on the publication of Dr. Delany; he replied in 1755, with great temper and truly Christian moderation. Besides these, he published sermons, and some theological tracts. He died at Bath, May, 1763, in the 83d year of his age. Dr. Delany was remarkable, not more for his learning, than for his benevolence and hospitality. He left little property behind him, though the last twenty years of his life his annual income was 3000*l.* which were generously distributed at the call of indigence and distress.

DELANY, Mary, second wife of Dr. Delany, was daughter of Barnard Granville, afterwards lord Lansdowne, and was born at Coulton, Wilts, 14th May, 1700. When she was 17, she was influenced by her relations, against her inclinations, to marry Alexander Pendarves, Esq. of Roscrow, in Cornwall, a gentleman of great property, but much advanced in life; but though she lived unhappy, her time was usefully devoted to the cultivation of her mind, naturally vigorous and eager after improvement. In 1724 she became a widow; in consequence of which she left Cornwall, and resided chiefly in London. After a widowhood of 19 years, she married, in 1743, Dr. Delany, whom she had long known as the friend of her learned correspondent dean Swift, and with him she lived the happiest of wives, till his death, in 1768. When this melancholy event took place, she wished to settle at Bath, but the dutchess of Portland, who knew and loved her virtues, insisted upon her living with her at Bulstrode, and she continued in that hospitable retreat for some years. On the death of the dutchess, the king, with laudable benevolence, assigned Mrs. Delany a house, ready furnished, in St. Alban's street, Windsor, and granted her a pension of 300*l.* a year, which she enjoyed till her death, 15th April, 1783, at the advanced age of nearly 83. Mrs. Delany is well known for her spirited and elegant correspondence with some of the learned and of the witty of the times, but particularly for her great skill in drawing and painting. Her pieces, which are numerous and tastefully executed, adorn the mansions of her relations, as well as her works in embroidery and in shells. She is also known for inventing, at the age of 74, an ingenious Flora, by the tasteful application of coloured papers together, skilfully cut with scissors, and so delicately disposed upon black ground, as to imitate and almost equal the works of nature. In this elegant accomplishment she continued to be engaged till her 83d year, when her sight began to fail; and so astonishing was her assiduity, that not less than 980 plants were exhibited in her beautiful flora, which is now in the possession of her nephew, Court Dewis, Esq. She also wrote some poetry.

DELAUNE, Thomas, a nonconformist, who, in 1683, wrote an answer to Dr. Calamy's discourse concerning a scrupulous conscience. His book, called "plea for nonconformity," gave such offence, that he was tried, and sentenced to pay a heavy fine; which as he could not do, he died in prison.

DELAWARE, Thomas West, lord, governor of Virginia, under the charter of May 23d, 1609, arrived in the colony in June, 1610, when he succeeded Sir Thomas Gates. In March, 1611, after having built three forts, and placed the colony in the most respectable condition of which its circumstances would admit, he sailed for Nevis for the benefit of his health, but was driven to the western Islands, and thence returned to England. He continued to take a deep interest in the concerns of the colony, which he was at great expense to establish. In 1618 he commenced a second voyage to Virginia, but died on his passage, "in or near the mouth of the bay which bears his name."  L.

DELEYRE, Alexander, a native of Bourdeaux, who wrote an analysis of lord Bacon's works, 3 vols. 12mo.—the genius of Montesquieu—the spirit of St. Evremond, &c. He also assisted Raynal in his history of the commerce of the Indies, and contributed some valuable articles to the encyclopedie. He died 1797.

DELFT, Jacob, a celebrated portrait painter, of Delft, who died 1661, aged 42. He was grandson of Mirevelt, whom he rivalled in the efforts of his pencil.

DELUS, Christopher Traugott, a native of Walhausen, in Thuringia, who, after serving in the army, was made surveyor of the Hungarian mines, and then placed at Vienna, in the department of the mines and of the mint. He was an eminent mineralogist, and wrote a dissertation on mountains, 8vo.—an introduction to the art of mining, 4to. He died in Italy, 1799, aged 51.

DELMONT, Deodalt, an historical painter, born at St. Tron. He was pupil to Rubens, who highly esteemed him. He died 1634, aged 53.

DELOBEL, a French painter, of the 17th century. His pieces, which are in a very superior style, adorn chiefly the churches and cathedrals of France.

DE LOLME, John Lewis, LL.D. a native of Geneva, who for some years resided in England, and acquired great celebrity as an author. In the latter part of his life he retired to the continent, and died in Switzerland, March, 1807. He was in his character a man of talents and information, entertaining and witty in his conversation, temperate in his living, but in his person little attentive to the graces of outward appearance. He is author of parallel between the English constitution and the former government of Sweden, 1772—treatise on the constitution of England, 1775, a work of singular merit, often reprinted, and commended by the approbation not only of lords Camden and Chatham, and other great political characters, but by the nervous writer of Junius's letters—essay on the union of Scotland with England, 1787—memorials of human superstition—observations on the tax on windows, 1788—observations on the late national embarrassments, 1789, &c.

DELRIO, Martin Anthony, a learned Jesuit, born at Antwerp, of Spanish parents, 1551. He studied at the universities of Paris, Douai, and Louvain, where he displayed astonishing powers of memory, and great quickness of learning. He was admitted LL.D. at Salamanca, and afterwards became a counsellor of the parliament of Brabant, and entered the Jesuits' order at Valladolid. He taught belles lettres at Liege, Mayence, Gratz, and Salamanca, and died at Louvain, two years after his friend Lipsius, 1608. Besides notes on Seneca, Claudian, and Solinus, he wrote explications of difficult passages in Scripture—commentaries on the Old Testament—disquisitiones magicæ.

DELRIO, John, a native of Bruges, dean of Antwerp, died 1624. He wrote commentaries on the 119th Psalm.

DEMADES, an Athenian orator, for some time at the court of Philip of Macedon. He was put to death by Cassander, B. C. 322.

DEMARATUS, a king of Sparta, who was obliged to resign the crown in consequence of the imputation of his enemies, who accused him of being illegitimate. He retired to Persia, where he was honourably received.

DEMESTE, John, M. D. chaplain and chief surgeon to the forces of the prince of Liege, was a native of Liege, where he died, August 20, 1783, aged 38. He is well known as the author of some ingenious letters on chymistry, Paris, 1779.

DEMETRIUS, Poliorcetes, son of Antigonus, was honoured by the Athenians with the dedication of brazen statues, because he had delivered their city from the power of Demetrius Phalereus, and defeated Cassander at Thermopylæ. Though beaten at the battle of Ipsus, he had the good fortune to seat himself on the throne of Macedonia; where his posterity remained till the age of Perseus. He died B. C. 296.

DEMETRIUS, Soter, king of Syria, was son of Seleucus. He was for some time an hostage at Rome, and perished in battle, B. C. 150.

DEMETRIUS II. surnamed Nicanor, was king of Syria after his father Demetrius I. He formed an alliance with the Jews, and was at last killed by the governor of Tyre, B. C. 127.

DEMETRIUS PHALEREUS, a philosopher, the disciple of Theophrastus. He was highly honoured by the Athenians, and afterwards was hospitably entertained by Ptolemy, king of Egypt. He contributed 200,000 volumes to the Alexandrian library, and died by the bite of an asp, 284 B. C.

DEMETRIUS, a cynic philosopher, in the reign of Caligula, afterwards banished by Vespasian for his insolence.

DEMETRIUS, czar of Russia, son of the czar John Basilowitz, is by some historians called the false Demetrius, and regarded as an obscure native of Jaroslaw, who was instructed by an artful monk to assume the character of the real Demetrius, who, it is said, had been murdered by Boris Godenow. This youthful adventurer, whether really the prince or pretender, invaded Russia with a small army in 1604, and was so successful as to seat himself on the throne. After a short reign of eleven months, he was assassinated, 1606. He had married the daughter of Mnieski, palatine of Sendomir, who had warmly espoused his cause.

DE MISSY, Cæsar, a learned divine, born at Berlin 2d January, 1703. He studied at Berlin and at Frankfort on the Oder; and after preaching for five years in several towns of the United Provinces, he came to London, where he was ordained to serve the Savoy chapel, and in 1762, named by the bishop of London French chaplain to the king. He died 10th August, 1775. He published some poetical pieces—essays on profane and sacred literature—epitomes of books, memoirs, &c. but generally anonymously, or only with his initials. He also assisted many of his friends, particularly Wetstein, in his edition of the Greek Testament, and Jortin in his life of Erasmus. He was a learned and pious man.

DEMOCEDES, a physician of Crotona, who, after serving Polycrates, of Samos, became the slave and the physician of Darius, king of Persia. He returned to his country by stratagem, and married the sister of Milo, the celebrated wrestler.

DEMOCRITUS, a famous philosopher of Abdera, whose mental acquirements were so great and extraordinary, that his countrymen accused him of madness. Hippocrates, however, saw and acknowledged his merit. He laughed constantly at the follies of mankind. He died at the age of 109, about 351.

DEMONAX, a philosopher of Crete, in the reign of Adrian. He had the highest contempt for riches, and lived upon the accidental supplies which he received from his friends and strangers. He lived to his 100th year.

DEMOIVRE, Abraham, an eminent mathematician, born at Vitri, Champagne, May, 1667. He left France at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and came to England, where, by studying the principia of Newton, he made himself a complete master of mathematics, in which he read some popular lectures for his support. He was admitted member of the royal society in London, and of the academy of sciences, Paris; and died in London, November, 1754. His works are strong evidences of his superior learning and great application. He published miscellanea analytica, 4to.—a treatise on annuities—and his great work, “doctrina of chances,” in 1718, 4to. twice reprinted, with considerable improvements.

DEMOSTHENES, a celebrated orator of Athens. Though but the son of a blacksmith, he rose to consequence; and though neglected by his guardians, and impeded in his education by weakness of lungs, and an inarticulate pronunciation, his assiduity overcame all obstacles, and enabled him to rise superior to every difficulty, and become the most illustrious and eloquent orator of all antiquity. He warmly resisted the politics and the insinuating conduct of Philip of Macedon, and was equally violent against his son and successor, Alexander the great; but, in spite of his eloquence, the arts and the valour of the Macedonians prevailed, and Demosthenes unhappily found, that the Athenians whom he addressed were only the degenerate sons of those heroes who had bled at Marathon, at Salamis, and at Thermopylæ. Demosthenes, who had inveighed against the bribery of the Macedonians, himself was accused of receiving some splendid presents of money from Harpalus, the deputy of Alexander; but the unpopularity of his conduct continued but a short time; till at last the victories of Antipater obliged the Athenians to deliver their orator, and Demosthenes, rather than fall into the hands of his enemies, destroyed himself by poison, B. C. 322. The best edition of his orations is that of Reiske.

DEMOURS, Peter, a native of Marseilles, known for his eminence as a physician, and for the dexterity of his surgical operations, and his great skill as an oculist. He died at Paris 26th June, 1795, aged 93, author of some respectable works on his profession.

DEMPSTER, William, a learned Scotchman, born in the shire of Angus, 1490, and educated at St. Andrews, from whence he went to Paris, and was successfully employed by the university there to refute the books of Raymond Lully, who had impugned Aristotle’s philosophy. After visiting Padua and other places, he returned to Scotland, of which he published an ecclesiastical history, in which he magnifies the most common events into miracles. He died at Paris 1557.

DEMPSTER, Thomas, a native of Scotland, who studied at Paris, and there taught classical learning. His quarrelsome temper, however, and his severities to his pupils, rendered him unpopular, and he was obliged to fly from Paris, and to return to Scotland. He afterwards went to Pisa, where his wife, a woman of great beauty, ran away with one of his scholars, a misfortune which he bore with all the indifference of stoicism. He afterwards read lectures on polite learning in various universities, and obtained a professor’s chair at Nismes, from whence he retired to Bologna, where, after some years’ residence, he died 1625. He wrote some learned works, commentaries on Rosinus’s Roman antiquities, and on Claudian,—four books of epistles,—dramatic pieces and poems,—a martyrology of Scotland,—a list of Scottish writers, &c. He was a man of astonishing memory, so that he was properly called a living library. His application was indefatigable, he never studied less than 14 hours daily, but he wanted judgment and discrimination. He was so partial to his country that he attributed to the natives of it nearly all the books which English, Welsh, and Irish authors had composed. He has therefore been censured by protestants as well as papists, and Baillet has observed that in his ecclesiastical history of Scotland, in 19 books, he had no conscience, he forged titles of books never published to raise the glory of his native country, and he has been guilty of several cheating tricks, by which he has lost his credit among men of learning.

DEMPSTER, George, a Scotch gentleman, was born at Dundee in 1736. He became a member of the faculty of advocates, but soon quitted the bar for the senate, being elected into parliament in 1762. He joined the Rockingham party, and afterwards supported Mr. Pitt, till the affair of the regency, when he espoused the side of Mr. Fox. In 1790 he retired from parliament, and devoted himself to the improvement of the Highlands by agriculture and the fisheries. He died in 1818. His publications are—1. Discourse on being nominated chairman of the society for extending the fisheries of Great Britain, 8vo.—2. Account of the magnetic Mountains of Cannay, 8vo.—3. Several papers in the transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh.—4. Letters in the Agricultural Magazine.—5. Speeches in Parliament.

W. B.

DENHAM. Sir John, an English poet, born in Dublin, 1615. His father was chief baron of the exchequer in Ireland, and when afterwards removed to the English bench, he brought his son with him, who was educated in London, and in 1631, entered at Trinity college, Oxford. During his residence in the university, and afterwards while a student at Lincoln's Inn, he was devoted to gaming and dissipation, more than to learning and science, and his father not only augured the most fatal consequences, but threatened to disinherit him. In 1641, three years after the death of his father, he published his tragedy of "Sophy," which, says Waller, broke out, like the Irish rebellion, threescore thousand strong, when nobody was aware of it. Soon after he was sheriff of Surry, and governor of Farnham castle, but not understanding military affairs he came to the king at Oxford, where in 1643, he published his "Cooper's hill," a poem, says Dryden, which for majesty of style is and ever will be the standard of good writing. His attachment to the royal cause during the civil wars, ensured him the confidence of the queen, who intrusted him with a commission to her unfortunate husband, a captive in the army. He afterwards went as ambassador with lord Croft from Charles II. to Poland, and in 1662, he returned to England, where he found his estates greatly reduced in consequence of his former habits of gaming, and the persecutions of the civil war. For about a year he was hospitably entertained by Lord Pembroke. At the restoration he entered upon his office of surveyor-general to the king's buildings, and at the coronation, he was created K. B. In the latter part of his life, in consequence of some domestic difference on his second marriage, he unfortunately lost his senses, which he however recovered. He wrote some verses on Cowley's death, and soon followed him to the grave. He died March 1668, and was buried in Westminster abbey, near the remains of Chaucer, Spenser, and Cowley. Denham's works have been published together at different times, the sixth edition of which appeared in 1719.

These poems are above 20 in number, containing besides the Sophy and Cooper's hill, the destruction of Troy, and Cato major. Wood mentions other works of Denham, such as a new version of the psalms, a panegyric on general Monk, the true presbyterian, &c. Denham, as Johnson has observed, is deservedly considered as one of the fathers of English poetry. Cooper's hill is the work that confers upon him the rank and dignity of an original author. He seems to have been, at least among us, the author of a species of composition that may be denominated local poetry, of which the fundamental subject is some particular landscape to be poetically described, with the addition of such embellishments as may be supplied by historical retrospections or incidental meditation. He is one of the writers that improved our taste and advanced our language, and whom we ought therefore to read with gratitude, though having done much, he left much to do.

DENELLE, an infamous revolutionist. He was the friend of Marat, and shared all his crimes, and at last, after trying to poison his wife and five children, he killed them with his own hand with blows. He expiated his crimes on the scaffold.

DENIS, Michael, a German bibliographer, was born at Sclarden, in Bavaria, in 1729. He became principal keeper of the imperial library at Vienna, and died there in 1800. His works are, 1. A German translation of Ossian, 3 vols. 4to. 2. Songs, with a preliminary dissertation on the ancient poetry of the North, 8vo. 3. A catalogue of Butterflies, 4to. 4. An introduction to the knowledge of Books, 2 vols. 4to. 5. A typographical history of Vienna, 4to. 6. Augustini Sermones inediti, folio. 7. Codices manuscripti theologici Latini aliarumque occidentis linguarum biblioth., Palat. Vindobon., 2 vols. folio. 8. Carmina quædam, 4to.—W. B.

DENNER, Balthazar, a portrait painter, born at Hamburg, 1685. He was offered, in London, for his excellent portrait of an old woman, 500 guineas, which he refused. He died 1747.

DENNIE, William, governor of Pennsylvania, under the proprietors, succeeded governor Morris in August, 1756. His administration was unsatisfactory to the proprietors, and highly obnoxious to the people. He was succeeded in 1759 by Hamilton.  L.

DENNIE, Joseph, editor of the Port Folio, was a native of Boston, Massachusetts, born August 30, 1763, and was graduated at Harvard in 1790. He studied law and commenced practice in New-Hampshire, but after a short time relinquished the profession, and devoted his attention to literature. He resided in Walpole, where from 1795 to 1799, he published the "Farmer's Museum," a newspaper of high literary character, and warmly devoted to the principles of the party then in power. It was in that that his popular essays of the Lay Preacher first appeared. After leaving Walpole, in 1799, he was for a short time a clerk in the office of the secretary of state. In 1800, he commenced the publication of the Port Folio, at Philadelphia, and devoted himself with great zeal and success to the labours which the editing of that work required. He was ardently desirous of exalting the literary character of the country, and did much to promote it. He died at Philadelphia, January 7th, 1812, aged 44. His genius was of a very superior order, his literary attainments unusually extensive, and his writings characterized by uncommon originality and ingenuity, great delicacy of thought and language, and friendliness to virtue.  L.

DENNIS, John, an English critic, born in London 1657, and educated at Harrow and Caius college, Cambridge. After taking his bachelor's degree, he was expelled for attempting to stab a person in the dark, upon which he travelled over France and Italy, and at his return set up for a man of fashion and of wit. He began his literary career as early as 1690, and continued to write till his death in 1733. He was intimate with the great and the learned of the times, but his temper was so violent, and his pride and suspicions so great, that his life was a continual scene of tumult and quarrel, inflamed and cherished by the invectives of his pen. He wrote in 1692, a pindaric ode on William's victory at Aghrim, and he also honoured the death of that monarch and that of his queen, with poetical incense. In 1704, came his favourite tragedy "Liberty asserted," in which he used such violent language against the French nation, that in the pride of self-consequence, he persuaded himself peace could never be re-established between the two countries without his being delivered up to the offended enemy. With this idea he applied to the duke of Marlborough for his protection, who declared to the alarmed poet that he had no influence with the ministry, but that he thought, without being terrified, his own case as desperate, as he had done the French almost as much mischief as Mr. Dennis himself. This singular character, thus exposed to ridicule, is said on another occasion to have been walking near the sea while the guest of a friend in Sussex, and that at the sudden sight of a ship sailing as he imagined towards him, he decamped in the greatest hurry, calling his friend a traitor for conspiring to deliver his person up to the French. His poems on the battles of Blenheim and Ramillies gained him the friendship of the victorious hero of the day, who presented him with 100*l.* and procured him an appointment in the customs worth 120*l.* per annum. He also wrote some prose pieces, especially priestcraft dangerous, &c. against Sacheverell's political union, and some severe reflections on Pope's essay on criticism, and Addison's Cato. This not only occasioned a curious pamphlet called the narrative of Dr. Robert Norris, concerning the strange and deplorable frenzy of Mr. John Dennis, but it drew upon him the satirist's resentment, and entitled him to a conspicuous place among the heroes of the Dunciad. Though now disregarded as a writer and a critic, he was esteemed in his day, but it was observed by a wit that Dennis was the fittest man in the world to instruct a dramatic writer, for he laid down rules for writing good plays, and showed him what were bad by his own.

DENNY, Sir Anthony, a favourite of Henry VIII. born at Cheshunt, and educated at St. Paul's school, and St. John's college, Cambridge. His great abilities soon recommended him to the court, where he became gentleman of the bed-chamber, groom of the stole, and a privy counsellor. He was also knighted by the king, and in the general plunder of the property of the church, Sir Anthony received from his capricious master very large and valuable grants of lands in Hertfordshire. When Henry was on his death-bed, Sir Anthony alone had the courage and humanity to approach him, to remind him of his situation, and to exhort him to devote the few remaining moments of life to the momentous concerns of religion. The king had such an opinion of his integrity, that he made him one of the executors of his will, and of the counsellors of his successor, and gave him a legacy of 300*l.* Sir Anthony was a man of great piety as well as learning. He died 1550, leaving by his lady Joan, daughter of Sir Philip Champenon of Modbury, Devon, six children, of whom Henry the eldest was father of Edward who was knighted, and in 1626, made earl of Norwich.

DENTON, John, an English divine, educated at Clare-hall, Cambridge, and ejected for nonconformity from the living of Oswald Kirk, Yorkshire, in 1662. He afterwards conformed, and after being re-ordained, was presented to the living of Stone-grave, and a prebend of York, which he held till his death, 4th January, 1708, in his 83d year. He published some sermons and religious tracts, and was the intimate friend and correspondent of Tillotson, afterwards the primate.

DENTRECOLLES, Francis Xavier, a Jesuit, born at Lyons 1664. He went to China as missionary with Parennin, and he died there on the same year as his associate, 1741, and both aged 77. This Jesuit wrote several works in the Chinese language to recommend the Christian religion to the disciples of Confucius, and some interesting pieces of his are also found in "lettres edifiantes et curieuses," and in du Halde's China.

DENYS, James, an historical painter, born at Antwerp 1645. He studied in Italy, and resided for some time at the court of Mantua, where he was highly honoured. He returned afterwards to his native city, where he died.

D'EON, the chevalier, an extraordinary character, who is registered in the parish of St. Pancras, Middlesex, as "Charles Genevieve Louise Auguste Andre Timothee D'Eon de Beaumont." He was born of an ancient family at Tonnerre, in Burgundy, in 1728. His education was liberal, and being left an orphan, the Prince de Conti procured him a cornetcy of dragoons. He was also placed in a public office at Paris, where his conduct gave satisfaction. In 1755, he was employed on a mission to Petersburg, after which he joined his regiment, and served in the campaign of 1762, as aid-de-camp to Marshal Broglie. The year following he accompanied the duke de Nivernois to England, as secretary, and was invested with the order of St. Louis. When the duke left this country, D'Eon remained as minister plenipotentiary in his room; but soon afterwards he was superseded by the count de Guerchy. This mortified the chevalier to such a degree, that he published libels against the count, for which he was prosecuted and convicted in the king's bench; but not appearing to receive judgment, he was outlawed. About the year 1771, doubts were entertained concerning his sex, and bets to a great amount were laid on the question, which in one instance produced a lawsuit that ended in a nonsuit. In the mean time the chevalier returned to France, where he assumed the female dress; for what reason has never been explained; yet his conduct in this instance was sanctioned by his own court, his pension was continued, and he was suffered to retain the cross of his order. In 1785, he came back to England, and continued here till his death, teaching fencing; but when the revolution broke out, he presented a petition to the assembly, as Madame D'Eon, offering his services in a military capacity. This, however, was disregarded, and he remained here in poverty till death closed the scene, May 21, 1810, when all doubts as to his sex were completely removed by professional inspection. He published several works on politics and commerce.—W. B.

DEPARCIEUX, Anthony, a mathematician, born in the diocess of Usez. He wrote a treatise on trigonometry, 4to.—essays on the probabilities of the duration of human life, 4to. a valuable work, which obtained him a seat in the academy of sciences,—memoir on the inundations of the river Seine, &c. His skill was much applauded in his construction of sun-dials on a new plan, and also for his meridian lines. He died 1768, aged 65.

DERBY, James Stanley, earl of, an English nobleman, celebrated for his courage during the civil wars. With only 600 horse he bravely defended himself at Wigan against col. Lilburne and 3000 horse and foot, but when taken at the battle of Worcester, he was basely beheaded, though faithfully promised pardon, October 15th, 1651. His widow imitated his heroic conduct, and after the brave defence of Latham-house, she retired to the Isle of Man, where she defied the attacks of her enemies. She was the last person who submitted to the power of the regicides.

DERCYLLIDAS, a Lacedemonian general, who avenged his country against the Persians, and defended Chersonesus against the inroads of the Thracians, about 400 B. C.

DERING, Edward, an eminent divine, born in Kent, fellow of Christ's college, Cambridge. He was preacher at St Paul's, London, and distinguished himself by his eloquence before the court. He died 1576, much respected for his piety as well as learning. He wrote sermons,—lectures on the epistle to the Hebrews,—answer to Harding, &c.

DERHAM, William, an able philosopher and divine, born at Stoughton, near Worcester, 26th November, 1657, and educated at Blockley, and Trinity college, Oxford. He was presented in 1682, to Wargrave vicarage, Berks, and in 1689, to Upminster rectory, Essex. He devoted the best part of his time to mathematics and experimental philosophy. He was chosen fellow of the royal society, and enriched the philosophical transactions with many curious and valuable communications. In 1716, he was made canon of Windsor, and the university of Oxford, in 1730, honourably granted him the degree D.D. for his meritorious services in the cause of science. This pious and good man, always employed in the labours of philosophy, humanity, and religion, died 5th April, 1735, aged 78, and was buried at Upminster. His publications are very numerous, not less than forty, and mostly on philosophical subjects. The best known of his works are his physico-theology, 16 discourses, preached at Boyle's institution, 1711 and 12, and in 1714, his astro-theology, and in 1736, his christo-theology, a sermon to prove the divine origin of Christianity, besides the artificial clock-maker, an ingenious book, the fourth edition of which was published 1734. He also assisted some of his literary friends, he revised the "miscellanea curiosa," he prepared notes and observations for Eleazer Albin's natural history, 4 vols. 4to. and published some pieces of Mr. Ray, and also the experiments of Dr. Robert Hooke. He left behind him a very valuable collection of curiosities.

DERING, Sir Edward, a native of Kent, very violent in parliament in favour of republican principles. He brought in a bill for the abolition of bishops, deans, and chapters, and proposed other plans of reforms. Afterwards, however, he changed his opinion, and espoused the royal cause, which he supported with a troop of horse, equipped at his own expense. He was a great sufferer in the civil wars, and died before the restoration. His speeches in parliament were published in 4to.

DERRICK, Samuel, a linen-draper of Dublin, who in 1751, came to London with the intention of supporting himself as a literary character. He once attempted the character of Gloucester in Jane Shore, but with such ill success, that it was never repeated. After this he subsisted by pamphlet writing, but his extravagance led him into perpetual difficulties. He was, on Beau Nash's death, by means of his friends appointed in his place master of the ceremonies at Bath and Tunbridge, but ill conduct prevented his rise to independence, and he died very poor, 7th of March, 1769, aged 45. He translated, among other things, Sylla, a dramatic entertainment by the king of Prussia, 8vo. 1753.

DERYK or DERICK, Peter Cornelius, a landscape painter of Delft, the pupil of Hubert Jacobs. He studied afterwards in Italy, and died 1630, aged 62.

DERYKE, William, an historical painter at Antwerp, who died 1697.

DESAGULIERS, John Theophilus, son of a protestant minister at Rochelle, where he was born 12th March, 1683, and which he left at the revocation of the edict of Nantes. He was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, and he succeeded Dr. Kiel in reading lectures on experimental philosophy. In 1712, he married, and was the first who introduced the reading of lectures in London, where he had for his audience not only the learned and the great, but also George I. and George II. and the royal family. He was patronised by the duke of Chandos, who gave him the living of Edgware, and he afterwards became chaplain to the prince of Wales, and had a valuable living in Essex. In the latter part of his life, he had lodgings under the piazzas, Covent-garden, where his lectures were continued till his death, 1749. He was member of several foreign academies, and published a course of experimental philosophy, 2 vols. 4to. 1754.—Gravesand's mathematical elements of natural philosophy—and an edition of Gregory's elements of catoptries and dioptries.

DESAIX, Lewis Charles Anthony, a French general, born of a respectable family at Vegou, near Riom, in August, 1768. He embraced the military profession as lieutenant in the regiment of Britany, and at the revolution he assisted Custine as his aid-de-camp. He was wounded in the cheek at the battle of Lauterburg, but disregarded the pain while he boldly rallied the yielding battalions to the fight. He was general of division under Moreau, whom he assisted in his glorious retreat from the Danube; and afterwards he drove the Germans from the Rhine, and at the battle of Rastadt he obliged the archduke Charles to retreat. He bravely defended the bridge of Kehl, and afterwards, in consequence of the treaty of Campo Formio, he attended Buonaparte into Egypt. In this distant country, he every where displayed the same presence of mind, the same bravery, and after dispersing the Arabs, and the scattered forces of Murad-bey, and Elphi bey, he was named commander of Upper Egypt, which his valour and steadiness had completely subdued. After Buonaparte's retreat from Egypt he signed the treaty of El-Arisch with the English and the Turks, and returned to Europe, but was detained as a prisoner by lord Keith. When set at liberty he hastened back to France, and found his friend Buonaparte advancing to the conquest of Italy. His happy arrival, after a severe march of thirty miles, with a fresh squadron, gave the decision to the memorable battle of Marengo, but at the very moment that he ensured the victory to his already yielding countrymen, the brave Desaix received a fatal shot in the breast, and immediately expired, 14th June, 1800. He was buried with the military honours which his services and his private virtues deserved.

DESAULT, Peter, a native of Arsac, distinguished as a physician. His treatise on the venereal disease and on the method of curing it without salivation, was much admired, and also that on the stone in the kidneys and the bladder, which was attacked by Astruc. He died at Bourdeaux, 1737, aged 62.

DESAULT, Peter Joseph, a French surgeon whose journal de chirurgie was translated into English by Gosling. He was born at Maguibernois near Macon, and died June 1st, 1795, in his 46th year, not without suspicion of being poisoned for his attendance on the unfortunate Lewis XVII. It is remarkable that his successors, Clopart and Doublet, died within four days after. He had been much esteemed as a professor of anatomy at Paris, where 300 pupils together attended his lectures, and also as surgeon at the hospital of charity, and at the hotel Dieu.

DES BARREAUX, James de Vallee lord, a French nobleman, born at Paris, 1602. He was brought up by the Jesuits, who in vain endeavoured to gain him over to their society, and he afterwards became counsellor in the parliament of Paris, where his wit was more admired than his application. He exposed himself to the resentment and persecution of Richelieu, by refusing to yield a favourite mistress to the hoary libertine, and thus banished from regular employment, he spent his time in visiting his friends, and in pursuing his pleasures. About four or five years before his death, however, he began to reflect upon the vicious course of his conduct, and after disregarding the truths and the practice of Christianity, he gave himself up to serious meditation, and to penitence. He retired to the pure air of Chalon, on the Soane, where, after an exemplary close of life, he died 1647. Some time before his death he wrote the famous sonnet so full of contrition "grand dieu, tes jugemens," &c. He was, in the days of his gayety and libertinism, author of some poems in Latin, and also in French, and of some popular songs, &c.

DESBILLONS, Francis Joseph, a French Jesuit, born at Chateaufort, 25th January, 1711. After reading lectures in the colleges of Caen, Nevers, la Fleche, and Bourges, he came to Paris, where he studied for 15 years in the college of Lewis XIV. At the abolition of his order, 1762, he retired to Manheim, where he published his fables, on which he had so long been engaged, 530 in number, divided into 15 books, in two vols. He also published a learned edition of Phædrus, and wrote some Latin poems, and left in MS. a history of the Latin tongue. He died 19th March, 1788, aged 78.

DESEOIS, Francis Alexander, author of a military dictionary, 3 vols. 8vo.—a dictionary of agriculture, 2 vols. 8vo.—a dictionary of animals, 4 vols. 8vo. and other works, died in the public hospital, at Paris, 1784, aged 85.

DES CARTES, René, a French philosopher. Vid. CARTES.

DESERICIUS or DESERITZ, Joseph Innocent, a native of Nitra, in Hungary, made a Roman cardinal, and sent by Benedict XIV. as ambassador to the hospodar of Wallachia. He died 1765, aged 63. He wrote pro cultu literarum in Hungaria, ac speciatim civitate diocesique vindicatio, 4to.—de initiis et majoribus Hungarorum commentaria, 5 vols. fol.—historia episco- patus diœcesis et civitatis Vacienſis, fol. &c.

DESGODETS, Anthony, a native of Paris, eminent as an architect. When going to Rome, in 1674, he was captured by the Algerines, and remained 16 months in slavery, and when he reached the capital of Italy at last, he composed his work "the ancient edifices of Rome drawn and measured with exactness," fol. which was newly edited, 1779. He was made controller of the royal buildings at Paris, and architect to the king. He died 1728, aged 75. Two of his works on architecture have appeared since his death.

DESHAIS, John Baptist Henry, a French painter, born at Rouen, 1729. Under the direction of Vermont, Restout, and Carlo Vanloo, he improved his strong natural abilities, and in 1751, obtained the prize of the academy. After visiting Rome for improvement and information, he returned to Paris, and was admitted into the academy with universal approbation. The superior merit of his pictures promised the noblest monuments of genius to adorn the French school, but he unfortunately died in the midst of his career, in 1765. The most celebrated of his pieces are the marriage of the Virgin, the resurrection of Lazarus, Potiphar's wife and Joseph, the combat of Achilles and Xanthus, Jupiter and Antiope, Artemisia at her husband's tomb, &c.

DESIDERIUS or DIDIER, last king of Lombardy, succeeded Astolphus, 756. His invasion of the papal dominions was resisted at the request of the pope by Charlemagne his son-in-law, and Didier was made prisoner and died in France. His other daughter had married a brother of Charlemagne, Carloman, another son of Pepin, king of France.

DESMAIS, Joseph Francis Edward de Corsembleu, a French writer, born at Saully-sur-Loire, who died February 25th, 1761, aged 38. He was a man of great abilities, very amiable in his manners, moderate in his wishes, and benevolent in his intercourse with mankind. He used to say, "When my friend laughs, it is his business to inform me of the cause of his joy; but when he weeps, it is mine to discover the sources of his grief." He wrote the comedy of the "impertinent," which met with great applause. He also wrote miscellaneous works, and in his poetical pieces displayed ease, grace, and elegance. His works were published 1777, two vols. 12mo. Paris.

DES MAIZEAUX, Peter, a learned biographer, born at Auvergne, 1666, where his father was a protestant minister. He came early to England and was elected secretary to the royal society. He died 1745. He edited the works of St. Evremont, three vols. 4to. and also published the life of Bayle, prefixed to his dictionary. He had some hand in the general historical dictionary, 10 vols. fol. and in other useful works, and wrote the lives of Chillingworth and John Hales.

DESMARES, Toussaint, a priest, native of Vire, in Normandy. He defended the cause of the Jansenists before pope Innocent X. and distinguished himself by his sermons. He was persecuted for his opinions, but humanely protected by the duke of Liancourt, at whose house in Beauvais, he ended his days, 1687, aged 87. He wrote the Necrologe de port royal, printed 4to. 1723, and other works.

DESMARETS, Nicholas, nephew of Colbert, and minister of state and comptroller in the reign of Lewis XIV. died 1721. He published a very curious and interesting account of his administration.

DESMOLETS, Peter Nicholas, an ecclesiastic, born at Paris. He edited Lamy's treatise de tabernaculo fœderis sanctâ civitate Jerusalem et templo ejus, fol.—Ponget's institutions catholicæ in modum catecheos, 2 vols. fol.—and continued Sallengre's memoirs of literature, 11 vols. 12mo. He died 1760, aged 83.

DESMOULINS, Benedict Camille, a native of Guise in Picardy, who displayed his republican zeal at the taking of the Bastille, and in the demolition of the monarchy. As the friend of Danton he was one of the original founders of the Jacobin club, and he had a share in the atrocities of the 20th of June and the 10th of August, 1792. His influence in the convention was seen with jealousy by Robespierre, and he marked for slaughter the man who presumed to defend Orleans, and to talk of a committee of clemency in the midst of a sanguinary assembly. The fall of Danton was his own; when seized in the night, 31st March, 1794, he opened his windows to call in vain for help against the satellites of tyranny, and with Young's night thoughts, and Hervey's meditations in his hand, he was dragged to prison, and immediately after to the scaffold. His writings were periodical—the revolutions of France and Brabant—the history of the Brissotins—the Vieux Cordelier. His wife, who wished to share his fate, was permitted to follow him 10 days after to the scaffold. When asked his age by the bloody tribunal, he answered, "My age is that of Jesus Christ when he suffered death," 33.

DESMOUTIER, Charles Albert, a French writer, was born at Villers Coterets, in 1760, and died in 1801. His works are—1. Lettres à Emilie sur la Mythologie, 6 vols. 18mo. 2. Several comedies and operas. 3. Le Siege de Cythere, a poem. 4. La Liberté du Cloître, a poem. He had begun a piece entitled "Galerie du dixhuitieme Siecle;" but never finished it.—W. B.

D'ESPAGNE, John, minister of a French congregation at Durham-house, Strand, died about 1660. He was much admired as a preacher, and several of his works have been translated into English. They are all on theological subjects.

DESPARD, Edward Marcus, a native of Queen's county in Ireland, of a respectable family. He early embraced a military life, and was employed in the West Indies, on the Spanish main, and in the bay of Honduras, where he was appointed superintendent of the English colony. His conduct in this office gave offence to the settlers, and in consequence of their complaints he was recalled home, 1790; but when he applied to government to investigate his administration, his representations were rejected without explanation. This rendered him a disaffected subject, and the French revolution no sooner tended to disseminate the principles of disloyalty and rebellion, than he warmly embraced the new doctrines. He was seized for his seditious conduct, under the suspension of the habeas corpus act, and confined in several prisons, but when at last liberated, past misfortunes had made no impression upon him, but rather stimulated him to revenge. He now formed the plan of seducing the soldiery from their allegiance, and in the secret committees which he held with his associates, under the sanction of a solemn oath it was agitated to assassinate the king, as he proceeded to the opening of parliament. This murderous design was happily discovered by some of the accomplices, and Despard and his associates were seized, and tried at a special commission in Southwark, 5th February, 1803, and on an impartial trial his atrocious guilt was made too evident to deserve pardon. He suffered on the 21st March, with nine others, and after their heads had been cut off, their bodies were delivered to their friends for interment. Without contrition, sorrow, or concern, this infatuated man met his fate, and convinced the spectators how well qualified he was for the worst of nefarious attempts.

DESPAUTERE, John, a Flemish grammarian, who was born at Ninove, and died at Comines, 1520. He had the use of only one eye. His works, which were chiefly grammatical, were in great vogue in all schools at one time, but now they have given way to more modern and methodical elements of education.

DESPIERRES, John, superior of the Benedictine college at Douay, died there 1664, aged 67. He was eminent as a mathematician, and as a mechanic, and wrote treatises on the Roman calendar—a defence of the vulgate translation of the Bible—a commentary on the Psalms, &c.—and he also constructed an iron sphere which with great exactness represented the planetary system.

DESPLACES, an eminent French engraver, who died 1749. His best pieces were his soldier holding a dagger at Astyanax in his mother's arms, his descent from the cross, after Jouvenet, his rape of Helen after Guido. Another of the same name engraved several pieces for the cabinet de Crozat.

DESPORTES, Claude, a painter of Champagne, who died at Paris, 1743, aged 82. He was highly favoured by Lewis XIV. and XV. His best pieces are preserved at Marly. He excelled in grotesque figures, and in animals, flowers, fruits, &c. His son and nephew were equally celebrated.

DESTOUCHES, Andrew, a Frenchman, who went to Siam, and abandoned the profession of a soldier for that of a musician. Though unacquainted with rules, by the mere powers of genius he produced his Isse, an opera, which so highly pleased the French king, that he gave him 200 louis, with many commendations. Afterwards he studied the rules of musical composition, but his other pieces were never equal to Isse. He died 1749.

DESTROUCHES, Philip Nericaut, a French dramatic writer, born at Tours, and educated at Paris. He shone also as a negotiator in Switzerland, and lastly in London, where he resided seven years, and where he married. On his return to Paris, he was received with esteem for his services, but the death of the regent shattered his fair hopes of preferment and reward, and he retired to Fortoiseau, near Melun, where he forgot the ingratitude of the court in the cultivation of the muses and of agriculture. Cardinal Fleury in vain wished to draw him from his retirement to go to Russia. He died 1754. His works were published by his son, by the order of Lewis XV. 4 vols. 1757, and 10 vols. 12mo. Though devoid of the gayety of Regnard, and the strong touches of Moliere, he yet commands attention by his interesting scenes, and his tender and affecting delineations of nature. His Philosophe Marié, and his Glorieux, a comedy, rank next to the compositions of Voltaire.

DEVAUX, John, a native of Paris, esteemed as a surgeon, and author of a treatise on preserving health, by instinct—on making reports on surgery—and other works, besides translations of medical works into French. He died 1729, aged 80.

DEVEREUX, Robert, earl of Essex, the favourite of Elizabeth, was born 10th November, 1567, at Netherwood, Herefordshire, and under the guardianship of lord Burleigh, he was educated at Cambridge, by Dr. Whitgift, afterwards primate. His first appearance at court was in his 17th year, and in 1585, he accompanied the earl of Leicester to Holland, and distinguished himself greatly by his courage at the battle of Zutphen. At his return he was master of the horse to the queen, and at the assembling of an army at Tilbury fort against the Spanish invasion, he was declared general under Leicester, and soon after made knight of the garter. Thus elevated in rank he disputed for the queen's favour with Sir Charles Blunt, earl of Devonshire, who wounded him in the knee, but afterwards became his most intimate friend. In 1589 he went with Sir John Norris and Francis Drake in the expedition to replace Antonio on the throne of Portugal, but as it was without the queen's permission, he was soon recalled with marks of displeasure, which, however, his presence soon dissipated. His private marriage with the widow of Sir Philip Sidney, daughter of Sir Francis Walsingham, was also disagreeable to the queen, and his unsuccessful expedition to assist Henry IV. of France, and his quarrel with lord Burleigh about the Spanish war, tended to show the violence of his temper and the ambition of his heart. Though Burleigh, by proposing a peace with Spain, opposed him, yet he loved him, and after the death of that statesman, Essex found that he had lost a most valuable friend, whose advice and protection often interposed between him and the commission of wrong. He succeeded Burleigh as chancellor of Cambridge, but his enemies viewed the increase of his dignities with a jealous eye. When a consultation took place about appointing a viceroy in Ireland, the queen recommended Sir William Knollis, and Essex Sir George Carew, and when the favourite saw his mistress unwilling to yield to his persuasion, he contemptuously turned his back upon her. Elizabeth resented the ill conduct of Essex, and gave him a box on the ear, upon which he placed his hand upon his sword, with threatening attitude, swearing he would not take such an affront even from her father. The courtiers present interfered, and he left the palace with unsubdued indignation. His friends however prevailed upon him to make concessions, and he was apparently reconciled to Elizabeth, and soon after by the artifice of his enemies sent over to Ireland. The ill success of his ministry there encouraged his opponents, who persuaded the queen to levy an army under Nottingham, to counteract the rebellious schemes of Essex. Essex heard of their plans, and coming suddenly over to England, he was apparently received with cordiality, but soon after stripped of all his honours except of the office of the master of the horse. While thus disgraced, he was advised by his favourite Cuffe to restore himself to the queen's partiality by force, but though he disapproved all violent measures, he could not refrain saying the queen grew old and cankered, and that her mind was as crooked as her carcass. The rash words were reported to the queen, and Essex was summoned to appear before the council, but he conceived his person in danger, and instead of submitting he prepared to resist. After an unavailing struggle, and some bloodshed, he surrendered and was conveyed to the tower. He was arraigned before his peers on the 19th February, 1601, and condemned to lose his head, and his execution took place on the 25th. He was in person tall, but careless in his dress. He was learned, and to his honour protected and encouraged learned men. Warm in his friendships, and sound, except in few instances, in his morals, he was a good protestant. It is remarkable that his execution took place not without great struggles in the queen's affections. In the days of their friendship, she had given him a ring, with promises that it would restore him at all times to her favour, and therefore she suffered to be sacrificed the man who so proudly refused to purchase and at so little price her pardon. The fatal ring indeed was sent by the repenting Essex, but lady Howard the bearer refused to deliver it, and on her death-bed she revealed to the queen her ill conduct, which she attributed to the jealousy of her husband. The queen heard the dreadful tale with astonishment; she retired overwhelmed with grief, and a few weeks after expired.

DEVEREUX, Robert, earl of Essex, son of Elizabeth's favourite, was born 1592, and educated at Merton college, Oxford, under Sir Henry Saville. His marriage with lady Frances Howard, lord Suffolk's daughter, was very unfortunate, for the lady accused him of impotency, and obtained a divorce that she might marry her new favourite, Carr, earl of Somerset. Essex served in the Palatinate under Sir Horatio Vere, and in Holland, under prince Maurice, and on his return to England, appeared in parliament as a violent opposer of the measures of government. During the civil wars he headed the parliamentary army, faced the king's forces at Edgehill, and at the first battle of Newbury, and after reducing Reading, and relieving Gloucester, he, in 1644, returned to the west of England. Here he was unsuccessful against the king's troops, and he owed his safety to flight by sea from the untenable garrisons of Cornwall. In 1645 the parliament, jealous of his power, or dissatisfied with his conduct, deprived him of his office by the self-denying ordinance, and the next year he died at Essex-house, in the Strand.

D'EWES, Sir Symonds, an English historian and antiquarian, born in 1602, at Cox-den, Dorsetshire, the seat of Mr. Symonds, his mother's father. His ancestors came from the Low Countries. In 1618 he entered at St. John's college, Cambridge, and two years after began his collection of materials for a history of England. His learning and his labours recommended him to the notice of the most distinguished characters of the times, of Cotton, Spelman, Selden, and others. In 1626 he married Anne, daughter of Sir William Clifton, who was scarce 18, with whom he lived in great domestic happiness. His great work was finished when he attained his 30th year, but he did not publish it, and it appeared afterwards under the title of Journals of all the parliaments during the reign of Elizabeth, &c. revised by Paul Bowes, 1682, folio. He served the office of Sheriff for Suffolk, and was knighted, and in 1641 was made baronet; but notwithstanding these marks of royal favour, he embraced the cause of the parliament. He sat in the house till December 1648, when he was ejected for supposed attachment to the king. He died April 18th, 1650, and was succeeded by his son Wilmoughby, to whom the journals were inscribed by Mr. Bowes. The manner in which Sir Symonds spoke of Camden's Britannia has drawn upon him the censures of several writers, and he certainly was very injudicious in asserting that scarce a page of it was free from errors. From his MSS. preserved among the Harleian papers, there are some particulars of his life.

DEWEY, Daniel, judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts, was appointed to supply the vacancy occasioned by the death of chief justice Parsons, in 1814. He had previously been a member of the council of the state, and a representative in Congress from Berkshire district. He studied law under Theodore Sedgwick, and attained a high rank in his profession. He died June 3d, 1815.  L.

DE WITT, John, the famous pensionary of Holland, was born at Dort, in 1625, and educated there. His abilities were so great, and his improvement so rapid, that at the age of 23 he published his "Elementa curvarum linearum," a work displaying the deepest knowledge of mathematics. After taking the degree of LL.D. and travelling for some time, he was made pensionary of his native town, and began to distinguish himself by his skill in political affairs. He warmly but unsuccessfully opposed the war between England and his country, and when afterwards raised to the high office of pensionary of Holland, he sent ambassadors to Cromwell to negotiate a peace. A pacification took place, but the secret article to exclude the family of Orange from the stadtholdership, brought public odium on

De Witt's administration. Notwithstanding the clamours of his enemies, and the pulpit invectives of the clergy, he subdued all opposition by his firmness, and when his office expired, he was unanimously re-elected by the states, 15th Sept. 1663. When war was unfortunately declared against England, after the restoration, De Witt exerted all his power to make the naval armaments as respectable as possible, and after Opdam's defeat, he was one of those named to preside over the fleet. The fleet was shut up in the Texel; but while the commanders considered it impossible to sail but with only 10 points of the compass, he, by mathematical calculation, convinced them that only four points were against them, and 28 for them, and in consequence of this, the ships were safely conveyed through a passage, which since that time has been called De Witt's diep. Of this affair, and of the events which took place afterwards, he wrote an accurate relation, for which he received the thanks of the state. Of the famous battle of three days, in 1666, he also gave a full account to the states, and in 1667 he established an edict for ever to abolish the stadtholderate in Holland; but in 1672, when the prince of Orange was nominated captain-general, the mob invited him to accept the office of stadtholder, and De Witt, no longer popular, resigned his office, after receiving the solemn thanks of the states for his services. When Holland was invaded by the French, the odium was thrown by the friends of the Orange family on De Witt and his party, and so violent were the tumults, that De Witt's brother, Cornelius, was accused by Ticklaer, a barber, and though declared innocent, was sentenced to exile, and soon after the prison in which he was, was attacked, and he as well as his brother, who unfortunately was present, were inhumanly butchered. Their dead bodies were dragged to the gallows, and the pensionary's remains were hung one foot higher than those of his brother. Their bodies thus insulted were cut into a thousand pieces, and it is even said, that some of the flesh was broiled and eat by the savage murderers. Thus fell this virtuous and amiable man, in his 47th year. As a politician he had no equal, and his love to his country was inferior to none of his other virtues. Without pride and pomp, he lived upon little more than 700*l.* a year, though at the head of a government; and with the greatest and most laudable integrity he refused the gift of 10,000*l.* with which the states wished to reward his noble services, observing, that such liberality was a bad precedent in a government. His work called "the true interest and political maxims of the republic of Holland," translated into English by John Campbell, is a glorious monument of his abilities as a statesman, and it displays the true maxims by which a government may become popular at home and respectable abroad, whilst it maintains justice with liberty, and encourages trade without oppression, or monopoly.

DEWITT, James, a painter of Amsterdam, born 1695. He was pupil to Van Hal. His best work is Moses appointing the 70 elders, painted for the burgomasters of Amsterdam.

DEXTER, Samuel, LL.D. a distinguished American lawyer and statesman, was the son of the honourable Samuel Dexter, of Boston, Massachusetts, and born in that place in 1761. He was educated at Harvard University, where he was graduated in 1781, with a high reputation for talents and acquirements. He studied law under the tuition of the honourable Levi Lincoln, of Worcester, and soon after commencing practice in his native town, rose into notice, and enjoyed extensive business. He was in a short time chosen to a seat in the state legislature, and at length transferred to the congress of the United States, first as a member of the house of representatives, and afterwards of the senate, and in those situations rose to the highest eminence as a statesman and orator. He was distinguished for the soundness of his judgment, the comprehensiveness of his views, the perspicuity and force of his reasoning, and commanded the profound respect of his political opponents as well as friends. During the administration of president Adams he was appointed secretary of war, and afterwards secretary of the treasury, and through a short period of vacancy also discharged the functions of secretary of state, and maintained in those stations his high reputation. On the accession of Mr. Jefferson to the presidency, he resigned his public employments, and resumed the practice of law; and was extensively employed not only in the courts of Massachusetts, but in the supreme court of the United States, and held the first rank among the eminent advocates who attended that bar. He was in 1815 requested by president Madison to accept a mission to the court of Spain, but declined the appointment, from a reluctance to go abroad. He died suddenly at Athens, New-York, the 3d of May, 1816. He possessed those rare endowments which would have placed him, had he lived in any age or nation, in the first rank of professional eminence. His superiority consisted rather in the energies of his understanding, than in brilliancy of fancy, warmth of passion, or extent of learning. His eloquence was of a lofty and original cast, addressed more to the reason than the passions, and characterized by great energy of thought, simplicity of diction, and perspicuity and acuteness of ratiocination.

DEYNUM, John Baptist Van, an eminent miniature painter of Antwerp, born 1620.

DEYSTER, Lewis, an eminent painter and engraver of Bruges, who died 1711, aged 55. His death of the Virgin, is his best piece. His daughter Anne was equally famous as a painter, but she relinquished the profession to construct organs and harpsichords, and consequently died poor, 1746, aged 50.

D'HOSIER, Peter, a native of Marseilles, the first who formed genealogies into a science. He was patronised by Lewis XIII. and XIV. who made him counsellor of state. He died 1660, aged 68.

DIACONUS, Paulus, a Lombard, born at Friuli, and educated at the court of Pavia. He became a monk in the monastery of Monte Casino, where he composed his history of the Lombards, in six books. He is considered as accurate in the affairs of his own nation, though not equally exact in treating foreign affairs. He died 770. His history was printed 1611, and is also found in Muratori's Rerum Ital. Scriptores.

DIAGORAS, a philosopher born at Melos, who publicly professed atheism, for which he was accused before the Athenians. He afterwards perished in a shipwreck, 412 B.C.

DIAZ, Bartholomew, a celebrated Portuguese navigator, who in 1466 discovered the most southern cape of Africa, to which he gave the name of the Cape of Storms. This appellation, so ill omened, was altered by John II. king of Portugal, to the name of the Cape of Good Hope.

DIAZ, John, a Spaniard, who studied at Paris, and embraced the doctrines of Luther. He afterwards visited Calvin at Geneva, and Bucer at Strasburg, and met at Neuburg his brother Alphonsus, who, as a violent catholic, endeavoured to convert him from the protestant faith. Unable to do this, Alphonsus pretends to return home, and the next morning, instigates an assassin to enter his brother's apartment, and with an axe to dash out his brains, whilst he himself awaits the event at the door of his chamber. The assassins were pursued and seized at Inspruck, but Charles V. took their punishment into his own hand. This dreadful deed was perpetrated the 27th March, 1546.

DIBDIN, Charles, a dramatist and song writer, was born at Southampton in 1748. He was educated at Winchester-school, which he left at the age of sixteen, and brought out an opera called "The Shepherd's Artifice," written and composed by himself. This was followed by "Lionel and Clarissa:" and "The Padlock;" in which last he performed Mungo. After this he became manager of the circus, and next the proprietor of a small theatre near Leicester-square. He wrote a number of loyal and nautical songs, for which Mr. Pitt granted him a pension of two hundred a year, but this was withdrawn on the death of that great man. Being thus reduced to poverty, he became a bankrupt, but at last a private subscription was entered into for his support. He died in 1814. Mr. Dibdin published some novels, and "Observations on a Tour through England and Scotland."—W. B.

DICEARCHUS, a philosopher of Messina in Sicily, who wrote a treatise on the geography of Greece, &c. published 1709.

DICENEUS, an Egyptian philosopher, in the age of Augustus. He travelled into Scythia, where he persuaded the people to learn and to practise temperance.

DICETO, Ralph de, author of abbreviations chronieorum, or an epitome of English history to the conquest—et imagines historiarum, or lives of some English kings—was dean of St. Paul's, London, 1210.

DICK, Sir Alexander, son of Sir William Cunningham of Copington, by the daughter and heiress of sir James Dick of Prestonfield, was born 1703. He studied medicine at Edinburgh, and afterwards under Boerhaave at Leyden, where he took his degrees, and after visiting several countries of Europe, he returned to England, and began to practise in Pembrokehire. On the death of his brother sir William, he assumed the name of his maternal grandfather, and retired to his family seat at Prestonfield, where he died 1785. He was in 1756 president of the college of physicians in Edinburgh, and liberally contributed to the honour and support of his profession. He was in 1774 honoured with a medal from the London society of arts and commerce, for his successful culture of Rhubarb, the first attempt of rearing which in England was owing to his patriotic views.

DICKINSON, Edmund, an eminent physician, son of the rector of Appleton, Berkshire, where he was born 1624. He was educated at Eton, and at Merton college, Oxford, where he took his medical degrees. He published in 1655 his Delphi Phœnicizantes, a learned work, in which he proved that the Greeks borrowed their history of the oracle of Delphi from the Scriptures, especially the book of Joshua. This book was universally admired, and Sheldon the primate wished in vain to turn the attention of the ingenious author to theological studies. After practising for some time in Oxford, where he had the misfortune to lose his first wife in childbed, and his second soon after his marriage, he in 1684 settled in London, where, by recovering lord Arlington, he obtained an introduction at court, and became physician to Charles II. and afterwards to his successor. Upon the abdication he retired from practice, and applied himself to the completion of his Physica vetus et vera, &c. which, when just finished, was unfortunately burnt, and cost him the heavy labours of recomposition. It appeared in 1702, and it proved that the method and mode of the creation of the universe, according to the principles of true philosophy, are related in a concise and general way by Moses. He wrote besides, diatriba de Noë in Italiam adventu, &c.—de origine Druidum, &c. He was also an able chymist, and was intimate with Theodore Mundanius, an illustrious professor in that science at Paris. He died of the stone in April, 1707, in his 83d year, and was buried in the chapel of St. Martin in the fields.

DICKINSON, Jonathan, first president of the college of New-Jersey, received his education at Yale college, where he was graduated in 1706. He was settled a year or two after pastor of the presbyterian church at Elizabethtown, New-Jersey, and laboured there with great reputation and success for forty years. On the establishment of the college of New-Jersey at Elizabethtown in 1746—he was appointed its president, but died in October of the next year. He possessed superior endowments and extensive learning, and enjoyed much celebrity as a preacher and controversial writer on theology. ☞ L.

DICKINSON, John, celebrated for his political writings, was a native of Delaware, and son of Samuel Dickinson, Esq. He was a member of the legislature of Pennsylvania in 1764, and of the general congress in 1765. In November, 1767, he published the first of his celebrated letters entitled "From a Farmer in Pennsylvania to the inhabitants of the British colonies;" against the oppressive acts of the British government, which did much to excite the Americans to the defence of their liberties. He was elected a member of the congress of 1774 and 1775, and wrote the petition addressed by that body to the king in the latter year. In 1776, he conscientiously opposed the motion for a declaration of independence, and was, in consequence, recalled from congress by his constituents. His superior talents and attachment to liberty, however, soon changed his views of that measure, and restored him to popularity, and a seat in congress, and he became a zealous supporter of the struggle for a complete emancipation from the parent country. In 1782, he was chosen president of Pennsylvania, and held the office till superseded by Dr. Franklin in 1785. Soon after that he removed to Delaware, and was again chosen a member of congress, and afterwards president of that State. He died at Wilmington, February 15th, 1808. He was distinguished for force of mind.

extent of knowledge, and eloquence, elegance of taste and manners, integrity and zeal for the happiness of his country; and he rendered it the most important services, and shared largely in its affections and honours. His political writings were republished in 1801, in 2 vols. ☞ L.

DICKINSON, Philemon, an officer in the war of the American revolution, who engaged in that contest at an early period, and enjoyed the praise of courage and zeal in the cause of liberty. He commanded the Jersey militia at the battle of Monmouth. After the organization of the national government in its present form, he was appointed to a seat in congress. Having discharged the duties of the several civil and military stations which he held with reputation, and enjoyed several years of retirement from public life, he died at Trenton in 1809. ☞ L.

DICKSON, David, a Scotch divine, born at Paisley 1591, and educated at Glasgow. He was an eloquent preacher; but he was too violent against the episcopalians, which subjected him to much obloquy, and to persecution. He was in 1638, a commissioner to the general assembly at Glasgow, and in 1643, in Westminster. He was divinity professor at Edinburgh, but in 1622, he was stripped of all his employments, and died at Edinburgh two years after, aged 73. He wrote a commentary on St. Matthew—the epistle to the Hebrews and Romans—and the Psalms, &c.—beside some divinity tracts.

DICTYS CRETENSIS, an ancient historian, said to have been engaged in the Trojan war, under Idomeneus. The work extant under his name is spurious.

DIDEROT, Dionysius, a celebrated writer, son of a cutler, was born at Langres 1713, and educated by the Jesuits, and afterwards at Paris. His father wished him to study the law, but belles lettres were his favourite pursuits, and when settled in the capital, he soon acquired by his wit, his learning, and his genius, friends, patrons, and encouragement. His first publication was Pensées philosophiques in 1746, which afterwards was published under the title of Etrennes aux esprits forts. He now employed himself with Eidons and Toussaint, in publishing a universal dictionary of medicine, in six vols. folio. This work, though deficient in many respects, procured him a greater share of reputation, and he now formed the gigantic plan of a Dictionnaire encyclopedique. In this laborious undertaking he was assisted by d'Alembert, and by several associates, whose genius, diligence, and judgment, were united to produce a work of merit, and of universal interest. Diderot himself took the arts and trades, and infused into his subjects all the knowledge, the brilliancy, and the nervousness of language, of which he was so capable; but he did not find in his fellow-labourers the same zeal, nor the same abilities. While his own part was completed with spirit and success, his associates proved too often inadequate to their undertakings; their contributions are ill digested, puerile, and contradictory, without system, without union, and devoid of interest and accuracy. This great work, which cost twenty years' labour to Diderot, was retarded in its progress by the suspicions of the court, who considered some reflections on government and religion, as improper and indelicate, and not only some copies were seized, but the printers themselves were sent to the Bastille. The work was delivered to the public between 1751 and 1767, and soon sold off, but Diderot did not find that increase to his independence which he expected, so that he was obliged to sell his library, which was purchased for 50,000 livres by the empress of Russia; but with a generosity truly great, the philosopher was permitted the use of his books as long as he lived. Though laboriously engaged in the encyclopedie, Diderot found time to write his Bijoux indiscrets, 2 vols. 12mo. a licentious and disgusting romance, the Fils naturel, and the Pere de famille, 1757 and 1758, two prose comedies, which, in an elegant and nervous style, paint the passions strongly, interest the heart, and render virtue in her various trials truly great, noble, and amiable. His letters on the blind appeared in 1748, but the freedoms, and the skepticism of the author cost him his liberty, and he was imprisoned for six months at Vincennes, where the gloom and horrors of confinement nearly deprived him of reason, had not the conversation of J. J. Rousseau and other literary men comforted his affliction. In 1751 he delivered his opinion on metaphysics, poetry, eloquence, &c. in a letter on the deaf and dumb, 2 vols. 12mo. Diderot's other works are—principles of moral philosophy, 12mo.—history of Greece, translated from Stanyan, 3 vols. 12mo.—pieces on mathematical subjects—the code of nature—the sixth sense—of public education—reflection on the interpretation of nature—panegyrics on Richardson—and the life of Seneca, a useful work. He died suddenly on rising from table, 31st July, 1784, aged 71. Diderot's character has been variously described. His frankness and candour are extolled by his friends, whilst his enemies reproach him as an artful, interested, pliant, and dangerous character. Of his extensive learning, and of his knowledge in every branch of science, his writings are most lasting monuments. It is, however, to be lamented, that his erudition was not always employed in the support of virtue and morality, nor his abilities exerted to animate man in the cultivation of what is so necessary to his welfare and happiness, the religious duties. A partial collection of his works has been published in 6 vols. 8vo.

DIDIUS JULIANUS, M. Salvius Severus, a Roman emperor, who purchased the diadem of the corrupt soldiery. Severus was soon after raised to the throne, and Didius was put to death after a short reign of 66 days, A. D. 193.

DIDO, or ELISSA, queen of Carthage, fled from Tyre after the murder of her husband Sichæus, by his brother Pygmalion, and she settled on the coast of Africa, where she laid the foundation of a new empire. Virgil and others represent her as visited by Æneas, after whose departure she destroyed herself through grief and disappointed love.

DIDOT, Francis Ambrose, an eminent printer at Paris. The works which he printed were peculiarly admired for the correctness, elegance, and beauty of the type, and among these, the edition of the classics, published by order of Lewis XVI. for the use of the dauphin, ranked very high. He made some useful improvements in paper mills, and in printing machines, and to his ingenuity the invention of stereotype printing may be fairly ascribed, to the perfection of which he devoted himself with so much zeal, that at the age of 73, he perused five times successively, the edition of Montaigne, which his sons had undertaken. He died at Paris, 10th July, 1804, aged 74, and was succeeded in his business by his sons, the eldest of whom is lately dead, leaving his concern to his brother, and to his son.

DIDYMUS, of Alexandria, an ancient grammarian, in the age of Augustus, said to have been the author of 400 books.

DIDYMUS, of Alexandria, an able writer, though blind at the age of five. He died 395, aged 85.

DIECMAN, John, a native of Stade, who became superintendent of the dutchies of Bremen and Verdun, and rector of Stade university, where he died 1720, aged 73. Besides several theological, metaphysical, and philosophical works, he published an edition of Luther's Bible, used at Stade.

DIEMEN, Anthony Van, a native of Kuilenberg, where his father was burgomaster. He went to the East Indies, and gradually rose to the government of the Dutch territories there, an office which he discharged with great zeal, ability, and success. He sent in 1642 Abel Tasman on a voyage of discovery to the government of the Dutch territories there, an office which he discharged with great zeal, ability, and success. He sent in 1642 Abel Tasman on a voyage of discovery to the southward, and the land which was discovered on the south of New Holland, was called in his honour Van Diemen's land. He died 1645.

DIEMERBROEK, Isbrand, a learned professor of anatomy at Utrecht, born at Mountford, in Holland. He died at Utrecht, 1674, aged 65. His works are a treatise on the plague—a history of distempers—a miscellany of pieces on physic and anatomy, folio.

DIEPENBECK, Abraham, a painter of Boisleduc, who died at Antwerp, 1675, aged 67. He studied under Rubens, and first painted on glass, and afterwards in oil. His drawings are numerous, and his temple of the muses is considered as a masterpiece.

DIEST, Adrian Van, a landscape painter of the Hague, who died 1704, aged 49. He spent the best part of his life in England, where his pencil was employed in delineating the beauties of the western plants of the island.

DIETRIC, John Conrad, a Lutheran, native of Butzbach, in Wetteravia. He was professor of Greek and history in his native town, and removed in 1653 to Giessen, where he died 1667, aged 55. He was author of a book de peregrinatione studio-rum—antiquitates Romanæ lexicon etymologico-Græcum—antiquates novi testamenti—antiquitates bibliæ, &c.

DIETRICH, John William Ernest, a native of Weimar, where his father was eminent as a painter of battles, and of portraits. After studying under his father, he went to Dresden to improve himself under Alexander Thiele, and thence removed to Italy. His abilities recommended him to the public notice, and he was made professor of Dresden academy, and director of the painting school of Meissen, and died 1774, aged 62. His landscapes, portraits, scripture pieces, conversations, &c. were much admired, and he acquired some celebrity also as an engraver.

DIETRY, a painter of Dresden, who died there 1730, aged 45. His two views near Rome are very pleasing proofs of his great skill in landscape painting.

DIEU, Lewis de, an eminent divine, born at Flushing, 7th April, 1590. He early distinguished himself as a preacher, and refused to be the court minister at the Hague, as he was more desirous to censure than countenance the licentious morals of the great. He came to Leyden to teach with his uncle and preceptor, the learned Colonius, and he was divinity professor in the Walloon college till his death in 1642. He published in 1651 a commentary on the four gospels—and notes on the Acts, after a careful examination of several translations—the history of our Saviour in the Persian language, by the Jesuit Jerome Xavier, and a Latin translation—rudiments of the Hebrew and Persian tongues—besides the revelation of St. John, in Hebrew and Syriac, with a Latin version—and other inferior treatises. His father Daniel de Dieu, was minister of Flushing, and a very learned orator, who could fluently preach in German, Italian, French, and English.

DIGBY, Everard, an English gentleman of Drystoke, in Rutlandshire, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He wrote some curious and learned books, de arte natandi—de duplici methodo, &c.—theoria analytica—a dissuasive from taking the church livings, &c. He died 1592.

DIGBY, Sir Everard, son of the preceding, was educated in the Romish church after his father's death. He was recommended to queen Elizabeth, whose court he attended, and he was knighted by king James. Though of mild manners, and peaceful disposition, and rich and independent from his own paternal estates, and the property of his wife, daughter of William Mulsho, Esq. of Gothurst, Bucks, he yet engaged in the schemes for the destruction of the government. Though not immediately an agent in the gunpowder plot with Guy Fawkes, he gave 1500*l.* towards the expenses of it. On the discovery of this diabolical scheme, therefore, he was sent to the tower, and when arraigned he pleaded for his conduct, that the king had broke his promises to the catholics, and that the restoration of the catholic religion was an event which, in the opinion of this infatuated sect, it became every subject to accomplish by whatever means they could; and he added, that as he alone was guilty, pardon should be extended to all others, and his family particularly, not ruined. On the 30th January, 1607, pursuant to his sentence, he was hanged, drawn, and quartered at the west end of St. Paul's, London, and he died very penitent, and anxious to make deep atonement for the meditated horrors of the conspiracy.

DIGBY, Sir Kenelm, an eminent philosopher, eldest son of the preceding, was born at Gothurst, Bucks, 11th June, 1603. He was educated under the care of Laud, then dean of Gloucester, and in 1618 he entered at Gloucester-hall, Oxford, where during the three years of his residence, he displayed such great abilities, and so extensive a knowledge, that he was compared to the celebrated Picus de Mirandula. After travelling through France, Spain, and Italy, he returned to England in 1623, and was knighted. He then engaged the attention of the learned and curious, by the introduction of a secret medicine, afterwards well known by the name of sympathetic powder, which he discovered in his travels. He became a favourite of Charles I. and when a quarrel arose with the Venetians, he was sent with a fleet into the Mediterranean in 1628, and acquired great reputation by his conduct at Algiers, and by his attack of the hostile fleet in the bay of Scanderon. In 1636, after a visit to France, he was reconciled to the Romish church, much to the regret of his guardian and friend Laud, who expostulated with him in vain, and he defended his motives, and published, 1638, a conference with a lady about the choice of religion, re-printed 1654. In 1639 he was very active to levy contributions among the papists for the king's service, for which interference he was called before the parliament, and imprisoned in Winchester-house, from which, however, he was released in consequence of the honourable interference of the queen of France. Upon his liberation he retired to Paris, and soon after visited Des Cartes at Egmont, and laid the foundation of that friendly intercourse and literary communication, which always afterwards prevailed between these two celebrated characters. During his retirement in France, Sir Kenelm devoted himself to philosophical pursuits, and published his treatise of the nature of bodies—and another on the operation and nature of man's soul, &c. 1644—an institutionum peripateticarum libri quinque, &c. 1651. Upon the destruction of the regal power, he returned to England to collect the shattered remains of his fortune, but the parliament ordered him to leave the country on pain of confiscation and loss of life. His return to Paris was agreeable to queen Henrietta, whose chancellor he had been appointed, and he was sent by her as negotiator to pope Innocent X. The elevation of Cromwell to supreme power enabled him to revisit England, and after staying there the best part of the year 1655, and engaging, it is supposed, to reconcile the papists to the usurpation, he returned to Paris. He afterwards spent some time at Toulouse and Montpellier, where, as a man of letters and as a philosopher, he was courted and respected. At the restoration he came back to England, and became a favourite in the court of Charles II. though his enemies failed not to represent him as lately employed in the service of the usurper. At the establishment of the Royal Society he was made one of the council. He was very grievously afflicted the latter part of his life by the stone, of which painful disorder he died at his house, Covent-garden, June 11th, 1665. His remains were interred in Christ-church, Newgate. His valuable library, which, during the troubles, had been removed to France, became at his death the property of the French king. Besides the books mentioned, Sir Kenelm published observations on Dr. Brown's religio medici—observations on the 22d stanza of the 9th canto, second book of the fairy queen—a discourse on the vegetation of plants—a treatise of adhering to God, translated from Albertus Magnus. Sir Kenelm was ridiculed for asserting, on the report of some of his friends, that there was a city near Tripoli, whose inhabitants, beasts, &c. had in a few hours been turned to stone, by petrifying vapour from the earth; a circumstance supported by the observations of the late travellers, mentioned in Dr. Rob. Hook's philosophical observations, &c. 1726, 8vo. Sir Kenelm left an only son John, who succeeded him to his estate. Another son, Kenelm, was slain in the king's cause at the battle of Saint Neots.

DIGBY, John, a nobleman, descended of a respectable family at Coleshill, Warwickshire. He was of Magdalen college, Oxford, and after finishing his travels, he was introduced to James I. who appointed him gentleman of the privy chamber, and in 1606 knighted him, and in 1611 and 1614 sent him as his ambassador to Spain. In 1616 he became a privy counsellor, and chamberlain to the king; two years after he was made baron Digby of Sherbourne, and 1620 sent ambassador to the archduke Albert, and next year to the emperor. In 1622 he went to Spain to negotiate the prince's marriage with the Infanta, and on his return he was created earl of Bristol. He opposed Buckingham in parliament, and for a while he favoured the popular party; but in the civil troubles he was exiled, and died at Paris, 21st Jan. 1653. He was author of some poems, of airs and dialogues. He also translated, it is supposed, at James I.'s request, Du Moulin's defence of the catholic faith, contained in the books of king James against the answer of N. Coeffeteau, &c. 1610.

DIGBY, George, earl of Bristol, son of the preceding, was born at Madrid, October, 1612. He was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, where he distinguished himself by his abilities, and by his friendship with the celebrated Peter Heylin. In his politics he embraced the popular cause, and was one of Strafford's accusers; but he afterwards favoured the king's party, and was expelled from the house of commons for speaking in the defence of that unfortunate nobleman. During the civil wars he was very active in the royal cause, and in Ireland, Jersey, and France, he displayed his zeal in the service of his unfortunate master. After Charles's death he was exempted from pardon by the parliament, and consequently spent his life in exile, but at the restoration he was made a knight of the garter, but he violently opposed in parliament the great Clarendon. He died at Chelsea, 20th March, 1676. It is remarkable, that though he wrote against popery he died a papist, and though a papist he spoke in favour of the test act.

DIGGES, Leonard, a learned mathematician, born at Barham in Kent, and educated at University college, Oxford. He wrote Tectonicum, to show the measuring of land, &c. 1556, 4to. improved by his son Thomas, 1592—a geometrical practical treatise—pantometria, published by his son, 1591—prognostication of everlasting right, good effect, or rules to judge the weather by the sun, moon, stars, &c. 1564. He died 1574.

DIGGES, Thomas, only son of Leonard, after studying at Oxford, proved himself a very great mathematician. He went as muster-master general to the forces sent by Elizabeth to defend the Netherlands. Besides improving some of his father's works, he published alæ sive scalæ, &c. mathematical wings or ladders, 1573, 4to.—an arithmetical military treatise, 4to.—a geometrical treatise, &c.—a description of celestial orbs, &c.—motive for association, &c.—England's defence, &c. He died 1595.

DIGGES, Sir Dudley, eldest son of Thomas, was born 1583, and educated at University college, Oxford. He studied the law, and after being knighted, travelled to improve himself in foreign lands. He was sent in 1618, as ambassador to Prussia by James I. and two years after he went to Holland as commissioner. He was in parliament in the reign of James, and of Charles I. and his conduct was very independent, and often hostile to the measures of the court, so that he was sent to the tower for his accusation against Buckingham. So powerful was his influence, that measures were adopted to gain him over, and by a reversionary grant of the office of master of the rolls in 1630, which he obtained in 1636, he was brought over to favour the measures of government. He did not long enjoy this honourable office, as he died 8th March, 1639, universally lamented. He published a defence of trade, 4to.—a discourse on the rights and privileges of the subject, or a conference with the lords by a committee of both houses, 1628 and 1642—speeches on several occasions inserted in Ruthworth's collections—letters between Walsingham and Burleigh, and others, about Elizabeth's marriage with the duke of Anjou.

DIGGES, Thomas, brother to Sir Dudley, was educated at University college, and improved himself by travelling abroad. He translated Gerardo, the unfortunate Spaniard, from Cespades—and Claudian's rape of Proserpine into English verse. He was a learned man, and died 1635.

DIGGES, Dudley, third son to Sir Dudley, was educated at University college, and became fellow of All-souls, 1633. He wrote an answer to observations on his majesty's answers and expresses—and the unlawfulness of subjects taking up arms against their sovereign, 1643. He died 1643.

DIGGES, Edward, governor of Virginia, succeeded Bennett in 1654. He was the son of Sir Dudley Digges, privy counsellor of Charles I. It was during his administration that the Virginians were defeated by the Indians, near the falls of James river. He did much to promote the culture of silk in the province, and sent to Armenia for persons to teach the art. He was superseded by Mathews in 1656, and soon after sent to England as an agent of the colony.

DILLENIIUS, John James, an eminent botanist, born at Darmstadt, in Germany, 1681, and educated at the university of Giessen, in Upper Hesse. He established his reputation as a learned botanist, by his valuable communications to the miscellanea curiosa, and by his other ingenious publications. In his dissertation on the coffee of the Arabians, he gives his preparations made with peas, beans, &c. and asserts, that from rye can be produced, that which most nearly resembles coffee. He enumerates not less than 980 plants; exclusive of mushrooms and mosses, in the neighbourhood of Giessen, and thus displays the most indefatigable and ardent industry. His acquaintance with Dr. Sherard, who had been British consul at Smyrna, was productive of an alteration in his plans; he followed his friend to England in 1721, and there resided the rest of his life. He first engaged himself in this country, in a new edition of Ray's synopsis stirpium Britannicarum, and by the death of his friend in 1728, and his bequeathing of 3000*l.* to the university of Oxford for a botanical professorship, to which Dillenius was first to be appointed, he was raised to comfortable independence, and learned retirement. In this wish-for situation he applied himself diligently to the improvement of botany, and in his hortus Elthamensis, 417 plants, chiefly exotics, were described and figured with the most careful attention. His expectations, however, did not answer; botany was not yet a favourite study, and the author sold few of his copies, and where he flattered himself with profit, he experienced only loss. In 1735, the university granted him the degree of M. D. and the following year he was honoured with a visit from his friend and correspondent Linnæus. He now devoted himself to the completion of a history of mosses, and probably would have undertaken the funguses, had not death closed prematurely his labours. He was attacked the last week in March, 1747, with an apoplexy, and died on the 2d April, aged 60. In his private character, Dillenius was very respectable, naturally of a mild temper, but fond of retirement, that his studious pursuits might meet less interruption. His drawings, dried plants, MSS. &c. were purchased by Dr. Sibthorpe his successor, and now enrich the treasures of Oxford.

DILLON, Wentworth, earl of Roscommon. Vid. ROSCOMMON.

DILWORTH, Thomas, a diligent schoolmaster, whose spelling-book—book-keeper's assistant—schoolmaster's assistant—miscellaneous arithmetic, &c.—are well known as useful and popular books. He was for some time engaged at Stratford-lebow with Dyche, and then set up a school for himself at Wapping. He died 1781.

DIMSDALE, Thomas, an eminent English physician, born at Thoydon-garnon, Essex, where his father was a surgeon. His family were quakers, and his grandfather was the companion of Penn, in America. Young Dimsdale, after studying at St. Thomas' hospital, settled at Hertford, which he quitted in 1745, in consequence of the death of his wife, and engaged as surgeon in the duke of Northumberland's army in the Scotch campaign. On the taking of Carlisle he returned to Hertford, where he again married, and in 1761, began to practise as physician. His celebrity as an inoculator in the smallpox, recommended him to the empress Catharine, at whose request he visited Russia, in 1768. His successful inoculation of the empress, and of her son the grand duke, was rewarded with the rank of baron of the empire, of counsellor of state, and of physician to the empress, besides a pension of 500*l.* per ann. and a present of 12,000*l.* His son, who had accompanied him, shared his honours, and was presented with a gold snuff-box set with diamonds. In 1781, Dimsdale was again in Russia to inoculate the grand duke's two sons, and so respectable was his character, that he was elected member of parliament for Hertford, in 1780, and again 1784, but resigned his pretensions at the next general election. This able practitioner had the misfortune to lose his eyesight by a catarrh, which, however, was happily removed by Wenzell. He died 1800. He was author of tracts on inoculation, with an account of his journey to Russia, 8vo. 1781.

DINARCHUS, a Greek orator, the pupil of Theophrastus. He was banished for a false accusation of receiving bribes, B.C. 340.

DINGLEY, Robert, an English writer, educated at Magdalen college. He became a zealous puritan, and was made rector of Brixton, in the Isle of Wight, by the interest of his uncle, col. Hammond, when governor there. He died 1659, aged 40. Among his works are mentioned, the deputation of angels, proved by the divine right of nature, from many rubs and mistakes, &c.

DINO, compiler of the six books of decretals, and author of a valuable commentary on the rules of law, was professor of jurisprudence at Bologna, and died about 1307. It is said, that he expected to be made a cardinal, as the reward of his services, and in consequence of such hopes he took orders, and divorced his wife.

DINOCRATES, a Macedonian architect, whose abilities were employed in the building of the city of Alexandria. His offer to cut mount Athos into the form of a statue, in honour of Alexander, was rejected by the monarch.

DINOSTRATUS, a mathematician, the pupil of Plato. He is the inventor of the quadratic curve which bears his name.

DINOTH, Richard, a protestant writer of Coutances, who died 1680, leaving an accurate work, de bello civili Gallico.

DINOUART, Anthony Joseph Toussaint, canon of St. Bennet, Paris, and member of the academy of the Arcades, at Rome, was born at Amiens, 1st Nov., 1715, and died at Paris, 23d April, 1786. He first engaged at Paris with Joannet in periodical publications, where the severity of his remarks drew upon him trouble and law-suits. In 1760, he began his ecclesiastical journal, which produced him an extensive correspondence with France, but he was little attentive in this periodical work to propriety, as nostrums and sermons were recommended in the same page to his readers, and large quotations from various authors were made without any acknowledgment. His other works are embryologia sacra, 12mo.—the manual for pastors, 3 vols. 12mo.—the rhetoric of preachers, &c.—besides some Latin and French poems of inferior merit.

DINWIDDIE, Robert, governor of Virginia, succeeded Thomas Lee, on whom the administration devolved after the departure of Gooch, and the death of Robinson, in 1752. He had been a member of the council as early as 1742, and was subsequently employed as clerk to a collector of customs in the West Indies. He there detected and exposed to the government an enormous fraud practised by his principal, for which he was rewarded by receiving the government of Virginia. Under his administration, the attempt was made to expel the French from the Ohio and fort Du Quesne, in which Washington first distinguished himself as a military officer, and the unfortunate Braddock fell. In 1757, governor Dinwiddie left the colony, and devolved the administration on John Blair, president of the council. He was charged with converting to his own use the sum of 20,000*l.* transmitted through his hands as a compensation to the Virginians for the money they had expended beyond their proportion in the public service. He died at Clifton, England, August 1st, 1770, aged 80.

DIO CHRYSOSTOM, an orator of Prusa, in Bithynia, wantonly disgraced by Domitian, but treated with great kindness by Trajan.

DIOCLES, a mathematician in the fifth century, the inventor of the cissoid or curve line, which Newton calls one of the defective hyperboles.

DIOCLESIAN, Caius Valerius, a Roman emperor, born of an obscure family in Dalmatia. He succeeded Numerian, in 284, and after a glorious reign of valour, and the honourable patronage of virtue and learning, he laid down his power at Nicomedia, 304, and retired to privacy at Salona, where he died, 313.

DIODATI, John, a native of Lucca, professor of philosophy at Geneva, where he died, 1652, aged 73. He is well known for his translations of the Bible into Italian, with notes, 4to. 1607, into French, 1644—and father Paul's history of the council of Trent into French.

DIODORUS SICULUS, a Greek historian, born at Argyrium, in Sicily. Of his universal history only 15 books remain, best edited by Wesseling. He flourished about 44 B.C.

DIODORUS, bishop of Tarsus, eminent as a divine, and also as an instructor of youth in the fourth century. Of his writings only a few fragments remain.

DIOGENES, a famous cynic philosopher, born at Sinope, in Pontus, B.C. 414. He was so independent in his character and conduct, that he preferred living in a tub to the comforts of a house. Pride, however, and misanthropy, seem to have predominated in him, over virtue and true philosophy.

DIOGENES, a philosopher of Babylon, B.C. 200. He succeeded Zeno in his school, and attended Carneades to Rome in his embassy.

DIOGENES LAERTIUS, a Greek historian of Cilicia. His lives of philosophers in 10 books are esteemed. He died A.D. 222.

DIOGENES, a Cretan philosopher, the successor of Anaximenes, B.C. 500.

DIOGNETUS, a philosopher, preceptor to Marcus Aurelius.

DION, a Syracusan, celebrated as the friend of Plato, and particularly as the relation and the opponent of the Dionysi, tyrants of Sicily. After successfully expelling the younger Dionysius, he was himself soon after murdered, about 354 B.C.

DION CASSIUS, a historian of Bithynia, in the third century. Of his Greek history from the age of Romulus to the reign of Alexander Severus, much has been lost.

DIONIS, Peter, a French surgeon, who died 1718. His skill in anatomical dissertations and chirurgical operations was very great. He published some valuable works, —un cours d'operations de chirurgie,— l'anatomie de l'homme,—and traité de la maniere de secourir les femmes dans les accouchemens, &c.

DIONYSIUS I. tyrant of Sicily, raised himself from obscurity to the sovereign power, which he maintained with great vigour. His reign is however marked by many actions of cruelty and oppression, and his conduct towards Plato, whom he ordered to be sold as a slave, was infamous in the extreme. He died 366 B.C. after a reign of near 40 years.

DIONYSIUS II. succeeded his father as tyrant of Syracuse, and exceeded him in cruelty, though he was inferior to him in sagacity. He was at last expelled by Dion B.C. 343, and died a private man at Corinth.

DIONYSIUS PERIEGETES, author of Periegesis, or geography of the world, in Greek verse, was patronised by Augustus.

DIONYSIUS, an historian of Halicarnassus, who settled at Rome B.C. 30, and wrote a valuable work called Roman antiquities, of which only 11 books are extant. He wrote some other works.

DIONYSIUS, a tyrant of Heraclea, who married a niece of Darius. He was remarkable for his corpulence, and died 304 B. C.

DIONYSIUS, a bishop of Corinth, who suffered martyrdom 178.

DIONYSIUS, a bishop of Alexandria, the disciple of Origen. He wrote some things, and was exposed to persecution. He died 267.

DIONYSIUS, bishop of Rome after Sixtus 259, condemned the heresy of Sabellius in a full synod, and died 269.

DIONYSIUS, a Romish monk called the little, in the fifth century. He compiled a book of decretals, and translated from the Greek a body of canons, and invented, as it is said, the victorian period, or method of calculating the time of Easter.

DIONYSIUS the Areopagite, a learned Athenian, member of the court of the Arcopagus, and converted to Christianity by Paul's preaching on the unknown God, as mentioned in Acts xvii. He is supposed to have suffered martyrdom, but when or where is unknown. The works published under his name, Antwerp, 2 vols. 1634, are spurious.

DIOPHANTUS, a mathematician of Alexandria, said to have invented algebra. The age in which he lived is unknown. His six books on arithmetic, in Greek and Latin, were published at Paris 1621.

DIOSCORIDES, Pedacus, a physician under Nero. He wrote five books on the virtues of plants, edited by Saracenus, 1598, fol.

DIPPLE, John Conrad, a curious and extravagant character, who called himself in his writings, Christianus Democritus. He warmly opposed the Pietists at Strasburg, and afterwards supported them at Giessen. When unable to get a wife and a professor's chair, he began his invectives against the protestants, and soon after turned his thoughts to chymistry, and pretended to have discovered the philosopher's stone. But though thus rich in his opinion he was literally poor, and in consequence of his debts successively confined in the prisons of Berlin, Copenhagen, Frankfort, Leyden, Amsterdam, &c. In 1727 he went to Stockholm to prescribe for the king, but the Swedish clergy, though pleased with the recovery of the monarch, banished the operator, who returned to Germany. In 1733 he published a statement to prove that he should not die till the year 1808, but the next year, unfortunately for the prophecy, he was found dead in his bed at Wigenstein, 25th April, 1734. He wrote some enthusiastic works, and denied the divine inspiration of the Holy Scriptures.

DIROIS, Francis, doctor of the Sorbonne, is known for his work called Preuves et prejugés pour la religion Chretienne et catholique, contre les fausses religions et atheism, and for other ecclesiastical labours. He died about 1700.

DISNEY, John, a native of Lincoln, educated at the grammar-school there, and among the dissenters, and afterwards removed to the Middle temple. He never however practised at the bar, but devoted himself to the arduous offices of public magistrate in his native country, and was so upright and zealous in the support of virtue and morality, that he received the thanks of the judges at the assize. Though brought up among the dissenters, and the son of a dissenter, he yet honoured the church of England, and at the age of 42, took orders and succeeded to the livings of Croft, and Kirkby on Baine, Lincolnshire, and in 1722 to that of St. Mary, Nottingham. He was author of two essays on the execution of the laws against immorality and profaneness, 8vo.—Flora prefixed to Rapin's poem on gardens, translated, —remarks on Sacheverell's sermon, —primitiæ sacræ, or reflections on devout solitude, 8vo.—genealogy of the house of Brunswick Lunenburg, —view of ancient laws against immorality, &c. folio. This excellent man died at Nottingham 1730, aged 53.

DISNEY, John, a descendant of the preceding, was born at Lincoln in 1746, and educated at Peterhouse, Cambridge, where he proceeded to his degree of doctor in divinity. He became chaplain to bishop Law of Carlisle, and vicar of Swinderly, in his native county, which he resigned in 1783, in imitation of his friend Mr. Lindsey, to whom he was first an assistant, and afterwards his successor in Essex-street.

Mr. Michael Dodson left him half his fortune, and Brand Hollis made him his sole executor, though neither of those gentlemen were related to him. In return for these favours he published their memoirs, and that of Mr. Hollis in a most splendid form, in 2 vols. 4to. Dr. Disney died in 1816. He printed several tracts and sermons; also Biographical Sketches of Bishop Law, Dr. Jortin, Dr. Sykes, and other divines.—W. B.

DITHMAR, a Benedictine monk, bishop of Mersburg, died 1028, aged 42. He is known for a valuable chronicle of the emperors Henry I. Otho II. and III. and Henry II. the best edition of which is that published by Leibnitz in his collection to illustrate the history of Brunswick.

DITHMAR, Justus Christopher, member of the academy of Berlin, and historical professor at Frankfort, where he died 1737. His works on the history of Germany evince great learning and strong application.

DITTON, Humphrey, an eminent mathematician, born at Salisbury, 29th May, 1675. He entered upon the labours of the ministry at his father's request, and for some time officiated at a dissenting meeting-house at Tunbridge, where he married. The death of his father soon after enabled him to pursue his favourite studies, and to abandon divinity for mathematics. By the interest of his friends, and especially Sir Isaac Newton, he was appointed master of the mathematical school, Christ's Hospital, where he continued till death, 1715. He favoured the world with some learned works, and his tracts on the tangents of curves, in spherical catoptrics, general laws of nature and motion, Alexandra's synopsis algebraica, the institution of fluxions, his discourse on the resurrection of Jesus, and the new law of fluxions, and a treatise on perspective, are well known.

DIVINI, Eustachius, an Italian artist, eminent in the making of telescopes. He disputed with Huygens about the discovery of Saturn's ring, but the pamphlets written on this occasion show that the Italian's telescopes were not so good as those of his opponent. He died about 1664.

DIXWELL, John, one of the regicides, who after the restoration of Charles II. came to America, and resided at New-Haven, bearing the name of John Davids. He had held a colonel's commission from the parliament. He died in 1688, in the 82d year of his age.  L.

DLUGOSS, John, a Pole, who became archbishop of Leopold, and died 1480, aged 65, much persecuted by king Casimir. His history of Poland, in Latin, though accurate, is written in barbarous language. He brought it down to the year 1444. The 12 first books were printed at Frankfort 1711, folio, and the 13th at Leipsic 1712.

DOBBS, Arthur, governor of North Carolina, was appointed to that office in 1753. He was selfish, arbitrary, and zealous, to abridge the rights of the people, and augment the influence of the crown. After a very turbulent and unpopular administration, he died March 25th, 1765, aged 82, and was succeeded by governor Tryon.

DOBSON, William, an English painter, born in London 1610. Under Peake, a stationer, he had the opportunity of copying Titian and Vandyck's pieces with such success that he was generously recommended by Vandyck to Charles I. who patronised him. Though highly favoured at court, he died poor at his house in St. Martin's lane 1647. Had his genius been early tutored by the hand of art, he might have become a very great master. His pieces however in history and portraiture exhibit unusual powers.

DOD, John, a nonconformist of Jesus college, Cambridge, who died about 1645. His pious observations were once very popular among the vulgar, as well calculated to recommend virtue and religion. He was called the decalogist from his exposition of the 10 commandments in conjunction with Robert Cleaver. He was very eminent as a Hebrew scholar, in which he instructed his friend John Gregory of Oxford.

DODART, Denys, physician to Lewis XIV. was born at Paris 1634, and died 1707, greatly regretted. He was a supporter of Sanctorius's notions about insensible perspiration, and he made an experiment upon himself during Lent, by which he found that he weighed at the end of that season of abstinence only 107 pounds 12 ounces, having lost during that time eight pounds five ounces. He was a very religious and amiable character. His son Claude, was physician to the king, and died at Paris 1720, leaving notes on Pomey's history of drugs.

DODD, William, a learned but unfortunate divine, born 1729 at Bourne, Lincolnshire, where his father was vicar. In 1745 he entered at Clare-hall, Cambridge, where he early distinguished himself and took his degrees. He published about this time the beauties of Shakspeare, 2 vols. 12mo. and having entered into orders in 1753, he became a popular and eloquent preacher in London, and was appointed lecturer to some charities, especially the Magdalen hospital, in whose establishment he had been zealously active. In 1761 he wrote a sonnet in praise of Dr. Squire, bishop of St. David's, and for his flattery was made his chaplain, and afterwards prebendary of Brecon. But though his income was respectable from his ecclesiastical appointments, and from his connexions with the booksellers, who allowed him 100*l.* a year to superintend the Christian's magazine, his expenses were great from an improper spirit of extravagance and gayety which he thoughtlessly indulged. In 1765 he began to publish in weekly numbers his commentary on the Bible, which drew the public attention, as being collected from the papers of Locke, Waterland, West, Clarendon, and other celebrated men, and the work was completed in 3 vols. folio, and dedicated to bishop Squire, who unluckily for the author died soon after. In 1766, as being king's chaplain, he took the degree of LL.D. and soon after published a volume of poems, and in 1769 he translated Massillon's sermons, inscribed to the prince of Wales. In 1771 appeared his sermons to young men, 3 vols. 12mo. dedicated to his pupils Charles Ernst, and Philip Stanhope, afterwards earl of Chesterfield. He was presented in 1772 to the living of Hoekliffe, Bucks, by his pupil, but though his income was enlarged his expenditure increased in far greater proportion, and in a thoughtless moment of ambition and avarice, he endeavoured to obtain the vacant living of St. George's, Hanover square, by offering in an anonymous letter 3000*l.* to lady Apsley, if she would use her influence for the appointment. The unfortunate letter was divulged, and the chancellor Apsley laid it before the king, in consequence of which Dodd, now proved to be the author of it, was not only erased from the list of chaplains, but ridiculed in the papers, and lampooned on the stage in one of Foote's pieces at the Haymarket. Ashamed of his conduct he fled to Geneva, where his pupil lord Chesterfield honourably gave him in addition the living of Winge in Bucks; but so extravagant and ridiculous was the conduct of this ill-fated divine, that he appeared at the races at Sablons near Paris, in a phaeton, in all the attire of French foppery. On his return to London he preached his last sermon at the Magdalen, 2d February, 1777, and two days after signed a bond for 4000*l.* which he had forged in the name of lord Chesterfield, and by which he obtained money to relieve his necessities. The forgery was soon discovered, Dodd was tried and condemned at the Old Bailey 24th February, and executed at Tyburn 27th June. Between the passing of his sentence and its execution, which had been delayed in consequence of doubts about the admissibility of the evidence of the man who had drawn up the bond, great interest was made, and a petition signed by thousands presented to the king, to save from ignominious death this unfortunate man, but all in vain. During his confinement he behaved with great penitence, and addressed his fellow-prisoners in his "thoughts in prison," with energy and Christian fortitude. He translated Callimachus, and wrote 4 vols. of sermons on the miracles and parables of our Saviour. His publications are said to have altogether amounted to 55 in number, chiefly on religious and moral subjects. Before the commission of his forgery he offered proposals for a history of free-masonry, 2 vols. 4to. He was married in 1751, but he left no children.

DODDRIDGE, or DODERIDGE, Sir John, a native of Barnstaple, Devonshire, educated at Exeter college, Oxford, where he took his bachelor's degree 1576. He then removed to the middle temple, and became in 1603 serjeant at law, solicitor to the king, and in 1612, a judge of the common pleas, and afterwards of the king's bench. He died at Egham, Surrey, and was buried in Exeter cathedral, where a monument records his services. He is author of the lawyer's light, or direction for the study of the law, 4to. 1629,—a complete parson, or description of advowsons, &c. 4to. 1630,—history of the ancient and modern estates of Wales, Cornwall, and Chester, 4to. 1630,—the English lawyer, 4to. 1731,—opinion on the antiquity, power, order, &c. of the high court of parliament in England, 1658, published by his relation John Doddridge, recorder of Barnstaple.

DODDRIDGE, Philip, D.D. an eminent dissenting divine, son of an oilman in London, where he was born 26th June, 1702. He was educated at private schools at Kingston-on-Thames, and at St. Alban's, and began at the latter place a lasting friendship with Dr. Samuel Clarke, who became his religious instructor, and, on his father's death, his faithful guardian. Tinctured with the tenets of the dissenters, he declined the liberal offers of the dutchess of Bedford, who wished to bring him up at the university, and to raise him to preferment, and in 1719, he went to the academy of Mr. Jennings at Kibworth in Leicestershire, where he displayed uncommon diligence. He afterwards took the care of a small congregation at Kibworth, and soon after succeeded, on Jennings's death, to his academy, which, at the invitation of his friends, he removed to Northampton, where he continued the rest of his days, respected as a divine, successful as an instructor, and beloved as a private man. He died 26th October, 1751, at Lisbon, where he had gone for the recovery of his health, and was buried in the ground of the English factory there. This amiable character, so much respected by all parties, published several religious tracts, the best known of which are, the principles of the Christian religion, &c.—the rise and progress of religion in the soul,—remarkable passages in the life of col. James Gardiner, &c.—ten sermons on the power and grace of Christ, &c.—the family expositor, containing a version and paraphrase of the New Testament, with critical notes, &c. a valuable work, in 6 vols. 4to. Some of his letters and smaller tracts have been published by Stedman of Shrewsbury.

DODOENS, or DODONEUS, Rambert, a botanist of Malines, physician to the emperors Maximilian II. and Rodolphus II. and professor at Leyden, died 1585, aged 67. He wrote a history of plants, Antwerp, folio, 1616, translated into French by P'Ecluse.

DODSLEY, Robert, a well-known bookseller and writer, born at Mansfield, Nottinghamshire, 1703. Receiving little of education, he began life as footman in the family of Mrs. Lowther, but in this servile situation he indulged his natural talents for poetry and satire, and wrote the muse in livery, and a small dramatic piece called the Toyshop, which accidentally was seen by Pope, and engaged all his attention. Interesting himself in the cause of this humble poet, he procured for him the introduction of his piece at the theatre, and manifested for him to the end of life, the most cordial and honourable friendship. The Toyshop was succeeded by the "King and Miller of Mansfield," in 1736, and from the great success of these two pieces, he was enabled to settle himself independently as a London bookseller, a situation in which he maintained the greatest respectability of character with the most benevolent intentions and great humility of deportment. After acquiring a very handsome fortune, Dodsley retired from business in favour of his brother, and died 25th September, 1764, in his 61st year, at the house of his friend Mr. Spence, of Durham, and was buried in the abbey church at Durham. His works consist of six dramatic pieces, of which the Cleone, a tragedy, is much admired, besides Public Virtue, a poem, 1754, 4to., Trifles, 1745, 8vo., Melpomene, Agriculture, a poem, the Economy of Human Life, and another book of trifles, collected after his death. He also collected some scattered poems of great merit, in 6 vols. 12mo. and also plays by old authors in 12 vols. 12mo. which have lately been reprinted, and introduced to the public by a handsome and well-deserved compliment to the genius, character, and integrity of the first editor.

DODSON, Michael, a native of Marlborough, Wilts, son of a dissenting minister. Under the protection of his paternal uncle, sir Michael Foster, the judge, he studied the law, and was called to the bar, 1783. In 1770, he had been made by Lord Camden commissioner of bankrupts. Besides a translation of Isaiah with notes, published in 1790, and ably defended against the attacks of Dr. Sturges, he wrote the life of judge Foster, for the Biographia Brit. and the life of Hugh Farmer, some papers, &c. among the essays published for the promotion of Scripture Knowledge. He died 1799, aged 67.

DODSWORTH, Roger, an indefatigable topographer, born 24th July, 1585, at Newton Grange, St. Oswald, Yorkshire. He died August, 1654, and was buried at Rufford, Lancashire. In his laborious researches in the antiquities of his native country, he wrote 122 volumes, besides other MSS. which altogether amount to 162 folio vols. which were never published, but are deposited in the Bodleian library. Gen. Fairfax was, notwithstanding the violence of the times, a great patron of Dodsworth, and to the liberality of his nephew, dean Fairfax, of Norwich, the university of Oxford are indebted for this valuable collection.

DODWELL, Henry, a learned writer, born in Dublin, October, 1641, but of English parents. He came over to England in 1648, and was placed at a school in York, but the death of his father by the plague, at Waterford, and of his mother by a consumption, soon after, reduced him to a wretched and indigent situation, from which he was at last relieved by his uncle, a clergyman of Suffolk, who in 1654 sent for him, paid his debts, and afterwards had him conducted to Dublin. In 1656, he entered at Trinity college under Dr. Stearne, and became fellow, but in 1666, quitted his fellowship because he would not go into orders, as the statutes required. He then passed over to England, but afterwards revisited Ireland, and in 1674, settled in London, where he soon formed a lasting friendship with several learned men, especially Bishop Lloyd. In 1688, he was, without his knowledge, and in his absence, elected Camden professor of history at Oxford, of which employment however he was deprived three years after for refusing to take the oaths of allegiance. He afterwards settled at Cockham, Berkshire, and separated from the church because new bishops were appointed to succeed such as refused the oath of allegiance. In consequence of his acquaintance with Mr. Cherry, of Shottesbrooke, he removed to that village, and after the death of the Dodwells, his nephews, whom he nominated his heirs, he married the daughter of the person where he lodged at Cockham, in 1694, by whom he had 10 children, six of whom survived him. He was afterwards reconciled to the church, and died at Shottesbrooke, 7th June, 1711, aged 70. His writings, which are very numerous, and which prove him to have been a man of indefatigable diligence and extensive learning, are on controversial, theological, and classical subjects. The best known of these are annals of Thucydides and Xenophon,—de veteribus Græcorum, Romanorumque cycelis, obiterque de cyclo Judæorum,—atate Christi, dissertationes decem, cum tabulis necessariis, 4to. 1701, a most excellent book according to Dr. Halley, an epistolary discourse proving from the Scriptures and the first fathers that the soul is a principle naturally mortal, but immortalized actually by the pleasure of God, to punishment or reward, by its union with the divine baptismal spirit, wherein is proved that none have the power of giving this divine immortalizing spirit since the apostles, but the bishops, 1706, 8vo. a work which gave rise to a violent controversy, which was defended by the author in three different treatises against the attacks of Chishull, Norris, and Clarke, &c.—chronology of Dionysius Halicarnassus,—exercitationes duæ, &c.—Julii vitalis epitaphium, &c.

DODWELL, Henry, eldest son of the preceding, was author of an anonymous pamphlet, "Christianity not founded on argument;" an artful work, in which he attempted to undermine and vilify religion. It was answered by his own brother, and by Leland, and Doddridge. He was brought up to the law, and was a zealous promoter of the society for the promotion of arts, manufactures, and commerce.—His next brother, William, D.D. of Trinity college, Oxford, was archdeacon of Berks, prebendary of Sarum, and rector of Shottesbrooke. Besides an answer to his brother's pamphlet, he wrote a dissertation on Jephthah's vow,—practical discourses, 2 vols.—an answer to Dr. Middleton's free inquiry,—defence of the answer against Toll, 1751, &c.

DOES, Jacob Van der, a Dutch painter, who died 1673, aged 50. As his temper was gloomy, it is supposed his pictures partake strongly of his feelings. His landscapes are very much admired. His pieces are generally in the style of Bombaccio.

DOES, Jacob Van der, son of the preceding, was born at Amsterdam, and died 1659, aged 19, giving, by the few pieces which he finished, the most promising tokens of a great genius in the art of painting.

DOES, Simon Van der, brother of the preceding, died 1717, aged 64. His landscapes, portraits, battles, &c. are in a pleasing style.

DOGGET, Thomas, an author and actor, born in Castle-street, Dublin. He first appeared on the Irish stage, but afterwards came to England, and engaged himself in the Drury-lane and Lincoln's-inn-fields companies, where he was particularly applauded in the characters of Fondle-wife, in the Old Bachelor, and Ben, in Love for Love. He was joint manager of Drury-lane with Wilkes and Cibber; but gave up his concern, because Booth was forced upon him as fellow-manager in the house; and he retired in the meridian of his reputation, to the private enjoyment of a moderate fortune. He died highly respected, 22d Sept. 1722. In his principles he was a whig, and so strongly attached to the house of Hanover, that he left a waterman's coat and silver badge to be rowed for yearly by six watermen, on the Thames, against the stream, from the Old Swan, London-bridge, to the White Swan, Chelsea, on the 1st of August, the anniversary of George I.'s accession to the throne. He wrote only one comedy, "the Country Wake," 1696, 4to. better known in its altered form of "Flora, or Hob in the Well," a farce.

DOISSIN, Lewis, a Jesuit, who died 1753, aged 32. He displayed great powers in the composition of elegant Latin verse, in his two poems on the art of sculpture and the art of engraving, in which he celebrates in an animated style, the immortal labours of Praxiteles, Miron, &c.

DOLABELLA, P. Cornelius, son-in-law of Cicero, was the friend of Cæsar, and became governor of Syria. When besieged in Laodicea by Cassius, he killed himself, in his 27th year.

DOLBIN, John, descended from an ancient family in North Wales, was born at Stanwick, Northamptonshire, 1624, and educated at Westminster school, and Christ-church, Oxford. During the civil wars, he bravely espoused the king's side, and was major in his army; but upon the triumph of the republicans, he returned to a collegiate life, and was turned out in 1648. At the restoration he became canon of Christ-church, archdeacon of London, dean of Westminster, and in 1666, bishop of Rochester, and in 1683 was translated to York, where he died 1686. He was an eloquent and admired preacher, and his sermons, delivered before Charles II. and on other occasions, possess merit.

DOLCE, Lewis, a native of Venice, who died there, 1568, aged 60. He wrote several poems, and translated some ancient authors, Ovid, Seneca, Euripides, &c. in a style pure and elegant. He published Dialogo della pittura, intitolato l'Aremino, Venice, 1557, 8vo. reprinted at Florence, 1735—cinque primi canti del Sacripante, 1535, 8vo.—Primaleone, 4to.—Achilles and Æneas, 1570, 4to.—poems in different collections, and the life of Charles V.

DOLCE, Carlo, a painter of Florence, who died 1686, aged 70. His St. John, though painted only in his 11th year, was much admired. His religious pieces are very highly finished.

DOLET, Stephen, a learned Frenchman, born at Orleans, 1508. He was a printer and bookseller at Lyons, where he published some of his works for the reformation and improvement of the French language. He ventured, however, to give way to licentious and profane ideas in his writings, which drew upon him the vengeance of the inquisition, so that he was condemned to be burnt for atheism. He suffered the dreadful punishment on his birthday, 3d August, 1546. Though some attribute his sufferings to his attachment to Lutheranism, yet Beza and Calvin seem to place him in the number, not of martyrs, but of impious blasphemers.

DOLLOND, Peter, the eldest son of Mr. John Dollond, the optician, was born in 1730, and died at Kensington in 1820. He communicated in 1765, a paper to the Royal Society on his improvement of telescopes; and in 1772 another on his additions and alterations in Hadley's quadrant. In 1779 he gave an account of his equatorial instrument for correcting the errors arising from refraction in altitude: and in 1789 he published "Some account of the discovery made by his father in refracting telescopes."—W. B.

DOLOMIEU, Deodat, commander of the order of Malta, member of the academy of sciences and of the institute at Paris, was made inspector of the mines. In the pursuit of knowledge he exposed himself to all the inclemencies of the air, the climate, and the seasons, and regarded neither expense nor difficulties for his favourite studies of nature. He was in Egypt with Bonaparte, and on his return was taken prisoner, and confined at Messina, from whence he was liberated by the kind interference of Sir Joseph Banks. He died suddenly at Cree, near Macon, in 1802, as he was preparing a scientific excursion to the north, to examine the rocks and the natural curiosities of unexplored regions. He published a voyage to the isles of Lipari, 1781—memoir on the earthquake of Calabria in 1783—a mineralogical dictionary—a treatise on the origin of basaltes—memoir on Ætna, &c.

DOMAT, John, a French lawyer, born at Clermont, in Auvergne, 1625. He studied the learned languages and belles lettres at Paris, and applied himself to the law at Bourges, where, though only 20 years old, he was offered, on account of his great proficiency, a doctor's hood. He became a pleader at Clermont, and, as advocate to the king, which he continued for thirty years, he was, for his integrity and extensive abilities, the arbiter of all the affairs of the province. In 1648 he married, and by that marriage had thirteen children. He applied himself to simplify the laws of the state, and to reduce them from confusion to order and regularity; and was so successful in his plan that Lewis XIV. granted him a pension of 2000 livres, and encouraged him in the prosecution. The first volume was published 1689, in 4to. called, "the civil laws in their natural order;" to which three volumes of equal size and value were afterwards added. Domat was the friend of Pascal, whom he assisted in some of his experiments on air, and in other branches of philosophy. He died at Paris, 1696. A new edition of his works appeared in 1777, in folio.

DOMENICHINO, an Italian painter, born at Bologna, 1581. He was the pupil of Calvert the Fleming, and afterwards of the Caraccis; but he was so slow in his progress, that his fellow-students called him "the ox." Annibal Caracci observed, upon this ridiculous appellation, that "this ox, by dint of labour, would in time make his ground so fruitful that painting itself would be fed by what it produced"—a prognostic of his future greatness, which was most truly fulfilled. He applied to his work with great study and zeal; and though he wanted genius, yet solidity and judgment, and a strong enthusiastic ardour, made him one of the greatest Italian masters. According to N. Poussin, his communion of St. Jerome, and Raphael's transfiguration, were the two best pieces which ever adorned Rome. He also shone as an architect, and built the apostolical palace for Gregory XV. He was reserved, but mild in his manners; but his great merit raised him many enemies, who were jealous of his fame, and envious of his eminence. He died 1641, not without suspicion of poison.

DOMINIC, de Guzman, a Spaniard, born 1170, at Calahorra, in Arragon, known as the founder of the order of the predicants, and the establisher of the inquisition in Languedoc. Before he was born, his mother dreamed she had a dog vomiting fire in her womb; and the dream was fulfilled, when Dominic, followed by fire and sword and the army of Innocent III. preached to the Albigenses, and, with the offer of death or abjuration, converted above 100,000 souls. He was the first master of the sared palace, an office which at his suggestion Honorius III. established. He died at Bologna, 1221, and was afterwards canonized for his great services. The great men of the order were, Thomas Aquinas, Albertus Magnus, cardinal Cajetan, Dominicus Soto, Lewis of Granada, &c.; and it is said that the Dominicans produced to the church no less than 3 popes, 48 cardinals, 23 patriarchs, 1500 bishops, 600 archbishops, 43 legates, and other inferior agents actively employed in the service of the Romish church.

DOMINICHINI, Lodovico, a native of Placentia, famous for his voluminous translations from ancient authors and other works, which are mentioned in Baret's Italian library. He was poor, and died 1574.

DOMINIS, Mark Antony de, originally a Jesuit, afterwards bishop of Segui, and lastly archbishop of Spolato, in Dalmatia, in the 16th century. He was very unsettled in his religious notions, though so elevated in the church; and he wrote his famous book, called "de republicâ ecclesiasticâ," in which he assailed the papal power. This work was seen in MS. and corrected by the learned Bedell, who was chaplain to Sir Henry Wotton, the ambassador of James I. to Venice, and by his means it was published in London. De Dominis accompanied his friend Bedell on his return to England, and was received with great respect by the English clergy. He was favoured by the king, and made dean of Windsor; but, after preaching against the pope, and endeavouring to reconcile and reunite the Romish and English churches, he, with his usual wavering temper, expressed an inclination to return to Rome. He there abjured all his errors, 1622, and was received into the pope's protection; but an expression against Bellarmine, who, as he said, had not refuted his arguments, in his answer to him, rendered him suspected to the catholics. He was seized and imprisoned, and died in confinement, in the castle of St. Angelo, 1645. It was afterwards discovered, that his writings and correspondence had been very hostile to the pope, and therefore, by order of the inquisition, his body was dug up, and together with his writings burnt in Flora's field. He wrote besides a treatise, de radiis visus et lucis, &c. in which he was the first who gave a rational explanation of the colours of the rainbow.

DOMITIAN, Titus Flavius, a Roman emperor, after Titus son of Vespasian. From a very mild character at the beginning of his reign, he became licentious, debauched, cruel, and vindictive, and was at last assassinated, 96, in his 45th year.

DOMITIANUS, Domitius, general of Dioclesian, was proclaimed emperor in Egypt, 288, and died a violent death two years after.

DONALDSON, John, an artist, was born at Edinburgh in 1737. He painted portraits in miniature, and was distinguished also for his skillful imitations of the old engravers, which he executed with a pen so correctly as to deceive even connoisseurs. He published a volume of poems, and an Essay on the Elements of Beauty; among his other studies he cultivated chymistry.

and discovered a method of preserving meat and vegetables during long voyages. He died in 1801.—W. B.

DONATO, Bernardino, Greek professor at Padua, and other Italian cities, died about 1550. He was the learned author of a Latin dialogue on the difference between Aristotle's and Plato's philosophy, and translated into Latin, besides some of Galen's, Aristotle's, and Xenophon's works, the demonstratio evangelica of Eusebius, &c.

DONATO, an architect and sculptor of Florence. He was employed by Cosmo de Medicis, by Venice and other states. His Judith cutting off the head of Holofernes is his best piece. He died 1466, aged 83.

DONATO, Jerom, a Venetian nobleman, eminent for his learning, for his military services, and particularly for his negotiations. He was the successful ambassador in the reconciliation made between his country and pope Julius II. When asked by the pope why Venice claimed the sovereignty of the Adriatic, he answered, your holiness will find the concession, on the back of the record of Constantine's grant to pope Silvester of the city of Rome and of the ecclesiastical states—a bold answer on a donation about doubting which in former times 1478 persons had at Strasburg been sent to the flames. This great statesman died of a fever at Rome, 1511, just before the pacification was signed.

DONATO, Alexander, a Jesuit of Sienna, who died at Rome, 1640. He wrote a very valuable description of Rome, 1639, 4to. called Roma vetus et recens, besides poems in Svo. Cologne, 1630, and other works.

DONATO, Marcellus, an Italian count, who held some important offices at Mantua, and died at the beginning of the 17th century. He wrote a learned work, scholia on the Latin writers of the Roman history, 1607, Svo. Frankfort.

DONATUS, bishop of Carthage, was banished, 356. He maintained that the three persons of the Trinity are of the same substance, yet unequal.

DONATUS, Ælius, a grammarian of the fourth century, preceptor of St. Jerome, and author of commentaries on Terence and Virgil.

DONATUS, bishop of Numidia, founder of a sect after his own name, 311, was deposed for supporting Majorinus as a candidate for the see of Carthage against Cæcilianus.

DONCKER, Peter, a painter of Gouda, disciple to Jaques Jordaens. He studied at Rome, and died 1668. There was also another painter named John, of the same place, who died young.

DONDUS, or DE DONDIS, James, a physician of Padua, surnamed Aggregator, from the number of medicines he had made. He was also well skilled in mechanics and in mathematics, and he invented a clock on a new construction, which pointed out not only the hours, but the festivals of the year, and the course of the sun and moon. He found out also the secret of making salt from the wells of Albano, and died 1350. He wrote Promptuarium medicinae Venice, fol. 1481—de fontibus calidis Patavini agri, 1553, folio—the flux and reflux of the sea.

DONEAU, Hugh, Donellus of Chalons-sur-Soane, professor of law at Bourges and Orleans, was saved from the massacre of Bartholomew by the affection of his scholars, and escaped into Germany, and died at Altorf, 1591, aged 64. He wrote commentaria de jure civili, five vols. fol. reprinted at Lucca, 12 vols. fol. 1770.—Opera posthuma, Svo.

DONGAN, Thomas, governor of New-York, succeeded Sir Edmund Andros in 1683. He was a catholic, and a man of integrity, moderation, and genteel manners, and one of the best governors of the province. Soon after his arrival he issued orders for convening an assembly by election, (a privilege which the former deputies of the duke of York had withholden,) and thus removed a principal cause of disaffection among the people. When the French governor of Canada meditated the destruction of the Five Nations, he apprised the Indians of the design, and promised them his advice and assistance. He fell at last unjustly under the displeasure of the monarch, and on the approach of the revolution in England, found it expedient to resign the administration to Colonel Nicholson, the lieutenant governor. He finally retired from the province in 1689, and was afterwards created Earl of Limerick, in Ireland.  L.

DONI, Anthony Francis, a Florentine priest, who possessed great satirical powers, and died, 1574, aged 61. His works are, letters in Italian, Svo.—la libreria, Svo.—la Zucca, four parts with plates, Svo.—Imond, celesti, terrestri, &c.—Imarmi cive Raggionamenti, &c. 4to.

DONI D'ATTICI, Lewis, a Florentine noble, whose modesty and learning recommended him to Richelieu, who made him bishop of Reiz, and afterwards of Autun. He died 1664, aged 68. He wrote in French a history of the minims, 4to. a society to which he belonged,—and in Latin the life of queen Joan, Svo.—of cardinal de Berulle, Svo.—and of the cardinals, two vols. fol. 1660.

DONI, John Baptiste, an Italian, who died in his native city of Florence, 1647, aged 51. He was professor of eloquence, and member of the Florentine and del crusca academies, and invented a musical instrument called lyra barbarini. He wrote a well-known treatise on music in Latin, and other tracts on the same subject in Italian.

DONNE, John, an English poet and divine, born in London 1573, and descended by his mother from Sir Thomas More. At the age of 11, he went to Oxford, and after three years' residence he removed to Cambridge, and three years after to Lincoln's-inn. His friends were papists, but he refused to be shackled by their opinions and prejudices, and at the age of 19, he embraced the protestant faith. When 21, he began to travel, and accompanied the earl of Essex in 1596 and 97, against Cadiz and the Azores, and afterwards visited Spain and Italy, and formed the resolution of going as far as Jerusalem, which, however, he did not do. On his return to England, he became secretary to Egerton, keeper of the great seal, but his secret attachment and his marriage to the daughter of Sir George More, chancellor of the garter, threatened for a time every possible misfortune to him. The father was so irritated that he not only prevailed upon Egerton to dismiss the offender from his service, but he procured his imprisonment, and that of the two brothers, Brooke, the one the minister, who had married him, and the other the friend who had given the lady away. He at last liberated himself and his friends from confinement, and was with difficulty reconciled to his father-in-law, who consented to make him a decent allowance. Though not replaced in the favour of Egerton, he applied himself diligently to the study of civil and canon law, and was much respected for his learning and abilities. About the year 1612, he accompanied Sir Robert Drury to Paris, and about that time he displayed such ability in a treatise on the oaths of allegiance and supremacy then agitated, that king James highly favoured him, and in compliance with his intimation and the request of his friends, he now applied himself to divinity, and took orders. James made him his chaplain, and the university of Cambridge conferred on him the degree of D. D. At this time to his great grief his wife died on the birth of her 12th child. He was no sooner ordained than 14 livings in the country were offered to him, which he declined to reside in London, where he became Lincoln's-inn preacher, and two years after, was appointed chaplain to lord Doncaster's embassy to Vienna. In 1621, he was made dean of St. Paul's, and afterwards he was presented to St. Dunstan in the west and another benefice. His eloquence as a preacher was great, but his enemies represented him as hostile to the king, and therefore he was obliged to vindicate himself before James, who expressed himself much pleased with his conduct. He was in 1630, attacked by a fever which brought on a consumption. He preached at court the first Friday in lent, on the words "to God the Lord belong the issues from death," which was considered as his funeral sermon. He died 31st March, 1631, and was buried in St. Paul's cathedral. Dr. Donne was in his character an amiable and benevolent man, as well as an ingenious and learned man, and lord Falkland said of him, that he was "one of the most witty and most eloquent of our modern divines." To his Pseudomartyr he was indebted in some degree for his honours, but it is a book, as Warburton has observed, of little merit, agreeing merely with the opinions of the times, and applauded by James. He published also some poems consisting of songs, sonnets, epigrams, elegies, satires, &c. all printed in one vol. 12mo. 1719. In speaking of these, Dryden has given Donne the character of the greatest wit, though not the greatest poet of the nation. Pope has shown the highest respect to his memory by employing his pen to render his satires into modern numbers and all the graces of his own poetry. He wrote, besides paradoxes, essays, &c. three volumes of sermons, essays in divinity, letters to several persons, the ancient history of the Septuagint, biathanatos, or on suicide, &c. His son John was educated at Westminster-school, and Christ-church, Oxford, he took the degree of LL.D. at Padua, and had the same at Oxford, he died 1662, and was buried in St. Paul's church, Covent-garden. Wood represents him as an atheistical buffoon, but adds, that Charles II. valued him as a man of sense and parts. He wrote some frivolous trifles.

DONNE, Benjamin, a mathematician, born 1729, at Biddeford, Devonshire, where for some years he kept a school, and afterwards at Bristol. He was made master of mechanics to the king in 1796, and died two years after, respected as a very ingenious and benevolent character. He wrote mathematical essays, in 8vo. treatises on geometry, book-keeping, and trigonometry, an epitome of natural and experimental philosophy, and the British mariner's assistant, and in the first part of his life received 100*l.* from the society of arts and commerce for his able survey of his native country.

DOOLITTLE, Thomas, a nonconformist, born at Kitterminster 1630, and educated at Pembroke-hall, Cambridge. He was for nine years minister of St. Alpage, London, from which he was ejected in 1662. He afterwards kept an academy in Monkwell-street, Cripplegate, and officiated among the dissenters till his death, on the 24th May, 1707, at the age of 77. He wrote several books of practical divinity. His treatise on the sacrament has been frequently printed, as also his call to delaying sinners. Memoirs of him are prefixed to his "body of divinity," published after his death. His son Samuel was for some time minister at Reading.

DOPPLE-MAIER, John Gabriel, author of some tracts on geography, dialling, astronomy, of the account of the mathematicians of Nuremberg, and of several translations from English mathematical works into Latin and German, died at Nuremberg, where he was professor of mathematics, 1750, aged 83. He was fellow of the London royal society, and of the academies of Berlin and Petersburg.

DORBAY, Francis, a French architect, who furnished the design of several beautiful works at the Louvre, Thuilleries, &c. He was born at Paris, and died there 1697.

DORFLING, a Prussian, who from the profession of a tailor became a soldier, and gradually rose to the highest military honours under Frederic William, elector of Brandenburg. He distinguished himself greatly against the Swedes, and when become field-marshal, some envying his elevation observed he had still the appearance of a tailor. "Yes," said the valiant Dorfling, "I was once a tailor; I formerly cut out cloth, but now, (clapping his hand to the hilt of his sword,) here is the instrument with which I cut off the ears of them that speak ill of me."

DORIA, Andrew, a noble Genoese, born at Oneille 1468. He embraced the military profession, and signalized himself in Italy, and particularly in Corsica, which island he bravely reduced under the power of the republic. Distinguished as a warrior by land, his countrymen wished to employ his abilities by sea, and accordingly in 1513, he was named captain-general of the galleys of Genoa, and soon enriched himself and his brave companions by successful attacks on the pirates of the Mediterranean. The revolutions of Genoa engaged Doria in the service of Francis I. of France, after whose defeat at Pavia, he became admiral to pope Clement VII. Upon the sacking of Rome by Bourbon 1527, Doria returned to the French service, and was honourably received by Francis, who granted him a pension, and appointed him admiral of the seas of the Levant. His great talents were now employed in establishing the preponderance of the French power in Italy, and the emperor baffled, saw his fleets destroyed and his armies defeated by the genius of this intrepid republican. But when Naples, besieged by the French forces, was ready to submit, Doria changed the face of war. Long viewed with jealousy by the courtiers of Francis, he became suspected to the monarch, who ordered his person to be seized; but Doria's vigilance frustrated the designs of his enemies, and by throwing himself under the protection of the emperor he was received with open arms. Francis in vain, by every sacrifice, endeavoured to regain his confidence, and the emperor on the other hand wished to secure him even by making him the sovereign of Genoa, an office which Doria rejected with noble patriotism. Doria, thus successful in preventing the capture of Naples, attacked Genoa, which had fallen under the French power, and though only with thirteen galleys and 500 men, he in one night, 1528, made himself master of the place without bloodshed, and was hailed by the grateful Genoese by the endearing terms of father and the deliverer of his country. A new and moderate government was established, and Doria, now owner of 22 galleys, and supported by brave and faithful associates, signalized himself in maritime affairs, took Coron and Patras from the Turks, and assisted Charles V. in the reduction of Tunis and Goulette. The expedition against Algiers, in 1541, and the affair of Prevazzo, undertaken against his advice, proved, however, very unfortunate, and it has been insinuated that Doria, when opposed to Barbarossa, the commander of the Turkish forces, did not display his usual valour, but secretly wished to prolong a war which cemented his influence, and made him a necessary ally. He was loaded with honours for his eminent services by the emperor, and to the marquisate of Tursi in Naples, was added the dignity of grand chancellor of that kingdom. Engaged to the very last in the service of his country, and of his ally, Doria died 25th November, 1560, aged 93, poor indeed in fortune, but honoured by his country, and respected by the whole world. His life was twice attempted by assassins, but their conspiracy failed. Doria, though of a benevolent and humane temper, once yielded to a dishonourable resentment, and ordered de Fresco, a man who had conspired against him, to be sewn up in a sack and thrown into the sea.

DORIGNY, Michael, a French painter and engraver in aquafortis, born at St. Quintin 1617. He was professor of the academy of painting at Paris, and died 1665. His paintings are seen in the castle de Vincennes, and his engravings were of his own pieces.

DORIGNY, Nicholas, an eminent French engraver, whose finest pieces are the bark of Lanfranco, the St. Petronilla of Guerchino, the descent from the cross by Voleterra, the transfiguration after Raphael, &c. He was knighted by George I. and died at Paris 1746, aged 90. His brother Lewis, also a painter, died at Verona, 1742, aged 48.

DORING, or DORINK, Matthias, a German Franciscan professor, born at Kiritz, where he died, 1494. He is said to be the author of the abridgment of the historical mirror of de Beauvais continued to 1493. He inveighs with asperity against the vices of the cardinals and popes, and he may be considered as the forerunner of Luther.

DORISLAUS, Isaac, a Dutchman, who came from Leyden to England, and by the interest of Fulk, lord Brooke, read lectures on history at Cambridge. When expelled by Cousin, the vice chancellor, as suspected of republican principles, he became judge advocate in the royal army, against the Scots, but with an unpardonable levity, he quitted the king's service for that of the parliament, and assisted, it is said, in drawing up the articles of accusation against his sovereign. Thus recommended by guilt and profligacy to the ruling powers, he went in 1649, as ambassador from the republic to Holland, where he was attacked while at supper, by some enthusiastic royalist, and stabbed to the heart. His body, by the direction of the parliament, was brought over to England, and buried in Westminster abbey, but removed at the restoration, to St. Margaret's churchyard.

DORMANS, John de, bishop of Beauvais, a cardinal, and chancellor of France under Charles V. died 7th Nov. 1373. He was a liberal patron of letters, and founded the college which bears his name at Paris.

DORNAVIUS, Gaspar, a physician, born at Zigenrick, in Voightland, died very old, in 1631. He is author of some humorous and whimsical pieces—amphitheatrum sapientia Socratica, two vols. folio—homo diabolus, 4to. &c.

DORSCH, Everard, a Dutch engraver on gems of superior abilities. He was born at Nuremberg, and died 1712, aged 63. His son Christopher was equally celebrated, and finished portraits on gems, without the assistance of drawings, with astonishing accuracy. He was also a painter. He died 1732, aged 56, at Nuremberg.

DORSEY, John Syng, M.D. professor of anatomy in the university of Pennsylvania, was born December 23d, 1783, and graduated at the college in Philadelphia in 1802. He visited England and France, and attended the first lectures on physic and surgery in those countries. A few years after his return to the United States he was appointed adjunct professor of surgery with Dr. Physic, and in 1816 professor of materia medica in the university. On the death of Dr. Wistar he succeeded him as professor of anatomy. He had just finished an introductory lecture, in which he had paid a testimony of respect to his predecessors, Doctors Shippen and Wistar, when he was seized with an illness, which proved fatal. He died November 12th, 1818, aged 36. He published an edition of Cooper's Surgery, with valuable notes; and Elements of Surgery, an original work in 2 vols. Svo. Philadelphia, 1813, which is held in high estimation, and has been republished and made a text book at Edinburgh; several of his literary pieces were published in the early numbers of the Port Folio.  L.

DOSITHÆUS, the first heresiarch, a magician of Samaria, who pretended to be the true Messiah, and applied to himself all the prophecies concerning the Saviour. Among his thirty disciples he admitted a woman, whom he called the moon. He privately retired to a cave, where he starved himself to death, that he might persuade his followers that he was ascended into heaven. His followers always staid 24 hours in the same posture in which they were when the sabbath began. They existed in Egypt till the sixth century.

DOULET, N. an eminent French surgeon, who died at Paris, 1795. He wrote some valuable pieces on his profession.

DOUCIN, Lewis, a French Jesuit of Verdon, in Normandy. He wrote a history of Nestorianism—a work against the Jansenists—and other pieces, and died at Orleans, 1726.

DOVE, Nathaniel, an ingenious penman, author of "the progress of time," containing verses on the four seasons and the 12 months of the year, with 16 plates. He was clerk in the victualling-office, Tower-hill, and kept in 1740 an academy at Hoxton. He died 1754, aged 44.

DOUFFET, Gerard, a painter of Liege, born 16th August, 1594. He was the pupil of Rubens, and distinguished himself by the accuracy, variety, correctness, and sweetness of his pencil. He died about 1660.

DOUGADOS, Venance, a capuchin, born near Carcassone, 1764. The revolution opened to him a field for the display of intrigue and of ambition, but as the friend of the federalists he was dragged to the scaffold, and suffered 1794. He wrote some poetical pieces, which possess merit, and have been published at Nice.

DOUGLAS, Gawin, youngest son of the sixth earl of Angus, was born at Brechin in Scotland, 1471, and educated at St. Andrews. He perfected his education by travelling in Italy and Germany, where he cultivated the muses, and merited the acquaintance and commendation of the learned. On his return to Scotland in 1496, he was made provost of St. Giles's church, Edinburgh, in 1515, bishop of Dunkeld, to which the rich abbey of Aberbrothick was afterwards added. He was exposed to the virulent persecutions of the times, and came to London, where he died of the plague in April, 1522. His chief works, which prove him to be an eminent scholar and poet, are a translation of Virgil's Æneid—the palace of honour, a poem—aurea narrationes et comedix sacræ—de rebus Scotticis liber. As Chaucer in England, so he in Scotland, is the great forerunner of the revival of learning.

DOUGLAS, William, a Scotch nobleman, commissioned by Robert Bruce, who had made a vow which he could not fulfil, to go on a crusade, to carry his heart to the holy land. Douglas set out after the king's death, 1327; but he perished by the way, with the illustrious Scots who followed in his train.

DOUGLAS, James, an English anatomist, and great practitioner in the obstetric art, in the beginning of the 18th century. He wrote bibliographiæ anatomix specimen, 8vo.—miographiæ comparatæ specimen, 1706—description of the peritonæum, London, 1730—a history of the lateral operation for the stone, 8vo.—and papers in the philosophical transactions. He patronised John Hunter, and died 1742. His brother John was surgeon in the Westminster hospital.

DOUGLAS, Sir Charles, a Scotchman, engaged in the Dutch navy, and afterwards in the English service during the American war. He commanded with reputation in the gulf of St. Lawrence, and died 1789, a rear-admiral.

DOUGLAS, James, earl of Morton and Aberdeen, was born at Edinburgh, 1707, and distinguished himself by his love of science and literature. He established, when 26, the philosophical society of Edinburgh, and was, in 1733, elected president of the London royal society. The academy of sciences at Paris paid respect to his virtues, by electing him an associate; and as the patron of merit, and an able astronomer, he deserved the good opinion of the learned world. He died 1768, leaving a son and daughter.

DOUGLAS, John, a learned prelate, born in 1721, at Pittenweem, in Fifeshire. From Dunbar school he removed, in 1736, to St. Mary-hall, Oxford, and two years after was elected to an exhibition in Baliol college. He took his first degree in 1741, and then went to Montreal and to Ghent, to acquire a competent knowledge of the French language. As chaplain of the 3d regiment of foot guards, he went in the expedition to Flanders, and was present at the battle of Fontenoy, in 1745. He afterwards attended Lord Pultney in his travels on the continent; and on his return to England, in 1749, he obtained from his patron the donative of Uppington, Shropshire, which he soon after exchanged for the vicarage of High Ereal, in the same county. By the interest of his friends, and by his own merits as an able and acute writer, he rose to higher honours in the church. He was made, in 1760, chaplain to the king; and in 1762, he obtained a canonry of Windsor, which he afterwards exchanged for the residentiaryship of St. Paul's, resigned by him in 1788, for the deanery of Windsor. He had, in 1764, exchanged his Shropshire livings for St. Austin's and St. Faith's, Watling-street, London; and in 1787, he was raised to the see of Carlisle, from which he was translated, in 1791, to Salisbury. His powers as a writer were strong, respectable, and multifarious. His first work was, the Vindication of Milton from the charge of plagiarism, against Lauder, 1750—and he afterwards published the criterion of miracles, 1754, a work of great merit, of which he prepared another edition in 1806—an apology for the clergy against the Hutchinsonians, &c.—the destruction of the French foretold by Ezekiel—several pamphlets against Archibald Bower—a defence of lord George Sackville—a letter to two great men on the approach of peace, &c. Besides these works, he assisted in the publication of Lord Clarendon's diary and letters—of Cook's voyages—of Lord Hardwicke's miscellaneous papers, &c. and he also published several political papers in the Public Advertiser and in other periodical publications. He was, in 1786, elected one of the vice presidents of the antiquarian society, and was also one of the trustees of the British museum; and after a life thus actively devoted to the cause of literature and religion, retaining his faculties to the last, he died of a gradual decay, without a struggle, 18th May, 1807, aged 86, and was buried in St. George's chapel, Windsor. He was twice married; first in 1752, when he became a widower in the short space of three months; and secondly in 1765. By his last wife, daughter of Henry Brudenell Rooke, Esq. who died two years before him, he left one son and one daughter.

DOUGLASS, William, M.D. was a native of Scotland, and in the early part of the eighteenth century, came to Boston, and settled as a physician. In 1722, he distinguished himself by opposing the inoculation of the smallpox, the practice of which he undesignedly became the instrument of introducing, by giving to Dr. Mather a volume containing an account of its being practised at Constantinople. Besides his writings on that and other medical subjects, he published a history of the settlement of North America, which has not the reputation of accuracy. He was a highly respectable scholar and physician, but was extremely passionate, opinionative, and rough in his manners. He died in 1752.

DOUSA, James, a noble Dutchman, born at Northwick 1545. After studying with great reputation at Paris, he returned to Holland, where he married early, and applied himself to political affairs. For twenty years, he was curator of the banks and dykes of Holland, and distinguished himself so much at the siege of Leyden in 1574, that the prince of Orange made him governor of the town, and curator of the university founded there. He was most eminent as a scholar, and his genius was displayed in several poetical productions. He also wrote the annals of his country, besides critical notes on Horace, Sallust, Plautus, Catullus, Tibullus, &c. He was in his private character as amiable as he was respected in his public duties. He died 1604, and his memory was honoured by the oration of Daniel Heinsius. He had four sons, James, George, Francis, and Theodorus. James was a very extraordinary genius, who attained maturity of wisdom and erudition in the flower of youth. Besides poems of great merit, he wrote at the age of 19, his book de rebus cœlestibus—and his panegyric on a shadow—critical notes on several Latin authors—and assisted his father in his annals. He was made preceptor to the prince of Orange, and librarian to the university of Leyden; but he unfortunately died 1597, in his 26th year, when his abilities promised the noblest additions to the greatness and learning of his country. George was a good linguist, and published an account of a voyage to Constantinople. Francis published Scaliger's epistles—annotations on the fragments of Lucilius, &c. Theodorus published Logotheta's chronicon, with notes, &c.

DOUVRE, Thomas de, a native of Bayeux, raised, for his learning and virtues, by William the conqueror, to the see of York, where he rebuilt his cathedral. He composed some books on music, and was a great patron and benefactor to his clergy. After being archbishop for twenty-eight years, he died 1100.

DOUVRE, Thomas de, nephew to the foregoing, was also archbishop of York in 1108. He had violent quarrels with Anselm of Canterbury about the precedency of the two sees. He died 1114, greatly respected for his constancy, virtues, and faith.

DOUVRE, Isabella de, of the same family as the preceding, was mistress to Robert the bastard of Henry I. of England, by whom she had Richard, afterwards bishop of Bayeux, 1133. She retired in her old age to solitude and penitence at Bayeux, where she died, 1166.

Dow, Gerard, pupil of Rembrandt, was born at Leyden 1613. His pieces, which are all small, and to be viewed to advantage only by the help of a magnifying-glass, possess astonishing expression, and are extremely delicate. He was patient in his labours, and was not less than three days in representing a broomstick, and five in painting a hand. He died in a good old age, but when is not ascertained.

DOWALL, William Mac, a learned Scotsman, born in 1590, and educated for seven years by Nisbet at Musselburg, and afterwards at St. Andrews. In 1614, he went to Groningen, where he studied civil law, and took his doctor's degree, in 1625. He was made advocate to the army of count Nassau, and in 1629 and 1635, came as ambassador to Charles I. to support the freedom of the seas about the herring fisheries. He was made by Charles one of the council of state for Scotland, in which office he was continued by Charles II. with the additional title of ambassador to the United States. He died in London, but when not known, having had two wives, both Dutch women, the last of whom he buried 1652.

DOWNHAM, John, was born at Chester, son of the bishop of that see. He was educated at Cambridge, and is author of that pious and well-known book, "the Christian warfare." He died in London 1644.

DOWNING, Calicut, an English divine, doctor of laws, and incumbent of Hackney, Middlesex, and Hickford, Bucks. He was disappointed in his views of higher preferment, upon which he embraced the republican party, and preached some violent sermons, asserting the lawfulness of subjects to take up arms against the king. In 1643, he was a grand covenanter, but died the next year. Some of his sermons have been printed. His son, Sir George, was secretary of the treasury, and commissioner of customs under Charles II.

DOWNMAN, Hugh, a physician and poet, was born at Newton St. Cyres, in Devonshire, in 1740. He was educated at Exeter-school, and next at Baliol college, Oxford, after which he entered into orders, but quitted that profession for physic, in which line he attained considerable eminence. He died at Exeter in 1809. Dr. Downman published—1. The Land of the Muses, a poem, 1768. 2. Editha, or the Siege of Exeter, a tragedy. 3. Infancy, a poem, 1771. 4. Poems on various subjects.

He was also the author of some curious articles in the "Essays by a society of gentlemen at Exeter," 8vo. 1796.—H. B.

DRAVICIUS, Nicholas, an enthusiast, born 1587, at Stransnitz, in Moravia. He became a minister in 1616 at Drakotutz; but the persecutions against the protestants obliged him to fly to Leidnitz, in Hungary, where he turned woollen-draper for his subsistence. His improper conduct and frequent ebriety exposed him to the centures of his superiors ; but in his 50th year he determined to distinguish himself as a prophet. His visions began in 1638, and though at first little regarded, yet they engaged the curiosity and acquired the respect of the vulgar, and, by denouncing destruction against the house of Austria and the papal power, he inspired with fear even the bravest of generals. He was assisted in his fanatical reveries by Comenius, a man of learning, but weak principles, with whom he published his revelation called "lux in tenebris." Drabicius was persecuted by the house of Austria, for the ruin which he falsely prophesied against it, and what became of him is unknown. Some suppose that he was burnt as an impostor and false prophet, and others say that he died in Turkey, where he had taken refuge. Comenius published an abridgment of the reveries of Drabicius, Kottorius, and others, at Amsterdam, in 1660, and reprinted it under the title of lux e tenebris novis radiis aucta, &c. 1666.

DRACO, a celebrated Athenian, B. C. 643, whose laws were so severe that they were said to be written in blood.

DRACONITES, John, a Lutheran divine, born at Carlstadt, in Franconia. He was made a bishop in Prussia, and was the learned author of commentaries on the prophets and the gospels, and began a polyglott Bible, but died before its completion, 1566.

DRAGUT, RAIS, i. e. captain Ragut, the favourite and successor of Barbarossa, was born of obscure parents in Natolia. In abilities noways inferior to his master, he distinguished himself in the courts of Naples and Calabria ; but being taken by Doria's nephew, he passed seven long years in captivity. In 1560 Doria was besieged in the harbour of the isle of Gerbes ; but the artful pirate eluded the vigilance of his enemies, by conveying his galleys across the land, and took the capital of Sicily, to the astonishment of his opponents. In 1566 he assisted Solymán II. against Malta with fifteen galleys, and while reconnoitring, a piece of stone struck by a cannon ball gave him so violent blow on the ear that he died a short time after.

DRAKE, Sir Francis, an illustrious navigator, son of a sailor, and born at Tavistock in Devonshire, 1545. He was brought up by his kinsman, Sir John Hawkins, and at the age of 18 was purser to a Biscayan trader, and at 20 went to Guinea, and at 22 obtained the command of the Judith. He distinguished himself greatly in the gulf of Mexico, under Sir John Hawkins, and projected expeditions against the Spaniards in America, which he executed with great firmness and success, in 1570, and 1572. He afterwards served in Ireland under Walter earl of Essex, and at his death he was recommended by Sir Christopher Hatton to queen Elizabeth, who entered into all his views of attack and discovery. On the 13th of Dec. 1577, he set out on his celebrated voyage, with five small ships, and only 164 able men. Of these ships two were destroyed on the coast of Brazil as unfit, and one returned home, so that only with his own vessel he entered the straits of Magellan, and coasting along Chili and Peru, he enriched his companions by the plunder of the unsuspecting Spaniards. He sailed as high as the 48th degree north latitude, with the hope of finding a passage to the European seas, and gave the name of New Albion to the country. From thence he set sail the 29th Sept. 1579, for the Moluccas, and after visiting some savage islands, and enduring many hardships, he doubled the cape of Good Hope on the 15th of March, 1580, having then only 57 men and three casks of water. He continued his voyage, and after watering in Guinea, he reached Plymouth on the 3d of November, after an absence of 2 years and 10 months. The glory of sailing round the world, and the vast plunder obtained from the Spaniards, were however viewed with indignation by some, who regarded Drake as a common pirate ; but the queen approved the bold expedition of her naval hero, and on the 4th of April, 1581, she went on board his ship at Deptford, and dined with him, and conferred on him the honour of knighthood. This ship also was preserved to commemorate the glory of the enterpriser, till decaying by time it was broken up and a chair made of the timber presented to the university of Oxford. In 1585 Drake took St. Jago, St. Domingo, Carthagena, &c. in the West Indies, and in 1587, he attacked Cadiz, and burned more than 10,000 tons of shipping, which he merrily called burning the Spanish king's beard. When the invincible Armada approached England, Drake was made vice-admiral under lord Howard, and in the encounter he behaved with great courage, though his eagerness to pursue the plunder proved nearly fatal, by his suffering his admiral to be exposed in the midst of the hostile fleet. Fortune, however, favoured the English, and Drake enriched himself and his crew by the seizure of Pedro's galleon, which produced 55,000 ducats of gold. In 1589 Drake was sent to restore Antonio to the kingdom of Portugal, but without success ; and he afterwards went to the West Indies, where his quarrel with Sir John Hawkins disconcerted the plans of the expedition, which ended unsuccessfully. These unfortunate events preyed much upon the mind of Drake, he fell into a melancholy, and was carried off by a bloody flux on board his ship near the town of Nombre de Dios, 28th January, 1596. His death was universally lamented, for he was respected not only as a naval hero, but as a worthy private character. He was twice member of Parliament for Bossiney, and afterwards for Plymouth, a town where his name is still revered for the water which he conveyed there in 1587 by a circuitous canal of 20 miles from springs at the distance of eight miles. His widow, daughter of Sir George Sydenham, by whom he had no issue, married after his death William Courtenay, Esq. of Powderham castle.

DRAKE, James, a physician and political writer, born at Cambridge 1667, and educated there. In 1696 he took the degree of M.D. and became soon after fellow of the royal society and of the college of physicians, but he preferred writing for the booksellers to professional engagement. His "History of the last parliament of king William," 1702, was considered as so severe in his reflections on that monarch, that he was prosecuted by the attorney-general, but acquitted. In 1704, upon the rejection of the bill to prevent occasional conformity, he ventured, with Poley, member for Ipswich, to publish the memorial of the church of England, &c. which highly offended Godolphin, and roused the vengeance of the house of commons, who offered a reward for the discovery of the author, who, however, though suspected, remained unattacked. In 1706 he was prosecuted for the publication of Mercurius Politicus, a newspaper which severely reflected upon the conduct of government, and though acquitted through a flaw in the information, he took to heart the asperity of his persecutors, and falling into a fever, he died at Westminster, the second of March, 1707. He wrote, besides the "Sham lawyer," a comedy,—an English translation of Herodotus, never published,—a "new system of anatomy," a work of great merit, published by Dr. Wagstaffe, and again in 1717, in two vols. 8vo. with an appendix, 1723,—and notes to Le Clerc's history of physic.

DRAKE, Samuel, fellow of St. John's college, Cambridge, published in 1729, folio, a splendid edition of archbishop Parker's "de antiquitate Britannicæ ecclesiæ," &c.

DRAKE, William, a physician, born 1687, at York, where he settled, after taking his degrees at Christ-church, Oxford. In his old age he collected various records, and published a valuable history of York, with copperplates, &c. folio. He was the friend of Mead, Fawkes, &c. and died greatly respected, 1760, aged 73.

DRAKE, Roger, D.D. a physician, who afterwards became a popular preacher in London, and was one of the Savoy commissioners. He died after the restoration. He was learned, pious, and charitable, and wrote some sermons, besides a sacred chronology.

DRAKENBURG, Christian Jacob, the well-known centenary of the North, was born at Stravenger, Norway, 1624, and died at Aarrhuys in 1770, aged 146. After living in celibacy till his 113th year, he married a widow aged 60. His great old age brought about him many respectable visitors, who were pleased with his good sense, his humility, and the sound state of his faculties.

BRAKENBORCH, Arnoldus, professor of history and eloquence at Utrecht, died 1748, aged 64. He is well known as the editor of Livy, 7 vols. 4to. and Silius Italicus with very learned notes.

DRAN, Henry Francis le, a famous surgeon and lithotomist, who died at Paris, 1770, aged 85. He was author of observations on surgery, 2 vols. 12mo.—on gunshot wounds,—on the various modes of lithotomy,—on the operations of surgery, translated into English by Gataker, &c.

DRAPER, Sir William, an English general, son of a collector of the customs at Bristol, educated at Eton, and King's college, Cambridge. He embraced the military profession, and in the East Indies acquired the rank of colonel. In 1761, he was made brigadier in the expedition against Belleisle, and in 1763, he went with admiral Cornish against Manila. The place was taken, but the ransom of four millions of dollars, which the governor pledged himself to pay, was resisted by the Spanish government, and the conquerors were thus robbed of their expected reward. Draper, however, was made in consequence of his services, knight of the bath, and on the reduction of his regiment, colonel of the 16th. In gratitude for his education he presented the colours of the conquered fort, to King's college. In 1769, he engaged in the controversy with the celebrated Junius, in defence of the marquis of Granby, and his two letters were answered with great spirit and severity by his unknown antagonist, whom, however, he again attacked under the signature of Modestus. In October, 1769, he went to America for his health, where he married Miss De Lancey, daughter of the chief justice of New-York. In 1779, he was made lieutenant governor of Minorea, and on the surrender of the place he exhibited twenty-nine charges against the governor, Murray, twenty-seven of which were deemed frivolous, and for the other two, the governor was reprimanded; after which the accuser was directed by the court to make an apology to his general, to which he acquiesced. He lived afterwards in retirement, and died at Bath, 8th January, 1787.

DRAYTON, Michael, an English poet, born at Harshull, in Warwickshire, 1563. He was educated at Oxford, where, however, he took no degree, and devoted himself early to the cultivation of the muses. In 1593, he published the shepherd's garland, afterwards re-printed under the name of pastorals, and before 1598, he presented before the public his Barons' wars, England's heroical epistles, downfalls of Robert duke of Normandy, Matilda, and Gaveston. Thus distinguished as a favourite of the muses, he welcomed the arrival of James I. in a congratulatory poem, but he met with marked neglect instead of remuneration from the court. In 1613, he published the first part of his Poly-Olbion, a descriptive poem, which in its account of the rivers, mountains, productions, antiquities, and remarkable historical features, contains more correctness and truth of delineation than real and sublime poetry. The metre of twelve syllables is particularly offensive, and the poem is now regarded only for the accuracy of its narrative and of its description. In 1627, Drayton published a second volume of his poems, containing the battle of Agincourt, miseries of queen Margaret, court of fairies, quest of Cynthia, shepherds' syrena, elegies, and a spirited satire against female affectation, called Mooncalf. In 1630, another volume appeared, called the muses' elysium, &c. Drayton died 1631, and was buried among the poets in Westminster abbey. Though called poet laureate, it is a complimentary appellation, as Ben Jonson was the laureate of this time. Drayton's works were published in 1748, in 1 vol. fol. and in 1753, in 10 vols. Svo.

DRAYTON, William, LL.D. judge of the federal court for the district of South Carolina, was born in that state, in 1733. After studying law for some time in South Carolina, he went to London, and spent three years in the Middle temple. He returned in 1754, and his talents and knowledge soon gave him eminence in the profession. In 1768, he was appointed chief justice of East Florida, and held the office till 1775, when the governor of the province, doubting his fidelity to the royal cause, ejected him. He went to England to obtain redress, but was unsuccessful, and returned to South Carolina, where he was appointed judge of the court of admiralty, and in March, 1789, associate justice; but in October following, he resigned that office for a seat on the bench of the federal court of the United States. He died June, 1790, aged 57.

DRAYTON, William Henry, who became noted by his political writings during the war of the American revolution, was a native of South Carolina, and was one of his majesty's justices in that province during their last circuit in the spring of 1775. Being appointed a member of the provincial congress of that year, he was elected president of that body, and distinguished himself in its deliberations by his talents and zeal in the cause of liberty. He was afterwards appointed chief justice of his native state. He died in 1779, in the 37th year of his age, while attending a session of congress in Philadelphia. Besides the several political pamphlets which he published, he wrote a manuscript history of the American revolution to the year 1773, in 3 volumes, which he was prevented by death from completing.  L.

DREBEL, Cornelius, a Dutch philosopher, born at Alcaer, 1572, died in London, 1634. As he pretended to be an alchemist, some curious particulars are related with respect to his power to cause rain, cold, &c. by the operation of his machines. To his ingenuity some attribute the invention of the microscope and the thermometer, to which some add the telescope. Among other things he wrote de naturâ elementorum, 8vo. &c.

DREINCOURT, Charles, a Calvinist minister, born at Sedan, July, 1595, and educated there and at Saumur. Though a protestant and a powerful enemy against the papists, yet he was universally esteemed and beloved by them there and at Saumur. His discourses as a preacher were very edifying, and his writings particularly consolatory, as interesting the soul in that inward devotion and sincerity of prayer which alone can prove acceptable to the God of purity. Many of his writings, thirteen in number, were controversial. Besides these he published consolations against the fear of death, which have passed through more than forty editions, and have been translated into various languages,—his charitable visits, in 5 vols. and 3 vols. of sermons, &c. all equally remarkable for the piety, devotion, and religious assertions with which they inspire the attentive reader. He died the third of November, 1669. He married in 1625, and by his wife had sixteen children, the first seven of whom were sons, and the rest six sons and three daughters intermixed. The eldest son Lawrence was an able preacher, and his sermons and sonnets were greatly esteemed. He died 1681, aged 50. Henry, the second son, was minister, and published also some sermons. The third son, Charles, was born 1633, at Paris, and became M.D. at Montpellier, and was appointed physician to the king's forces in Flanders under Turenne. He was afterwards physician to William and Mary of England, and died at Leyden, May, 1697, leaving a son of his own name. He was not less esteemed as a private character than as a medical man, as he was humane, pious, benevolent, and learned. His treatises on his profession are highly esteemed. The fourth son of Dreincourt, Anthony, was a physician at Orbes, in Switzerland; the fifth died at Geneva, studying divinity; the sixth, Peter, died dean of Armagh; the other children died young, except a daughter who married Malnoc, advocate of the parliament of Paris.

DRESSERUS, Matthew, a German, born at Erfurt, in Thuringia, 1536. He became professor of rhetoric and history at Erfurt, and afterwards at Jena, and in 1581, accepted the chair of polite learning at Leipsic. He engaged, though unwillingly, in the puerile disputes which in those days divided the attention of the learned between the disciples of Aristotle and of Ramus. He was learned and laborious, and by his influence, the confession of Augsburg was received in the university of Leipsic. He died 1607. He had been twice married. His writings were chiefly on controversial subjects, and are no longer remembered.

DREVET, Peter, two famous engravers at Paris, who both died there, 1739, the father, aged 75, and the son 42. Their works are highly esteemed. Claude, their relation, possessed also merit in the same line.

DREUX DU RADIER, John Francis, an advocate, born at Chateaufort Thimerais 10th of May, 1714. He abandoned the bar for the pursuits of literature, but he did not gain much reputation as a poet, as his verses were dull, incorrect, and prosaic. His prose writings are bibliothèque historique politique du Poitou, 5 vols. 12mo.—l'Europe illustrée,—tablettes, anecdotes des rois de France, 3 vols. 12mo.—histoires anecdotes des reines, &c. six vols. 12mo.—He died the first of March, 1780. Though sarcastic in his writings he was a benevolent man in his character.

DREXELIUS, Jeremiah, a Jesuit of Augsburg, who died at Munich, 1638, aged 57. His works were published at Antwerp two vols. folio. He has a curious poem on hell torments, in which he calculates how many souls can be contained in a narrow space in those dreadful regions.

DRIEDO, John, a learned divinity professor of Louvain, who died there, 1535. His abilities were engaged in the opposition of the Lutheran Calvinists, and he published 4 vols. fol. on theological subjects.

DRINKER, Edward, an American centenary, born Dec. 24th, 1680, in a small cabin where the corner of Walnut and Second-streets, Philadelphia, now stand. At the age of twelve he went to Boston as apprentice to a cabinet-maker, and in 1745, returned to Philadelphia, with his family, where he lived the rest of his life. He was four times married, and had eighteen children, all by his first wife, and before his death he had a grandchild born to one of his grandchildren, being the fifth in succession from himself. He retained all his faculties to the last, though his eyesight failed him some time before his death. He lost all his teeth about thirty years before he died. In his meals he was moderate, but he ate often, and never took any supper, and he was never seen in a state of intoxication. His memory continued so perfect that he could relate the minutest events in his youth, and never repeated them twice to the same company. He had the unusual happiness of seeing a place of desolation, the lurking spot of wild beasts and birds of prey, converted to a handsome, populous, and flourishing city, and after living under seven sovereigns, and beholding the great Penn establish his treaty with the Indians, and the congress sign their alliance with France, he hailed the day which made America a free independent republic. This venerable man, deservedly respected for his virtues in private life, died Nov. 17th, 1782, aged 103.

DROLINGER, Charles Frederic; privy counsellor and librarian to the margrave of Baden Durlach, was admired as a poet and scholar. He died 1742, and his poetical works appeared the next year at Basil, in 8vo. full of energy, elegance, and correctness.

DROU, N. a French advocate, distinguished for his eloquence as well as humanity. He defended with zeal and ability the cause of the poor as well as of the rich. He died June, 1783, much respected.

DROUVAIS, Hubert, a painter, born at la Rouge, Normandy, died at Paris, Feb. 9th, 1767, aged 68. He was the pupil of his father, who was likewise a painter, and he enjoyed the sublimest of satisfactions of sharing with his parents and in the bosom of his family the applauses which were liberally bestowed on the exertions of his pencil. By his genius and industry he raised himself from an humble situation to fame and opulence. His son, Germain John, was a painter of promising abilities, and died at Rome, 1790, aged 27.

DROUET, Stephen Francis, a laborious French writer, who edited Moreri, and also Lenglet's Methode, &c. He died 1779, aged 54.

DRUMMOND, William, a Scotchman, son of Sir John Drummond of Hawthornden, where he was born, 1585. He was educated at Edinburgh, and in 1606, he passed over to France, and studied civil law at Bourges. He, however, abandoned the profession of the law for the muses, and for the peaceful retirement of Hawthornden, which soon became disagreeable to him on the sudden death of a young lady to whom he was betrothed. In consequence of this he went to settle on the continent, and resided for eight years between Rome and Paris, and travelled over Germany, Italy, and France. He visited his country afterwards, but soon left it on account of the civil broils of the time. During his retirement he wrote the history of the five James's, which was published after his death. He also wrote other pieces which tended to pacify his countrymen, and rouse a spirit of loyalty through the nation. He was intimate with the learned men of the times, with Drayton, Jonson, the marquis of Montrose, &c. He married in 1644, and had three children, and died 1649. His works, consisting of poetry and prose, with his life prefixed, were printed in folio, Edinburgh, 1711. His son William was knighted by Charles II.

DRUMMOND, Robert Hay, second son of the seventh earl of Kinnoul, by a daughter of Robert Harley lord Oxford, was born 10th Nov., 1711, at London, and educated at Westminster school, and Christ-church, where he was student. In 1736 he took orders, and the next year was made king's chaplain, and in 1743, was abroad with the king, before whom he preached after the battle of Dettingen. His abilities, and particularly the influence of his relations, ensured his promotion in the church, he became prebendary of Westminster, in 1748 bishop of St. Asaph, in 1761 bishop of Salisbury, and soon after was translated to York. He published six occasional sermons, besides a sensible letter on theological study, which was edited in one vol. 8vo. 1803, with his life. He died in 1773, leaving only three of several children by his wife, daughter of Peter Auriol, a London merchant.

DRURY, Robert, was shipwrecked 1762, in the Degrave East Indiaman, on the south side of Madagascar, where he remained in slavery 15 years. On his return, he published, 1729, a very interesting account of that uncivilized country, which, though extraordinary, is considered as accurate, as it corresponded with the papers of Mr. Benbow, who shared the calamity. Three only with Drury escaped the ferocity of the natives.

DRURY, Dru, a jeweller in the Strand, London, better known as fellow of the Linnæan society, and as a naturalist, and an indefatigable collector of curiosities. He died Jan. 1804, and after his death there were found in the neck of his bladder, three large oval stones, more than two inches long, and one deep, nearly two ounces in weight. He wrote three volumes on insects. It is supposed that he was descended from Dru Drury, a well-known character in the reign of Elizabeth.

DRUSILLA, Livia, daughter of Germanicus, disgraced herself by her incestuous commerce with her brother Caligula. She died 38 A. D. aged 29.

DRUSIUS, John, a learned protestant, born at Oudenard, 1555. He was educated at Ghent and Louvain, and upon his father's settlement in England, came to Cambridge, where he learned Hebrew. His return to France was prevented by the Bartholomew massacre, and he went by invitation to Oxford, where he became professor of the oriental languages for four years, though only 22. He afterwards studied law at Louvain, and settled at Leyden, as professor of oriental languages, where he married, and then removed in 1585, in consequence of the scantiness of his salary, to Franeker, where he filled the professor's chair with great credit till his death, in 1616. He was very learned in Hebrew, and in the Jewish antiquities, and the text of the Old Testament, as his works fully evince. He had two daughters and one son. One of the daughters married Curiaander, who wrote the life of his father-in-law. His son was so well skilled in the learned languages, that he could write at 12 extempore in verse and prose, and at 17 he made a Latin speech to James I. which was much applauded. He died at the age of 21, of the stone. He left some learned works, so excellent that Scaliger declared that Drusius the son, knew Hebrew better than his father.

DRUSUS, son of Germanicus, was put to death by Tiberius through the intrigues of Sejanus, A. D. 93.

DRUSUS, M. Livius, an ambitious Roman, murdered for his attempts to recommend and enforce the Agrarian law, B. C. 190.

DRUSUS, Nero Claudius, brother of the emperor Tiberius, was honoured with a triumph for his victories in Germany, and died B. C. 91, aged 30.

DRUSUS, son of Tiberius and Vipsania, was banished by the intrigues of Sejanus, whom in a fit of resentment he had struck, A. D. 23.

DRYANDER, John, a physician and mathematician of Wetteren in Hesse, lecturer at Marburg, where he died 20th December, 1560. His works are valuable on medicine and mathematics, and his discoveries in astronomy and his invention of mathematical instruments are important.

DRYDEN, John, an illustrious English poet, was born of a very respectable family at Aldwinckle, near Oundle, Northamptonshire, the 9th of Aug. 1631. He was educated at Westminster, under Busby, and at Trinity college, Cambridge. He early gave proof of superior poetical abilities, and even while at school, translated the third satire of Persius, and wrote a poem on the death of Lord Hastings. In 1658, he published heroic stanzas on Cromwell, and in 1660, Astrea redux, on the restoration of Charles II. In 1662, he addressed a poem to chancellor Hyde, and published his satire on the Dutch. In 1666, appeared his Annus-mirabilis, and in 1668, he was, on the death of Davenant, appointed poet laureate and historiographer to the king. He next wrote his essay on dramatic poetry, inscribed to the earl of Dorset, and in 1669, appeared his first play, "The wild gallant," which was not well received, but ill success did not however discourage him, as in the space of 25 years he produced 27 plays. He was satirized and ridiculed in 1671, under the character of Bays in the duke of Buckingham's comedy of the Rehearsal, an attack which he affected to despise, but which he fully resented by representing the duke as Zimri in his Absalom and Achitophel. In 1679, he published with lord Mulgrave his essay on satire, but as it reflected on the character of the dutchess of Portsmouth and lord Rochester, three men were hired soundly to cudgel him for his insolence, in Will's coffee-house, Covent garden. In 1680, he was concerned in the translation of some of Ovid's epistles, and the next year he published his celebrated poem Absalom and Achitophel, in which he satirized severely the rebels who espoused the cause of Monmouth against the king. The king appeared under the name of David, Monmouth of Absalom, Shaftesbury of Achitophel, and Buckingham of Zimri. This poem was deservedly popular, and was translated into Latin verse by both Dr. Coward and the famous Atterbury, but the author never could be prevailed upon to finish the story, as he was unwilling to show Absalom unfortunate. A second part indeed was written by Tate, to which Dryden contributed about 200 lines, but far inferior to the first. In 1681 appeared the Medal, a satire against sedition, in consequence of Shaftesbury's acquittal, and the next year Religio laici was published, and in 1683, the tragedy of the duke of Guise, which proved so offensive to the whigs. The translation of Maimbourg's history of the league was published in 1684, and the next year Dryden changed his religion to please his patron James II. His conduct deservedly exposed him to the ridicule and satire of the wits of the times, and particularly T. Browne, Burnet, and Stillingfleet, whose attacks he wished to repel by defending the Romish faith. His Hind and Panther was published in 1687, but while he represents the church of Rome under the former beast, and under the latter the church of England, he betrays weakness of argument, and a gross abuse of poetical talents, and his ridiculous allusions are well and humorously exposed in "the hind and panther travestied to the story of the country mouse and city mouse," by the united labours of Montague, lord Halifax, and of Prior. The Britannia rediviva appeared in 1688, and on that year the poet, in consequence of his religion, was removed from the appointment of laureate, which was bestowed on Shadwell. Lord Dorset, however, behaved with great liberality, and while as chamberlain he dismissed the catholic poet, he allowed a pension out of his own pocket equivalent to the royal salary. The spleen of Dryden on this occasion was discharged with astonishing efficacy on his successor in the Mac Flecknoe, a satire, the severest that has appeared in any country or language. About this time he translated father Bouhour's life of Xavier, and in 1693, he published the Juvenal of Persius, assisted by some of his friends. In 1695, he translated in prose du Fresnoy's art of painting, and two years after his Virgil appeared, a work which has in various editions continued to command the public admiration, and which, as Pope observes, is, notwithstanding some human errors, the most noble and spirited translation in any language. In 1698, he published his fables, ancient and modern, from Homer, Ovid, Boccace, and Chaucer. Besides these numerous works, he was engaged in the translation of some of Plutarch's lives and various other miscellanies. This great man died in consequence of the inflammation in his foot, caused by the growing of his nail under the flesh, May the 1st, 1701, and he was interred in Westminster abbey, where a monument was erected over his remains by John Sheffield, duke of Buckingham. He had married lady Elizabeth Howard, daughter of the earl of Berkshire, who survived him eight years, by whom he had three sons, Charles, John, and Henry. The eldest was usher of the palace to pope Clement II. and soon after his return to England, was drowned in the Thames, near Windsor, 1704. He had written some pieces. John was the author of "the Husband his own Cuckold," a comedy, printed 1696. Henry entered into a religious order. It is said in Wilson's memoirs of Congreve, that Dryden's remains were indecently insulted by Jefferies, the dissipated son of the chancellor, who upon the pretence of paying greater honour to the deceased poet, stopped the funeral in the midst of the procession, and afterwards disdainfully left it to the care of an undertaker. Dryden's character as a prose writer is as well established as that of a poet. His dedications, essays, prefaces, &c. are very elegant and masterly productions, and display great powers of judgment, criticism, and erudition. His poems prove him one of the greatest poets of his country, and as Congreve says, no man has written in any language, so much and so various matter, and in so various manners, so well. His ode on St. Cecilia's day, and his fables, though composed in the latter part of life, show him in imagination and fire even greater than himself. For the correctness of his prose he owned himself indebted to the frequent reading of Tillotson's excellent writings. His dramatic works are perhaps the least valuable of his poetry, and he confesses himself to be not very fit for that sort of writing, in which his predecessors had shone so superior to himself. The great fault, and probably the only fault which criticism can observe in his works, is the astonishing rapidity with which he composed, which consequently prevented correctness, and all the accuracy which must arise from frequent meditation and impartial revision. If he had written but the tenth part of what he has published, his name would have stood high in the list of fame, and if he had applied himself only to one species of the various subjects on which he has treated, still he would have appeared a most respectable and eminent author, entitled to preference and distinction. Dr. Johnson's critique on Dryden is well worth the most attentive perusal.

DUANE, James, district judge of the United States for New-York, was a lawyer of eminence in that state, and was chosen a member of congress in 1774. He disapproved of the declaration of independence, and by that means lessened his popularity, though he still continued to enjoy a large share of public confidence. He was a member of the convention which formed the state constitution in 1777, and after the revolution, mayor of the city of New-York. He was one of the convention which ratified the federal constitution, and a member of the senate of the state when he was appointed judge in October, 1789. He died at Albany, in February, 1797.

DUAREN, Francis, a French civilian, born at St. Brienne, in Bretagne, 1509. He taught civil law at Bourges, where he died, 1559. His works, which are chiefly on law, were published in his lifetime, Lyons, 1554, and after his death, a more complete edition appeared by his scholar Cisner, 1579.

DUBOCAGE, Mary Anne le Page, a French lady, born at Rouen, 1710. She early displayed her poetical powers, by a spirited translation into French of Pope's Temple of Fame, and afterwards of Milton's Paradise Lost, and of the Death of Abel. Her Amazons, a tragedy, was received with flattering applause in 1749, and soon after her Columbiad, an epic poem in 10 cantos, on the discovery of America, proved her to be animated by the strongest fire of the muses. She published besides, her travels through England, Holland, and Italy, in the form of letters, and also the composition which obtained the first prize granted by the Rouen academy in 1746. She was member of the learned academies of Rome, Bologna, Padua, Lyons, Rouen, &c. and died, August, 1802. Her works were collected in 3 vols. Lyons.

DUBOIS, William du, a French prelate, son of an apothecary at Limosin. Though originally but a valet in St. Michael's college, Paris, he rose to consequence by the influence of the regent Orleans, to whom he was reader, and afterwards preceptor, and whom he ably supported in all his schemes of licentious pleasure, and of wild ambition. In 1693, he obtained the rich abbey of St. Just, and afterwards became counsellor of state, and in 1717, passed as ambassador to England to sign the triple alliance. He was next appointed minister and secretary of state, presented to the archbishopric of Cambrai, in 1721, made a cardinal, and in 1722, raised to the dignity of prime minister. He died 1723, aged 67, leaving behind him the unamiable character of a mean intriguing politician, of an immoral priest, and a designing hypocrite.

DUBOIS, Dorothea, daughter of Annesley, afterwards earl of Anglesea, by Anne Symson, married a musician, and endeavoured by her writings to reclaim her rights and privileges from her father, who had meanly denied his marriage with her mother, and disowned her as his child. She wrote the divorce, a musical entertainment,—and Theodora, a novel, 2 vols. 1770, in which she delineates her unfortunate history. She died at Dublin, 1774.

DUBOIS, Simon, a painter of Antwerp, who came to England, where he met great encouragement. His battles, cattle, &c. were highly finished. He died 1708.

DUBOS, Charles Francis, a Frenchman, author of the life of Barillon, bishop of Lucon. He continued the Lucon conferences in 17 vols. 12mo. and died 1724, dean of St. Lucon, aged 63.

DUBOS, John Baptist, abbot of Resons, died 1742, aged 72. He wrote critical reflections on poetry and painting, 2 vols. 12mo.—critical history of the establishment of the French monarchy in Gaul, besides some political pieces, &c.

DUBOS, Jerome, a Dutch painter, whose representation of hell was finished with such effect that it struck astonishment and terror into the spectators. He lived in the beginning of the 16th century.

DUBOUCHER, Matthew, a native of Dax, who published some law tracts, besides a poem on friendship, a drama, and an opera in three acts. He died 1801.

DUBRAU, or DUBRAVIUS SCALA, John, bishop of Olmutz in Moravia, was born at Piltzen in Bohemia, and died 1553. He was employed as ambassador in Silesia, and was the author of some learned works, especially a valuable history of Bohemia, in 33 books, edited 1575, and afterwards improved, Frankfort 1688.

Duc, Fronton du, Fronto Ducaeus, a Jesuit of Bourdeaux, well known as a learned critic and an excellent Greek scholar. He devoted his time to study, devotion, and abstinence. He is the editor of Chrysostom's works, six vols. fol. 1613,—three volumes of controversy,—of the history tragique de la pucelle d'Orleans, &c. He died of the stone at Paris 27th September, 1624. A stone weighing five ounces was found in his bladder.

Duc, John le, a Dutch painter, born 1636, at the Hague, where he was director of the academy of painting. He was the disciple of Paul Potter, and equalled his master in execution.

DUCAREL, Andrew Coltee, a learned antiquarian, born at Greenwich, 1714, and educated at Eton, and St. John's college, Oxford, where he took the degree of LL.D. He became member of Doctor's Commons 1743, and married 1749. In 1757 he was made Lambeth librarian under the primate Hutton, and he devoted himself with great care and assiduity in perfecting and improving the catalogues of that valuable collection. Of all his preferences that which pleased him most was his commissariate of St. Catharine's, of which peculiar he has given a very elaborate history, with beautiful engravings. He was so devoted to the pursuit of antiquities, that he generally travelled every year in company with his friend Samuel Gale, Esquire, with a Camden's Britannia and a set of maps, and by proceeding about 15 miles a day, enjoyed the opportunity of examining every place with leisure and accuracy. He was a very cheerful and hospitable man, and of his knowledge of antiquities the best specimen is his history of Croydon palace, and of Lambeth, besides the account of Doctor's Commons, which he did not live to complete. He died three days after his return from his visitation as official of Canterbury, at South Lambeth, aged 72, 29th May, 1785.

DUCART, Isaac, a flower painter, born at Amsterdam. He painted generally on satin, and with extraordinary effect. He died 1727, aged 67.

DUCAS, Michael, a Greek historian, author of a history of the Grecian empire from Andronicus the elder to the fall of the empire. Though his language is harsh and impetuous, yet he relates with accuracy and impartiality. The work was printed at the Louvre, fol. 1649, and translated by Cousin into French 1672.

DUCHAL, James, a dissenting minister, born in Ireland 1697, and educated at Glasgow, where he took the degree of D.D. After being 11 years minister of a dissenting congregation at Cambridge, on the removal of his friend Abernethy from Antrim, he succeeded him there, and at his death was chosen minister of the congregation in Wood-street, Dublin. He died 1761. In the decuple of life he wrote above 700 sermons, out of which were selected the three vols. 8vo. published 1764. During his life he published a volume of sermons.

DUCHANGE, Gaspard, a French engraver, who died 6th January, 1757, aged 97. After engaging on the engraving of Leda, Io, and Danae, without draperies, he executed the driving of the money-changers, and the Pharisee's supper. The palaces of France are adorned with the best of his pieces.

DUCHAT, Jacob le, a Frenchman born at Metz 1658. He followed the profession of the bar till the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and in 1701, he settled at Berlin, where he died, 1735. He was learned, and he is known rather as an editor than an author. He edited the Menippean satires, the works of Rabelais, &c. and contributed much to the completion of his friend Bayle's dictionary. A book called Ducatiana appeared at Amsterdam 1738, two vols. 12mo.

DUCHATEL, Gaspard, a deputy in the French convention, celebrated for his able and manly defence of the unfortunate Lewis XVI. These honourable efforts in the cause of innocence were regarded by the tyrants with envy, and Duchatel falsely accused of holding a treasonable correspondence with the Vendean rebels, was guillotined November, 1793.

DUCHATELET-D'HARAUCOURT, Lewis Marie Florent duc, a native of Saumur, who became colonel in the French army, and was one of the deputies in the national assembly. He was imprisoned for his attachment to his royal master on the 10th August, and fell on the scaffold November, 1792, aged 66. He left memoirs of his mission as ambassador in England, lately published.

DUCHE DE VANCY, Joseph Francis, a French poet born at Paris 29th October, 1668. He was patronised by Madame de Maintenon, and he engaged and ensured universal respect by the mildness of his manners, his inoffensive conduct, and his genuine wit, never directed against virtue or religion. He was member of the academy of inscriptions and belles lettres, and died 14th December, 1704, aged 37. He wrote three tragedies, Jonathan, Absalom, and Deborah, besides ballets and pieces for the opera, which had great merit, and were received with universal applause. His hymns, sacred canticles, and edifying stories, composed for the pupils at St. Cyr, possess great excellence.

Duck, Arthur, a civilian born in Devonshire 1580, and educated at Exeter college, and Hart-hall, Oxford. He became fellow of All-ouls, and took his degrees in law, and, after travelling through France, Italy, and Germany, he was made chancellor of Bath and Wells, afterwards of London, and then master of the requests. He suffered much during the civil wars for his attachment to the royal family, and died in his retirement at Chiswick 1649. He wrote Vita Henrici Chichele, &c.—et de usu et autoritate juris civilis Romanorum in dominiis principum Christianorum, a useful book, often reprinted.

Duck, Stephen, a poet of extraordinary fortune, who from a thrasher became the respectable minister of a parish. Though little blessed with education, he was naturally endowed with a strong mind and persevering temper; and at the age of 24 he began to apply himself laboriously to the acquisition of knowledge, and devoted to retired study those few hours which he could spare from the active and menial occupation of a servant. By little and little he purchased a few and necessary books, and, with a scanty library and great application, he became something of a poet and of a philosopher. The lines of Milton enriched his imagination, and the correctness of Addison's Spectators improved his understanding, and helped him in the regular disposition of his thoughts. By degrees his poetical attempts became respectable, and, by being reported in his neighbourhood, were made known to some of the clergy, and at last to queen Caroline, who, pleased with him, settled a pension of 30*l.* upon him, and thus enabled him not only to live independently, but to take orders; after which he was presented to the living of Byfleet, Surry. In this new office he behaved with great propriety; he was followed as a preacher, and respected as a man; but his spirits sunk into a dreadful melancholy, and, in an unfortunate moment, robbed of his reason, he threw himself from a bridge, near Reading, into the Thames, and was drowned, May or June, 1756. His poems have been published; and though he was not a first-rate poet, yet he possessed merit, and deserved the censure of the cynical Swift.

Duclos, Charles Dineau, historiographer of France, and secretary to the French academy, was born at Dinant, in Bretagne, 1705, and educated at Paris. In 1744 he was mayor of Dinant, and in 1755 received a patent of nobility, and died 26th March, 1772, respected and beloved. Though considered as one of the philosophers of France, he proved by his conduct, writings, and conversation, that he was moderate in his opinions and the friend of morality and virtue. He never published any thing as historiographer, and observed, that he never would ruin himself by speaking truth, nor debase himself by flattery. His history of Lewis XV. was, after his death, lodged in the hands of the minister. His works are romances, ingenious and interesting—the confessions of count —the baroness de Luz—history of Lewis XI. 3 vols. 12mo.—memoirs on the manners of the 18th century—Acajou, &c. Though he took Tacitus for his model, he resembles him little in his delineation of characters, and the interest of his narrative. He was also engaged in the dictionary of the academy, and in the continuation of the history of that society.

Duclos, Mary Ann, a French actress of great merit, born at Paris. She excelled chiefly in the representations of queens and princesses, and for many years engaged the public applause. Her maiden name was Chateaufort; that of Duclos was assumed; and she married, in 1730, Duchemin, an actor, from whom she was divorced three years after. She died at Paris 1748, aged 78.

DUCREUX, N. a native of Paris, eminent as a painter. He was at Vienna to take portraits of the imperial family. He died at Paris of an apoplexy, 1802, aged 64.

DUCKROISY, Philibert Gassaud, a French actor, intimate with Moliere. It was for him that the poet wrote the excellent character of his Tartuffe.

DUDEFFANT, N. a French lady, well known in Paris for her knowledge of criticism, her elegant taste, and her pleasing and agreeable manners. She was acquainted with all the learned men of the times, who frequented her house. She died 1780, aged 84, the last thirty of which she had been blind.

DUDITH, Andrew, a divine, born at Buda, in Hungary, 6th February, 1533, and employed by Ferdinand II. in affairs of importance, and rewarded with the bishopric of Tina, in Dalmatia. He was a man of great learning, and of such application that he is said to have transcribed three times the works of Cicero, to make himself perfect master of his style and manner. He was deputy at the council of Trent, where he became intimate with cardinal Pole; and at his return he embraced the protestant religion, resigned his bishopric, and married one of the queen's maids of honour, by whom he had a son, who gave him great trouble. After her death he married a second time, and died 23d February, 1589. His works on physic, controversy, and poetry, are numerous, and possess merit. He was a man of great mildness, benevolence, and regularity.

DUDLEY, Edmund, a celebrated lawyer and statesman, born in 1462, of a respectable family. He was educated at Oxford, and removed to Gray's inn; and he became so respectable for his knowledge of law, and for his general information, that Henry VII. admitted him of the privy council, and made him one of his favourites. In 1494 he married Elizabeth Grey, daughter of viscount l'Isle. In 1504 he was speaker of the house of commons, and two years after he obtained the stewardship of the rape of Hastings. His services to his master were numerous; and it is said that Henry, to fill his coffers, used this artful favourite, who, little regardless of conscience or of reputation, joined with Empson to oppress and harass the people, and by various methods of influence, intrigue, or terror, extorted great fines and ransoms, so that, according to Bacon, they turned law and justice to wormwood and rapine. This conduct, however, did not pass unpunished. Henry was scarce in his grave before the public indignation called for the punishment of his wicked and corrupt ministers; and Empson and Dudley were both yielded up by Henry VIII. and after being attainted and convicted of high treason, they lost their heads on Tower-hill, 15th August, 1510. During his imprisonment in the Tower, Dudley wrote "the tree of the commonwealth, by Edmund Dudley, Esq. late counsellor to Henry VII. the same Edmund being at the compiling thereof prisoner in the Tower, 1 Henry VIII." It is still in manuscript.

DUDLEY, John, son of the above, baron Malpas, viscount l'Isle, earl of Warwick, and duke of Northumberland, was born in 1502. He was restored in blood from the ignominious attainder of his father, and soon became known at court as the friend of Suffolk, of Wolsey, and of Cromwell, and as the favourite of the king. Henry, pleased with the versatility of his talents, created him viscount l'Isle, and knight of the garter, and afterwards, for his many services and his great courage, appointed him high admiral for life. He also received important grants of church lands, and was nominated one of the sixteen executors of the king's will. On the death of Henry, Dudley was succeeded as high admiral by Sir Thomas Seymour, brother to Somerset the protector; but, as an equivalent for his loss of dignity, he was created earl of Warwick, and chamberlain of England. His military abilities were now employed against the insurgents of Norfolk, and, by a well-managed negotiation, instead of fighting them, he prevailed upon them to lay down their arms, and to deliver up their leaders. His influence in the cabinet was now so great, that the young king confided much to his advice and authority; he was made duke of Northumberland; and a short-lived reconciliation was effected between him and the duke of Somerset, by the marriage of his eldest son with the latter's daughter. Rivalship, however, could never be extinguished. Somerset, though uncle to the king, was tried, condemned, and executed for a pretended conspiracy against Northumberland. The victorious but guilty favourite now succeeded to all the honours of his fallen enemy; he became chancellor of Cambridge, and not only guided the young king, but in consequence of his weak state of health determined to raise his own family to the sovereign power. He with precipitation effected a marriage between his fourth son, lord Guildford Dudley, and lady Jane Grey, eldest daughter of the dutchess of Suffolk, in whose favour he caused the yielding Edward to settle the succession. No sooner had Edward expired than Jane was conveyed to the Tower by her ambitious father-in-law, and on the 10th of July proclaimed queen. Submission to these measures was demanded from Mary, and when the men of Suffolk rose up in her favour, Northumberland advanced with a body of troops to check the insurgents. He soon found however the unpopularity of his measures; when he reached St. Edmundsbury, no supplies arrived to support his plans, and he retired to Cambridge, where seeing his followers deserting his standard, he affected attachment to Mary, and caused her to be proclaimed queen, and threw up his cap into the air, in sign of joy. Mary, pleased with her success, did not relent towards her enemy, Northumberland was arraigned and condemned, and he lost his head on Tower-hill, after making a profession of the Romish religion 22d Aug. 1553. Thus fell this powerful subject, whose many virtues were lost by a restless, and at last fatal ambition, which swept away not only him, but the innocent lady Jane and her virtuous consort. Northumberland had eight sons and five daughters, some of whom died before him.

DUDLEY, Ambrose, son of the preceding, was born 1530. He was knighted for his bravery against the Norfolk insurgents, and shared the condemnation of his unfortunate father, but was pardoned by the queen 1544. In 1557, he distinguished himself with his two brothers Robert and Henry, at the siege of St. Quintin, and for his gallant services was restored in blood by the kindness of Mary, and was afterwards under Elizabeth created baron l'Isle and earl Warwick. His services to the country were great, and to his honour it is mentioned that he had no share in the intrigues and disgraceful measures of the times, and therefore was deservedly called "the good earl of Warwick." He died in consequence of the amputation of his leg from a wound received in his valiant defence of Newhaven against the French, Feb. 1589. Though three times married he left no issue.

DUDLEY, Robert, baron Denbigh, earl of Leicester, son of John duke of Northumberland, and brother of Ambrose earl of Warwick, was born 1532. He became a favourite at the court of Edward, and was knighted, and in 1550, he married Amy daughter of sir John Robsart. Under Mary he fell into the same disgrace as his father, and he was condemned, but by the queen's favour pardoned in 1554, and afterwards restored in blood. On the accession of Elizabeth he became a great favourite, and was made knight of the garter, master of the horse, and a privy counsellor, and so much honoured by the queen and flattered by the people, that he was called "the heart of the court." Though opposed in some of his measures by the earl of Sussex, he yet shared the queen's favour, and obtained the grant of whatever lands and offices he pleased, to gratify his pride, or the avarice of his friends. Elizabeth, to show how much she esteemed him, proposed him in marriage to Mary queen of Scots, with the intention of admitting him to share her bed, if that unfortunate princess listened to the proposal. Mary however rejected this offer from Dudley, who it is said on the 8th of September, 1560, had caused his ill-fated wife to be strangled and thrown down a pair of stairs at Cumnor near Abingdon, that she might not stand in the way of his criminal ambition. In 1564 he was created earl of Leicester with unusual solemnity, and to the honours of chancellor of Oxford and high steward of Cambridge, was added the order of St. Michael from the king of France. About 1572 he privately married lady Douglas Sheffield, but though he had by her a son whom he called his base son, and a daughter, he never acknowledged her as his wife, and when he espoused lady Essex, he, after attempting in vain to pacify her, and to silence her pretensions to his hand and heart, endeavoured to cut her off by poison, from which she however escaped, with the loss of her hair and nails. When on her progress, Elizabeth and her suite were sumptuously entertained for 17 days at Kenilworth castle, Warwickshire, a mansion which the earl had obtained from the favour of his mistress, and had embellished at the expense of 60,000*l*. Though Leicester stood so high in the graces of the queen, there were not wanting attempts to destroy his influence and consequence. Elizabeth was highly displeased with his union with lady Essex, of which she had been for some time kept ignorant, and in 1584 a virulent attack was made on the favourite by a work called "Leicester's commonwealth," which exhibited him in the odious character of an atheist, a traitor, a public oppressor, and a monster of ambition, cruelty, and lust. This famous book, considered as so hostile to overgrown ministers, and afterwards republished to bring into disgrace the government of Charles I. and Anne, was read with avidity by the people; but Elizabeth screened her favourite with the shield of her never-ceasing partiality and esteem. In 1585 he went to the Low Countries as governor, at the request of the distracted inhabitants, but his conduct was displeasing to the queen, and he was recalled, and though criminated by his enemies for violence and maladministration, he was reinstated in the royal favour. In 1588 he was made lieutenant-general of the army assembled at Tilbury to oppose the Spanish armada, and he there received high and flattering commendation from the queen. He died Sept. 4th, 1588, at Cornbury, Oxfordshire, and was buried with great magnificence at Warwick. This ambitious favourite was endowed with great talents; the influence which he possessed over the queen he maintained by his intrigues and duplicity. He affected regularity and piety to an offensive degree, but when his views were thwarted, neither virtue nor innocence could resist the secrecy of his measures, or the perseverance of his guilt. Poisoning was the favourite recipe to which he had recourse to remove his enemies or rivals. He left the greater part of his estates to his base son Robert.

DUDLEY, Robert, son of the earl of Leicester by lady Douglas Sheffield, was born at Sheen in Surrey 1573. His birth was carefully concealed from the knowledge of queen Elizabeth, as well as of lady Essex, to whom the earl was either betrothed or married. He was sent to school at Offingham in Sussex, and removed to Christchurch, Oxford, where he became known for his many mental and personal accomplishments. Though he inherited the better part of his father's estate, after the death of his uncle Ambrose, yet dissatisfied with a life of indolence, he projected a voyage to the South seas, which however the government would not suffer to proceed, till Nov. 1594. His first wife was the sister of the famous Thomas Cavendish, and for his second he took Alice daughter of Sir Thomas Leigh. In 1605, he commenced a suit to prove the legitimacy of his birth, but in this he was opposed by the lady dowager of Essex, who threatened to prosecute him for a conspiracy. Upon this he retired to the continent, where he assumed the title of the earl of Warwick, for which he was summoned back to England, and on his refusal, his property was forfeited to the crown during his life. He settled at Florence, where he was patronised by the duke Cosmo II. and by the influence of his consort, sister to the emperor Ferdinand II. he was created a duke of the Roman empire, and ten years after he was enrolled by pope Urban VIII. among the Roman nobility. These high honours were deserved by the services which he performed for his patrons. He formed the plan for draining the extensive morass between Pisa and the sea, and by his wise regulations he raised Leghorn from an insignificant town, to a respectable and populous sea-port. He lived in great magnificence, and to his titles assumed that of duke of Northumberland. He died at his castle of Corbello, three miles from Florence, Sept. 1659. In philosophy, chymistry, and physic, he was as eminent as in politics. The account of his voyage is published in Hackluyt's collection, and his principal work besides is "del arcano del mare," &c. Florence 1630, 1646. It is very valuable for its charts and plans, and for projects there offered for the improvement of commerce and navigation. He also wrote a proposition to bridle the impertinence of parliaments, &c. which was submitted to James, and which was intended to pave the recall of the intriguing author to England; but instead of being approved it drew upon him the censure of politicians, and was made a charge of indirect accusation against James and his unfortunate son. Though he left his wife lady Alice and four daughters in England, yet he afterwards, by a dispensation from the pope, married Elizabeth, daughter of sir Robert Southwell, a young lady who had accompanied him in his exile in the habit of a page, and who atoned for the follies and the immodest conduct of her youth, by the exemplary deportment of a respectable matron. By her he had a son, Charles, who called himself earl of Warwick, and four daughters.

DUDLEY, Thomas, governor of Massachusetts, was a native of Northampton, England, and born in 1574. He came to Massachusetts in 1630, as deputy governor, and in the years 1634, 1640, and 1645, held the seat of the chief magistrate. He unhappily, like many of his cotemporaries, indulged a spirit of persecution toward such as were deemed heretics. His life was, in other respects, highly exemplary, and useful to the colony. He died at Roxbury in 1653.

DUDLEY, Joseph, governor of Massachusetts, and a son of the preceding, was born in 1647, and educated at Harvard college. In 1682 he visited England as an agent for Massachusetts, and in 1686 was appointed president of that province and of New-Hampshire. He had however scarcely entered on the exercise of the office before he was superseded by Andross. Visiting England again in 1689, he soon after returned with an appointment to the office of chief justice of New-York; after occupying that station three years, he again crossed the Atlantic, and for eight years held the office of lieutenant-governor of the Isle of Wight. Being appointed by queen Anne governor of Massachusetts in 1702, he returned to Boston in June of that year, and continued to govern the province till November, 1715. After having lived to the advanced age of seventy-two years, an ornament to his country by his superior talents, learning, and piety, he died at Roxbury, April 2d, 1720.

DUDLEY, Paul, F.R.S. chief justice of Massachusetts, and a son of the preceding, was born at Roxbury, in 1673, and finished his education at Harvard College in 1690. After some years attention to law in the province, he visited England to complete his studies at the temple. In 1702, being appointed attorney general, he returned to Massachusetts, and employed himself in the duties of that office till 1718, when he was advanced to a seat on the bench of the supreme Court, and some time afterwards, to the station of chief justice. His fine talents, extensive knowledge, integrity, and piety, procured him the high respect of the people. He was a friend to literature and religion, and left a bequest to Harvard college for the purpose of establishing a yearly lecture to be delivered at that institution in defence of Christianity. He died at Roxbury in 1751.

DUFFET, Thomas, from the profession of a milliner, rose to the rank of a dramatic writer. He travestied Dryden, Shadwell, and Settle, but his plays, which for a while commanded the public attention, have long since been forgotten. His mock tempest, Psyche, Emperors of Morocco, are mentioned, but they lived for a day. He flourished in the 17th century, but the time of his death is not mentioned.

DUFRESNE, Abraham Alexis Quinault, a French actor of eminence. The noblest characters of the theatre were exhibited by him with great success, but it is remarkable that in private life, he could scarce forget the authority which he exercised as a theatrical monarch. He died 1767, aged 72.

DUFRESNOY, Charles Alphonse, a native of Paris, who acquired some eminence as a painter, and as a poet. He died of a paralytic stroke, 1665, aged 54.

DUFRESNY, Charles Riviere, a native of Paris, called grandson of Henry IV. from his great resemblance to that monarch. He was employed about the court, in laying out the garden and pleasure grounds, and when dismissed he became a dramatic writer. His works were published in six volumes, 12mo. He died very poor, 1724, aged 86.

DUGARD, William, son of a clergyman, was born at Bromsgrove, Worcestershire, 1606, and educated at Worcester school, and Sydney college, Cambridge. About 1631 he was appointed master of Stamford school, and in 1637 master of Colchester school, and 1644 master of Merchant tailors', London. He was displaced for assisting in the printing of Salmasius's defence, and was imprisoned in Newgate, and his wife and children reduced to poverty, 1650. Upon his release he opened a private school, the same year, and the following September was reinstated at Merchant tailors'. In 1662, however, he was ejected for the violation of some of the rules, and opened a school in Coleman-street, where he had 193 scholars. He was a man of great learning, and much and deservedly esteemed as a teacher. He died 1682. His "Lexicon Græci Testamenti" has been improved and edited by Bowyer. He wrote besides a compendium of rhetoric, a Greek grammar, a selection of Lucian's dialogues, &c.

DUGDALE, Sir William, an eminent historian and antiquary, born at Shustoke, near Coleshill, Warwickshire, 12th Sept. 1605. He was educated at Coventry grammar-school, and instructed by his father in civil law and history. In 1623 he married at his father's request, and two years after settled at Blythe-hall, near Coleshill, on an estate which he purchased. He devoted himself deeply to the study of antiquities, and in 1635 he came to London, and by the influence of his friends Hatton and Spelman, he procured an appointment in the Heralds' office. In this favourite retreat he had the means of improving his collections, and by the encouragement of Sir Christopher Hatton he was employed in taking draughts of the most celebrated of the English cathedrals, which were afterwards deposited in the library of his friends. He was with Charles at the battle of Edge-hill, and at the siege of Oxford, where he was in 1642, made M. A. Upon the reduction of Oxford, he returned to London, and after compounding for his estate he applied himself laboriously with his friend Dodsworth in completing their collection from the records of the Tower, and other places. Of his Monasticon Anglicanum the first volume appeared in folio, 1655, the second 1661, and the third 1673, a curious collection of all the foundation charters of the dissolved monasteries. His antiquities of Warwickshire were published in 1656, after the laborious researches of 20 years, of which valuable compilation a second edition appeared in 1730, by Dr. Thomas. His history of St. Paul's cathedral was published in 1658, and it was afterwards greatly improved and edited by Dr. Maynard. At the restoration, he was made norroy king at arms, and in 1677 created garter, and knighted by the king. He died at Blythe-hall, of a cold, 10th Feb. 1686, in his 81st year, and was buried in Shustoke church, where he had erected a tablet of white marble. With his wife, who died 18th Dec. 1681, aged 75, he lived 59 years, and by her he had several children. One of his daughters married Ashmole of antiquarian memory, his sons all died young except John, who was Windsor herald, and norroy king at arms, and was knighted, and died Aug. 31st, 1690. Besides the works already mentioned, Sir William wrote the history of draining and embanking fens and marshes, &c. republished 1772—Spelman's councils from 1066 to 1531—Spelman's glossarium archæologicum, &c.—origines juridicales, &c.—the baronage of England, three vols. fol. which, though the labour of 30 years, is not without inaccuracies—a short view of the late troubles in England, &c.—the ancient usage of bearing arms, &c.—a perfect copy of the summons of nobility to the great councils, &c. Many of his manuscript collections, to the number of 43 vols. in folio, he gave to the university of Oxford, where they are now preserved, besides several books to the Heralds' office, London.

DUGOMIER, N. a French general, born at Martinico. In the revolution war he was appointed commander in Italy, and was afterwards successful in retaking Toulon from the English. He next was employed against the Spaniards, and defeated them in various encounters; but he was killed 17th Nov. 1794, at the battle of St. Sebastian. His name was inscribed in the Pantheon.

DUGUAT-TROUIN, René, a celebrated French admiral, born at St. Maloes, 10th June, 1673. He early distinguished himself by his intrepidity and perseverance, and in various encounters with the English and the Dutch he came off victorious. In 1711 he took Rio Janeiro from the Portuguese, and every where in the Indies, and also in the Mediterranean against the corsairs, he displayed the greatest skill united with the most consummate wisdom. This brave man, honoured by the king, and respected by the nation, died at Paris, 27th Sept. 1736. His memoirs appeared at Paris, in 4to. by de la Garde.

DUGUET, James Joseph, a French writer, born 1649. He was a priest of the oratory, and went to Brussels to his friend Arnauld, but returned to Paris, where he led a very retired life, and died 1733. He was a man of great learning, and uncommon sweetness of manners, but his firm opposition to the bull unigenitus, exposed him to much obloquy and trouble. He wrote nearly 20 works in French, on theological subjects, in a style clear, pleasing, and perspicuous.

DUHALDE, John Baptist, a French Jesuit, born at Paris. His historical and geographical description of the empire of China, and Chinese Tartary, in 4 vols. fol. was compiled from the records of French missionaries, a work of great merit. He wrote besides Latin poems—essays—letters—&c. and died at Paris, 1743, aged 69.

DUHAMEL, John Baptist, a French ecclesiastic, born at Vire, 1624, and eminent as a philosopher and a man of science. He published astronomia physica—de meteoris et fossilibus—de mente humanâ—de corpore animato—de consensu veteris et novæ philosophiæ—and other learned works, and died 6th August, 1706, aged 82.

DUHAMEL DU MONCEAU, Henry Lewis, a learned Frenchman, who devoted himself to the improvement of agriculture and commerce, of the marine and of mechanical arts. He published various ingenious works, and died universally respected for his abilities and patriotic exertions, 23d Aug. 1782, aged 82.

DUHAN, Lawrence, a professor of philosophy for 38 years at the college du Plessis. He died canon of Verdun, 1730, aged 70. He left a book "philosophus in utramque partem," of great use in scholastic subtleties.

DUIGENAN, Patrick, an Irish civilian, was born in 1735. His parentage was humble, and he was solely the creator of his own fortune. From being a sizar in the college of Dublin, he rose to the degree of doctor of laws, was made advocate-general, a judge of the prerogative court, vicar general of Armagh, and a privy counsellor. In the Irish parliament he zealously supported the union; and in that of Great Britain he as strenuously opposed the claims of the Romanists to political power. He died April 10th, 1816. Dr. Duigenan published—1. Lachrymæ Academicæ, 8vo. 2. An Address to the Nobility and Gentry of Ireland, 8vo., and some other tracts on political subjects.

W. B.

DULLIUS, Nepos, the first Roman who obtained a naval victory over Carthage. A column was erected to his honour, B. C. 260.

DUISBURG, Peter de, a native of Duisburg, in the dutchy of Cleves, in the 16th century, author of a chronicle of Prussia from 1226 to 1325. It contains many valuable particulars.

DUJARDIN, Charles, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam. He died at Venice, 1674, aged 34. He was the able disciple of Bergham, and excelled in the delineation of markets, robbers, mountebanks, and landscapes. His productions are greatly esteemed. About 50 of his engravings in aqua fortis are preserved.

DUKE, Richard, a poet, educated at Westminster, and made fellow of Trinity college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees of M.A. 1683. He was the friend of Otway, and of the poetical wits of the times, and was for some time tutor to the duke of Richmond. His poetry is not very respectable. He wrote a poem on the marriage of Anne and the duke of Denmark. He was made chaplain to the king, prebendary of Gloucester, and obtained the rich living of Witney, Oxfordshire, where he was found dead in his bed, after returning the preceding evening from an entertainment, 10th Feb. 1711. He published a volume of sermons and another of poems.

DULAU, John Marie, a native of Perigueux, who became archbishop of Arles, and was in the states general of 1789. Though he did not venture, through timidity, to speak in favour of moderation, yet he wrote with spirit and ability against the banishment of the priests. He was arrested by the suspicious jacobins, and was one of those wretched victims sacrificed in the prison of the Carmes, in Sept. 1792.

DULAURENT, N. a native of Artois, who employed his great abilities on subjects of licentiousness. The best known of his immoral works, is his Compere Matthieu, 3 vols. This worthless ecclesiastic, who proved so great an enemy to religion and morality, died about the end of the last century.

DOLLART, Herman, a painter and poet of Rotterdam, the disciple of Rembrandt. He was of a weak constitution, and refused to become one of the magistrates of Rotterdam. He so successfully imitated his master, that their pieces are frequently mistaken one for the other. He was well skilled in music. He died 1634, aged 48.

DUMAS, Lewis, a native of Nismes, natural son of Montcalm, lord of Candiac. Though bred to the law, he was eminent as a mathematician, and invented the bureau typographique, to teach children reading and writing mechanically, and also another instrument for musical instruction. He wrote an history of Mary queen of Scots, and died 1741, aged 68.

DUMAS, Charles Louis, a French anatomist, was born in 1765. He became a professor at Montpellier in 1795, and died there in 1814. His works are—1. An Inaugural Dissertation on Life. 2. A Treatise on Myology, 4to. 3. Principles of Physiology, 4 vols. 8vo. 4. A Physiological Sketch on the Transformation of the Organs of the Human Body.—W. B.

DUMÉE, Joan, a learned lady, born at Paris. She married very young, and at the age of 17, lost her husband, who fell in Germany, at the head of his company. She devoted herself with unusual application to astronomy, and published at Paris, in 1680, "discourses of Copernicus on the mobility of the earth," 4to. in which she displays great knowledge and extensive erudition.

DUMESNIL, N. a professor of rhetoric at Paris, author of Latin synonymys. He died at Valogne 1802, aged 82.

DUMMER, Jeremiah, a native of Boston, Massachusetts, and a graduate at Harvard college in 1699, early rendered himself conspicuous by an extraordinary brilliancy of genius, and progress of knowledge. Designing to devote himself to the ministry, he entered the university of Leyden, and obtained by his superior learning, the applause of the celebrated Witsius, professor in that seminary. He afterwards abandoned the ministry, and became a civilian. He went to England, and was in 1710 appointed agent for Massachusetts. He engaged in the service of the party then in power, and received several important employments from lord Bolingbroke, but lost his hopes by the change of the administration at the death of the Queen, and unhappily by his intimacy with that profligate nobleman, made shipwreck also of his religious principles and morals. He sent forth religious and political publications, which bore the marks of an extraordinary mind, and have passed through several editions. He died in 1739, at Plastow. ☞ L.

DUMMER, William, lieutenant governor of Massachusetts, and a native of that province, received his commission in 1716. After the departure of governor Shute in 1723, he was the first magistrate till the arrival of Burnet, and afterwards during the interval between his death and the arrival of his successor, and discharged the duties of the station with great integrity and skill. The most important event of his administration was the defeat of the Norridgewock Indians in 1724. He died in 1761. ☞ L.

DUMONT, John, baron of Carlscroon, historiographer to the emperor, fled from France to Holland, upon the revocation of the edict of Nantes. He wrote "des memoires politiques, &c." 4 vols. 12mo. a useful performance, which contains every fact of importance from the peace of Munster to the year 1676—travels in France, Italy, &c. 4 vols. 12mo.—universal diplomatic body, &c. 8 vols. fol.—Historical letters, &c. He died about 1726, at a great age.

DUMONT, George, a native of Paris, secretary to the French embassy at Petersburg. He was author of History of the commerce of English colonies—present state of English commerce—treatise on the circulation of credit, &c. and died 1788, aged 63.

DUMONT, N. a French painter, surnamed the Roman. He died at Paris, 1781, very old. His pieces possess merit.

DUMOURIER, Anthony Francis Duperier, a native of Paris, eminent as a commissary in the French armies. He was author of Richardet, a poem, 2 vols.—some comedies translated from the Italian, Spanish, and English,—an opera, &c. He died 1767, aged 60.

DUN, David Erskine, lord, born at Dun, and educated at St. Andrews and Paris, where he studied at law. He was called to the bar 1696, and opposed the Scottish union, but was a benefactor to the persecuted episcopal clergy. He was called to the bench 1711, and took the name of Dun. He died at Dun 1755, five years after he had retired from the court of justiciary, aged 85. His "advices," 12mo. is an excellent performance.

DUNBAR, William, an eminent poet of Scotland, born 1465, at Salton, on the south of East Lothian. He was originally poor, and after travelling as a novice of the Franciscan order, he returned home in his 25th year. His "thistle and the rose" was written on the marriage of James IV. of Scotland, with Margaret, daughter of Henry VII. but whilst he expected ecclesiastical preferment for the offering of his poetry, he unfortunately was disappointed; for the great listen with delight to the flattering compliments of the learned, but seldom reward merit. He wrote besides, the golden terge—the freirs of Berwick—the twa marrit women—and the wedo. His poetry is commended by Warton, as next in rank to Chaucer's and Lydgate's, and Pinkerton, with national partiality, says, that he surpasses the morals and satires of Langland, Chaucer's humour and knowledge of life, Gower's allegory, and the description of Lydgate. His works were published with learned notes by sir David Dalrymple. He died about 1580.

DUNCAN, Mark, a Scotch physician, professor of philosophy, and principal of the Calvinists' college at Saumur. He was invited by James I. to settle near his person, which he declined, and he died 1640 at Saumur, where he had married. He wrote some philosophical works, and a treatise against the possession of the Ursuline nuns of London, which excited some public resentment against him.

DUNCAN, Daniel, an eminent physician, born at Montauban, in Languedoc, 1649, of a family of Scottish origin. The loss of his parents while in his cradle was compensated by the paternal attention of his mother's brother, Daniel Paul, a learned counsellor of Toulouse, who had him educated at Puy Laurens, and at Montpellier, where, under the care of Dr. Charles Babelrac, he studied eight years, and when 24 he took his degree of M.D. From Montpellier he came to Paris, where he resided seven years, and published his "explication nouvelle et mechanique des actions animales, 1678," which was well received, and the following year he visited London, for business, as well as to make inquiries into the effects of the plague of 1665. After a residence of two years he was recalled to Paris, on account of the declining health of his great friend and patron, Colbert. About this time he published his "chymie naturelle, ou explication de la nourriture de l'animal," which, when completed in three parts, was read with universal applause. On the death of Colbert he left Paris, 1683. and retired to Montauban, with the intention of selling his property and settling in London. Here, however, he continued till the persecution against the protestants forced him for refuge to Geneva, and afterwards to Berne, where he obtained the professorship of anatomy. After residing at Berne eight or nine years, he went to attend the princess of the landgrave of Hesse Cassel, where, for three years, he was treated with the respect due to his merit. At this time he wrote his popular treatise on the abuse of hot liquors, especially tea, coffee, and chocolate, which had lately been introduced into Germany, and he published it afterwards at Rotterdam, 1705, at the request of Dr. Boerhaave. His character and the benevolence with which he treated the various protestant emigrants whom persecution drove out of France, recommended him strongly to the king of Prussia, by whom he was honourably invited to Berlin, where, though physician to the household, he staid a little time and removed to the Hague. For 12 years he resided at the Hague, and finally settled in London in 1714. He died in London, April 30th, 1735, aged 86. This amiable man, so universally respected for his humanity and benevolence, wrote, besides the books already mentioned, "histoire de l'animal, &c." and left besides several manuscripts on medical subjects. His conversation, "says his biographer," was easy, cheerful, and interesting, and free from all taint of party scandal or idle raillery; this made his company desired by all who had a capacity to know its value, and he afforded a striking instance that religion must naturally gain strength from the successful study of nature. It is remarkable that for three generations before him medicine found most respectable professors in his family.

DUNCAN, William, a learned writer, professor of philosophy in the Marischal college of Aberdeen. He was born at Aberdeen in July, 1717, and was educated there under the celebrated Dr. Blackwell. He came to London in 1739, and there chiefly employed himself in writing for the booksellers. His works appeared generally without his name. He translated some books from the French, and was concerned in that translation of Horace known under the name of Watson. He was the coadjutor of Dr. Johnson, Campbell, and For-dyce, in the Preceptor which Dodsley published, and he wrote for his share the logical part. He also translated several of Cicero's orations, and likewise Cæsar's commentaries, which appeared in 1752, folio, with fine cuts. In 1753 he removed to Aberdeen, where he had been the preceding year appointed professor of philosophy. He died a bachelor May 1st, 1760, aged 43. Though a man of no superior genius, he possessed taste, judgment, and good sense, and his abilities were rather solid than shining. He was universally beloved in private life.

DUNCAN, Adam lord, a well-known English admiral, born at Dundee, of a respectable family. As a younger son he was bred to the sea, and in 1761, was made post captain. He served under Keppel as his captain, and in 1787 was made rear-admiral, in 1793 vice-admiral, and in 1795 admiral of the blue. His station during the late war was in the north sea, to block up the Texel, but in his temporary absence during the mutiny of the fleet, the Dutch escaped from their ports, and were soon brought to an engagement by the English admiral, near Camperdown, within five miles of their own shores. On this celebrated day, 11th October, 1797, the Dutch admiral De Winter struck with eight ships to the superior valour of the English, and in reward for his conduct Duncan was created, the 21st of the same month, viscount Duncan of Camperdown, baron Duncan of Lundie, Perthshire, with a pension of 2000*l.* on himself and his two successors in the peerage. Lord Duncan, whose character in private life as a man and as a Christian, was equal to his bravery as a seaman, died 1804. He was in stature a comely person, full six feet three inches tall, so that he observed jocosely to the Dutch admiral, who was likewise a man of tall stature, I wonder how you and I have escaped the balls in this hot battle. During the mutiny of his fleet the admiral addressed the crew of his ship, the Veteran, with a tone of affection and of firmness, and in a speech so sensible and so judicious, as to call forth the admiration even of his rebellious crew.

DUNCOMBE, William, an English writer, born at Stock, Hertfordshire. In 1726 he he married the only sister of John Hughes, whose poems he edited in two vols. 12mo. 1735, and the miscellanies of the other brother Jabez, in one vol. 1737. He translated Racine's Athalie, which met with applause, and afterwards edited the works of Mr. Needler, and he produced his L. J.

Brutus on the boards of Drury-lane, and it was published in 1735 and 1747. He besides edited some of Herring's sermons, and published Horace in English verse by several hands, 1757. He died 26th Feb. 1769, aged 80.

DUNCOMBE, John, son of the preceding, was born in 1730. He was educated at private schools at Romford and Felsted, where he displayed great regularity, uncommon application, and superior talents. At the age of 16 he was admitted at Benet's college, Cambridge, at the recommendation of archbishop Herring, his father's friend. In 1750 he was chosen fellow of his college, and three years after took orders, and became assistant preacher at St. Anne's, Soho, where his eloquence as an orator, and his amiable manners in private life, gained him the respect of a populous neighbourhood. In 1757 the primate Herring gave him the livings of St. Andrew and St. Mary Bredman, Canterbury, but the death of that excellent patron, two months after, cut off all hopes of further and more valuable preferment. He married in 1763 the daughter of Mr. Highmore, the painter, with whom he enjoyed 23 years of uninterrupted domestic happiness. In 1766 Secker appointed him one of the six Canterbury preachers, and the next primate, Cornwallis, presented him in 1773 to the living of Herne, six miles from Canterbury. He was also master of Harbledown and St. John's hospitals, which, though places of trust and not emolument, enabled him to display his regard for the poor, and his humane endeavours to relieve their necessities. He was also an active magistrate, and in this office he was the means of encouraging virtue and of checking vice. He was attacked by a paralytic stroke, 21st June, 1785, from which he never recovered, and died on the 18th of the following January. He left only one daughter. His works are chiefly fugitive pieces, published in Dodsley's collection and in periodical magazines, besides the Seminead, and a poem on the death of Frederick prince of Wales. He also greatly assisted his father in his translation of Horace, and published the seventh satire of the second book in 1752, imitated, and inscribed to R. Owen, Cambridge.

DUNDAS, Sir David, general in the British army, was born near Edinburgh about the year 1735. He entered the army in 1752, and served in Germany in 1759, and in Cuba in 1762. He obtained the rank of colonel in 1781, and of major-general in 1790. He served at Toulon in 1793, and in Germany in 1794, where he for some time had the chief command of the British forces. He became quarter-master-general of the British army in 1797, and served that year with great reputation as a general officer in Holland. In 1803 he resigned his quarter-master-generalship, and was put on the staff as second in command under the duke of York, and in 1809 he became commander-in-chief of the forces, which rank he held two years. He about the same time became privy counsellor. His death took place February 18th, 1820. He published "principles of military movements, chiefly applicable to infantry," in 1788, and in 1792 "rules and regulations for the formations, field exercises, and movements of his majesty's forces."

L.

DUNDAS, Henry, viscount Melville, son of lord Arniston, was born in 1740, and educated at the university of Edinburgh. In 1763 he was admitted a member of the faculty of advocates, in 1773 appointed solicitor-general, in 1775 lord-advocate, and in 1777 joint keeper of the signet for Scotland. In 1782 he was sworn one of the privy council, and made treasurer of the navy; but when the coalition administration came into power he lost his places. This, however, was but for a short time; and when that party fell he resumed his station at the navy-board, on which he relinquished that of lord-advocate. The board of control for East India affairs being established, Mr. Dundas was appointed first president; and in 1791 he became secretary of state for the home department, which he exchanged for that of the war office in 1794. He continued in active employment till 1801, when he resigned his places, and was created viscount Melville. On the return of Mr. Pitt to power, his lordship was made first lord of the admiralty, and continued so till he was impeached, in 1805, of high crimes and misdemeanors in his former situation as treasurer of the navy. Of all the charges brought against him, however, he was acquitted, and afterwards resumed his seat in the privy council, though he never returned to public business. He died in Scotland, May 27, 1811, being succeeded by his son, the present lord Melville.

W. B.

DUNGAL, a monk of St. Dennis in the ninth century, supposed to be an Irishman. He was consulted by Charlemagne with respect to the two eclipses of the sun which happened 810, and his answer is preserved in the 10th vol. 4to. of d'Acheri's spicilegium. A tract also by him against the worship of images, may be found in the Bibliotheca patrum, 1608, 8vo.

DUNLOP, William, M.A. was born 1692, at Glasgow, where his father was principal of the university. He applied himself for about two years to the study of the law at Utrecht, but abandoned the plan at the representation of Mr. Wishart, and became, by means of his friend, regius professor of divinity and church history at Edinburgh, 1716. He distinguished himself much as a preacher, and died of a dropsy 1720, aged 28. He published two volumes of sermons 12mo. and an essay on confessions of faith.

DUNLOP, Alexander, M.A. brother to the above, was born in 1684, in America, where his father was in exile. He came over at the revolution, and was in 1720 appointed professor of Greek in Glasgow university. He published in 1736, a Greek grammar, which still maintains its superiority in the Scotch university, and died at Glasgow, 1742, aged 58.

DUNMORE, John Murray, earl of, was appointed governor of New-York in December, 1763, and arrived in the colony in October following. He was afterwards governor of Virginia, and the last who held that office under the royal authority. His violent conduct in that colony inflamed the public mind, and hastened the crisis of the revolution. Early in 1775 he left the palace, and retired on board the Fowey man of war, in which he remained some time in the vicinity, and committed considerable depredations upon the colonists. In 1786 he was appointed governor of Bermuda. He married in 1759 lady Charlotte Steward, daughter of the earl of Galloway, who was much beloved by the Virginians. He died at Ramsgate, England, in 1809.  L.

DUNN, Samuel, an English mathematician, born at Crediton, Devonshire, where he kept a school for some years, and where he founded a mathematical school. He afterwards removed to Chelsea, where he kept school, and was appointed mathematical examiner of those officers who entered into the East India company's service. He died 1792, author of several mathematical treatises—an atlas—treatises on book-keeping, &c.

DUNNING, John, lord Ashburton, was born 18th October, 1731, at Ashburton, in Devonshire. He rose by his merit at the bar, and greatly distinguished himself in parliament. He was raised to the peerage in 1782, and made chancellor of the dutchy of Lancaster, and recorder of Bristol. He died 18th August, 1783, leaving only one son.

DUNOD DE CHARNAGE, Francis Ignatius, the learned professor of law at Besancon, his native town, died there 1751. He wrote "memoirs of the court of Bourgogne," three vols. 4to.—history of the church &c. of Besancon, two vols. 4to.—treatise of descriptions, &c. His son Joseph left some notes on his father's works. Peter, a Jesuit, of the same family, published a curious work, called the discovery of the town of Antre in Franche Comté.

DUNOIS, John, count of Orleans and Longueville, was the natural son of Lewis Duke of Orleans, and born 23d November, 1407. He distinguished himself in arms, in the defeat of the earls of Warwick and Suffolk, and in the defence of Orleans, till it was relieved by Joan of Acre. He opposed the English, and took from them Blaie, Bourdeaux, Bayonne, &c. He was rewarded for his services by Charles VII. who called him the restorer of his country, and gave him large grants of lands, and the office of grand chamberlain of France. This great hero, so respectable also for the virtues of private life, died 24th November, 1468, aged 71.

DUNS, John, commonly called Duns Scotus, a celebrated theologian of the Franciscan order, born at Dunstons, Northumberland. He became a scholar at Oxton, Oxford, and then went over to France, where his abilities, and his acuteness in disputation, procured him the appellation of the subtle doctor. He opposed the doctrines of Thomas Aquinas, hence his followers were called Scotists, and his opponents Thomists. He afterwards went to Cologne, where he died 1308. It has been said by Paul Jovius that he was attacked by an apoplexy, and buried as dead, and that upon his recovery, he languished in a most miserable manner in his coffin till he expired. His works were printed at Lyons 1639, 10 vols. folio, and are now little regarded.

DUNSTAN, St. archbishop of Canterbury, was born in 924. He embraced the ecclesiastical life, and was made by Edgar, bishop of Worcester, and afterwards in 959 translated to Canterbury. He was also abbot of Glastonbury. He is well known as a man of intrigue, and of great spiritual power, which he showed with unusual obstinacy in the English court especially under Edmund. The pope knowing his influence, made him his legate. He died 988.

DUNSTER, Henry, first president of Harvard college, and a native of England, came to New-England in 1640, and in August of that year entered on the duties of his office, and continued to discharge them with great reputation for learning, piety, and wisdom, till October 1654, when he resigned in consequence of having changed his views respecting baptism. He was eminently skilled in Hebrew, and contributed much to improve the New-England version of Psalms, which was intrusted to his revision. He died in 1659.

DUNTON, John, a bookseller, born at Graffham, Huntingdonshire, 14th May 1659. Upon failing in his business, bookseller, after twenty years' success, he began author, and in 1701, was employed in the Post angel paper. He afterwards began the Athenian Mercury, which was a plan to answer questions, monthly proposed y unknown persons, and which was re-published by Bell, under the name of the Athenian Oracle, 4 vols. 8vo. In 1710, he publis' d his Athenianism, containing 600 treatis , in prose and verse, on all subjects. Though prolix and sometimes obscure as a writer, he yet possesses merit as a rist, and some of his pieces will be read with pleasure. He also wrote "Dun-ton's life and errors." He died about 1725.

DU PATY, advocate general, afterwards preside t of the parliament at Bourdeaux, was b n at Rochelle, and died at Paris 17' 3, advanced in life. He disting- rshed . lf as an eloquent and pow- orat. end as an upright magistrate. Historical reflections on penal laws, a very valuable work. He wrote academical letters, and discourses on f, two vols. 8vo. 1788. He affected to imitate Diderot, and was deficient in taste. Voltaire with sarcastic self-conse- quence spoke with indifference of his abilities.

DUPERRAY, Michael, a French lawyer, who died at Paris 1730, aged 90. He wrote some works chiefly on ecclesiastical subjects, &c.

DUPHOT, N. a French general, who after serving with distinction in Italy, was sent as ambassador to the pope. He was there assassinated in 1797, in a popular tumult, and though the pope could not prevent, and was not privy to the commotion, the death of the ambassador was made a pretext by he French for seizing the Ecclesiastical States.

DUPIN, Lewis Ellis, a learned and well-known critic, was born at Paris, 17th June, 1657. He early displayed great partiality for literature, and embraced the ecclesiastical profession, and became doctor of the Sorbonne, 1684. He devoted himself to the composition of his great work called "Bibliothèque universelle des auteurs ecclesiastiques," the first volume of which appeared 1686. The boldness, however, with which he spoke of various writers, gave offence to the critics, and the author was obliged by Harlay, archbishop of Paris, to retract some of his opinions, and to suppress the work in 1693, with the privilege of continuing it under the altered title of Bibliothèque nouvelle. Besides this great work, which was brought down in several volumes to the end of the 16th century, Dupin wrote others, the chief of which are—prolegomena to the Bible,—notes on the Psalms and Pentateuch,—a profane history—a treatise of power, ecclesiastical and temporal,—and method of studying divinity, &c. He was professor of the Royal college, from which he was removed in the famous cas de conscience, but afterwards restored. He died at Paris 1719, aged 62.

He was a man of extensive erudition, and of indefatigable application. His ecclesiastical bibliothèque, so valuable for the analytical account of authors and of their writings, which it accurately gives, has been translated into English with notes, &c. He corresponded with Wake, the English primate, about the union, of the two churches.

DUPLANIL, J. D. a French physician, who translated various works into French from the English, among which was Buchan's domestic medicine. He died at Paris, 1802.

DUPLEIX, Scipio, was born at Condom, 1566, and noticed by queen Margaret, who brought him to Paris in 1605, and made him master of requests, and afterwards historiographer of France. In his old age, which he reached without sickness or infirmity, he wrote a book on the liberties of the Gallican church, which he presented to chancellor Seguier, for the liberty of printing, but the courtier with unparalleled audacity threw it into the fire, which so shocked the venerable author, that he returned to Condom, and died soon after, of deep vexation, 1661, aged 92. His works are memoirs of the Gauls, 1650, folio, a book of great value,—history of France in six vols. folio, not very accurate or impartial—an account of the flatteries heaped on Richelieu, and the violent reflections thrown on the deceased Margaret, now no longer the patroness of the author,—Roman history, three vols. folio, an insipid performance,—a course of philosophy, three vols. 12mo.—natural curiosity, &c. 8vo. insignificant and often licentious,—the liberty of the French language against Vaugelas, &c.

DUPLEIX, Joseph, a French merchant, appointed in 1730, director of Chandernagore in the East Indies, a colony which, by his wisdom and firmness, he raised from poverty and distress to consequence and opulence. He inspired his countrymen with the spirit of commerce and enterprise, and established mercantile connexions with the Red Sea, the Maldives, Goa, the Manillas, &c. He was appointed governor of Pondicherry in 1742, and defended the place with uncommon bravery in 1748, for forty-two days against the attack of two English admirals. For these services he was rewarded by the French king with the red riband, and the title of marquis, and by the great Mogul with the title of nabob. He was recalled in 1753, during the war which broke out in the East between the English and the French, in the support of two rivals for the nabobship of Arcot, and he was so hurt at the idea of being called away from the exercise of sovereign power to a private station, and of soliciting the French East India company for the payment of his arrears, that he fell under a dejection of spirits, and died soon after. His conduct towards la Bourdonnaye, his rival in the East, is the most exceptionable part of his character. Jealousy of power prompted him to use severe measures against him, in 1747, and afterwards Bourdonnaye had influence enough to procure the recall of his prosperous adversary.

DUPORT, James, a learned divine educated at Cambridge, where he became professor of Greek, and master of Magdalen college. He was raised to the deanery of Peterborough, and died 1680. His great erudition as a classical scholar is evinced in his learned works. He wrote a Greek version of the Psalms,—gnomologia Homericum duplici parallelismo, Cambridge, 1660—poetica stromata, 1676, 8vo.—and lectures published with Nedham's Theophrastus's characters, 1712.

DUPORT, Francis Mathurin, counsellor of the parliament of Paris, distinguished himself in the revolution as a violent enemy to the measures of the court. His connexion with Orleans at last proved fatal to him, and he suffered under the guillotine, 20th April, 1794, aged 46.

DUPPA, Brian, a learned prelate born 1589, at Lewisham, Kent, and educated at Westminster, and Christ-church, Oxford. In 1612, he was elected fellow of All-souls, and after having travelled in France and Spain, he took his degree of D.D. in 1625, and was in 1629, by the interest of the earl of Dorset, made dean of Christ-church. In 1638, he became tutor to the prince Charles, and to his brother James, and about that time was raised to the see of Chichester. In 1641, he was translated to Salisbury, but he received little benefit from it, and on the suppression of episcopacy he attended his master, especially in the Isle of Wight, and assisted him, it is said, in the composition of the Eikon Basilike. He afterwards lived in retirement at Richmond, till the restoration, when he was made bishop of Winchester, and lord almoner. He died in 1662, aged 73, at Richmond in Surrey, a place which he loved, and where he erected and endowed an alms-house. A few hours before he expired, Charles II. visited this venerable prelate, and kneeling by his bed-side implored his blessing, which the dying man, placing one hand on the king's head, and raising the other to heaven, gave him with great fervour and piety. He was buried in Westminster abbey. He left many charitable legacies to those places, or societies, with which either by birth, office, or predilection, he had been connected. He wrote some things chiefly on devotional subjects, as "a guide for the penitent," "the soul's soliloquies, &c."

DUPRAT, Anthony, an eminent French statesman. He was first at the bar, and rose gradually to the first presidency of the parliament of Paris, 1507, and the chancellorship of France, 1515. He was tutor to Francis I. when count of Angouleme, and by checking his criminal passion for the wife of Lewis XII. he gained his confidence and patronage. He advised his master, whose necessities were great, to raise money by selling the offices of judicature, and by his suggestions the chamber called Tournelle was established, which augmented the taxes and improved the royal revenue by the oppression of the poor. By the advice of his favourite, Francis also abolished the pragmatic sanction, and established the concordat, by which, while the king nominated to vacant benefices, the pope received a large annual income from the churches. This step rendered Duprat a favourite at Rome, he became an ecclesiastic, and from the sees of Meaux, Albi, Valence, Die, Gap, and Sens, which he successively filled, he was honoured with the purple 1527. He was afterwards a legate in France, and on the death of Clement VII. it is said that he aspired to the tiara, an ambitious step which the French king ridiculed and by no means promoted. This artful prelate, to whom his ambition and his intrigues raised many enemies, died at his chateau de Nantoillet 9th July, 1535, overwhelmed with remorse, and worn out by diseases. He was a man of the most ambitious and selfish character, whose whole conduct was guided by interest and avarice. To increase his power or enlarge his fortune he scrupled at no sacrifice on either of fame or virtue, and therefore his death was as unlamented as his life had been guilty. He built at the Hotel de Dieu at Paris, a hall which still bears his name, on which the king observed that it should have been much larger, if it would contain all the poor Duprat had made.

DUPRE, DE GUYER, John, a hermit, said to have built with only the assistance of his servant the hermitage of Friberg in Switzerland, in the solid rock, the chimney of which rises 90 feet in height.

DUPRE, Mary, a learned lady of the 17th century, born at Paris, and educated by her uncle des Marets de St. Sorlin in the learned languages, and in rhetoric, versification, and philosophy. She also studied Des Cartes, and was called the Cartesienne. She was intimate with the learned of her time, and her pieces of poetry and also her prose writings were read with great applause.

DUPRE d'AUNAY, Lewis, a native of Paris, member of several learned academies. He died 1758. He wrote letters of the generation of animals,—traité des substances militaires, two vols. 4to—reflections on the transfusion of blood, 12mo. &c.

DUPRE de ST. MAUR, Nicholas Francis, a native of Paris, who died there December the 1st, 1774, aged 80. He was member of the French academy. He translated Milton's Paradise Lost, with Addison's odes, and also Paradise Regained, by a Jesuit, four vols. 12mo. He wrote an essay on the coins of France, 1740, 4to. a valuable work,—inquiries on the value of money, &c.—the table of the duration of human life. He was well informed in the matters of agriculture, economy, and commerce.

DUPUIS, Claude, a French engraver of merit, who died at Paris 1742, aged 57. His brother Gabriel Nicholas was also an eminent engraver, and died 1771, aged 73.

DUQUESNE, Abraham, a native of Normandy, who distinguished himself in the French navy in various fights against the Spaniards, the Dutch, the Genoese, &c. He died at Paris the second February, 1688, aged 78, much and deservedly respected, not less in his private than his public character.

DURAND, William, a native of Provence, eminent as a lawyer, and afterwards raised to a bishopric by the pope. He died at Rome 1296, aged 59, author of a Speculum juris, &c. a work of merit. His nephew was also a bishop, and wrote on general councils.

DURAND, DE ST. POURCAIN, William, a French bishop, called from his powers of argumentation the resolute doctor. He was author of commentaries on the sentences and other works, and died 1332.

DURANDE, N. a physician of eminence at Dijon, who published some interesting tracts on his profession. He died at Dijon, 1799.

DURANT, Gilles, sieur de la Bergerie, advocate in the Parliament of Paris. He was one of the nine appointed by the court to reform the customs of Paris. He possessed great talents for ludicrous poetry, and his verses on the ass that had joined the league, and had fallen during the siege of Paris 1590, are much admired. He wrote other humorous pieces, which equally command the approbation of the public, though some are of a licentious tendency. Some suppose that he was broke on the wheel, 16th of July, 1618, for a libel on the French king, but the sufferer was another person, who with his two brothers endured that savage punishment. Durant's works were printed 1594.

DURANTI, John Stephen, a native of Toulouse, of whose parliament he was advocate-general, and afterwards in 1581 first president. He violently opposed the league, and perished in a tumult which he endeavoured to appease, being shot by a musket-ball 10th of Feb. 1589, and treated with every mark of insult and indignity by the mob. This meritorious martyr had the year before successfully employed his influence to preserve Toulouse from the plague, and he had deserved the affection of his country by his liberality and charity of some institutions which he founded for the education of youth and the relief of indigence. He wrote also a book de ritibus ecclesiæ, printed at Rome 1591, folio.

DURBACH, Anne Louisa, a German poetess, born 1722. From the mean occupation of watching cattle, she raised herself to distinction by the reading of books, and by uncommon application to literature. At 17 she married a wool-comber, but with him and with another afterwards, she was exposed to great poverty, till the age of 40, when her muse celebrated in a triumphal ode the battle of Lowoschutz. This piece was noticed, and recommended to the Prussian monarch, who sent for the poetess to Berlin, and by his patronage placed her above want. Her poems have been published, and possess great merit. She died about 1780.

DURELL, John, a divine of eminence, born 1626 in the island of Jersey, and educated at Merton college, which he left at the beginning of the civil wars, and then passed to Caen, where he took his degree of M.A. He was ordained by the bishop of Galloway, at Paris, 1651, and afterwards invited by the church of Caen to supply the place of the famous Bochart during his absence at the court of Christina of Sweden, an honourable appointment, which however he did not accept. At the restoration he was chaplain to the king, and preferred to a prebend at Salisbury, afterwards at Windsor, and then at Durham. In 1669 he took his degree of D.D. at Oxford, and in 1677 was raised to the deanery of Windsor. For this preferment he was indebted to his abilities as well as to the partiality of Charles, who was well acquainted with his merits, and had known him in Jersey and in France. He died 1683, aged 58, and was buried at Windsor. His writings were chiefly controversial—a vindication of the church of England against schismatics—a view of the government, &c. of the church of England, 4to.—besides a translation of the liturgy into Latin and French.

DURELL, David, a native of Jersey, educated at Pembroke college, Oxford, where he took his master's degree. He afterwards became fellow of Hertford college, of which in 1757 he was made principal. In 1764 he took his degree of D.D. and in 1767 was made prebendary of Canterbury. He served the office of vice chancellor, and died 1775, aged 47. He was author of critical remarks on the books of Job.

Psalms, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles, 4to. —the Hebrew text of the parallel prophecies of Jacob and Moses, relating to the 12 tribes, with a translation and notes, &c. 4to.

DURER, Albert, a celebrated painter and engraver, born at Nuremberg 20th May, 1471, of Hungarian parents. After being well instructed in arithmetic, perspective, and geometry, he began to exhibit some of his pieces before the public, and his three graces were the first performance which fixed the admiration of his country upon him, in 1497. He painted little, therefore his pictures are very scarce, and as highly valued. His Adam and Eve are still preserved in the royal palace of Prague, and also a picture of Christ bearing the cross, an adoration of the wise men, and at Frankfort two pieces of the passion and an assumption of exquisite beauty. In the senators' hall at Nuremberg are also still exhibited with national pride, a portrait of Charlemagne, and of some of the emperors, with the 12 apostles. His engravings are highly admired. Instead of the tedious mode of engraving on copper, he first attempted to work on wood, and his first pieces in that way, were the beheading of John the Baptist, and the presentation of his head to Herod, published in 1510. One of his best pieces is said by Vasari to be a St. Eustachius kneeling before a stag. The merit of Durer was not lost in obscurity, he was esteemed by the great, and the emperor Maximilian not only patronised him, but granted him a pension and a patent of nobility. He died in his native city, 6th April, 1528, and was buried in St. John's church, where his friend Pirkheimer placed an honourable inscription over his remains. Besides his great reputation as an artist, he possessed what is equally valuable, a respectable character in private life. He was cheerful but not licentious in his conversation, the firm friend of virtue and piety, and he never, like some of his fellow artists, employed his talents on any thing that was either obscene or profane. He wrote some books in German, published after his death, on the rules of painting—instituciones geometriæ, &c. His wife, who was beautiful, but is described by some as a Xantippe, sat to him, and from her features he painted the face of the Virgin Mary.

DURET, Lewis, a physician, born at Beaugé-la-Ville in Brescia. He practised with great success at Paris, and was in the household of Charles IX. and Henry III. He was particularly esteemed by this last monarch, who granted him a pension of 400 crowns of gold, with a survivance to his five sons, and in proof of his great esteem was also present at the marriage of his daughter. Duret died 22d January, 1586, aged 59. He was a true follower of Hippocrates, and treated medicine after the manner of the ancients. His best work is a commentary on Hippocrates, published at Paris 1621, folio, after being completed and revised by his son John, who like himself was eminent as a physician. The son died 1629, aged 66.

D'URFEY, Thomas, a facetious English poet. His parents, who were Hugonots, left Rochelle before it was besieged by Lewis XIII. in 1628, and they settled at Exeter, where the poet was born. He applied himself to the law, but the liveliness of his genius, and the volatility of his mind, carried him to the cultivation of poetry, and as he possessed the powers of wit and the keenness of satire, his plays were received on the stage with great applause. His facetiousness and easy manners recommended him to the notice of the great, and Charles II. was often seen with this favourite of the muses, most familiarly leaning on his shoulder, or humming over a song with him. But though popular, his ballads, songs, and plays possessed all the coarseness of wit, licentiousness, and indelicacy which were fashionable in the days of the second Charles, and which better times have happily banished, so that within 30 years after his death, none of his pieces were suffered to appear on the stage. This humorous author, familiarly known by the name of Tom, lived much with the earl of Dorset at Knoles, where there is still preserved a picture of him, taken by stealth, as he was sleeping in his chair after dinner, but in the last part of his life he was haunted by poverty, for, regardless of the morrow he had always squandered the present away. To relieve him from distress, the players very generously, at the solicitation of Addison, came forward to perform "the Plotting sister," for the benefit of the author, who humorously said, he had written more odes than Horace, and four times as many comedies as Terence, and this temporary relief set him above want. He died 26th February, 1722, and was buried in St. James churchyard, Westminster. His age is not exactly known, though it must have been about 70. His sonnets, ballads, &c. are contained in 6 vols. 12mo. and called "Pills to purge melancholy," and they are handsomely recommended by the 29th number of the Guardian, in the 6th number of which work also may be found an humorous account of the author.

DURHAM, James, a Scotch divine, born in West Lothian, 1620, and educated in St. Salvador's college, St. Andrews. At the age of 30, by the persuasion of his friends, he took orders, and became a very popular and eloquent preacher at Glasgow. He died of a consumption, 1658, aged 38. He wrote a commentary on the Revelation —discourse on scandal—sermons on the 33d of Isaiah, and the Song of Solomon, &c.

DURINGER, Melchior, professor of ecclesiastical history at Berne, passed his whole life in celibacy, solitude, and melancholy. He fell from the story of his house, which was unfortunately on fire, and died an hour after, 1st January, 1723, aged 76. The author of physica sacra, printed at Amsterdam, 1732, is much indebted to the labours of Duringer.

DURY or DURÆUS, John, a Scotch divine, laboured earnestly to reconcile the Lutherans and Calvinists, but to little purpose. He began, about 1634, to travel through Europe, engaged in this gigantic undertaking, and after conferring with the divines of England, Germany, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Geneva, and other places, he at last, after 40 years' laborious pursuit, found himself disappointed, and though all commended his spirit and extolled the purity of his intentions, none would resign their opinions and their faith to the decision of their neighbours. It is unknown when he died, but in the last part of his life he was honourably patronised, by Hedwig Sophia, princess of Hesse, who allowed him a comfortable retirement, with a table well furnished, and every convenience. He wrote much in favour of his grand plan, and evinced himself a man of extensive learning, great zeal, becoming piety, but rather fanatical. His letter to Dumoulin, concerning the churches of England, Scotland, and Ireland, under Cromwell, is curious. It is published, London, 1658, 12mo.

DUSART, a painter of Haerlem, disciple of Adrian Ostade. He was chiefly great in the description of taverns and low company. He died 1704, aged 39.

DUSSAULX, John, a native of Chartres, who, after distinguishing himself in the war of Hanover under Richelieu, devoted himself to literary pursuits. At the revolution he became member of the convention, but his conduct was moderate and humane, and he was one of the 73 proscribed deputies who were imprisoned for opposing the measures of their more violent associates. He was afterwards member of the council of ancients, and president of the national institute, and died at Paris, 16th March, 1799, aged 71. He published a translation of Juvenal—de la passion du jeu, 8vo.—éloge de Blanchet—memoire sur les satiriques Latins, &c.

DUVAL, Peter, geographer royal of France, was born at Abbeville. He died at Paris, 1683, aged 65. He studied geography under his learned maternal uncle Sanson, and is the author of some geographical tracts and maps, formerly in great esteem.

DUVAL, Nicholas, a Dutch painter, who died 1732, aged 88. He studied in Italy under Cortona, and was made by William III. director of the academy at the Hague.

DUVAL, Valentine Jamerai, an extraordinary character, born in 1695, at Artonay in Champagne. At the age of 10 he lost his father, who was a poor labourer, but thus destitute, overwhelmed, with his mother and her family, by poverty, he began to hope for better times. He hired himself with a peasant of the village, and even in the employment of keeping the poultry-yard, he drew the attention of his youthful associates, and by his superior agility guided their innocent sports. In the winter of 1709, he travelled towards Lorraine, and in the cold journey he was attacked by the smallpox, under which he must have sunk but for the timely assistance of a shepherd near Monglat, who supplied him with dry bread and water, in a miserable sheep-pen, where the breath of the crowded sheep hastened the termination of his disorder by occasioning a strong and lasting perspiration. Recovered from this dreadful malady he went to Clezantine, a village on the borders of Lorraine, where he continued two years in the service of another shepherd, and then became an attendant on brother Palemon at the hermitage of La Rochette, near Deneuvre. From this peaceful abode he was soon removed to the hermitage of St. Anne, near Luneville, and there employed in the service of four hermits, and in acts of charitable hospitality, he learned to write, and with eagerness devoured the books which his indigent abode afforded. His activity was here employed in the pursuit of game, which he sold and converted to the increase of his books and knowledge, and his accidental finding of a seal belonging to Mr. Forster, an English gentleman resident at Luneville, which he very honourably advertised, procured him new and solid advantages. Forster rewarded his honesty, and assisted him in the purchase of books and of maps, and his library soon increased to 400 volumes. Here, while one day engaged deeply in the study of a map at the foot of a tree, he was found by the attendants of the princess of Lorraine, and the pertinent and very sensible remarks which he made on the inquiries of his illustrious visitors, engaged so much their attention that they promised him their protection, and introduced him to Leopold, duke of Lorraine. The young adventurer quitted the hermitage with tears of gratitude, and soon, under the care of the Jesuits of Pont-a-Mousson, he made himself master of his favourite studies, history, geography, and antiquities. His progress here was astonishing, but while he endeavoured once to cure the impetuous passion of love by hemlock, as he read in St. Jerome, he nearly destroyed himself, and long after felt the terrible effects of this violent remedy. In 1718, he visited Paris in the suite of his patron Leopold, and at his return became his librarian, and also professor of history at Luneville. In this new office Duval distinguished himself greatly; he was attended by several Englishmen, and particularly by Pitt, afterwards earl of Chatham, whose genius and manners he admired, and whose future eminence he prophetically announced. He now found himself raised to comfortable independence, and in the fulness of his heart he showed his gratitude to the hermits of St. Anne his benefactors, by rebuilding and adorning their residence, and enabling them to extend their charities. On the death of Leopold, in 1738, he followed his son Francis, who exchanged Lorraine for Tuscany, but though Florence afforded him many comforts from the salubrity of its climate, and the rich treasures of its libraries, he yet sighed for his native land. Francis, on his marriage with the heiress of Austria, soon gratified his wishes, and when removed to Vienna, he called his respectable attendant near his person, and gave him the care of his collection of medals. In this situation Duval lived respected and beloved, and when in 1751, he was nominated preceptor to the young prince, Joseph, he did not offend his imperial patrons by modestly refusing an office so flattering to vanity. He enjoyed good health from the temperance of his habits, and the hard mode of life to which he had inured himself, and devoted himself to the cultivation of literature, and to the correspondence of his friends, especially of madame de Guttenberg, lady of the bed-chamber to the empress, a woman whose understanding was similar to his own, and whose goodness of heart like his own was displayed in frequent acts of benevolence and charity. In 1752, Duval visited Paris, and was honourably received by the learned, and on his return, passing by Artonay, his native village, he purchased the house which the indigence of his sister had sold, and built on the spot where he was born a neat house, which he appropriated to the residence of the public schoolmaster of the place. This venerable and pious character died third November, 1775, aged 81, displaying in his last moments that resignation and faith which close the life of a good man.

DUVENEKE, Marc Van, an historical painter of Bruges, who died 1729, aged 55. He was the pupil of Carlo Maratti, and painted chiefly for churches, and many of his pieces are still preserved at Bruges.

DWIGHT, Timothy, D.D. LL.D. president of Yale college, was born at Northampton, Massachusetts, in 1752. His father, Timothy Dwight, was a gentleman of liberal education, and of great respectability of character. His mother was the daughter of the Rev. Jonathan Edwards, president of the college of New-Jersey. He was educated at Yale college, and took the degree of bachelor of Arts, in 1769, at the age of seventeen. He was elected a tutor of the college in 1771, and discharged the duties of that station for six years. Soon after leaving the college, he served a short time in the American army as chaplain, and after that, resided several years at Northampton. While there, he was twice elected to a seat in the state legislature, and in his speeches in that body on several questions of great public expectation, acquitted himself in a manner highly honourable to his talents, and showing his capability of attaining great eminence as a civilian, had he chosen to make the bar or hall of legislation the scene of his exertions. In 1783, he accepted an invitation to settle as a clergyman in the parish of Greenfield, in the town of Fairfield, Connecticut, and resided there 12 years. In 1785, he published an epic poem in eleven books, entitled the "Conquest of Canaan." He brought it into the form in which it was given to the public in the twenty-fourth year of his age. In 1794, he published "Greenfield Hill," a poem in seven books. During his residence at Greenfield, he became very widely known by his works and his extensive intercourse with literary and professional gentlemen, and rose to a high reputation for talents, learning, and excellence as a preacher. In May, 1795, on the death of president Stiles, he was elected to the presidency of Yale college, a station for which he was most happily fitted by popular and dignified manners, and extraordinary talents for communicating knowledge, as well as by his superior endowments and acquaintance with science and literature. Under his superintendence the institution soon began to flourish beyond all preceding example. He was soon after elected to the divinity chair, and filled it in connexion with the office of president with great reputation till his death. He was eminently distinguished in the government and instruction of the college. During the whole of his presidency no general opposition to the collegiate government existed, or even a momentary interruption to the regular operation of law. He possessed from nature a constitution of body unusually firm and vigorous, and with the exception of a weakness of his eyes, which obliged him for many years to employ an amanuensis, he enjoyed remarkable health; but about two years before his death, he was attacked by a disorder, against which all medical prescriptions were unavailing, and which subjected him to an excess of suffering that at length broke down his robust frame. His patience under the severest agonies of distress, and his resignation to the Divine will, were striking, and eminently suited the character of ardent piety which he had so long sustained. His death took place February 11th, 1817, and was universally and deeply lamented as the fall of one of the greatest, best, and most useful of the eminent men who have adorned his country, and a loss to the cause at large of learning and religion, as well as to the seminary over which he presided. Since his death, his theological lectures, under the title of "Theology," have been published in five volumes octavo, and have passed through several large editions, both in the United States and in Great Britain. His travels in New-England and New-York have also been published in four volumes octavo.

DYCHE, Thomas, an English clergyman, well known as a schoolmaster, at Stratford-le-bow, and as the author of an English dictionary, spelling-book, Latin vocabulary, &c. He died about 1750.

DYER, Sir James, an eminent lawyer, born at Roundhill, Somersetshire, 1511, and educated at Broadgate hall, Oxford, and removed to the Middle temple, London. Here, by assiduity, he distinguished himself, and in 1552, he was made sergeant at law, and elected speaker of the house of commons. In 1556, he was made one of the judges of the common pleas, in 1557, removed to the king's bench, and in 1559, again restored to the common pleas, and the next January, he was made chief justice of that court. This respectable and upright magistrate died at his seat of Stanton, Huntingdonshire, 24th March, 1581, aged 70. He wrote a large volume of reports, published 20 years after his death, and reprinted often, and deservedly commended by Sir Edward Coke. He left also some other law tracts, and, for his learning and great excellence of character, fully merited the eulogium passed on him by Camden.

DYER, William, a Nonconformist, ejected from his living of Cholesbury, Bucks, in 1662. He turned quaker the latter part of his life, and died 1696, aged 60, and was buried at Southwark. He wrote some sermons, and theological tracts much in the style of Bunyan's. They were reprinted 1671.

DYER, John, an English poet, born at Aberglasney, Caermarthenshire, 1700. He was educated at Westminster school, and returned home to study the law, his father's profession, but he had a greater relish for poetry and design, and therefore he determined to become a painter. In 1727, he published his "Grongar-hill," a beautiful little poem, and afterwards set out for Italy, to delineate the antiquities of that celebrated country, and employed much of his time among the enchanting prospects near Rome and Florence. At his return home in 1740, appeared his poem, "the ruins of Rome," and soon after, by the advice of his friends, he took orders. He was presented to Calthorp, Leicestershire, which, after a residence of 10 years, he exchanged for Belchford, Lincolnshire. In 1752, he was presented by Sir John Heathcote, to Coningsby, and in 1756, the chancellor added to it Kirkby on Bane; but whilst he began to enjoy himself, and prepared the improvements of his parsonage-house and of his garden, the cup of felicity was dashed from his hand, and he was carried off by a rapid consumption, 1758, and buried at Coningsby, where no memorial records the virtues of its pastor. He left a widow and four children, one son and three girls. The son, heir to his father's taste and classical knowledge, died in London, April, 1782, aged 32, as he was preparing to extend his travels to Italy. The "fleece," which was published a little before the poet's death—Grongar-hill—and the ruins of Rome, are the three poems which raised Dyer above mortality. The simplicity of his lines is enriched with true sublimity, and the whole breathe forth the purest flames of benevolence and humanity, and have gained, and will preserve universal admiration. His works were printed in one vol. 8vo. 1761.

DYNAMUS, a rhetorician of the fourth century, born at Bourdeaux, which he left on an accusation of adultery. He died 360, in Spain, where he had married a rich widow.

EACHARD, Dr. John, an English divine, born in Suffolk 1636. He was educated at Catharine-hall, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and in 1675, master, the year after which he took his degree of D.D. He died 7th July, 1697, aged 61, and was buried in the chapel, where a handsome inscription is placed over his remains. He is well known as the author of the grounds and occasions of the contempt of the clergy and religion inquired into, in a letter to R. L. 1670, which was attacked by several writers and answered by him. In 1672, he published Mr. Hobbes's

State of Nature considered, in a dialogue between Philanthus and Timothy, dedicated to Sheldon, the primate, which Hobbes never noticed, and perhaps wisely, as his superior powers must have sunk before the wit and raillery of his opponent. These two performances were long in esteem, and deserved the high commendations of Swift. All Dr. Eachard's works were printed complete in 1774.

EAMES, John, a native of London, educated at Merchant Tailors', and intended for the ministry among the independent dissenters. A strong defect in the organs of speech rendered it impossible for him to appear with advantage before a congregation, and therefore he employed himself in educating young persons at the expense of the independent fund, and after undertaking the class of mathematics, the learned languages, and philosophy, he filled the chair of divinity with considerable respectability. His learning recommended him to the notice of sir Isaac Newton, and other eminent men, and procured him a seat in the royal society, whose transactions he abridged with the assistance of another person. He died 1744.

EARLE, John, a native of York, educated at Merton college, Oxford, and made tutor to Charles, prince of Wales. He was a great sufferer during the civil wars, and at the restoration, was made dean of Windsor, then bishop of Worcester, and in 1663, bishop of Salisbury, where he died two years after. He was author of a translation of the Icon Basilike into Latin—micro-cosmography, or a piece of the world characterized in essays and characters, 12mo.—an elegy on Francis Beaumont, the poet, &c.

EARLE, William Benson, a benevolent character, born at Shaftesbury, 7th July, 1740. He was a man of polished manners, well acquainted with the circle of belles lettres, and in disposition most humane and charitable. He left by his will 2000 guineas to the matrons in bishop Ward's hospital, Sarum, and to various other public institutions in Winchester, Salisbury, Bristol, London, Bath, &c. handsome legacies, expressive of his respect for those foundations, which offer relief to the aged, the weak, the indigent, and the unfortunate. Other legacies also were left for the improvements of the Salisbury concert, and for agricultural purposes. This benevolent man died 21st March, 1796, in the Close, Sarum, and was buried without pomp, with his ancestors, in Newton-Toney church.

EARLY, Peter, governor of Georgia, was bred a lawyer, and became distinguished in the profession. In 1802, he was chosen a representative in congress, and was among the most conspicuous of the members who supported the administration. In 1807, he was appointed a judge of the supreme court of Georgia, and in 1813, governor of the state, and rendered important services in those stations, by the intelligence, firmness, and freedom from party spirit, with which he discharged their duties, particularly by hindering the enactment of a law to prevent the collection of debts. He died August 15th, 1817.  L.

EASTON, Nicholas, governor of Rhode-Island, was first elected in 1650, and again in 1672. He came from England in 1636, with his two sons, Peter and John, and resided at Ipswich, Massachusetts, until the following year, when he removed to Newbury, and in 1638, to Hampton. He was concerned in the first planting of both the last-mentioned towns, and erected the first house in Hampton. In 1639, the Eastons, on account of some differences with the government, removed to Portsmouth, and afterwards to Newport, where they also erected the first house which was built in that place. It has been remarked of Easton and Coddington, another principal settler of Newport, that they did much more to secure the civil and religious liberty of the colony, than Roger Williams, whose services have been more highly extolled. Governor Easton died in 1675, aged 83, and was buried in the Coddington burying-ground.  L.

EASTON, John, governor of Rhode-Island, was the son of the preceding, and was elected in 1690. He continued in office until 1695, and died in 1705, aged 85.  L.

EATON, Theophilus, first governor of the colony of New-Haven, New-England, was a native of Stony-Stratford, England. After having held the office of deputy governor of the East India company, been ambassador to Denmark, and employed several years very successfully as a merchant in London, he came to New-England in 1637, and in the following year, accompanied by a few others, commenced the settlement of New-Haven. On the organization of a civil government in that colony, in 1639, he was chosen governor, and continued in the office till his death in 1657, in the 67th year of his age. He was distinguished by great amiableness of manners, dignity, and integrity as a magistrate, and piety, and was held in great reverence by the colonists, over whom he exerted a paternal care, and who testified their regard to him by defraying the expenses of his funeral, and erecting a monument to his memory.  L.

EATON, William, general in the service of the United States, was born at Woodstock, Connecticut, in 1764, and was graduated at Dartmouth college in 1790. In 1792, he was appointed to a captaincy in the American army, and served for some time under General Wayne on the Mississippi, and afterwards in Georgia. In 1798, he was appointed consul to the kingdom of Tunis, and continued there, discharging the duties of that difficult situation with an energy and sagacity highly honourable to himself, till 1803, when he returned to the United States. In April, 1804, he was appointed navy agent of the United States for the Barbary powers, for the purpose of co-operating with Hamet bashaw in the war against Tripoli. After reaching Malta, he left the American fleet, and proceeded to Cairo, where he formed a convention with Hamet. He marched from that place with a few hundred troops, chiefly Arabs, to Derne, which, in conjunction with the fleet, he captured. A premature peace, purchased by the American consul with the Tripolitan Bashaw, disappointed him and his country of the advantages he had gained for reducing that enemy to submission. Compelled by the treaty to relinquish his conquests, he evacuated the city, and embarking with his Christian troops on board the American fleet, returned to the United States. On his arrival there, though he received many flattering testimonials of respect for his brilliant achievements, he failed of obtaining from the government such compensation for the pecuniary losses he had sustained, and such employment as his talents and services entitled him to expect; and unhappily, under the influence of disappointment, he became incapable of usefulness, and died on the 1st of June, 1811. He possessed great energy of mind and independence of feeling, was brave, patriotic, and generous, but easily excited both to anger and vanity. His Majesty, the king of Denmark, presented him with an elegant acknowledgment, in a gold box, of services he rendered several captured Danes at Tunis, and he also received from Massachusetts the gift of 10,000 acres of land, in token of the respect in which his talents and services were held by that state.

EBERTUS, Theodore, a learned professor of Frankfort on the Oder, in the 17th century. His works are, Chronologia sanctorum linguæ doctorum,—elogia jurisconsultorum, &c. 8vo.—Poetica Hebraica, 8vo. 1628.

EBION, the founder of a sect about the year 72. St. John is supposed to have written his gospel against the doctrines of the Ebionites, who denied the divinity of our Saviour, and acknowledged as true only a mutilated and interpolated copy of St. Matthew's gospel, rejecting all the other books of the New Testament. Some authors suppose that there was no such person as Ebion.

EBROIN, mayor of the palace under Clothaire III. and Thierry I. maintained for a while the great power which his intrigues and hypocrisy had obtained, but his pride and cruelty offended the French nobles, and he was at last confined in a monastery. He however escaped, and soon returned with an army to regain his lost influence. His enemies and rivals were sacrificed to his ambition and revenge, and the greatest atrocities were exercised in the name of public justice. This tyrant, execrated by the people, was at last assassinated by Hermanfroi, a noble whose death he meditated, 681.

ECCARD, John George d', a German historian and antiquary, born at Duingen, Brunswick, 1670. He was professor of history at Helmstadt, and succeeded his friend Leibnitz in the chair of Hanover, 1716. His debts obliged him to leave his situation, 1723, and turning Roman catholic, he retired to Wurtzburg, where he obtained the office of episcopal counsellor and librarian. He was ennobled by the emperor, and died 1730. His works are Corpus historicum mediæ ævi a Caroli magni tempor. ad finem seculi xv. 2 vols. folio, a learned and valuable work,—leges Francorum, &c.—de Origine Germanorum,—historia studii etymologici, &c.

ECCHELLENSIS, Abraham, a Maronite professor of oriental languages at Rome. He translated from the Arabic into Latin some of the books of Apollonius's conics, and went to Paris to assist Le Jay in the publication of his polyglott Bible. He quarrelled with Le Jay, and also with Flavigny, who had attacked his edition of the Bible, and he showed himself wantonly severe and licentiously satirical. He was recalled from Paris to assist in the translating of the Scriptures into Arabic, and died at Rome, 1664.

ECCLES, Solomon, an English musician, who in the zenith of his fame turned quaker and destroyed his instruments. He now became as ridiculous as before he had been admired, and for a while amused the public by his foolish plans to reconcile all mankind to one religion. The confinement of a prison at last cured him of his follies, but he died without religion the last years of the 17th century.

ECHARD, Jacques, a Dominican, who was born at Rouen, and died at Paris, March 15th, 1774, aged 60. He wrote an account of the learned men whom his order had produced, 2 vols. folio, Paris, 1719, and 1721.

ECHARD, Lawrence, an English historian and divine, born at Bassam, near Beccles, Suffolk, 1671, and educated at Christ college, Cambridge, where he took the degree of M. A. 1695. He took orders and obtained the livings of Welton and Elkinton, Lincolnshire. In 1706, he published his history of England, from the time of the Romans to James I. in 1 vol. folio, to which he added a second and a third volume, folio, 1718, up to the settlement of William and Mary. He wrote also an ecclesiastical history, and an English translation of Plautus and Terence, besides a gazetteer, &c. He was made prebendary of Lincoln, and in 1712, arch-deacon of Stowe, and soon after presented to the livings of Rendlesham, Sudbourn, and Alford, Suffolk. His declining state of health obliged him to go to Scarborough for the waters, but he died by the way, while in his chariot, 16th August, 1730. He was an author of great judgment and perseverance, but the labours of more modern and elegant writers have rendered his works obsolete. He was twice married, but had no children.

ECKIUS, John, a learned professor of Ingoldstadt, born in Suabia, 1483. He warmly opposed the great leaders of the reformation, and disputed at Leipsic with Luther, before the duke of Saxony, and at Worms against Melancthon. He was a divine of great abilities, warm zeal, and extensive erudition. His writings are chiefly on controversial subjects, in support of the popish supremacy against the Protestants. He died at Ingoldstadt, 1548.

ECLUSE, Charles de l' Clusius, a physician of Arras, who had the care of the simples of Maximilian II. and Rodolphus II. Disliking the life of a courtier, he retired to Frankfort on the Maine, and then to Leyden, where he died, professor of botany, 4th April, 1609, aged 84. His works on botanical subjects were published, 2 vols. folio, Antwerp, 1601-5.

ECLUSE DES LOGES, Pierre Mathuran de l', doctor of the Sorbonne, was born at Falaise, and obtained the prize of eloquence at the French academy, 1743, and died 1775. He edited, but with great partiality, the memoirs of Sully.

EDELINCK, Gerard, an engraver, born at Antwerp, 1641. The munificence of Lewis XIV. invited him to France, where he executed, in the most finished style, the holy family of Raphael, Alexander in Darius's tent, by le Brun, and Mary Magdalen, also by le Brun. Some of his portraits are excellent, especially his own. He died 1707, aged 66, at the hotel of the Gobelins.

EDEMA, Gerard, a Dutch painter, born in Friesland. He visited Surinam and afterwards America, to paint the views, the trees, insects, &c. of the country, and came to London, 1670. He was much admired for the bold features of his landscapes; and his rocks, mountains, and cataracts displayed awful grandeur. He hastened his dissolution by excessive drinking, and died about 1700.

EDEN, Charles, governor of North Carolina, arrived in the colony, May, 1714. During his administration, the noted pirate Theach, alias Blackbeard, surrendered himself with his companions to the government, in consequence of the king's proclamation of pardon. He, however, soon afterwards fitted out a sloop in North Carolina, recommenced his depredations, and was killed by a party detached from a British frigate in quest of him. From circumstances which afterwards transpired, it was believed that Eden and the secretary of the colony had been confederate with him. He died March 27, 1722, and the administration devolved on Thomas Pollock, president of the council. ☞ L.

EDEN, Sir Robert, the last royal governor of Maryland, succeeded Mr. Sharpe in 1768. He was a man of amiable manners, and at the commencement of the revolutionary controversy, was more disposed to moderation than any of the other British officers, and complied, though reluctantly, with the order of congress, to relinquish his government. After the restoration of peace, he returned from England to America for the recovery of his estates, to which he was entitled by the treaty of 1783, and died at Annapolis, September 2, 1784; at this time, he enjoyed a pension of 800*l.* from the British government. He was a native of Durham, England, brother of sir John Eden, and married lady Calvert, sister of lord Baltimore. ☞ L.

EDER, George, a learned lawyer of the 16th century, born at Friesingen, and counsellor to the emperors Ferdinand, Maximilian, and Rodolphus. His best work is (Economia bibliorum seu partium biblicarum libri quinque, folio).

EDGAR, succeeded on the throne of England after his brother Edwy, 959, and deserved from his mildness the name of peaceable. He was a warlike prince, and obtained some important victories in Scotland and in Ireland, and also in Wales, where he exacted from the inhabitants a tribute of wolves' heads, which thus cleared the country from those rapacious animals. After the death of his queen Egelrida, he married the beautiful Elfrida, daughter of the earl of Devonshire, whom his favourite Ethelwolfe, overpowered with the love of her beauty, claimed for himself instead of demanding her for his master. Edgar died 975, aged 33.

EDGAR, son of Malcolm III, was king of Scotland, and died 1107. His sister married Henry, king of England, and by this union, restored peace between the two countries.

EDGEWORTH, Richard, was born at Bath in 1744, and died at Edgeworth's town, June 13, 1817. He was educated at Trinity college, Dublin, and next at Corpus Christi college, Oxford, from whence he removed to the temple. Instead, however, of studying the law, he applied to the mathematical sciences, and became an excellent mechanic. In 1767, he invented the telegraph, which many years after he saw generally adopted. He also contrived several agricultural instruments, and wheel carriages, upon new principles. On going to France, he was employed in directing the works across the Rhine at Lyons. In 1780, he became a member of the Royal Society; and in 1785, he was named in the patent for establishing the Royal Irish Academy. He proved a great benefactor to that part of the country where he resided, by making rail-ways, draining bogs, and introducing an improved system of agriculture. Some years before he died, he formed a spire for the church of Edgeworth's town, which was all constructed of frame-work on the ground, and then elevated by machinery to the tower, where it was fixed. Mr. Edgeworth published—1. Poetry Explained. 2. Readings in Poetry. 3. Essays on Practical Education, 2 vols. 8vo. 4. Professional Education. 5. Letter to lord Charlemont on the Telegraph. 6. Essay on the Construction of Roads; besides various tracts and papers in the Philosophical Transactions, the Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy, &c. He was married four times, and had several children, one of whom, Miss Maria Edgeworth, is well known by her excellent publications; and the continuation of her father's memoirs, from which this is extracted.—W. B.

EDMER, or EADMER, an English benedictine of Canterbury, afterwards abbot of St. Alban's, and bishop of St. Andrews, in Scotland. He wrote the history of his own times from 1066 to 1122, called Historia novorum, and also the life of Anselm and Wilfred, and some other tracts. His historia was printed with notes by Selden, 1623, and reprinted 1675, by Gerberon.

EDMONDES, Sir Thomas, a statesman, born in Devonshire about 1563, and introduced at court under the patronage of sir Francis Walsingham. He was employed by Elizabeth in some negotiations, but when her ambassador at Paris, he was allowed only 20s. a day, so that he complains severely of his inability to support the dignity of a royal representative, and adds that "he has not the means wherewith to put a good garment on his back, to appear in honest company." He was sent in 1599 to Brussels, and was afterwards employed as one of the clerks of the privy council. He was knighted by James I. and engaged in affairs of trust and importance, and afterwards appointed to the offices of comptroller of the king's household, and privy counsellor, and in 1615, of treasurer of the household. In the two first parliaments of Charles I. he sat for Oxford, and some of his speeches are preserved. In 1629, he went as ambassador to the French court, and afterwards retired from office, and died in peaceful privacy, 1639. He was a man of great abilities, eminent as a negotiator, active as a courtier, upright, firm, and incorruptible, as attached to the privileges of his king and country. Some of his papers, which once consisted of 12 vols. folio, have been preserved, and some of his letters are published in Sawyer's three volumes of memorials of affairs of state, 1725, and Dr. Birch's View of Negotiations, &c. 1749, 8vo.

EDMONDES, Clement, son of the preceding, was born at Sharwardine in Shropshire, and educated at All-souls college, of which he became fellow, 1590. By the interest of his father, he was made secretary for the French to Elizabeth, and afterwards remembrancer of the city of London, master of the requests, and clerk to the council, and in 1617 knighted. He was a man of learning, well skilled in arts and sciences. He wrote observations on the first 5 books of Cæsar's civil wars, 1600, folio, besides observations on the commentaries, &c. He died in St. Martins in the fields, 12th October, 1622, and was buried at Preston near Northampton.

EDMUND, St. king of the East Angles, was for his sanctity made one of the saints of the calendar. He was taken prisoner in 870, by Ivar the Dane, and shot to death with arrows, after being fastened to a tree. He was buried at St. Edmundsbury, Suffolk.

EDMUND, St. a native of Abingdon, who studied at Paris, and for his eminence as a preacher was made archbishop of Canterbury by Innocent III. A quarrel with Henry III. obliged him to leave the kingdom, and retire to France, where he died 1240. He was canonized by Innocent IV. 1249.

EDMUND I. son of Edward the elder, succeeded his brother Athelstan as king of England, 941, and added Mercia, Northumberland, and Cumberland, to his dominions. He was stabbed to death at Puckle church, Gloucestershire, 948, by Leolf, a robber, whom he had banished.

EDMUND II. surnamed Ironside, succeeded his father Etheldred, 1016, and took for his partner on the throne Canute, who opposed him. He was assassinated at Oxford, by two of his servants, 1017.

Edward, the elder, succeeded his father Alfred, as king of England, 900. He defeated the Scotch and Welsh, and repressed the invasion of the Danes. He erected five bishoprics, and by founding the university of Cambridge, he extended his protection to learning. He died 925, and was succeeded by his illegitimate son Aldestan.

EDWARD, St. or Martyr, the younger, son of Edgar the great, succeeded to the English crown 973, and was basely murdered at Corfe castle, 978, by his step-mother Elfrida, who wished to place her own son Ethelred on the throne.

EDWARD, surnamed the Confessor, son of Ethelred, succeeded his brother Hardicanute, 1041. He was a weak and impolitic prince, and suffered his kingdom to be governed by earl Godwin, whose daughter he had married. At his death, unable or unwilling to settle the succession about which he had consulted his friend William of Normandy, he left his kingdom a prey to ambitious factions. He died 5th January, 1066, and after the short but unfortunate reign of Harold, he was succeeded the following October by William the Conqueror.

EDWARD I. king of England, son and successor of Henry III. was born at Winchester. He was recalled from his expedition in Asia against the infidels to ascend the throne, 1272, and he distinguished himself by the vigour and wisdom of his government. The Welsh were subdued, and to reconcile them to their change of master, the king created his own son prince of Wales. In 1286 he was appointed umpire between the rival competitors for the crown of Scotland, and he so artfully conducted himself, that he nearly made the whole kingdom subservient to his power. He died at Carlisle, 5th July, 1307, aged 68, as he was preparing to march against the Scots, who had revolted against him, and on his death-bed he recommended to his son the prosecution of the war. From the wisdom and equity of the laws which he established, Edward has been called the English Justinian, and to his fondness for war and his expensive levies, the people may be said to be indebted for their liberties, which were cemented by the weight and consequence given to their representatives first called to sanction and to support the measures and the taxes of government. After the death of his first wife Eleanor, daughter of Ferdinand III. king of Castile, he married Margaret, daughter of Philip the hardy, of France.

EDWARD II. son and successor of the preceding, was born at Caernarvon, and ascended the throne 1307. He was devoid of that vigour and firmness requisite in the head of a turbulent kingdom, and his ill-judged attachment to his worthless favourites, Gaveston and the Spencers, raised his barons in opposition to his measures, and embittered the whole of his life. Not only his people, but his own wife, rose up against him, and after the punishment of his favourites, he was solemnly deposed by the nobles, and shut up in Berkeley castle, where soon after he was murdered in the most barbarous and insulting manner, 1327, aged 42.

EDWARD III. son of the preceding, was born at Windsor, 1312, and ascended the throne on his father's death, 1327. After a glorious campaign in Scotland, where Baliol paid homage to him for his crown, he turned his arms against Philip king of France. His successes brought on the celebrated victory of Cressy, 1346, in which 30,000 French fell, and after the capture of Calais, peace was re-established between the two countries. The succession of John on the French throne renewed the war, and in 1357 another dreadful battle was fought at Poitiers, by the black prince, who in the midst of the slaughter took the French monarch prisoner. The arms of Edward had also been successful against the Scotch, and their king David Bruce was taken prisoner, and thus England saw two captive monarchs in her capital. These glorious actions were unfortunately obscured by the misfortunes of the latter end of the king's reign. The monarch abandoned the cares of government to his rapacious ministers, and lost himself in the grossest sensuality. He died 23d July, 1377, aged 65, and was succeeded by his grandson Richard II. During his reign England was greatly improved by her connexion with the continent, and the arts and manufactures of the Flemish were transplanted into the island, where the industry and the bold genius of the inhabitants have since cherished and improved them. The order of the garter was established in this reign.

EDWARD IV. son of Richard duke of York, claimed the crown as descended from the second son of Edward III. in preference to the reigning monarch Henry VI. the descendant of a third son of Edward III. This rivalry, which filled the kingdom with blood, had already been disputed in six battles, in one of which Richard the duke of York fell, and in seven others it continued to engage the passions of contending armies, till Edward prevailed, and was crowned at Westminster, 1461. His marriage with Elizabeth Woodville, disgusted greatly his friend Warwick, who received the surname of king-maker, and the dissatisfaction was so rooted, that another civil war was to decide the dispute. Warwick joining himself to the forces of the deposed Henry, defeated Edward's army at Banbury, 1469, and soon after took him prisoner. Edward found means to escape, and Warwick, defeated in his turn, fled to France for new supplies, and soon returned to place Henry from a prison on the throne. In his turn, Edward became a fugitive, but unbroken by misfortunes, he collected forces on the continent, and on his return defeated his enemies, and slew Warwick in the field of battle, and in another fight in Tewksbury park, so completely routed the forces of Margaret, the heroic queen of the cowardly Henry, that no further opposition was raised against him. Respectable as a warrior and a negotiator, Edward became despicable as a monarch, and lost himself in effeminacy, and in the indulgence of the most sensual appetites. He died 9th April, 1483, aged 41.

EDWARD V. son of Edward IV. was only twelve years old on his father's death. The guardianship of his minority was intrusted to his uncle Gloucester, whose ambition prompted him to the commission of the foulest crimes. The young monarch, with his brother the duke of York, were on pretence of greater safety, conducted to the tower, and soon after barbarously smothered, 1483, and the cruel uncle ascended the vacant throne under the name of Richard III. The bodies of these unfortunate princes were discovered in 1678, and conveyed to a decent burial in Westminster abbey.

EDWARD VI. son of Henry VIII. by Jane Seymour, ascended the English throne, at the age 10, 1547. His character exhibited strong marks of benevolence, virtue, and humanity, but the goodness of his inclinations was often prevented by the intrigues or the malice of his ministers. He continued the work of the reformation begun by his father, and by the powerful co-operation of Craumer, nearly settled the religious establishment in the form in which it now exists. To avoid the errors of a popish reign, he set aside by his will his two sisters Mary and Elizabeth, and settled the crown on his cousin the lady Jane Grey, but his benevolent wishes failed, and the bloody reign of Mary overturned for a while his excellent institutions. He died of a consumption, 1553, aged 16. He showed himself a munificent patron of literature, by the foundation of several schools in the kingdom, and by the liberal endowment of Christ-church, Bridewell, and St. Thomas's hospital.

EDWARD, prince of Wales, surnamed the Black Prince, from the colour of his armour, was eldest son of Edward III. He distinguished himself by his valour in the field of battle in the wars of France under his father, especially at Cressy, and afterwards he commanded the English forces on the glorious victory of Poitiers, where he took John the king of France and one of his sons prisoners. Sensible of the deference due to royalty, he waited behind the chair of this illustrious prisoner on the evening of the battle, and when he conveyed him to London, he entered the capital mounted on a small black horse, while the royal captive was borne by a beautiful white charger richly caparisoned. This warlike prince, who was the idol of the nation, died of a consumption before his father, 1376, aged 46; and by a daughter of Edmund of Kent, brother to Edward II. a widow, he left one son, Richard, who ascended the throne after the death of Edward III. The crest which he took from the blind king of Bohemia became afterwards the crest of the succeeding princes of Wales, distinguished by three ostrich feathers and the motto Ich dien, I serve. Edward, as benevolent as he was brave, extended his protection to Peter the cruel, king of Castile, and received him in Aquitaine, which he had obtained by the treaty of Bretigny; but though replaced on his throne by the expulsion of his usurping brother Henry count of Transtamare, the ungrateful prince forgot his obligation to the English victor, and even refused to defray the expenses of the troops which had restored his fortunes.

EDWARDS, Richard, an English writer, born in Somersetshire, 1523, admitted of Corpus Christi college, Oxford, and elected student of Christ-church. He was made gentleman of Elizabeth's chapel, and taught music to the children of the choir. He wrote three plays, the first of which is dated 1562, besides poems published after his death in a collection called "a paradise of dainty devices," 1578. He was member of Lincoln's Inn, and in his last illness wrote "the soul's knell," much esteemed. He died 1566.

EDWARDS, Thomas, an English divine, educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree 1609. He was a nonconformist, and violently opposed the royalists during the civil wars. He generally preached about London, and at Hertford, and after the fall of royalty, he expressed his disapprobation against the sect of independents, with such freedom that upon the triumphal return of Cromwell to London, he fled to Holland, where he died of a quartan ague, 24th August, 1647, aged 48. His writings, which are extremely virulent and abusive, are chiefly in favour of the puritans, and of the presbytery. The most known of these are his Gangrana in three parts,—antapologia, &c. Mr. Edwards professes himself to be "a plain open-hearted man, who hated tricks, reserves, and designs, zealous for the assembly of divines, the use of the Lord's prayer, &c." He was from his zeal called the young Luther at Cambridge. He had by his wife, who was an heiress, four sons and one daughter.

EDWARDS, John, a divine of the church of England, son of the preceding, was born at Hertford 26th February, 1636. He was educated at Merchant-tailors' and St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He took his master's degree 1661, and was soon after ordained, and then undertook the cure of Trinity church, Cambridge, where his sensible discourses and eloquent delivery procured him a large and admiring audience. In 1668 he went for one year to reside at St. Edmundsbury as lecturer, and on his return to the university, in consequence of some dispute with the society of his college, he removed to Trinity-hall, and then became minister of St. Sepulchre's church there. In 1676 he married the widow of Mr. Lane, of Cambridge, and then went to reside on the small living of St. Peter's, Colchester, where for three years he continued the respected and beloved pastor of his parishioners. In 1697, displeased with the conduct of the Colchester clergy towards him, he removed to Cambridge, where two years after, he proceeded to his degree of D.D. In 1701 he lost his wife, and some time after he took for his second wife a niece of his first wife's first husband. He died 16th April, 1716, aged 79, and his wife survived him thirty-nine years, and died January 4, 1745, aged 81. Dr. Edwards, after his return to Cambridge, applied himself very assiduously to the service of literature. Though he had no collection of books, he drew much assistance from the libraries of the university, and in his writings, which are numerous, showed himself most indefatigable, well skilled in ecclesiastical history, and a subtle and able polemic. That he was occasionally unpopular among the clergy arose from his decided partiality for Calvinistic principles, and his bias towards the abjured doctrines of the old puritans. Dr. Kippis has called him the Paul, the Augustine, the Bradwardine, the Calvin, of his age; but though he possessed merit in a very great degree, the commendation is perhaps immoderate. His writings are now little known.

EDWARDS, George, the father of ornithologists, was born at Stratford, Essex, 3d April, 1694. He was brought up to a trade, but the great powers of his genius began to be developed by the perusal of books on natural history, antiquities, &c. and at the expiration of his apprenticeship, in Fenchurch-street, he travelled abroad, and visited Holland, and two years after, Norway, where his researches were attended with the most unbounded friendship and hospitality from the natives. In 1733, he was, by the recommendation of Sir Hans Sloane, chosen librarian of the college of physicians, where he obtained apartments; and he became afterwards fellow of the royal and antiquarian societies, London, and other learned societies abroad. The first of his learned and valuable labours appeared in the history of birds, 4 vols. 4to.

in the years 1743, 1747, 1750, and 1751; and in 1758, 1760, and 1764, three more 4to. vols. were added called "gleanings of natural history;" two most valuable works, containing engravings and descriptions of upwards of 600 subjects in natural history never before delineated. This worthy man died 23d July, 1773, aged 81.

EDWARDS, Dr. Jonathan, an English divine, who wrote against the Socinians. He was of Jesus college, Oxford, of which, on the promotion of Dr. Lloyd to the See of St. Davids, he became principal, 1686. His writings are chiefly controversial, and show him to have been a zealous but bigoted disputant.

EDWARDS, Thomas, an elegant writer. He purchased Turrick, in Bucks, where he chiefly resided; and he died on a visit to his friend Richardson, at Parson's Green, 8th January, 1757, aged 58, and was buried in Ellesborough churchyard, Bucks. He distinguished himself as an able critic and a good scholar in his canons of criticism, first printed 1747, and his letter to the author of a late correspondence, &c. which drew upon him the severity of Warburton's vengeance, illiberally wreaked in a note on the Dunciad. He also wrote some sonnets, thirteen of which are preserved in Dodsley's collection, eight in Pearch's, and four in Nichols'. His trial of the letter Y is elegant.

EDWARDS, Thomas, an eminent divine of the church of England, born at Coventry, 10th August, 1729. He was educated partly at Coventry school, and partly under his father, who was the vicar of St. Michael's, Coventry, and in 1747, he entered at Clare-hall, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He early displayed his knowledge of the learned languages by the publication of a new English translation of the Psalms from the original Hebrew, with notes, 8vo. 1755. In 1758, he was chosen master of Coventry grammar-school, and rector of St. John the Baptist in that city; and the same year married the daughter of Stonyer Parrot, Esq. by whom he had one son, Dr. Edwards, of Cambridge. In 1759 he published his useful work, "the doctrines of irresistible grace proved to have no foundation in the writings of the New Testament;" and in 1752 he attacked Dr. Lowth's "metricæ Harianæ brevis confutatio;" and by thus supporting Hare's metrical system, he began a controversy, which was continued for some time, and after some pamphlets between the rival divines, ended at last in the general opinion of the superiority of Lowth's arguments. In 1766 our author took his degree of D.D. and in 1770, upon obtaining the valuable living of Nuneaton, Warwickshire, from the crown, he retired from Coventry, and fixed his residence there for the rest of his life. The loss of his wife, May 1784, greatly afflicted him, and he never recovered the shock. He died at Nuneaton 30th June, 1785, aged 56. Besides the above, Dr. Edwards published two dissertations on bigotry, and on the interpretation of the New Testament, and some very learned notes on some of the idylls of Theocritus. As a teacher, Dr. Edwards was able and assiduous, and as a minister he was attentive, exemplary, and devout. The habits of a sedentary life, however, rendered him little fond of company, and though the correspondent of some learned men, he was the intimate friend of few, among whom bishop Law of Carlisle was the chief.

EDWARDS, Jonathan, president of the college of New-Jersey, and eminent as a divine and metaphysician, was the son of Timothy Edwards, minister of Windsor, Connecticut, and born October 5th, 1703. He was educated at Yale College, where he was graduated in 1720. He studied theology in the same institution, and spent two years there as a tutor, after having preached a short time in New-York. In 1727, he settled in the ministry at Northampton, Massachusetts, as colleague of his grandfather, the Rev. Mr. Stoddard, where he continued to labour with remarkable success till 1750, when he was dismissed in consequence of a disaffection of the people on account of his views respecting the administration of the Lord's supper and the discipline of the church. In 1751, he settled as missionary to the Indians at Stockbridge, Massachusetts, and remained there till his acceptance of the presidency of the college at Princeton, New-Jersey, in January, 1758. He had scarcely entered on the duties of that station, when on the 22d March, he fell a victim of the smallpox in the fifty-fifth year of his age. President Edwards, whether his genius, his writings, or his influence on religion and philosophy, are considered, must be pronounced one of the greatest men, not only of the age in which he lived, but of modern times. His treatise on the will is deservedly regarded as one of the ablest productions of the human mind. By that and other disquisitions, he settled several controverted subjects which had perplexed the divines and philosophers who had gone before him, and gained a title to be ranked, like Locke, Bacon, and Aristotle, among the most distinguished who have employed themselves in the study of metaphysics. His treatise on the will was translated into several foreign languages, and procured him the thanks of several of the professors of theology in the Dutch Universities. He was not more eminent as a metaphysician, than as a Christian and minister. His life was characterized by pre-eminent conscientiousness, meekness, humility, and reverence toward God; and his official labours by fervency of devotion, seriousness, plainness, love of truth, and pungency of address to the conscience; his labours were uncommonly successful, and his writings, which were numerous, and which have lately been published in 8 volumes, octavo, will perpetuate his usefulness and fame.  L.

EDWARDS, Jonathan, D.D. president of Union College, Schenectady, New-York, and son of the preceding, was born at Northampton 1745. He received from his parents an early pious education. His father's family, in the infancy of this son, removing to Stockbridge, where the population was chiefly composed of native Indians, and whose language, the Mahakaneeco, was principally spoken, Mr. Edwards acquired a perfect familiarity with that language, which he ever afterwards retained. At a very tender age he was sent, in company with the Rev. Gideon Hawley, a missionary to reside among the Oneidas on the borders of the Susquehannah, that he might himself become qualified for a missionary life. His subsequent education was at Princeton College, under President Finley. Here he became hopefully pious, and devoted himself to the service of God, as a minister of religion. After residing two years as a tutor at Princeton, he was first settled in the ministry at New-Haven, in Connecticut, 1769, afterward, in 1796, he took the pastoral charge of the church at Colebrook, in that State, and in 1799, was appointed president of Union College, at Schenectady. To the interests of this institution, he ardently devoted the short remainder of his life, till August, 1801, when he was removed by death in the 56th year of his age. In person he was somewhat above the ordinary stature, his features were bold and prominent, and his countenance commanded respect from all in his presence. As a scholar, he was critically skilled in the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin languages, and was well versed in all the literature of the age. But his favourite studies were theology and the philosophy of the mind, in which he had few superiors. In the structure of his mind, in the qualities of his heart, in the pursuits and many remarkable events of his life, he much resembled his venerable father. His literary works, published during his life, besides many occasional sermons, and contributions to the periodical religious publications of the day, are 1. Three sermons on the nature of atonement. 2. Observations on the Mahakaneeco language. 3. The Salvation of all men examined and refuted. 4. A Dissertation on Liberty and Necessity.  L.

EDWARDS, William, a common mason, who, by the strong powers of his untutored genius acquired great celebrity as a bridge-builder. His bridge over the river Taaff, which is the segment of a circle, the chord of which is 147 feet from the surface of the water, is a remarkable instance of his ingenuity. He was occasionally a Methodist preacher; and died 1789, aged 81.

EDWARDS, Bryan, a historian, was born in 1743, at Westbury in Wiltshire. He was brought up by his maternal uncle, a planter in Jamaica, to whose property he succeeded, as he also did to that of Mr. Hume, an other merchant of the same island. In 1796, he was elected into parliament for Grampound, which place he represented till his death, July 15th, 1800. His works are—1. Thoughts on the trade of the West India Islands, 8vo. 2. A Speech on the Slave Trade. 3. History of the British Colonies in the West Indies, 2 vols. 4to. and 3 vols. 8vo. 4. The Proceedings of the governor and assembly of Jamaica in regard to the Maroon Negroes, 8vo.—W. B.

EDWARDS, Edward, an artist, was born in London in 1738. He was brought up to his father's business of a chair-maker and carver; but quitted it for drawing, in which he acquired skill enough to become a teacher, and by that means he supported his mother when a widow, and also his brother and sister. He obtained two premiums from the society of arts for historical pictures, and in 1773, became an associate of the royal academy. After this he visited Italy, and on his return was employed by several gentlemen, particularly Horace Walpole, and Mr. Hamilton of Bath. In 1788, he was appointed teacher of perspective in the Royal Academy. He died in 1806. Mr. Edwards published a "Treatise on Perspective," 4to. And after his death were printed his "Anecdotes of Painters," 4to. with his own life prefixed.—W. B.

EDWY, succeeded his uncle Edred as king of England 955, and married Elgiva, who was related to him within the prohibited degrees. This circumstance proved his ruin, and that of his queen, who was seized by Odo, the archbishop, and after being branded with a hot iron in the face, to destroy her beautiful features, was banished to Ireland, where she expired by a most cruel and violent death. The king was also excommunicated, and died in exile 959.

ECKHOUT, Gerbrant Vanden, a painter, born at Amsterdam, 19th of August, 1621. He studied the manner of his master Rembrandt with such success, that his pictures drew equal applause, and possessed equal merit. He preferred historical subjects to portraits, and excelled chiefly in the representation of the feelings of the soul in the features of the countenance. His best pieces are—a Jesus among the doctors,—the infant Jesus in the arms of Simeon,—Abraham dismissing Hagar and Ishmael,— the continence of Scipio,—and a woman looking for the fleas of her dog. He died 22d July, 1674, a bachelor.

ECKHOUTE, Anthony Vanden, a painter, born at Bruges. He travelled into Italy with his brother-in-law Deyster, and while he executed the flowers and the fruits, his companion completed the figures of the several pictures, which were thus conjointly produced. After his return home, Eeckhoutte purchased an honourable post under the bishop of Bruges; but, to the astonishment of all, he suddenly abandoned his country, where he was loved and patronised, and embarked for Italy. In his way he was carried by a storm to Lisbon, where his works soon recommended him to general notice; and after the residence of two years he married a lady of quality, and of opulent fortune. His rivals, however, viewed his success with jealousy, and as he was riding out in his coach, he was shot with a ball and instantly expired 1695. The causes of this melancholy catastrophe are unknown. His fortune descended to his sister, who had married Deyster.

EGBERT, last king of the Saxon heptarchy, and first king of England, was proclaimed monarch of Wessex 800, and of all England in 828. He died ten years after, distinguished for valour and success against his Danish invaders.

EGEDE, John, a Dane, who went as missionary to Greenland 1721, where he resided 15 years. His description of Greenland appeared 1729, and he died 1758. His son Paul assisted him in his endeavours to convert the Greenlanders, and was appointed bishop of the country, and died 1789, aged 81. He republished his father's history, besides a journal about the occurrences of Greenland.

EGERTON, Thomas, an eminent lawyer, natural son of Sir Richard Egerton, of Ridley, Cheshire, born 1540. He was educated at Brazen-nose college, Oxford, and removed to Lincoln's Inn, where he assiduously applied himself to the law. In 1591 he was made solicitor general to the queen, in 1592 attorney general, and knighted, and afterwards he rose to the office of master of the rolls, and of keeper of the great seal. James I. in 1603, created him baron Ellismere, and made him chancellor of England. In 1616, he was elected chancellor of Oxford, and made viscount Brackley. He died 15th March, 1617, at York-house in the Strand, and was buried at Dodleston, Cheshire. He left some law manuscripts, and published some observations on his office, its privileges and prerogatives, and a speech concerning the postnati. His descendants now enjoy his estates represented by the earl of Bridgewater.

EGERTON, John, a learned prelate, born

30th November, 1721, in London, and educated at Eton, and Oriel college, Oxford. He was son of the bishop of Hereford, and descended from the earl of Bridgewater's family. On taking orders he was presented by his father to the living of Ross, afterwards made archdeacon of Hereford, and the year after prebendary of Hereford. In 1748, he married lady Ann Sophia, daughter to the duke of Kent, and the year after became chaplain to the king, and in 1750 was made dean of Hereford. In 1756 he was consecrated bishop of Bangor, and by diploma from Oxford made LL.D. In 1768 he was translated to Lichfield, and in 1771 to the see of Durham. These high and rapid preferments were not undeserved. The bishop possessed among his many virtues the manners of conciliation and humility, and by a temperate condescending conduct he restored peace and good will among the political contending factions which unhappily divided his county when he succeeded to Durham. By hospitality and affability he recommended himself to his clergy, and by his anxious concern for the general improvement of agriculture and the encouragement of useful projects through the diocess, he rendered himself deservedly popular, and greatly beloved. The respectability of the pastor, and the comforts of the poor, were always nearest to his heart, therefore his patronage was extended only to the virtuous and good, and his charity tended to encourage humble poverty in honest pursuits and in industrious diligence. This very virtuous and venerable prelate, after a life usefully spent in distributing liberally and judiciously the many favours which Providence had placed at his command, died at his house, Grosvenor-square, London, 18th January, 1787, and was privately buried in St. James's church. His lordship was married to his second wife, Mary, sister of Sir Edward Boughton, in 1782, who survived him without issue. Though well educated, and with a mind stored with all the learning of ancient and modern times, he published only three sermons preached on public occasions.

EGGELING, John Henry, a native of Bremen, who travelled over Europe to increase his knowledge and enlarge his mind. On his return he was made secretary to his republic, and did respected 1713, aged 74. He wrote explications of medals and other ancient monuments.

EGINHART. Vid. ÆGINHARD.

EGMONT, Lamoral count, one of the lords of the Low Countries, born in Holland 1522. He distinguished himself in the service of Charles V. in Africa, and also under Philip II. at the battles of St. Quintin and Gravelines, where he was general of horse. Though attached to the sovereign, he seemed unwilling to assist in the enslaving of his country, and therefore being suspected by the duke of Alva of favouring the cause of the prince of Orange, and moreover hated by the tyrant for his superior abilities, he was beheaded by the governor's order at Brussels, 5th June, 1568, together with Philip de Montmorency count Horn. On this dreadful occasion the French ambassador wrote to his court that he had seen that head fall which had twice made France to tremble, and Philip observed that the heads of salmons were of greater account than many thousands of frogs. Some others of the family were equally illustrious in arms. The count's last descendant died 1707, aged 38, in the service of France.

EGMONT, Justus Van, a painter, born at Leyden 1602. He travelled early, and resided a long time in France, where he was painter to Lewis XIII. and XIV. and one of the twelve elders in the establishment of the academy for painting and sculpture. He returned to Antwerp, where he died 8th Jan. 1674, and his wife, June 1635.

EGNATIUS, John Baptist, a learned man, born at Venice 1473. He was pupil to the famous Politian, and like him he contributed by the force and excellence of his instructions to the revival of learning. When grown old, the republic paid him the highest honours for his eminent services in education, and for his virtues, and decreed that his stipend should be continued as public teacher, and that he should be exempted from all taxes. The works which he published are numerous, but they do not exhibit any marks of superior excellence, as the abilities of the author consisted chiefly in an astonishing retentive memory, in a striking ready elocution, and in a convincing mode of conveying instruction. This respectable man died at Venice 1553, leaving his estate and fine library to the three illustrious families of Molino, Laureano, and Bragadono. His works are orations,—epistles,—a poetical panegyric on Francis I. of France,—de Romanis principibus vel Cæsaribus,—de exemplis viro- rum illustrium,—on the origin of the Turks, &c.

EHRET, George Dionysius, a German, eminent as a painter of flowers. After painting for Mr. Clifford of Holland, the beautiful figures of the Hortus Cliffortianus, he came to England, where he met with great encouragement, and was made member of the royal society. One hundred of his botanical figures appeared in the Plantæ selectæ. He died 1770, aged 60.

EISEE, Charles, an artist who died poor at Brussels, January 4th, 1773. He made excellent designs for Fontaine's tales, 1762, for Ovid's Metamorphoses, 1767, for the Henriade, &c.

EISENGREIN, Martin D.D. a native of Stutgard, chausellor of the university of Ingoldstadt, died 1578. Though he gloried in abandoning the party of antichrist, with the protestants, he afterwards altered his opinion, embraced the popish religion, and became a violent supporter of its tenets. His writings were mostly controversial.

EISENSCHMIDT, John Gaspar, a German mathematician and physician, born at Strasburg, where he died 1712, aged 56. He was intimate with du Verney, Tournefort, and other learned men. He wrote a treatise on the weights and measures of various nations, and the value of ancient coins, and a treatise on the figure of the earth.

EKINS, Jeffery, D.D. an English divine, educated at Eton, and King's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He held successively the rectories of Quainton, Sedgfield, and Morpeth, Durham, and was made dean of Carlisle. He published a translation of Apollonius Rhodius's loves of Jason and Medea, 3 vols. 4to. 1771, and died 1791.

ELBEE, N. d', a native of Poitou, for some time engaged in the service of Saxony. During the Revolution he espoused the cause of his suffering countrymen in la Vendée, and put himself at the head of the royalists there, 1793, and, by the most masterly manœuvres, the greatest intrepidity, and the most consummate prudence, he succeeded in defeating all the republican forces sent for his destruction. After the victories of Groileau, Thonars, Saumur, Chatenay, Clissot, &c. he was unfortunately defeated at the battle of Chollet, and retired to Noirmoutiers, where he was taken, and condemned to be shot. This extraordinary man, the bravest and most formidable of the royalists of la Vendée, was then aged 42.

ELBENE, Alphonsus d', a native of Florence, bishop of Albi, died 8th February, 1603, in an advanced age. His works are, de regno Burgundiæ et Arelatis, 4to. 1602—de familiâ Capeti, 1595, 8vo. &c. He was succeeded as bishop by his nephew Alphonsus, who quitted his dignity, in the civil troubles of Languedoc, and died at Paris, counsellor of state, 1661.

ELBERT, Samuel, governor of Georgia, and a brigadier general in the revolutionary army, was appointed lieutenant colonel of a battalion of continental troops raised by order of the legislature of Georgia in 1776, and was soon after sent to the protection of the southern frontier. He was an officer in the expedition against East Florida in 1778. In the action at Brier Creek, March 2d, 1779, he had the command of a brigade, which inspired by the example of its general, conducted with great bravery. This action resulted however in the defeat of the Americans, and Elbert was taken prisoner. He was afterwards a major general of the militia of Georgia, and in 1786, was elected governor of the state. He died at Savannah, November 3d, 1788, aged 45.

ELBŒUF, René de Lorraine, marquis d', seventh son of Claude duke of Guise, died 1566. His grandson Charles married Catharine, the daughter of Henry IV. and Gabrielle d'Estrées, and died 1657. These great and illustrious characters were concerned in the intrigues and tumults of the French court under Richelieu and Mazarin. The last male descendant of this noble house was Emanuel Maurice, duc d'Elbœuf, who died in France 1763, aged 86. He is particularly known as the discoverer of Herculaneum. As he had served the emperor in Naples, he settled there, at Portici, and being offered pieces of ancient marbles, to ornament his villa, by a peasant, who found them in digging a well, he purchased the ground, and by carefully making excavations Herculaneum was discovered.

ELBRUCHT, John Van, a painter, born at Elbourg, near Campen, 1500. He settled at Antwerp, where some of his pieces are preserved, especially in the Fishmonger's chapel, the miraculous draught of fishes. His landscapes, human figures, and his stormy sea, were admirable.

ELEANOR, DUTCHESS OF GUIENNE, succeeded her father, William IX. in 1137, though only 15, and the next year she married Lewis VII, king of France, whom she accompanied to the holy land. Lewis was a character full of oddity and superstition, and when he cropped his hair, and shaved his head at the instigation of Peter of Lombardy, who told him that God hated long hair, he soon appeared ridiculous, and consequently despicable to his wife, who was playful and volatile. His conduct, it is said, produced inconstancy, and Eleanor passed many guilty hours in the company of her uncle Raymond, prince of Antioch, and of Saladin, a Turk of commanding appearance; and when Lewis complained of her levity, on his return to France, a quarrel arose, and a divorce ensued, 1152. Six weeks after, Eleanor married Henry duke of Normandy, afterwards Henry II. of England, by whom she had four sons and a daughter. Guienne and Poitou, the dowry which she brought to her husband, afterwards proved the source of those dreadful wars which for three centuries deluged France with English blood. Eleanor gave up, in 1162, Guienne to her second son, Richard, and died 1204, a nun in the abbey of Fontevrault. Her history was published at Rotterdam by Larrey, 1691, 12mo. Her quarrel with her husband, who had an adulterous intercourse with the fair Rosamond of Clifford, in Woodstock-park, incited her to encourage the rebellion of their sons against their father, and at last procured her imprisonment for sixteen years.

ELEAZAR, high priest of Judea after his brother Simon, 292 B. C. It is said that he gave Ptolemy Philadelphus a copy of the Bible, which was by order of the monarch translated by 70 persons, and is now known by the name of the Septuagint.

ELEUTHERIUS, a native of Nicopolis, made pope 170. He opposed the Valentinians with great zeal, and died 185.

ELI, the high priest and the judge of the Israelites, B. C. 1156, was regardless of the licentious conduct of his sons, Hophni and Phinehas, against whom the anger of the Lord was announced in a vision revealed to the young prophet Samuel. The aged father heard the threatened punishment with resignation, and when the ark of God was taken by the Philistines, and his two sons slain in battle, he, at the melancholy report, fell back from his seat, and broke his neck, the 93d year of his age.

ELIAS, Matthew, a painter, born at Peene, near Cassel, of obscure parents, 1658. As he was one day keeping the only cow belonging to his widowed mother, Corbeen, the famous painter, observed him making a fortification of mud by the road-side, and, pleased with the regularity of his works, and the attitude of his figures, he stopped, and prevailed upon him to come to Dunkirk and live with him. Here he engaged the affection of his friend and patron, by his great application and his superior abilities; and at the age of 20 he was enabled to go to Paris, further to improve himself. His pieces soon gained the public attention; but though courted and flattered, Elias never forgot his gratitude and respect to his kind benefactor. He married at Paris, and was appointed professor of St. Luke, and raised to other respectable offices. He afterwards visited Dunkirk, and settled there, employing his pencil in adorning the churches and chapels of that part of France. He lived always with the same regularity and temperance. Mild in his manners, inoffensive in his conduct, he was seldom seen but at church and in his work room. He worked till the last period of life, and expired 22d April, 1741, aged 82, highly respected. He had only one son, who died doctor of the Sorbonne at Paris; and he never had more than one pupil, Carlier, as he rather discouraged the attempts to painting, which were attended with great trouble, and often unrewarded. Though correct and grand in his drawings, he failed in his draperies; and some of his female figures are represented without judgment and without taste.

ELIAS, Levita, a German rabbi, of the 16th century. He taught Hebrew at Venice and Rome, and was a very learned man and a most judicious critic. He published lexicon Chaldaicum, 1541, folio—traditio doctrinæ, 1538, 4to.—some Hebrew grammars—nomenclatura Hebraica, 1542, 4to.—collectio locorum in quibus Chaldaeus paraphrastes interjecit nomen Messiaë Christi, &c. 1572, 8vo.

ELICH, Lewis Philip, a native of Marburg, known in the 17th century for his foolish book, de magiâ diabolicâ, which was cancelled by the magistrates, but afterwards published at Frankfort under a different title, 1607. He now avoided persecution by flight, and turned Roman catholic. He published another book at Frankfort, 1609, de miseriâ homines, &c. He was immoral and impious in his sentiments, and his conduct has been warmly attacked and exposed by his opponent, Tandler, professor of medicine at Wittemberg.

ELICHMAN, John, a native of Silesia, who practised physic at Leyden, and was well acquainted with sixteen languages, and, according to Salmasius, superior to every European in the knowledge of Persian. He wrote in Arabic, de usu Arabicæ linguæ in medicinâ, 1636—a dissertation de termino vitæ, &c. 1639—and a Latin translation of Cebes' picture, printed at Leyden, 1640, with a Greek and Arabic version.

ELIEZER, a rabbi, of the 8th century, said by some to be contemporary with Christ. His valuable "chapters, or sacred history," were translated into Latin, with notes by Vorstius, 1664, 4to.

ELIJAH, an illustrious prophet of Israel, under Ahab and Ahaziah. After suffering great persecution from queen Jezebel, he was taken up to heaven in a chariot of fire, 895, B. C. and left his mantle and his prophetic powers to his servant Elisha.

ELIOT, Thomas, a native of Suffolk, sheriff of Cambridge under Henry VIII. He chiefly resided at Cambridge, and was the author of the first dictionary, Latin and English, ever published in England. He died 1546.

ELIOT, John, minister of Roxbury, Massachusetts, and usually denominated the apostle of the Indians, was born at Nasin, Essex county, England, in 1604, of parents who were pious, and who gave particular attention to his religious instruction. He was educated at Cambridge University. In 1632, a year after his arrival in Massachusetts, he was settled in the ministry at Roxbury, where he remained till his death in 1690. But his labours were not limited to his own people. He was one of the number employed in 1639 to versify the Psalms. The work, after having been corrected by president Dunster of Harvard college, was long used in New-England, and passed through many editions. On becoming acquainted with the Indian tribes, with which he was surrounded, he became strongly desirous to promote their salvation. Making himself acquainted with their language, he began in 1646 to preach to them, and possessing the happy talent of expressing himself with great simplicity, tenderness, and force, almost immediately gained their attention, and soon succeeded in affecting their hearts. He usually made a missionary tour once a fortnight, and extended his labours to all the tribes in the colonies of Massachusetts and Plymouth. The first Indian church established in North America, was formed of his converts in 1660 at Natick, where a house for worship was erected for its use. Many others were afterwards established by him and others whom he excited to the work; and great numbers of the Indians converted to Christianity. He had the happiness before his death to see 24 native preachers engaged in teaching their countrymen. Such was his zeal to promote their salvation, that he translated and published the whole of the Scriptures in their language, beside a number of smaller works. In richness of endowments, ardour of piety, self-denial, extent of labour, and success, Mr. Eliot was the first of missionaries, and will ever deservedly be commemorated with reverence and admiration. ¶ L.

ELIOT, Andrew, D.D. minister of Boston, Massachusetts, was a native of that town, and a graduate of Harvard college, where he obtained the degree of A. B. in 1737. He commenced his ministry in Boston in 1742, and continued in its labours there till his death in 1778, highly respected for his talents, his piety, and usefulness. He remained in the town while it was in the hands of the British during the war of the revolution, and by his affectionate attentions did much to alleviate the sufferings to which the inhabitants were subjected. His publications, consisting chiefly of sermons, were not numerous, but highly reputable to his learning and taste. ¶ L.

ELIOT, John, D.D. congregational minister of Boston, Massachusetts, was the son of the Rev. Andrew Eliot, D.D. and born at Boston, May 31st, 1754. He was graduated at Harvard in 1772, and ordained the successor of his father, November 3d, 1779, and continued there much respected till his death. He was particularly distinguished for his attention to the history and biography of New-England, and left in his Biographical Dictionary of the eminent men of that portion of the United States, published in 1809, a monument of his industry and acquisitions. He was a principal founder of the Massachusetts Historical Society, and contributed more than any other individual to its collections and library of rare books. He died February 14th, 1813. ¶ L.

ELLIOTT, Sir John, a native of Peebles, of obscure origin. He showed great application in his youth, and, by the direction of his father-in-law, he became well acquainted with Latin and Greek. He was first employed in the shop of an apothecary in the Hay-market, London, and quitting this for more venturous services, he went to sea as a surgeon. A rich prize soon rewarded his labours, and enabled him, on his return to London, to assume the air and the name of physician. He was in this new character befriended by sir William Duncan, and soon gained reputation and opulence. His address greatly recommended him, and though he was neither very learned nor very ingenious, he however became one of the most popular physicians in London; his fees amounted to little less than 5000*l.* a year; and such was his consequence, that he was created a baronet, by the influence of Madame Schwellenberg and lord Sackville. Thus raised to eminence, and patronised by the prince of Wales, and courted by the great, sir John showed that he knew well how to use the favours of fortune. His hospitality was very great; but while the friend of the witty and the learned, while courted by M^rPherson, Horace Walpole, Astle, Townley, Whiteford, Armstrong, and others, he did not forget the labours of his profession, nor did he, while attending the opulent, disdain to administer to the poor without fee or reward. It is supposed that the hospitable treats with which he delighted his friends, and the pleasures of the table, in which he moderately indulged, hastened the decay of his constitution. In the languishing hour of sickness he tried in vain the waters of Bath and other places, and sea voyages. He died suddenly, at Brock-et-hall, it was imagined, from the rupture of one of the larger vessels, and was buried at Hatfield, 1787. He left a handsome fortune, to be divided among his eight surviving children.

ELLIOTT, George Augustus, the brave defender of Gibraltar, was born at Stobbs, Roxburghshire, 1713, the youngest of the nine sons of Sir Gilbert Elliott, of an ancient family, said to have accompanied the conqueror in his invasion of England. He was educated under a private tutor, and then went to Leyden, where he made great progress in military science, which he completed at the ecole royale of La Fere in Picardy. He afterwards served in the Prussian service, and on his return to Scotland in his 17th year, he entered as volunteer in the 23d regiment of foot. The next year he went into the engineer corps at Woolwich, and then by his uncle's interest became adjutant of the second troop of horse grenadiers. He went with this highly disciplined regiment into Germany, and was at the battle of Dettingen, where he was wounded. After rising to the rank of lieutenant colonel in this regiment, he resigned his commission as engineer, and was soon after made aid-de-camp to George II. In 1759 he quitted his regiment to raise and discipline the first regiment of light horse, called after him Eliott's, and with them in the character of brigadier general, he went in an expedition to the French coast, and afterwards to Germany, where discipline, activity, and enterprise reflected the highest honour on the general, and on the men. He was recalled from Germany to be second in command in the expedition against the Havanna, where his intrepid courage in the action, and his great humanity towards the conquered, were eminently displayed. At the peace, the gallant regiment was reviewed in Hyde-park by the king, who was so pleased with their appearance, and so grateful for their valour, that he bestowed upon them the appellation of royals. In 1775, general Eliott succeeded A'Court as commander-in-chief in Ireland, but before he had completely taken possession of his office, he was nominated governor of Gibraltar, an appointment for which, by his habits, his intrepidity, and his experience, he was well calculated. While he established in the garrison a severe but salutary system of discipline, he exhibited to his soldiers an example for them to follow. He inured himself to the severest privations, he eat no flesh, nor drank wine, but lived on vegetables and water; he never slept more than four hours at a time, and therefore the abstemiousness and the vigilance of the general were soon seen and imitated as the best qualifications of a good soldier. Thus persevering, active, vigilant, he maintained the honour of his country, and defended a barren rock with victorious success against the combined forces of Spain and France. The skill and valour displayed in the memorable siege of 1782, had fixed upon the gallant commander and his brave garrison the eyes and the admiration of the world, and therefore on his return to England, at the peace, he was greeted by the nation with acclamations, by the senate with thanks, and by the king with the honourable reward of a peerage by the title of lord Heathfield, baron Gibraltar. This illustrious veteran died at his chateau, at Aix-la-Chapelle, of a second attack of the palsy, sixth July, 1790, in his 73d year, at a moment when he was preparing to return through Leghorn to his favourite garrison. His remains were brought over to England, and buried at Heathfield, Sussex, where a handsome monument is erected. Lord Heathfield had married Anne, daughter of Sir Francis Drake, who died 1769, leaving a son, who succeeded to his father's honours, and a daughter married to J. T. Fuller of Bailey-park, Sussex.

ELIOTT, Richard, an English divine, born at Kingsbridge, Devon, and educated at Bennet college, Cambridge, where he proceeded A.B. and took orders. He was expelled from St. George's chapel, Hyde-park, for printing a sermon on salvation by faith without works, and afterwards became minister of a dissenting congregation, Glass-house yard, Aldersgate-street. He died suddenly in his pulpit, 1789. He published some controversial tracts and sermons, and defended himself against the attack of Dr. Dodd, about his discourse on faith.

ELISHA, a prophet among the Israelites. He was called from the plough to become the servant of Elijah, and afterwards when his master was carried up to heaven in a chariot of fire, he received his mantle, and was appointed his successor. He was highly respected by the people of Judea, and by the Syrians, who frequently consulted him. He died at Samaria, about 830 B. C.

ELIZABETH, queen of England, daughter of Henry VIII. by Anne Boleyn, was born seventh September, 1533. She was declared illegitimate by her capricious father, but her dying mother recommended her to the care of Parker, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, by whom her principles of religion were fixed, and her mind cultivated and improved. She lived in privacy and retirement, but on Mary's accession, she was imprisoned, and nearly sacrificed to the queen's bigotry by the influence of bishop Gardiner, who represented her as the future prop of protestantism. Philip, however, interceded for her, as he already marked her for his second wife on Mary's decease. She was drawn from prison to sit on the throne, 1558, and thus educated in the school of adversity, she came to govern a gallant and rising nation, and by her wisdom and energy to fix their destinies on the most glorious basis. With a soul heroic and magnanimous, an understanding polished by the knowledge of literature and of the learned languages, she yet possessed the weakness of her sex, and loved to be admired and courted for the elegancies of her dress, and the beauties of her person. Prudent and discerning in all her measures, she proceeded with caution in her determination to establish the protestant religion, she treated the catholic party with tenderness, and professed a great willingness to be on amicable terms even with pope Paul IV. Before she ascended the throne, the king of Sweden made proposals of marriage to her, which she rejected. Philip her brother-in-law was equally unsuccessful, and the duke of Anjou, who for a while seemed to be treated with partiality and affection, was dismissed at last with coldness and indifference. Her parliament indeed interfered, but she declared that she was wedded to her people, and that she wished her tomb-stone to record that after reigning so long she had lived and died a virgin queen. Authors have been puzzled to account for this settled aversion to the marriage state, and whilst some have suggested that this coldness of constitution arose from natural causes, others have intimated that her hours of retirement were not always devoted to continence. The suspicions are wanton, false, and illiberal; though she was beautiful and young, and loved entertainments, dress, and pleasure, though she selected the handsomest and best shaped men, such as Leicester and Essex, for her favourites, yet nothing can be advanced with truth against the elasticity of her character. Though she had favourites, in no instance is it mentioned that she forgot her rank or the dignity of her sex, and indeed there were so many watchful eyes about her court and person, that had she been incontinent, her weakness would have been divulged, and her amours recorded to posterity. That she wished to govern her favourites, and by them her people, by the soft influence which female charms possess over the heart, is probable; but when it is considered that when settled on her throne she was nearly thirty, that the warmer passions of youth had subsided, and that her great ambition was to rule without a superior or rival in the affections of her subjects, the wonders of her celibacy will cease. She was fortunate in the choice of her ministers, but though she could depend on Ceil and on Walsingham, she yet loved business, and regarded the prosperity and happiness of the nation as her immediate care. It is unnecessary here to mention the glorious events which marked her reign. The most indelible blot, however, on her character, is her treatment of the unfortunate Mary, whom, as her rival in beauty, and as her presumptive heir, she hated. Instead of pitying her misfortunes indeed she deceived her; and instead of granting her liberty, or replacing her on her throne, she ignominiously led her to a scaffold, and then meanly pretended to blame the horrible proceedings as the act of her ministers. After an illustrious reign of 44 years four months and six days, and after seeing her people grown powerful in arms, successful in extending navigation and commerce, and distinguished in science and literature, this great princess died 24th March, 1603, aged 70. Never, says a Jesuit, did a crowned head better understand the art of government, and commit fewer errors in it, during a long reign. Her aim was to reign, to govern.

to be mistress, to keep her people in subjection. She was not a warlike princess, but she knew so well how to train up warriors, that England had not for a long time seen a greater number of them, nor more experienced.

ELIZABETH, of Austria, daughter of Maximilian II. was married to Charles IX. of France, 26th Nov. 1570, at Mezieres. The dreadful massacre of St. Bartholomew overwhelmed her with grief, but as she never meddled in the public affairs of the kingdom, she avoided the dangers of politics, and retained the affections of her capricious husband, who on his death-bed tenderly recommended her and her daughter to the kindness of Henry IV. king of Navarre, his successor. Thus respected and beloved in France as a most virtuous wife and most benevolent queen, she retired to Vienna after her husband's death, and though her sister-in-law, Margaret of Navarre, was different from her in temper and character, yet she honoured her with her friendship, and sent her two books she had written with her own hand, one on the word of God, and the other on the remarkable events that had occurred during her residence in France. She died at Vienna, in a convent which she herself had founded, 1592, aged 38, deservedly beloved and sincerely lamented.

ELIZABETH, Petrovna, daughter of Peter the Great, was born 1709. Her rank and personal attractions made her an object of admiration among her neighbours, and among her suitors are mentioned Lewis XV. of France, Charles Augustus bishop of Lubec, Charles Margrave of Anspach, Kouli Khan, and Lewis of Brunswick, but she rejected all. She did not, however, dislike favourites, as her amours were frequent, and as she declared to her confidants she never was happy but in love. She ascended the throne of Russia in 1741, and received the appellation of humane, because she made a vow that no capital punishment should be inflicted during her reign. Severities, however, were practised, the public prisons were filled with wretches who frequently expired under tortures, and Elizabeth herself gave a strong example of cruelty, in condemning two ladies of her court, women of beauty and rank, the countess of Bestuchef and Lapookin, to receive 50 strokes of the knout, in the open square of Petersburg, to have their tongues cut out, and to be banished to Siberia, for divulging the secret amours of the empress. Though thus given to private incontinence, Elizabeth pretended to be a strict devotee; she was scrupulous in her yearly confessions at Easter, she expressed contrition for her faults, and was most punctual in all the external offices of religion. She died 25th December, 1761, in the 21st year of her reign, and 52d of her age. The punishment of torture, which hitherto was permitted, was abolished gradually by her successors.

ELLER DE BROOKHUSEN, John Theodore, physician to the king of Prussia, was born at Pletzkau, in Anhalt-Bernburg, and died at Berlin, 1760, aged 71. He was a man of great learning and of extensive experience in his profession. He wrote a Latin treatise on the knowledge and treatment of diseases, translated by Le Roy into French.

ELLERY, William, one of the signers of the declaration of independence, was born at Newport, Rhode-Island, December 11th, 1727, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1747. He rendered himself conspicuous at the commencement of the revolutionary contest, by his zeal in opposing the oppressive acts of the British government, and in May, 1776, was appointed one of the delegates of Rhode-Island to congress. He continued several years in that body, and was one of its most able, judicious, zealous, and faithful members. In 1786 he was appointed commissioner of loans for Rhode-Island, and in 1789 collector of the customs for Newport. He continued in the latter office until his death. He possessed a discriminating mind, an excellent judgment, and a fine memory, was greatly distinguished for his integrity, promptness, and fidelity in the discharge of his official duties, and retained his activity and mental vigour, and continued his usefulness until his death, Feb. 25th, 1820, in the 93d year of his age.

ELLIGER, Ottomar, son of a physician, was born at Gottenburgh, 19th September, 1633. His father wished to make him a scholar, but nature had formed him for a painter, and at last the inclination of the son prevailed, and under Daniel Seghers, the Jesuit of Antwerp, he soon displayed superior excellence in painting flowers and fruit. He was invited to Berlin, where he became a great favourite at court. His pieces are much admired in Germany. The time of his death is unknown.

ELLIGER, Ottomar, son of the preceding, was born at Hamburgh, 16th Feb. 1666. He studied under his father, and under Michael Van Musscher, at Amsterdam, but his great master was Lairesse. Instructed by him he soon imitated his copies, and taking nature for his model, he finished his pictures in a style pleasing to the man of taste as well as the scholar. In his back grounds he introduced the finest remains of Egyptian, Grecian, or Roman architecture, and every where displayed correctness of conception and sublimity of genius. His best pieces are the death of Alexander, and the nuptials of Thetis and Peleus, made for the elector of Mentz, which the queen wished to reward by granting the painter a handsome pension, and making him his principal painter. These honours Elliger refused, preferring liberty to the service of the greatest potentates. The latter part of his life was clouded by intemperance and debauchery. He died 24th Nov. 1732, aged 60.

ELLIS, Clement, M.A. a native of Cumberland, brought up under his uncle, Potter, bishop of Carlisle. He afterwards went to Queen's college, Oxford, and at the reformation obtained the living of Kirkby-western, Notts, and in 1693 the prebend of Southwell. He died 1700, aged 70. He was learned and exemplary as a divine, and wrote the genteel sinner—the scripture catechist—the self-deceiver, &c.

ELLIS, John, an English poet, born in the parish of St. Clement Danes, London, 22d of March, 1698. As his father was a man of an eccentric, unsettled character, and his mother a fanatical dissenter, who punished him severely even for looking at a top on Sunday, his education was little attended to, though his application made up fully for the deficiencies of parental care. He was placed in the office of Taverner, a scrivener, in Threadneedle-street, where, besides the knowledge of his business, he heard and attended to the classical instructions which young Taverner, an idle scholar of Merchant Tailors' school, regularly received from his fond father. With this indolent youth, after the father's death, Ellis was united in partnership, and from his imprudence he was a great sufferer, and was long involved in difficulties, which injured his peace of mind, and prevented his prosperous settlement in the world. His literary qualifications introduced him to the acquaintance of the learned, and among his friends of merit and virtue he could number Mr. Faying, of Cambridge, Dr. King, of Oxford, Moses Mendez, Esq. and Dr. Johnson. Though for seventy years he wrote, without however publishing, small poetical pieces, he did not neglect his business, and as a scrivener of probity and moral honesty, he was the agent of many respectable families. In 1750 he was elected a common councilman of London; an office which he retained till his death. He was also for many years deputy of his ward, and four times elected master of the scriveners' company, and so highly esteemed by that respectable body that a picture of him was hung up in their hall. By temperance and exercise he attained a great age, though he had a weakness in one of his eyes, which, in his 86th year, passed to the other in a singular manner, which he has described in a letter to his friend Dr. Johnson. The last year of his life was clouded with distress, from which, however, his friends extricated him, by relieving him from indigence, in consequence of his having incautiously trusted some money, perhaps the whole of his property, into the hands of an artful villain, who was a bankrupt. Cheerful and strong even to the last, he was capable of walking twenty and even thirty miles a day even to his 85th year. He died gently, sitting in his chair, the 31st December, 1791, in his 94th year, and was buried on the 5th of January, in St. Bartholomew's church, Exchange, attended by a great number of persons, who paid this last respect to his memory. As he had been brought up a dissenter, he soon saw with disgust the hypocrisy of the sect, and instead of following them, he expressed the strongest aversion for them. His hours of relaxation were always employed in walking; and when questioned why he neglected to go to church, he replied, "Nathan walked with the Lord." To the character of an honest, upright, and independent man, he added that of poetical merit; and though his pieces possessed not superior sublimity, yet they were distinguished for neatness, elegance, spirit, and naiveté. Many of his poems were long preserved in manuscript. Besides some pieces to be found in Dodsley's collection, he wrote a translation of Dr. King's templum libertatis—a Hudibrastic travesty of Maphæus—the South Sea dream—the surprise, or the gentleman turned apothecary—a translation of some of the epistles and of the metamorphoses of Ovid—some parts of Æsop's fables, of Cato, and others.

ELLIS, George, a miscellaneous writer, was born in London, and educated at Westminster school and Trinity college, Cambridge. He was one of the writers of the Rolliad, a satirical publication, intended to annoy the administration of Mr. Pitt; but afterwards he became much attached to that statesman, and was appointed secretary to Lord Malmesbury when he went on the embassy to Lisle. Mr. Ellis was a fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies, and died at the age of 70, in 1815. His works are—1. Specimens of the early English poets, 3 vols. 8vo.—2. Preface, Notes, and Appendix to a translation of Le Grand's Fabliaux, 2 vols. 8vo.—3. Specimens of English metrical Romances, 3 vols. 8vo.—W. B.

ELLIS, Henry, F.R.S. governor of Georgia, was appointed 1757. He succeeded Reynolds, and continued governor until 1760. In 1761 he was appointed governor of Nova Scotia, where he was succeeded by Wilmot in 1764. He was a lawyer, educated at the temple, and became celebrated as a traveller, and as a man of genius and learning. He spent the close of his life in Europe, and died at a very advanced age.

ELLIS, Caleb, judge of the supreme court of New-Hampshire, was born at Walpole, Massachusetts, and graduated at Harvard college in 1793, when admitted to the bar, he settled at Claremont, N. H. The talents and integrity which he displayed in his profession, the gentleness of his manners, and the purity of his life, rendered him peculiarly an object of the public esteem and confidence. In 1804 he was elected a representative in congress. He was afterwards a member of the council, and in 1811 elected a member of the senate of the state. In 1812 he was one of the electors of president and vice-president. In 1813 he was appointed a judge of the supreme court, and continued in that office until his death, May 9th, 1816, aged 49. He was a man of piety, and exhibited his regard for religion by the bequest of five thousand dollars for the support of the ministry in the town where he resided.

 L.

ELLSWORTH, Oliver, LL.D. chief justice of the United States, was born at Windsor, Connecticut, 29th April, 1745, and was graduated at New-Jersey college in 1766. Devoting himself to the practice of law, he soon rose by the extraordinary energy of his mind and force of his eloquence to distinguished eminence. In 1777 he was elected a delegate to the continental congress, and in 1784 appointed a judge of the superior court of Connecticut. He held a seat in the convention which formed the constitution of the United States, and was one of the most conspicuous and useful in that assembly illustrious for learning, talents, and patriotism. On the organization of the federal government in 1789, he was elected a member of the senate, and continued in the office till he was appointed, in 1796, chief judge of the supreme court of the United States. After discharging the duties of that station with great credit to his legal science, integrity, and eloquence, for near four years, he was appointed, toward the close of 1799, envoy extraordinary to France. The decline of his health disqualifying him for the duties of his office as judge, he resigned it toward the end of the year 1800. After his return to Connecticut he was again elected into the council of that state, and appointed chief justice of the supreme court. He however declined the latter office, and soon after died November 26th, 1807, greatly regretted, as in his life he had been admired for his extraordinary endowments, his accomplishments as an advocate, his integrity as a judge, his patriotism as a legislator and ambassador, and his exemplariness as a Christian.

ELLWOOD, Thomas, a native of Crowell, Oxfordshire, who turned quaker, by the influence of Isaac Pennington, and thus lost the protection of his father. He was for some time reader to Milton, and exposed himself to persecution on account of his religious tenets, which he ably defended. He wrote a sacred poem on the life of David—a history of the Old and New Testaments—besides an edition of George Fox's journal, &c. He died 1713, aged 74.

ELLYS, Anthony, an English prelate, born in 1693, and educated at Clare-hall, Cambridge. In 1724 he was vicar of St. Olave's, Jewry, rector of St. Martin's, Ironmonger's lane, the next year prebendary of Gloucester, and in 1728 he took his degree of D.D. In 1752 he was made bishop of St. David's, and died at Gloucester, 1761, and was buried in the cathedral there. Besides three occasional sermons, he published, in 1736, a plea for the sacramental test, &c. 4to.—remarks on Hume's essay on miracles; and left unpublished tracts on the liberty, spiritual and temporal, of protestants in England, &c. the first part of which was printed, 1763, the second in 1765. These works prove the author to have been a man possessed of learning, of candour, of benevolence, and every Christian virtue.

ELMACINUS, George, an Egyptian of the 13th century, author of a Saracen history, from Mohammed to the year 1118. He professed himself to be a Christian, and held places of honour under the caliphs; but the favourable manner in which he speaks of the mussulmans, of Mohammed, and of his religion, suggests a suspicion that he had little of the Christian besides the name. This history has been translated from the Saracen into Latin by Erpenius, and completed by Golius, Leyden, 1625, folio, and into French by Vattier, Paris, 1657; but both translations are very incorrect.

ELMENHORST, Geverhart, a critic, of Hamburg, who died 1621. He published Cebes, Leyden, 1618, and distinguished himself by his learned notes on Minutius Felix, and other ancient authors.

ELMENHORST, Henry, author of a German treatise on public spectacles, Hamburg, 1688, 4to. He does not consider them as injurious to manners. This subject has been treated by Rousseau and D'Alembert.

ELPHINSTONE, William, a Scotch divine, born in the county of Stirling, 1432, and educated at St. Salvador's, St. Andrews, and at Paris, where he studied the law. On his return home he took orders, and became arch-deacon of St. Andrews, provost of St. Giles, Edinburgh, and bishop of Aberdeen. In 1483 he went as ambassador to France, and in 1489 to Henry VII. of England; and in 1495 he was made chancellor of Scotland. The death of king James, at the battle of Flodden-field, 1513, so overpowered his spirits that he died soon after, aged 81. He was a munificent benefactor to the university of Aberdeen, and his learning is evinced by the history of Scotland, a MS. copy of which is preserved in the Bodleian.

ELPHINSTON, James, a miscellaneous writer, was born at Edinburgh in 1721, being the son of an episcopalian clergyman of that city. He was educated at the high-school and university of Edinburgh; on leaving which he became tutor to lord Blantyre. In 1750 he superintended an edition of the Rambler, printed at Edinburgh, with translations of the mottos. The year following he settled near London, and kept an academy till about 1778; after which he delivered a course of lectures on the English language at Edinburgh and Glasgow. He died at Hammersmith, Oct. 8, 1809. He was a man of learning, but rendered himself ridiculous by endeavouring to introduce a new mode of spelling. He translated Martial into English, and published "Propriety ascertained in her picture," 2 vols. 4to. which was followed by "English Orthography epitomized," and "Propriety's Pocket Dictionary." In 1794 came out a selection of his correspondence, in 6 vols. 8vo.; but his best work is a grammar for the use of schools, 2 vols. 12mo.—W. B.

ELSHEIMER, Adam, a celebrated painter, born at Frankfort on the Maine, 1574. Though the son of a tailor, he by his industry was enabled to go to Rome, where he soon became a distinguished artist. His landscapes, histories, and night-pieces, are so highly finished, so scarce, and so valuable, that they are to be seen only in the collection of princes. He was a man of a melancholy disposition, and died 1610.

ELSNER, James, a Prussian, professor of theology and oriental languages at Lingen, and afterwards master of Joachim's school, Berlin. In 1730 he became pastor of one of the Berlin churches, and was made member of the academy of sciences, and confessor of the royal consistory. He wrote observations sacræ in novi testam. libros Utræ. 1720, 1728—explanation of the epistle to the Philippians—state of the Greek church in Turkey, 8vo. 1737. He died 1750, aged 58.

ELSTOB, William, a learned divine and Saxon linguist, born at Newcastle, 1673, and educated at Eton and Catharine-hall, Cambridge. He afterwards removed to Queen's college, Oxford, and thence was chosen fellow of University, where he was tutor. In 1702 he became rector of Saint Swithin and St. Mary Bothaw, London, where he died twelve years after. He published Lupus's Saxon history translated into Latin, and also Ascham's Latin letters, and wrote an essay on the great affinity and mutual agreement of the two professions, law and divinity. He was engaged also in the laborious edition of the Saxon laws, with notes, &c. which he did not live to complete, and which was finished by Dr. Wilkins, 1721.

ELSTON, Elizabeth, sister of the preceding, born in 1683, was well skilled in the Saxon language. She retired, after her brother's death, to Evesham, Worcestershire, where she kept a small school. By lord Oxford's interference, she obtained from queen Caroline an annuity of 21*l.* but after the death of her majesty she was again reduced to poverty, and though skilled in eight languages, she was obliged to become a governess. She was then engaged in the dutchess of Portland's family, where she continued seventeen years, and died at Bulstrope, 30th May, 1756. She gave an English translation to the homily, which her brother published from the Saxon, 1709. In 1715 she published a Saxon grammar, and, as Rowe Mores observes, "she was the indefessa comes of her brother's studies, a female student of the university, upon a genteel fortune, but pursuing too much the drug called learning."

ELSWICH, John Herman d', a Lutheran divine, who was born at Rensburg, Holstein, and died at Stade, 1721, aged 37. He published Simonius's book de literis perepenthis, with notes,—Launoius de variâ Aristotelis fortunâ, &c.

ELSTNGE, Henry, an English gentleman, appointed, by Laud's interest, elerk of the house of commons. He was born at Battersea, 1598, and educated at Westminster and Christ-church, Oxford. He spent some years in travelling; and when appointed elerk to the commons, he displayed such correctness and ability in his office that he was respected by all parties, and consulted on every occasion. He resigned this honourable office when he saw the determination of parliament to try the king; and he retired to his house at Hounslow, where he died, 1654. To learning, and the knowledge of French and Italian, he added the noble character of an honest man. He published "the ancient method and manner of holding parliaments in England," 1663, reprinted 1768, and wrote a tract concerning the proceedings in parliament, never published, and other things.

ELVIUS, Peter, a native of Upsal, secretary to the Stockholm royal academy of sciences. He was eminent for his knowledge of mathematics and his love of science. He made surveys of the Swedish lakes, and of the coasts of the country, besides observations on the heavenly bodies, from Uraniburg; and he constructed also some ingenious machines worked upon by water. He wrote a journal of a tour in Sweden, published, Stockholm, 1751. He died 1749, aged 39.

ELWES, John, of saving memory, was son of a brewer in Southwark, of the name of Meggot. Though he lost his father when four years old, he was sent to Westminster school, where he continued ten or twelve years; from whence he went to Geneva, where, for three years, he distinguished himself in dividing the palm of horsemanship with Mr. Worsley and Sir Sydney Meadows. On his return to England he visited, in the assumed garb of a miser, his uncle, Sir Harvey Elwes, who lived in Essex, and whose sole pleasure was the hoarding up of money. He afterwards succeeded to his fortune, which was little less than 250,000*l.* and agreeable to his will, changed the name of Meggot for that of Elwes. He was then 40 years old; but though known for the last fifteen years, in all the circles of fashion and dissipation in London, he did not, upon the acquisition of such an ample fortune, to which indeed his own was equal, launch out into the extravagancies of the times, but following his uncle's example, he determined to increase it with all his power. He was naturally fond of gaming, and did not give it up till late in life. "He has been known," as his biographer has observed, "after sitting up a whole night at play, for thousands, in elegant apartments, ornamented with the most splendid decorations, and with waiters at his call, to walk out about four in the morning, and proceed to Smithfield, to meet his own cattle coming to market from Thoydon-hall, Essex, where he had a farm. Forgetful of the scenes which he had just left, this singular man would stand there, often in the cold and rain, disputing with a carcass butcher for perhaps a shilling. Sometimes, when the cattle did not arrive at the hour he expected, he would walk on, in the mire and dirt, to meet them, and more than once he has gone the whole way to his farm, without stopping, though seventeen miles from London. Denying himself every earthly comfort, he would walk home to London in the rain, sooner than pay a shilling for a coach; he would sit in wet clothes, rather than have a fire to dry them; he would eat his provisions in the last state of putrefaction, sooner than have a fresh joint from the butcher; and he wore a wig for a fortnight, which I," says the biographer, "saw him pick up from a rut in a lane." Yet when this inordinate passion of saving did not interfere, he performed very kind offices, even went a great way to serve those who applied to him. In 1774, when aged sixty, he was elected member for Berkshire, and for twelve years served the county, the most independent man in the house of commons. He came in without expense, and therefore expected no favour, and voted as in the purest days of parliamentary representation. In 1788 he began to feel the infirmities of age, but with the strongest antipathy to the drugs and pills of apothecaries, he endeavoured to support life by regular exercise and by temperance. In November, 1789, nature seemed exhausted, and no longer able to walk, he crept into his bed on the 21st, and on the 26th expired without a groan, leaving besides entailed estates at Marcham, Berks, in Essex, &c. upwards of 500,000*l.* to his natural sons. Though, however, so fond of money, he never did an unjust action to increase his store. He was cruel to himself, and benevolent to others. To others he lent much, to himself he denied every thing.

ELXAI, or ELXÆUS, founder of a sect among the Jews in the second century, commanded his followers, whenever they prayed, always to direct their faces towards Jerusalem. As he was an enemy to continence, he obliged all his followers to marry. This sect spread around Jordan, Palestine, and Arabia, was not extinct till the 4th century.

ELYOT, Thomas. Vid. ELIOT.

ELYS, Edmund, a native of Devonshire, educated at Baliol college, Oxford, where he became fellow, and published some divine poems and miscellanea, in Latin and English verse, 1658. In 1659 he succeeded his father as rector of East Allington, Devonshire, from which he was afterwards ejected as a nonjuror. He was a man of extensive learning. His pamphlet against Tillotson's sermons on the incarnation, and his volume of letters, were much admired. He died after 1693.

ELZEVIUS, celebrated printers at Amsterdam and Leyden, inferior to the Stephens in learning, but superior to them in the neatness and elegance of their small characters. There were five brothers, Lewis, Bonaventure, Abraham, Lewis, and Daniel. Lewis became known at Leyden, 1595, and was the first who marked the distinction between v consonant and u vowel. Daniel, though he left some children in his profession, was the last of his family distinguished over other printers. He died 1681. The catalogue of their editions was printed at Amsterdam 1674, 12mo. Their Virgil, Terence, and Greek Testament, are most beautiful and valuable books.

EMANUEL, succeeded John II. as King of Portugal 1495, and distinguished himself by the liberal manner in which he patronised commercial adventures among his subjects. Their ancient privileges were restored to the nobility; and by the persevering boldness of the Portuguese, the way to India by the Cape was discovered by Gama; Brazil was visited in 1501 by Cabral, and a regular intercourse was established with the kingdom of Congo and the other states on the African coast. This popular monarch, deservedly called the great, died 1521, aged 53.

EMEBRAET, a Flemish painter, who, after living some time at Rome, settled at Antwerp, and acquired distinction in landscape painting. His best piece is in the church of the Carmelites at Antwerp. He lived in the middle of the 17th century.

EMERI, Sebastian, an advocate in the parliament of Paris, in the 16th century, known for his independent spirit in refusing to defend the dutchess of Angouleme against the constable of Bourbon. His severe satire against Poyet, afterwards chancellor of France, who espoused her cause, procured his banishment from court. He retired in disgust to a monastery, where he died, devoted to the services of religion.

EMERSON, William, an eminent mathematician, born 14th May, 1701, at Hurworth, in the county of Durham. He for a while followed the profession of his father as schoolmaster; but, either from dislike to the employment, or warmth of temper, he resigned it, and lived satisfied with a small paternal estate of about 60*l.* or 70*l.* a year. His mind had been well cultivated. He was not only a general scholar, but well skilled in classical learning, and knew something of physic. With a noble independence of mind, his manners, as well as his dress and conversation, were singular, and eccentric. His dress, when in company, consisted of a flaxen wig without a single crooked hair in it; his shirt had no opening before, but buttoned close at the collar behind; his waistcoat always open before, except the lower button; and his coat, the only one he had, always open; with one hat, which served him the whole of life, as he gradually lessened the flaps, bit by bit, as it lost its elasticity. He always walked, though he kept a horse; and when pressed by the duke of Manchester, who often was delighted to pay him a visit, to get into his coach, he would answer, "Damn your whim-wham, I had rather walk." When he had any thing for the press, he walked to London, and corrected every sheet himself. He was very fond of fishing, and generally stood up to his middle in the water while engaged in it. After hard study he retired to the ale-house for relaxation, and there procured whomever he could to drink and to talk with him. He was a married man. He lived very healthy, till 1781, when, being afflicted with the stone, and apprehending his dissolution, he sold all his books to a York bookseller. He expired 26th May, 1782, aged near 81. His publications were sixteen in number, and all on mathematics, fluxions, algebra, optics, navigation, and mechanics. They are considered as very learned and accurate, as he never advanced a proposition before he had first tried it in practice.

EMILIANO, John, an Italian philosopher and physician, of the 16th century, author of a tract published at Venice, 1584, 4to. called historia naturalis de ruminantibus et ruminacione.

EMLYN, Thomas, a learned English divine. He was born at Stamford, Lincolnshire, 27th May, 1663, and educated by his parents for the ministry among the dissenters. After being at a private school, he entered at Emanuel college, Cambridge, where, however, he staid little time, and removed to Doolittle's academy, near London. He became, in 1683, chaplain to the countess of Donegal, and went over to Belfast in Ireland, and lived in her family even after her marriage to Sir William Franklin. He was here so much respected and beloved that his patron Sir William offered him a living in England, which he refused, in consequence of his adherence to the nonconformists' doctrines. The troubles of Ireland, however, soon put an end to his peaceful retirement, and these, together with some domestic quarrels, occasioned the breaking up of lady Donegal's family, so that Emlyn returned to London about 1688. Though he occasionally officiated, he acquired no permanent settlement till May, 1689, when, on the invitation of Sir Robert Rich, one of the lords of the admiralty, he undertook the care of a dissenting congregation at Leostoff. Here he continued about a year and a half, and applied himself to the examination of the then warmly disputed trinitarian controversy. With Manning, a neighbouring nonconformist, he deeply studied the subject; but he did not agree with his friend in embracing Socinian doctrines, but inclined in opinion to Arianism. The flight of James II. from Ireland allowed the dissenters to re-establish their regular congregations, and Emlyn, who was well known as a preacher in Dublin, was invited to settle there by his friend Boyse, and to share with him the labours of the ministry over his congregation in Wood-street. Emlyn consented, and in 1691, removed to Dublin, and three years after, he married a rich widow of the name of Bury. In this active scene, he displayed great powers of eloquence as a preacher, he was universally followed; and he ensured the public esteem by his discourses, especially by that pathetic sermon called funeral consolations, which he delivered in consequence of his wife's death. This event, which happened 1701, and was followed by the death of his mother, and soon after of a son, affected him most bitterly; but to domestic calamities was now to be added public persecution. His opinions with respect to the Trinity began to be suspected by some of the neighbouring ministers, and he openly declared his sentiments, and after much disputation he was suspended from his office, and persuaded abruptly to leave the country. He came in consequence to London, where he published his case; but, after ten weeks' absence, he determined to return to Dublin to his family, and there roused the indignation and the animosity of all parties against him by the publication of his "humble inquiry into the Scripture account of Jesus Christ, or a short argument concerning his deity and glory, according to the gospel." This book, which, whatever were its merits or demerits, ought to have been candidly examined, drew the arm of the law upon its author. He was arrested at the instance of the dissenters, his book was seized, and he was tried, and found guilty of blasphemously asserting that Jesus Christ was not equal to God the Father, to whom he was subject, and that with a seditious intention. He was accordingly sentenced by the lord chief justice to suffer a year's imprisonment, to pay a fine of 1000*l.* to the queen, and be confined till paid, and to find sureties for his future good behaviour. The ignominy of the pillory was not added to this sentence, as he was a man of letters; but he was conducted round the four courts to be exposed with a label on his breast. After two years' confinement the fine was reduced to 70*l.* and he was liberated. He returned to London, where he occasionally preached among the dissenters; but by the death of some of his friends and supporters, his congregation was diminished, and at last he retired to peaceful solitude, where he engaged himself in polemical divinity. He was engaged with several divines in controversy about various parts of Scripture, especially about the authenticity of the seventh verse of St. John's 5th chapter 1st epistle, which he maintained to be surreptitious; an opinion which several learned men have adopted. Though his enemies were numerous, yet he had several invitations to take an active part in the ministry, particularly at Exeter; but all these he rejected, satisfied with his retirement, and the partial assistance which he occasionally gave his friends. He was much esteemed by Dr. Samuel Clarke, who visited him with real friendship and undisguised confidence. Emlyn died 30th July, 1743, aged 79. He was buried in Bunhill-fields, and his funeral sermon was preached by his friend Mr. Forster, and he is represented as "one of the highest examples of substantial unaffected piety, of serious rational devotion, of a steady unshaken integrity, and an undaunted Christian courage." His writings, which are numerous, and on controversial subjects, are even now held in estimation by some, who have embraced his opinions as a Unitarian or high Arian. Some memoirs of his life were also published by his son, Sollom Emlyn, in 1746, prefixed to a collection of his works, 2 vols. 8vo. Sollom Emlyn was a counsellor, and edited lord Hale's history of the pleas of the crown, 2 vols. folio, 1731, and died 1756. His son, Thomas, is a barrister, and fellow of the Royal Society.

EMMA, daughter of Richard II. duke of Normandy, married Etheldred king of England, with whom she fled, on the invasion of the Danes. She afterwards married Canute; and when her son Edward, called the Confessor, ascended the throne, she reigned conjointly with him. Her enemy the earl of Kent opposed her; and when she appealed for assistance to her relation the bishop of Winchester, she was accused of criminal intercourse with that prelate, a circumstance, from which she extricated herself by walking barefoot, and unhurt, over nine burning ploughshares, after the manner of the times.

EMMIUS, Ubo, a professor of Groningen, born at Gretha, in East Friesland, 1547. He studied successively at Embden, Bremen, Rostock, and Geneva, and at his return was appointed rector of Norden college, 1579. He was, however, expelled from his office, for refusing to subscribe the confession of Augsburg, and 1588, he became rector of Leer college, which he raised to high eminence and distinction. In 1594, he was appointed over Groningen college, and when it was changed, in 1614, into a university, he was selected to be professor of history and Greek. After a life usefully and honourably spent in the service of the public, this worthy and learned man died at Groningen 1625, leaving several children by two wives. He was author of several works, the most known of which are, Vetus Græcia illustrata, 3 vols. published after his death—history of William Lewis, count Nassau—decades rerum Friscarum, &c.—chronological and genealogical works—vita et sacra elcusini Davidis, Georgii, &c.

EMPEDOCLES, a philosopher of Sicily, who followed the doctrines of Pythagoras, B. C. 444. He wrote tragedies, &c. and refused the sovereign power over his country, offered him by his fellow-citizens. According to the more received opinion, he threw himself into the crater of mount Ætna.

EMPEREUR, a well-known French engraver, in the 18th century, whose best pieces are, the triumph of Silenus and the bathers, after Vanloo—Aurora and Tithonus, and the rape of Europa, after Pierre—Pyramus and Thisbe, from Natoire, &c.

EMPEREUR, Constantine P, of Oppyck, in Holland, was professor of Hebrew at Leyden, and died 1648, at an advanced age. His works are chiefly translations of Jewish and Talmudical books, which display deep research and great knowledge of oriental literature. He wrote also de mensuris templi, 4to. 1630.

EMPOLI, Jacopo da, an historical painter of Empoli, born 1554. He studied Andrew del Sarto's works, and rose to great eminence. He died 1640.

EMPORIUS, a learned rhetorician in the 7th century. His writings on his art were printed, Paris, 1599, 4to.

EMSON, Sir Richard, the favourite of Henry VII. was son of a sieve-maker of Towcester, Northamptonshire. His conduct in raising the king's revenues, and the oppressions of which he was guilty, rendered him unpopular, and in the beginning of the next reign, he was beleagued, with his friend and coadjutor Dudley, 1510.

ENCOLPIUS, the favourite of the emperor Alexander, whose history he wrote. The work is not extant, though a translation of it was introduced to the world by Thomas Eliot, in the reign of Henry VIII. who said he had obtained the original Greek manuscript from a Neapolitan called Puderic. It is, however, considered as an imposition upon the public, probably attempted in consequence of the success of the similar fraud of Guevara, who pretended to give the life of Marcus Aurelius taken from an old manuscript.

ENDICOT, John, governor of Massachusetts, was a native of Dorchester, England, and came to New-England in 1623, as agent of a company who were establishing a colony at Salem, on a territory purchased of the Plymouth company, lying between Charles and Merrimack rivers, and extending to the Atlantic Ocean. That plantation was soon incorporated into the colony of New-England. In 1636, he commanded an expedition against the Pequod Indians. Recovering from the unpopularity which he incurred by his want of success in that excursion, and by some strange opinions relative to religion, with which he had disturbed the public, he was, in 1641, elected deputy-governor, and two years after, placed in the chair of the chief magistrate, which he continued to occupy, with few intermissions, till his death in 1665. He made himself notorious by a vehement prejudice against the custom of ladies' attending public worship without veils, and of men's wearing long hair, and stained his administration by the execution of four quakers as heretics. [L.]

ENFIELD, William, a native of Sudbury, educated at Daventry, under Dr. Ashworth, and made in 1763 the minister of a dissenting congregation in Liverpool. He was in 1770, tutor in belles lettres to the Warrington academy, and in 1785, settled as pastor of a dissenting meeting at Norwich, where he died 1797, aged 56. He published two volumes of sermons, of considerable merit—a history of Liverpool—institutes of natural philosophy—prayers and hymns—a history of philosophy, 2 volumes, 4to.—biographical sermons—the speaker, a popular school-book—and since his death, 3 vols. of sermons have appeared, with his life, by Dr. Aikin.

ENGELBRECHT, John, a German Lutheran, born at Brunswick, 1599. After working as a clothier, he became, in 1622, a fanatical visionary, and gained the attention of the vulgar by his pretended intercourse with spirits, angels, and devils, and even with Christ himself, who, as he said, showed him his five holy wounds. As Heaven and hell were thus open to his view, he received divine letters from above, and was called the mouth of the Lord. He died, neglected and despised, in 1641. His doctrines have been revived by Swedenborg, who appears to have been a more rational, though equally eccentric fanatic.

ENGHELBRECHTSEN, Cornelius, a painter, born at Leyden, 1498. He studied the works of John Van Eyck, and was the first Dutchman who painted in oil. His Christ on the cross, his Abraham's sacrifice, and his descent from the cross, are preserved in the church of Notre Dame du Marais; but his best piece is a picture with two sides, designed for the tombs of the barons Lockhorst, representing the lamb of the apocalypse. This great painter died at Leyden, 1533, aged 65.

ENGHELRAMS, Cornelius, a painter in water colours, born at Malines, 1527. His works, which are on religious subjects, are scattered about Germany; but his principal pieces are in the church of St. Rombout, representing the works of mercy. He died 1583, aged 56.

ENGHIEN, duke of, son of the duke of Bourbon, and grandson of the prince of Condé, was seized in the night at his seat at Ettenheim, in the territories of the elector of Baden, by an armed force, by direction of Buonaparte, and hurried to Paris. This atrocious step was followed by a mock trial, and the prince condemned for having carried arms against his country during the tyrannical reign of Robespierre. The sentence of his judges was carried into execution in the night of the 22d of March, 1804, and he was shot in the wood of Vincennes. He died with heroic resignation, and rejoiced in his last moments that the soldiers who shot him were not Frenchmen, but the mercenary hirelings of the body guard of his bloody murderer.

ENGLISH, Hester, a Frenchwoman by descent, was eminent for fine writing in reigns of Elizabeth and James I. Her performances are preserved in libraries and private hands. One of her pieces was preserved by Mr. Cripps, surgeon, London, called "Octonaires upon the vanitie and inconstancie of the world, written by Ester Inglis, the firste of Januarie, 1600." It is an oblong 8vo. French and English verse, the French in a print hand, the English, Italian, or secretary, curiously ornamented with flowers and fruits, painted in water colours, containing on the first leaf her own picture in a small form, with the motto "de Dieu le bien, de moy le rein." At the age of 40, she married Bartholomew Kello, a North Briton, by whom she had a son, educated at Oxford, and who died 1700, minister of Speckshall, Suffolk. One of her MSS. preserved in the Bodleian, is dedicated to her very singular friend, Joseph Hall, bishop of Norwich.

ENJEDIM, George, an ingenious unitarian of Hungary, who died 1597. He wrote a learned book called explicatio locorum scripturæ veteris et novi testamenti, ex quibus dogma Trinitatis stabiliri solet, 4to.

ENNIUS, Quintus, a famous old Latin poet, born in Calabria about 237 B. C. He was the first Roman who wrote in heroic verse. His poems have perished.

ENNODIUS, Magnus Felix, an eminent writer, born in Italy about 473. The loss of an aunt, at the age of 16, reduced him to poverty, from which he was relieved by marrying a lady of fortune and quality. He afterwards altered his mode of life, and took orders; and his lady also retired to the seclusion of a religious life. His writings raised his reputation, and in 511, he was advanced to the bishopric of Pavia, and was afterwards engaged to negotiate a union between the western and eastern churches. Though unsuccessful, he displayed great prudence as a negotiator. He died at Padua, 521. His works were published by Scotus, at Tournay, 1610, and at Paris, by Sirmond, 1611, with notes to illustrate the history of the age of the author. Another edition was published in 1696, at Paris, and one at Venice, 1729, folio.

ENOCH, son of Jared, and the seventh from Adam, is celebrated in the Holy Scriptures for his integrity and virtues, for which he was taken up to heaven without dying, B. C. 3017, in the 365th year of his age. The prophecies of Enoch are preserved, but are regarded as apocryphal.

ENSENADA, Zeno Somo de Silva, marquis de la, an able minister of Spain. From obscurity and the office of a book-keeper to a banker, he rose to places of honour and trust; and being ennobled by the king, took the name of Ensenada (nothing in itself), either from modesty or from laudable ostentation. He was intimate with Farinella, who, like himself, had risen from obscurity to consequence; and when dismissed from office, by the intrigues of the duke of Huescar, his friend had the boldness to reflect upon the severity of the measure in the presence of the queen. Though never reinstated in the office and influence of prime minister, he yet retained in privacy the esteem and good will of his sovereign. He died 1755.

ENT, George, an ingenious physician, born at Sandwich, Kent, 6th November, 1604, and educated at Sydney college, Cambridge. He afterwards travelled, took his degree of M.D. in Padua, and at his return home, was elected fellow, and afterwards president of the college of physicians, and, at the restoration, knighted by Charles II. He died in London, 13th October, 1689, and was buried in St. Lawrence church, Jewry. He was eminent, not only for extensive practice, but great learning. As the friend of Harvey, he wrote Apologia pro circulatione sanguinis, contra Æmilium Parisianum, 8vo. 1641—animadversiones in Malachiæ Thrustoni, M.D. diatribam de respirationis usu primario, 8vo.—and observationes ponderis testudinis, &c.

ENTICK, John, an English clergyman and schoolmaster at Stepney, well known as the author of a Latin, and of a spelling dictionary. He also wrote a history of the war terminated in 1763, 5 vols. 8vo. and a history of London, 4 vols. 8vo. abridged from Stow and Maitland, and other works. He died 1780, and was buried in Stepney churchyard.

ENTINOPE, an architect of Candia, in the 5th century, one of the chief founders of Venice. He fled from the invasion of the Goths, in 405, and concealed himself in the marshes on the borders of the Adriatic, and the house he built there was the beginning of the republic. The people of Padua sought the same residence afterwards, and twenty-four houses were erected there in 413. The house of Entinope was afterwards converted into a church, dedicated to St. James, and still exists in the Rialto.

ENZINAS, Francis, a native of Burgos, 1515, known also by the name of Dryander and Du Chesne. He became a disciple of Melancthon, and at Wittemberg turned protestant, as his brother, John Dryander, had done. He translated the New Testament into Spanish, for which he was imprisoned fifteen months; and escaping from imprisonment, he fled to Calvin at Geneva, 1545. He wrote a history of the Low Countries, and of Spain, which forms part of the protestant martyrology printed in Germany. His brother was burnt at Rome as a heretic, 1545.

EÖBANUS, Elias, surnamed Hessus, as born in an open field near Hesse, 1448, was professor of belles lettres at Erfurt, Nuremberg, and Marpurgh. Though a good poet, an elegant scholar, and a learned man, he was very fond of drinking, and he is said to have conquered a hard German drinker by emptying a bucket of beer. He possessed all the ease and elegance of Ovid, though he was inferior in imagination. He died October 5, 1540, aged 52. His works are Latin translations, in verse, from Theocritus and from Homer—elgics —sylvæ,—bucolics, much esteemed,—epistolæ, &c. The poems were published under the name of Poematum farragines duæ, Halle, 1539, 8vo. and Frankfort, 1564, 8vo.

EÖN, de l'Etoile, a fanatic of Brittany. Taking advantage of his name, he thought himself the son of God, and the judge of quick and dead, per eum qui justificaturus est vivos et mortuos. He gave rank to his followers, calling some angels, and some inferior spirits; and as he bribed those who were sent to seize him, it was considered by the vulgar that it was impossible to apprehend him. He was brought before pope Eugenius, at the council of Rheims, in 1148, and pretended, that when he held up to heaven the forked stick in his hand, two-thirds of the world were under the power of God, and the other of himself, and when he turned the stick to the earth, that his authority extended over two parts and that of God only over one. He died wretched in prison, and some of his followers chose to be burnt rather than abjure.

EÖN DE BEAUMONT, Charlotte-Genevieve-Timothee d', a native of Tonnerre sur Armenton, born 5th October, 1723. She was brought up as a boy by her parents, who wished at her birth to have a son, and, after going through the labours of a school and college education, she was recommended to the court, and sent three times as ambassador to Russia. She afterwards served in the army under marshal Broglio, and behaved with unusual courage, and after the peace of 1762, she was sent as secretary to the embassy in London, and also succeeded as ambassador. A wager determined her sex in London, and before the king's bench she declared herself to be a woman. The pension she had received was continued by the French king, but on condition she assumed the dress of her sex. This extraordinary woman died in 1790. She published tracts relative to the negotiations in which she had been engaged.

EÖAMINONDAS, a Theban general of great celebrity. He defeated the Spartans at the battle of Leuctra, and afterwards fell nobly at Mantinea, B. C. 363.

EÖAPHRODITUS, a bishop of Philippi, who carried the contributions of his country to the saints of Jerusalem, and brought back St. Paul's epistle to his church, A. D. 62.

EPÉE, Charles Michael de l', a French ecclesiastic, celebrated for his most humane efforts to restore the deaf and dumb to the blessings and the enjoyment of society. By his salutary instruction, these unfortunate members of the community have been able to acquire the knowledge of even six different languages, they have become profound mathematicians, and ready calculators. This worthy and most benevolent man, after receiving the most honourable marks of esteem and gratitude from the empress of Russia, the emperor of Germany, the king of France, and the whole of Europe, died at Paris, February, 1790. He was succeeded in his benevolent institution by l'abbé Sicard.

EPHORUS, a historian of Cuma, the pupil of Isocrates. His works are lost.

EPHRAIM, son of Joseph, was adopted, with his brother Manasseh, among the tribes of Jacob. He was born in Egypt, about 1710 B.C.

EPHREM, St. a father of the church, born at Edessa, or Nisibis according to some. He devoted himself to the monastic life, and refused to be a bishop. He wrote several books in Syriac, which are highly esteemed. They have been translated, and were edited at Oxford, in folio, 1708. Ephrem was a man of great charity, and of uncommon chastity, so that he would not even fix his eyes upon a woman. He died 378, and ordered the monks who attended him to keep his garments as relics, but to bury him without funeral pomp. His works were edited at Rome, 1747, 6 vols. fol.

EPICHRMUS, a Pythagorean bishop of Cos, said to have invented the letters © and X. He died aged 97.

EPICIE, an eminent French engraver. His pieces in the cabinet de Crozat are highly esteemed; but his finest performance is considered to be the bashaw having the picture of his mistress, taken after Carlo Venloo. The heads in this piece are most beautifully engraved. The time of his death is unknown.

EPICETUS, a stoic philosopher, born at Hierapolis in Phrygia. He wrote, in the age of Domitian, Enchiridion, a work abounding in excellent rules of morality, translated from the Greek by Mrs. Carter.

EPICURUS, founder of the sect which bore his name, was born at Gargettus, near Athens, 342 B.C. His summum bonum was pleasure, but pleasure produced and tempered by virtue, a system which has been much misrepresented and abused. He died aged 73.

EPIMENIDES, a poet of Crete, said to have slept at one time fifty years.

EPIPHANIUS, a father of the church, bishop of Salamis. He died 403.

EPIPHANIUS, a writer of the 6th century, who translated the histories of Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret.

EPIPHANIUS, son of Carpocrates, was the author of a heresy. He supported the necessity of a community of women, and attempted to vindicate some of his opinions from the words of St. Paul, which mention that before the law there was no sin. He was after death revered as a saint, and had a temple at Sama in Cephelonia consecrated to him.

EPISCOPIUS, Simon, an able divine, born of protestant parents at Amsterdam, 1583, and educated there and at Leyden. During the controversy between Gomarus and Arminius about predestination, he embraced the opinions of the latter, and was consequently exposed to persecution and obloquy, and considered as the public disturber of the church. He was ordained in 1610, and two years after he was appointed divinity professor at Leyden, in the room of Gomarus. In 1615, he went to Paris; but this journey, undertaken for purposes of curiosity, was viewed with suspicion by his enemies, and he was on his return accused of concerting with father Cotton, the ruin of the Protestant church and the United States. He was consequently obliged to appear before the synod at Dort, and because he and his friends refused to submit to the authority of arbitrary judges, they were deposed from their functions, and banished from the territories of the commonwealth. He retired to Antwerp, and in his banishment employed his pen in the support of his opinions, and in severe attacks upon the popish tenets. He afterwards visited Paris; and in the revolutions of party zeal and religious persecution he was again permitted to return to Holland, in 1626, where he became minister of the remonstrants' church at Rotterdam. In 1627 he married, and in 1634, he was chosen rector of the college founded by his sect at Amsterdam. He died 4th April, 1643, of a retention of urine, a dreadful disorder, which had two years before carried off his wife. As the moon was under an eclipse at the moment of his death, his friends, in the wildness of their grief, considered it as the emblem of the church, which lost its brightest light by the departure of that shining luminary Episcopius. Though a man of great learning and vast erudition, Episcopius did not always act with that humility of temper and moderation so becoming a Christian. His character was highly respected by Grotius, who always carried with him his theological institutions; and even Mabillon, though a papist, has spoken much in his commendation. As an Arminian, and the leader of the remonstrants, he was engaged in severe controversies, in which he displayed commanding eloquence and ardent zeal. His works have appeared in 2 vols. folio, the first published in his lifetime, and the last after his death, under the care of Limborch, who had married his brother's daughter.

EPENDORF, Henry, a German noble, who acquired celebrity by his dispute with Erasmus. He was born near Friburg, a city of Misnia, and though he boasted of his nobility, he was the son of a plebeian. He reflected with vulgar severity on the illegitimate birth of Erasmus, who in his turn retorted against his adversary, and censured him for his petulance, falsehood, and defamation. The interference of friends at last produced a reconciliation, but it was momentary, and a war of letters arose more fierce and inveterate than before. These things are to be lamented in the life of men of literary merit and Christian virtue, but too many unfortunately forget their character and profession while intent to repel or avenge an injury. The time of Eppendorf's death is not recorded.

ERASISTRATUS, a Greek physician, known for discovering the passion which Antiochus had conceived for his mother-in-law. He is said to have first dissected human bodies.

ERASMUS, Desiderius, a most illustrious character in the republic of literature, and in the cause of religion, was born 28th October, 1467, at Rotterdam. His father Gerard, who lived at Tergou, fell in love with Margaret, daughter of Peter, a physician of Lovenbergen, and after mutual promises of marriage, which were never realized, the lovers forgot themselves in criminal intercourse, and gave birth to two sons. One of these died early, and the other was called Gerard after his father, a name which he exchanged for Desiderius, which in Latin signifies the same as Gerard in Dutch, that is, amiable. The conduct of Gerard gave such uneasiness to his relations that they determined to make him an ecclesiastic, but he fled from their pursuits to Rome, where he maintained himself by transcribing ancient authors. In this distant retreat he was falsely informed by his friends that his beloved Margaret was no more, and in despair he devoted himself to that profession, to avoid which he had abandoned his home, and became a priest. On his return to Tergou, however, he was astonished to find his Margaret alive, but displeased as he was with the meanness of his relations, and attached by the tenderest feelings to the first object of his love, he abstained from all improper intercourse, and Margaret herself, faithful to her first vows, led ever after a life of seclusion and celibacy. Gerard now devoted himself to the education of his only son, and saw with admiration the opening of those powers, which, according to Rhenanus the master of Deventer college, would some time prove the envy and wonder of all Germany. His studies at Deventer, where he had for his friend and fellow-student pope Adrian VI. were interrupted by the plague, which proved fatal to his mother, who from excessive affection had accompanied her son to this seat of learning. The death of Margaret was followed by that of Gerard, who through grief could not survive the woman in whom all his affections had centred, and Erasmus, now an orphan, was removed from Deventer to Tergou, about the age of 14, and placed under the care of guardians, who wished to obtain possession of his small patrimony by devoting him to the seclusion of a monastery. He was first sent to a convent at Bois-le-duc, where, as he says, he lost three years of his life, then removed to Sion near Delft, and afterwards to Stein near Tergou, where overpowered by the unceasing solicitations of his guardians, he became a regular canon, 1486. In the retreat of a convent, which, as he describes, is a place of impiety rather than of religion, where every thing was done to which a depraved inclination could lead, under the sanction and mask of piety, and where it was hardly possible for any one to keep himself pure and unspotted, Erasmus could not long be confined. He was introduced to Henry a Bergis, archbishop of Cambray, who wanted a learned secretary on his visit to Rome; but though the journey was laid aside by the prelate, Erasmus determined not to return to the convent, but after being ordained priest at Utrecht, 1492, he set out for Paris, in 1496, to prosecute his studies. To maintain himself he instructed some pupils, some of whom were Englishmen, and among them William Blunt, lord Montjoy, who ever after treated him with respect. In 1497 he left Paris, and was kindly received at Cambray by the bishop, who had, however, violated his promise of supporting him while in the capital of France. The same year he visited England under the patronage of his pupil lord Montjoy, and he entered at St. Mary's college, Oxford, where, in the company and conversation of Colet, Grocyn, Linacer, Latimer, and Moore, he devoted himself to classical studies, and especially to the learning of Greek, which now began to revive in England, and of which he knew nothing. After nearly a year's residence, he returned to Paris, and in consequence of the plague which prevailed in that city, he passed to Orleans, and in 1498, completed his Adagia. The kindnesses he had experienced in England could never be forgotten, and he again, in 1499, visited for a little time that country, which he describes as abounding with humanity, politeness, and learning. His Adagia was published at Paris, 1500, and to it he added a panegyric on England, and soon after he printed his book de copiâ verborum, et de conscribendis epistolis. But whilst rising in literary fame, and devoted zealously to the cultivation of literature, Erasmus was poor; and though he flattered his patrons, he found them indifferent, and frequently regardless of his necessities. The prelate of Cambrai pretended to be offended with him, lord Montjoy's assistance was slow, and from the marchioness of Vere, and Antonius a Bergis, abbot of St. Bertin, he could receive little but fair words and unmeaning promises. It was his intention to study divinity in Italy, but this plan he did not immediately adopt, as in 1502, he was pursuing theological studies at Louvain, under his friend Adrian Florent, afterwards Adrian VI. In 1503, he published his "Enchiridion militis Christiani," which assailed the corruptions and the superstition of the Romish church. He had now applied closely for three years to the Greek, and he displayed his proficiency by publishing some translations from Greek authors. One of Plutarch's treatises he dedicated to Henry VIII. the Hecuba of Euripides to archbishop Warham, and Lucian's Toxaris to Fox, bishop of Winchester. He now travelled to Italy, and taking his degree of D.D. at Turin, he proceeded to Florence, and was present at the pompous and triumphal entry of pope Julius II. into the conquered city of Bologna, a ceremony, which excited his surprise and indignation, when he compared the meek entry of the lowly Jesus into Jerusalem, to the splendid magnificence of his proud vicergerent. After staying about a year at Bologna, he went to Venice, where Aldus printed a new improved edition of his Adagia, and of his translations from Euripides, Terence, and Plautus. At Padua he superintended the education of Alexander the natural son of James IV. of Scotland, then nominally appointed archbishop of St. Andrews. He afterwards passed to Sienna, and to Rome, where he was received with all the respect and deference due to his merit and learning by the cardinals and great men of the city. The solicitations which he had to settle there, particularly from the pope himself and from cardinal Grimani, were so pressing, that he would have accepted them, had he not previously engaged to return to England. Going back therefore to Sienna, where he had left his royal pupil, he parted with him at Cumæ, and had afterwards the misfortune to hear that he had perished in the bloody battle of Flodden-field 1513. From Italy,

Erasmus passed through Constance, Brisingau, Strasburg, Holland, Antwerp, and arrived in England in the beginning of 1510. Though flattered with expectations, and promised an honourable settlement by his friends, he found himself greatly disappointed, and regretted seriously he had not fixed his residence at Rome. While in England he lodged in the house of Sir Thomas More, where in the course of a week he wrote his "encomium moriæ," in which he lashed the indolence and the follies of the church of Rome. He afterwards went to Cambridge upon the invitation of Fisher, bishop of Rochester and chancellor of the university, by whose recommendation he was appointed lady Margaret's divinity professor, and also professor of Greek. How long he continued in these offices is not known, he had unfortunately a fondness for wandering, which distracted the plans of his best friends, and the poverty which still persecuted him in the midst of his literary reputation, rendered him easily dissatisfied with the slow progress of preferment, which, while it frequently falls rapidly on the head of persons of no merit, with difficulty overtakes those whose services have been most active and successful in the cause of science and of virtue. In 1514, Erasmus was in Flanders, and was flattered with the title of counsellor to Charles of Austria at the court of Brabant, and in 1515 he went to Basil, with the intention of printing there his New Testament, his epistle of St. Jerome, and other works. The New Testament appeared in 1516, and as it was the first time it was printed in Greek, it drew upon the editor the envy and the censure of ignorant and malevolent divines. But to his labours, perhaps, more than to any other man, was learning indebted for its revival. The comprehensive powers of his mind were employed not only in producing before the public correct editions of respectable writers, but in rousing by his various compositions the attention and improving the taste of mankind, after a gloomy period of ignorance, superstition, bigotry, and persecution. While thus engaged in the cause of literature, the opinions of the world were agitated by the opposition of Luther to the papal authority, and the principles of the church of Rome. It was expected that Erasmus would have zealously joined the reformer, as in his Enchiridion he had ridiculed the popish ceremonies, and as he was considered by many "to have laid the egg which Luther hatched;" but though solicited by Luther, he declined to take a share in the dispute, and expressed his hopes that a reconciliation might be effected. This timidity from Erasmus was agreeable to neither party, who eagerly wished each for his great abilities to defend and support their cause, and therefore while he pretended on one side to be well affected towards the pope, and on the other hand, commended the conduct and talents of Luther, and declared that he learned more from one page of his, than from all the volumes of Thomas Aquinas, he at last found that his wavering disposition exposed him to the odium and persecution of all. In 1518 he was invited with offers of great presents from Henry VIII. to settle in England, but he was suspicious of Wolsey, and thanked the king in general terms. At last to answer the expectations of some of his friends, Erasmus attacked Luther on free-will, and bestowed high encomium on the book which Henry VIII. had published against the reformer, but these things appeared feeble to the catholics, and the publication of the Colloquia, proved that the author had no objection to ridicule the indulgences of the pope, and the vicious follies of his monks. The book, though full of wit and good sense, was afterwards condemned by the faculty of theology at Paris, and prohibited by the pope. On the succession of Adrian VI. to the chair of St. Peter, Erasmus congratulated his old friend and school-fellow, but though repeatedly invited by him to come to Rome, with every offer of patronage and protection, he refused to trust himself into the hands of men whom he had in his writings and conversation offended, and with justice, for he soon discovered that the advice which he offered about healing the dissensions of the church, was received at the Vatican not only with indifference, but with evident marks of displeasure. The latter part of his life was spent chiefly at Basil, where his laborious studies, the precarious state of his health, and the malevolent reflections of his enemies, all tended to enfeeble his constitution. Though exasperated by Luther, who in his answer to his book, in a mixture of compliment, scorn, ridicule, and invective, called it "an excrement in a golden dish," and displeased with the philippics of Julius Scaliger against his "Ciceronianus," he still preserved that neutrality which either the love of ease, or more properly cowardice, had suggested him to follow. It is said that as his health declined he was flattered with a cardinal's hat, and with the highest preference of the court of Rome, which no doubt would have been lavished upon him, but he firmly resisted. He died at Basil, 12th July, 1536, aged 69, and was buried there in the cathedral, where a Latin inscription is placed on his tomb. Basil still retains her respect for the ashes of this great man, the house in which he died is shown with enthusiastic ceremony, and his cabinet, containing his ring, his seal, his sword, knife, pencil, and his will written by himself, and his picture by Holbein, is still visited with veneration by the curious.

Rotterdam also has not forgotten the celebrity she derives from giving birth to her favourite citizen. The house in which he was born is marked out to the admiration of the traveller by a becoming inscription, the college bears the name of Erasmus, and a beautiful copper statue erected in 1622, in an open part of the city, points out with how much pride the inhabitants reckon Erasmus in the number of their fellow-citizens. The person and the manners of Erasmus have been faithfully delineated by his friend Beatus Rhenanus, and his features are most correctly expressed by the pencil of Hans Holbein. Great and respectable as the character of Erasmus is, he had his failings. Too fickle in his attachments, and irresolute in his opinions, he has been censured by Le Clerc for lukewarmness, timidity, and unfairness in the reformation. Though disgusted with the superstition and hypocrisy of Rome, his meek spirit was equally hurt by the violence and animosity of the reformers, and perhaps to the prejudices of his early education may be ascribed the conduct he pursued in not warmly embracing the tenets of Luther. Indifferent to the success or jealous of the labours of the reformers, Erasmus claims the gratitude of posterity by the number and excellence of his writings, in the composition of which he spent a long and laborious life, in opposing ignorance and superstition, and in promoting literature and true piety. His works, which are very numerous, and which display the eloquence and the graces of Cicero, were correctly published in 10 vols. folio, by Le Clerc. The life of Erasmus has been given to the world by Dr. Jortin.

ERASTUS, Thomas, a physician and divine, born at Baden 1524. He was educated at Basil, and afterwards studied at Bologna, and after 10 years spent in Italy he returned to his native country. He practised physic with great reputation at Henneberg, and at the court of Frederic III. elector palatine, and became professor of physic at Heidelberg university. The disputes about the real presence at the sacrament engaged his pen, and he attended the conference held on the subject between the divines of Wirtemberg and the palatinate, and he eloquently maintained that the words flesh and blood are to be used metaphorically. He retired to Basil afterwards, where he died 31st December, 1583. Of his books on divinity the best known is "de excommunicatione ecclesiasticâ," published after his decease, which was attacked by various divines, who wished to maintain that the censures of the church extended beyond this life.

ERASTOSTHENES, a Greek philosopher of Cyrene, librarian at Alexandria. He first discovered the method of measuring the earth's circumference, and died 194 years before Christ.

ERCHEMBERT, a Lombard, in the ninth century, who from a soldier became a benedictine monk, and retired to the monastery of Monte Cassino. He wrote a chronicle of the Lombards, from 774 to 888, which is supposed to be lost, but an abridgment of it was published by Caraccioli, at Naples, 1620, in 4to. and by Camillus Peregrinus, 1643, 4to.

ERCILL-YA-CUNIGA, Don Alonzo d', a Spaniard, in the service of Maximilian. He was at the battle of St. Quintin under Philip II. in 1557, and afterwards travelled through France, England, and Italy. Animated with romantic bravery, he went to the attack of the Indians who had revolted in Chili and Peru, and he defeated them, and made his adventures the subject of his poem called Araucana. This poem, which consists of thirty-six cantos, contains many tedious repetitions, but it abounds in bold descriptions, and possesses all the charms of animated poetry. The best edition is that of Madrid, 1632, in 12mo.

ERCKERN, Lazarus, a German, superintendent of the mines of Hungary, the Tyrol, &c. He published a useful work on metallurgy, at Frankfort 1694, which has been translated into Latin.

ERCOLE, a painter, son of Carl Antonio, the pupil of his uncle Julio Cesare. He was patronised by the court of Savoy, and died 1676, aged 80.

EREMITA, Daniel, a native of Antwerp, intimate with Scaliger, and by his introduction with Cassaubon. He went with M. de Vic the ambassador to Switzerland, and by his persuasion was converted to the Romish religion. He was insinuating in his manners, but without principle, and in his conversation very licentious. He was by his intrigues recommended to the great duke of Florence, and obtained a pension for his verses on the marriage of the duke with Magdalen of Austria, 1600. He went in the suite of the duke's envoy to Germany, and made himself ridiculous on his return, by the bold and shameless untruths which he delivered. He became afterwards a deist, and died at Leghorn, 1617. His opera varia were published at Utrecht by Grævius, among which were his four books, de aulicâ vitâ ac civili, written with elegance, ease, and purity of style. He wrote besides Latin poems, and relatio de itinere Germanico, &c.—and de Helveticorum, &c. situ, &c.

ERIC IX. king of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, after Margaret, 1412, married the daughter of Henry IV. of England. His pilgrimage to the holy land, and his captivity in Syria, disordered the affairs of his kingdom, and on his return to Europe he found the Swedes dissatisfied with his government, and the Danes anxious to revolt from him, because he wished to render their crown hereditary and not elective. Though he attempted to maintain his authority by arms, he found opposition unavailing, he was solemnly deposed, 1439, and retired to Pomerania, where he died in privacy, 1459. He wrote in his exile a history of Denmark to the year 1288.

ERIC XIV. succeeded his father Gustavus on the throne of Sweden, and became the unsuccessful suitor of Elizabeth queen of England. His marriage with the daughter of an obscure peasant, rendered him unpopular and his people dissatisfied. His cruelties increased the general dissatisfaction, and he was at last obliged to resign the crown, 1568, and died in confinement, 1578.

ERIC, Peter, a Venetian admiral, who seized in 1584 a vessel which was carrying the widow of the bashaw of Tripoli to Constantinople with all her treasures. Not satisfied to obtain the gold, he put to death the sailors, and offered violence to the females, and then cut their bodies to pieces and threw them into the sea. This barbarity was punished, and Eric was beheaded by order of the Venetian senate, and his plundered riches restored to Amurath emperor of Turkey.

ERIGENA, John Scotus, a celebrated scholar in the ninth century, born at Ayr in Scotland, though others give him a Welsh, others an Irish origin. Eager in the pursuit of knowledge, he quitted his native country, where only ignorance and superstition prevailed, and travelled into foreign lands, and at Athens so perfected himself in classical and oriental literature and science that he proved the greatest philosopher and most learned man of the age. At the invitation of Charles the Bald he resided for some years at the French court, and the king offered him the most munificent and honourable patronage, and bore with the severity of his raillery with good humour and most forgiving composure. As the monarch and the philosopher sat one day opposite each other at table, Charles asked him in a merry mood, Pray, what is between a Scot and a sot? Nothing but the table, answered the bold courtier. The king heard the rebuke without being offended, but laughed heartily. Scotus in this happy retreat wrote some works at the recommendation of his royal patron, but though all admired his learning, the clergy were offended with the boldness with which he attacked their notions of predestination, and the doctrine of transubstantiation. His books therefore were regarded as heretical by Wemlo archbishop of Sens, and as they seemed to contain all the errors of Pelagius, they were attacked by Prudentius bishop of Troyes, and by Florus a deacon of Lyons. His next work was a translation of the works of Dionysius, which the Greek emperor had sent as a present to Charles, and which Erigena at the request of his sovereign presented to the world in a Latin dress. The work, as being considered though falsely the labour of Dionysius the Areopagite, the first Christian preacher of France, was received with gratitude by the western clergy, but as it attacked in some passages the acknowledged faith of the Romish church, pope Nicholas sent a threatening letter to the French king, desiring the banishment of Erigena, and his appearance at Rome. Charles had too much regard for his learned friend than to trust him into the hands of the pope, he therefore permitted him to escape to England. Here he was employed under Alfred in restoring literature in Oxford. According to Tanner he was in 879 professor of mathematics and astronomy in that university, and in consequence of some dispute, after three years' residence he retired to Malmesbury, where he opened a school. His severity in this place was said to be so great that his pupils murdered him with iron bodkins, the instruments with which they then wrote, though some imagine that the atrocious deed was committed at the instigation of the monks, who were jealous of Scotus for his learning and heterodoxy. This event is placed in the year 883, by some in 884, and by others in 886, but by Mackenzie in 874, ten years after his return to England. The most celebrated of Scotus's work is his treatise on the division of nature, published from the MS. by Dr. Gale 1681, Oxford. It is written with great acuteness and metaphysical subtilty, and must rank its author if not among atheistical philosophers, yet among fanatical enthusiasts.

ERINNA, a Grecian poetess, cotemporary with Sappho.

ERIZZO, Lewis and Mark Anthony, two brothers of a noble Venetian family. They conspired in the murder of their uncle, a senator of Ravenna, 1546, to obtain his great riches. Their bloody deed was discovered by a soldier, who was an accomplice, and Lewis was beheaded and Mark died in prison.

ERIZZO, Paul, a noble, of the same family, governor of Negropont. When obliged to capitulate to the Turks, on condition of having his life spared, Mahomet II. disregarding his promises, ordered him, 1469, to be sawn in two, and cut off, with his own hands, the head of his daughter, who indignantly refused to gratify his licentious passions.

ERIZZO, Sebastian, a noble Venetian, author of an Italian treatise on medals, 4to. Venice, 1571. He wrote also—des nouvelles en six journées 1567, 4to. and trattato della via inventrice e dell' instrumento de gli antichi, Venice, 1554. He died 1555.

ERRIVINS, a famous architect of Steinbach, who died 1305. He began the erection of Strasburg tower, which was not completed till 1449.

ERLACH, John Lewis, a native of Berne, of the head of the six families of that name, so illustrious in Switzerland. He chose a military life, and so distinguished himself in the service of France, especially in the taking of Brisach, 1639, and at the battle of Lens, 1648, that Lewis XIV. made him commander in chief of his troops on the defection of Turenne. He died 1650, aged 55, at Brisach, of which he was governor, when the French monarch was preparing to send him as a negotiator to Nuremberg, and to bestow upon him greater marks of honour and of confidence.

ERNESTI, John Augustus, a native of Tennstadt, professor of theology at Leipsic, and afterwards of ancient literature and eloquence. He died 1781, aged 74, universally respected for learning, and indefatigable zeal in the service of literature. Besides excellent editions of Cicero, Xenophon, Suetonius, Homer, Tacitus, Callimachus, &c. with learned notes, he published institutio interpretis Novi Testam. Leips. 1761—opuscula oratoria, orationes prolusiones et elogia, 8vo.—opusculorum, oratorum novum volumen, 8vo. 1791—opuscula critica, 8vo. &c.

EROSTRATUS or ERATOSTRATUS, an Ephesian, who, to acquire celebrity, set the temple of Diana on fire, B. C. 356.

ERPENIUS, Thomas, or Van Erpe in Dutch, a learned writer, born at Gorcum in Holland, 11th September, 1584. He studied at Leyden, where he took the degree of doctor in philosophy 1608, and afterwards travelled for four years into England, France, Italy, and Germany. His extensive learning, and the fame of his works, made him known to the learned of Europe, and among his friends and correspondents were Cassaubon, Joseph Scaliger, Bedell, Vossius, &c. In 1612 he was appointed professor of Arabic and of oriental languages at Leyden, where he died of a contagious disease, 13th November, 1624. His abilities were so much admired that he was earnestly solicited to settle in England, also in Italy, and in Spain, and his knowledge of Arabic was so correct that the emperor of Morocco showed his nobles, as a curiosity for its elegance and purity, a letter in Arabic, which he had received from him, as the interpreter and corresponding secretary of the states of Holland, to the powers of Asia and Africa. Though he was but 40 years old at the time of his death, yet he published 19 various works, on oriental history, and on subjects connected with his professorship, in which he displayed the great powers of his mind, and the vast stores of his retentive memory.

ERSKINE, Ralph, a Scotch divine, born at Alloa, 1628, and educated there and at Edinburgh, where he took his degree of M. A. He was made minister of Falkirk in 1654, but ejected for nonconformity, 1662, and when afterwards imprisoned by the persecution of his enemies, he was liberated by the influence of his kinsman, the Earl of Mar. On the re-establishment of the presbytery by the toleration act of James II. he was made, 1690, minister of Churnside, Berwick, where he died 1696, aged 68. He left some Latin MSS. on difficult passages of Scripture, never published.

ERSKINE, Ebenezer, son to the preceding, was born 1680, in the prison of Bass, where his father was confined in the persecutions of the times. In 1701, he took his master's degree at Edinburgh, and the next year was ordained minister of Portmoak, Fifeshire, from whence he removed, in 1728, to Stirling. In 1747, in consequence of some disputes with the clergy, he joined the seceders called burghers, and died at Stirling, 1755, aged 75. Four volumes of his sermons were printed at Glasgow, 1702, 8vo. and a fifth at Edinburgh, 1765.

ERSKINE, Ralph, brother to the preceding, was born at Roxburgh, 1682, and educated at Edinburgh, where he took his master's degree 1704. He was minister of Dunfermline, Fifeshire, 1711, and was deposed by the general assembly 1734, for joining the seceders. He died 1751, aged 69, much respected as a divine and as a preacher. His works were published two vols. fol. 1760, consisting of a polemical treatise, gospel sonnets, and above 200 sermons, &c.

ERSKINE, James, lord Alva, was born at Edinburgh 20th June, 1722, and made one of the barons of the Scotch exchequer, 1754, which he resigned in 1761, on being appointed to the supreme civil court of Scotland. He assumed the name of lord Barjarg, which he afterwards exchanged for that of Alva. He died at Drumsheugh, near Edinburgh, 13th May, 1796. He was twice married, and had children only by his first wife, two sons and two daughters.

ERVING, William, who bequeathed to Harvard College, Massachusetts, 1000*l.* towards establishing a professorship of chymistry and materia medica, was a graduate of that institution, and obtained his degree in 1753. He served for some time as an officer in the British army, but quit it on the commencement of the American revolution. He died at Roxbury, Massachusetts in 1791.

ERYLEBEN, John Christian Polycarp, a native of Quedlinburg, who studied at Göttingen, and gave lectures in physic, the veterinary art, and natural history. He was an able naturalist, and his principles of natural history, in 8vo. 1768, are particularly admired. He died 1771, aged 33.

ERYCEIRA, Ferdinand de Meneses count d', was born at Lisbon 1614, and distinguished himself in military affairs, as governor of Penicha and of Tangiers. He was also an able historian, and wrote the history of Tangiers, fol. printed 1723,—history of Portugal, 2 vols. folio, from 1640 to 1657,—and the life of John I. king of Portugal.

ERYCEIRA, Francis Xavier de Meneses count d', great-grandson of the foregoing, was born at Lisbon, 1673, and died 1743. He was known also as a literary and military character. He was honoured by several princes, and many learned men, and by the present of their works and other munificent donations, he increased the valuable library of his ancestors with 15,000 new volumes, and 1000 manuscripts. He wrote above 100 different publications, the best known of which, are his memoirs on the value of the coins of Portugal,—reflections on academical studies,—58 parallels of illustrious men,—and 12 of illustrious women,—the Henriade of Voltaire, translated, with observations, &c. 4to. &c.

ERYTROPILUS, Rupert, a German divine, in the 17th century, minister of Hanover, who wrote a methodical commentary on the history of the passion—and catenæ aureæ in harmoniam evangelicam, 4to.

ES, James Van, a painter of Antwerp, well known for his pictures of birds, flowers, fishes, and fruit. His lobsters, crabs, oysters, &c. are incomparable, and in his grapes, nature is so skilfully imitated, that the stones are visible through the skin.

ESAU, son of Isaac and Rebecca, sold his rights of primogeniture to his brother Jacob, who afterwards also obtained by artifice his father's blessing. This conduct of Jacob proved so offensive to Esau, that he meditated his death, but though he caused him to fly into Mesopotomia, he was afterwards reconciled to him. He was the father of the Edomites, and died about 1710 B.C. aged 126.

ESCALO, Mastin de P, was elected podestat of Verona 1259, but though prudent and humane in the administration of affairs, he raised himself enemies by whom he was assassinated, 1273. The sovereign authority remained however in his family, and his descendant Mastino III. added Vicenza, Brescia, and even Padua to his dominions. His tyranny at last was repressed by the Venetians, and he died 1387, after a life of cruelty and perilous adventures. The families of l'Escalo and the Carraras of Padua had long and bloody contests, but Verona at last became independent till overpowered by the intrigues of her neighbours.

ESCALQUENS, William, capitou of Toulouse, 1326, rendered himself known by causing himself to be carried in a coffin, with all the funeral pomp of a departed saint, to the cathedral, and after the completion of the solemnity, inviting the attendants of this ridiculous ceremony to a sumptuous entertainment. The circumstance was agitated by the bishop and clergy in full council, and it was forbidden to practise such superstitious ceremonies on pain of excommunication. Charles V. however, renewed it in Spain about 200 years after.

ESCOBAR, Bartholomew, a learned Jesuit of Seville, who went to America as a monk employed in works of charity. He died at Lima, 1624, aged 66. He wrote some religious pieces in Latin, scarce known in Spain.

ESCOBAR, Marine d', a native of Valladolid, who died 9th June, 1633, aged 79, and is known as the foundress of the reconciliation of St. Bridget in Spain. Her memoirs have been written in folio, by father Dupont, her confessor.

ESCOBAR, Anthony, a Spanish Jesuit, surnamed of Mendoza, who died 4th July, 1669, aged 80. His works, which are theological, in 16 vols. folio, and his principles of morality in 7 vols. folio, have been ridiculed by Pascal.

ESCOUBLEAU, Francis d', cardinal de Sourdis, archbishop of Bourdeaux, was a great favourite with pope Leo IX. and his four successors. He was a warm advocate for church discipline. He died 8th February, 1686, aged 53.

ESCOUBLEAU, Henry d', brother and successor to the preceding, as archbishop of Bourdeaux. He was at the siege of Rochelle, under Lewis XIII. and at the retaking of the isles of Lerins under Harcourt. He quarrelled with the duke of Epemon, who struck him a blow, which was punished by the excommunication of the guilty lord, which disgrace, however, was removed by his falling on his knees before the haughty prelate. He died 1645.

ESCURÉ, N. de P', one of the generals of La Vendée, remarkable for his loyalty, courage, and virtues. With a small force he defeated the more numerous army of the republicans at Thouars, but unfortunately was wounded at the battle of Chollet, and died in consequence of the wounds, 1794, aged 26.

ESPAGNAC, John Baptist Joseph de Saligny Damarzil, baron d', a French general, born at Brive-la-Gaillarde, 25th March, 1713, and died at Paris, 23th February, 1783. He signalized himself in the campaigns of Italy and Bavaria, and was made major-general of the army under marshal Saxe, and as governor of the Hotel-des-invalides, he introduced some useful regulations. He wrote several books on the military profession, among which are his campagnes du roi, 1745, &c. 4 vols. 8vo. essai sur la science de la guerre, a valuable work, 3 vols. 8vo.—Histoire du marechal de Saxe, 3 vols. 4to. &c. He had four sons and a daughter by his wife baroness de Beyer.

ESPAGNANDEL, Matthew P', an eminent sculptor, who, though a protestant, adorned several of the Paris churches, and also the park of Versailles, by his works. He lived at the conclusion of the 17th century.

ESPAGNE, John d', a native of Dauphiné, who came to England in James's reign, and officiated as minister of a French protestant congregation in London, till the restoration. He wrote a treatise of some merit on popular errors in religion, with some strictures on Calvin's principles, dedicated to Charles I. His works appeared together in 2 vols. 12mo. 1674, Hague.

ESPAGNET, John d', president of the parliament of Bourdeaux, became known by his Enchiridion physicae restitutæ, in which he establishes a complete system of physics contrary to the tenets of Aristotle. He considers earth and water to be the only elements, and he places the real fire of the world in the sun, which he calls the eye, not only of the universe but of the Creator. He wrote also arcanum hermeticae philosophiæ opus, on the philosopher's stone, &c. In 1616 he published an old manuscript, called le Rozier des guerres, of which an earlier edition had appeared in 1523.

ESPAGNOLET, Joseph Riberia P', a Spanish painter, born at Xativa, in Valencia, 1580. He studied the manner of Caravaggio, and surpassed him in correctness. In poverty he was extremely happy in his delineations, but prosperity rendered him indolent, and regardless of his art. The countenances of his figures were extremely expressive, and he was particularly successful in the representation of terror, anguish, and ferocity. He was patronised at Naples, where he died 1656, aged 76. His chief works are preserved in the Escorial and at Naples.

ESPARRON, Charles d'Arcussia Viscount d', a Provençal nobleman, who wrote a valuable treatise on hawking and falconry, 4to. Rouen, 1644, amusements to which he was very partial.

ESPEN, Zeger Bernard Van, was born 1646, at Louvain, where he became professor of laws. His observations on the formulary, and on the bull unigenitus, proved the sources of great bitterness to him, so that to avoid persecution, he retired to Maestricht, and afterwards to Amersfort, where he died 2d October, 1728, aged 83. His works, which are considered as valuable, especially his jus ecclesiasticum universum, were published at Paris, 1753, in 4 vols. folio.

ESPEUCE, Claude d', a native of Chalons-sur-Marne, rector of the university of Paris, and doctor of the Sorbonne. He attended the cardinal de Lorraine in Flanders, and likewise at Rome, 1555, where he displayed so much eloquence as an orator, that the pope Paul IV. wished to bestow on him a cardinal's hat, which he refused. He died of the stone at Paris, 5th October, 1571, aged 60. He was a man of great learning and moderation. He wrote some commentaries on Paul's epistles to Timothy and Titus, and some controversial tracts. His Latin works were printed 1619, folio, Paris.

ESPER, John Frederic, a native of Drosensfeld, in Bayreuth, who studied at Erlangen, and applied himself to botany and natural history. He wrote an accurate description of the lately discovered zoolites of unknown animals, and of several eavens, &c. Nuremberg, fol. 1774, a method of determining the orbits of the comets, and other celestial bodies, without astronomical instruments and mathematical calculations, &c. He died 1781, aged 49.

ESPERIENTE, Philip Callimachus, a native of St. Gemignano, in Tuscany, who under Pius II. formed an academy, the members of which assumed Greek or Latin names. Under Paul, Pius's successor, the academy was considered as an assembly of scditionous men, and the founder therefore fled to Poland, where he became preceptor to the children of king Casimir III. He was also employed as ambassador to Constantinople, Vienna, Venice, and Rome, and on his return to Poland, an accidental fire destroyed his house, library, and manuscripts, and overwhelmed him with grief. He died soon after at Cracow, 1496. His works are commentarii rerum Persicarum, folio—historia de iis quæ a Venetis tentata sunt, Persis et Tartaris contra Turcas movendis,—Attila historia de rege Vladislao, 4to.

ESPREMENIL, James Duval d', a Frenchman, born at Pondicherry, the nephew and heir of Duval de Leyril, the governor of the city, and the accuser of Lally. He became an advocate, and counsellor of the parliament of Paris, and was remarkable for his violent proceedings during the revolution. He was guillotined April 23d, 1794. He was asked by his old opponent Chapelier, as he was going to the scaffold with him, To which of us two are the shouts of the mob addressed? To both, replied D'Espremenil. He wrote remonstrances, published by the parliament 1788,—nullity and despotism of the assembly, 8vo. actual state of France, 1790, 8vo.

ESPRIT, James, an agreeable writer, born at Beziers, 1611. For five years he was member of the oratory, which he quitted, and afterwards became, by his wit, sense, and elegant manners, the friend of Seguier, Rochefoucault, and Conti. He was member of the French academy, and died 1678, aged 67. He wrote paraphrases on the psalms, the fallacy of human virtues, 2 vols. 12mo. which is a commentary on Rochefoucault's reflections.

ESSARS, Pierre des, a French nobleman, who served in the Scotch army against the English, and was taken prisoner, in 1402. On his return to France he attached himself to the duke of Burgundy, by whom he was raised to places of trust and honour, but he became suspected of partiality to the duke of Guienne, and fled to Cherbourg, of which he was the governor. In 1413 he secretly returned to Paris, and was thrust into the bastille, and soon after condemned, and he lost his head, 1st July, 1413. His body was interred in the Mathurins' church, by his widow, who obtained the restitution of his property.

ESSARS, Charlotte des, countess of Remorentin, and daughter of lieutenant-general des Essars in Champagne, was a lady of great beauty. She was in England with the countess de Beaumont, and on her return to France, she was introduced, 1590, to Henry IV. by whom she had two children, afterwards legitimated. She afterwards lived with Louis de Lorraine, cardinal de Guise, by whom she had a son called the chevalier de Romerentin, and she married, in 1638, marshal de l'Hopital, known under the name of Hallier. Her wishes to advance her son Romerentin by her intrigues proved fatal to her, as she fell under the resentment of the French king and Richelieu, by whom she was arrested, and placed in confinement, where she died 1651.

ESSEX, James, F.A.S. was born 1723, and distinguished himself by his great knowledge of architecture. He repaired and improved King's college chapel, Cambridge, and the cathedrals of Ely and Lincoln, besides other colleges in Cambridge, which will remain lasting monuments of his great skill and judgment. His proposals for publishing plans and sections of King's college chapel, appeared in the Brit. Topog. vol. 1. p. 237, and he enriched that valuable collection with many other curious and ingenious communications. He died 14th September, 1784, in his 61st year, at Cambridge, his native town, where his father had acquired some property as a carpenter.

ESTAING, Charles Henry count d', a French admiral, born in Auvergne. He was under Lally in the East Indies, and escaped from an English prison, by breaking his parole. He was commander of the French squadrons in the American war, and he took Grenada. At the revolution he became member of the assembly of notables, and was at last guillotined 29th April, 1793, as a suspected character.

ESTAMPES, Anne of Pisseleu, dutchess of, a woman of great beauty, daughter of de Heilli. She attended, as maid of honour, Louisa of Savoy, when she went to meet her son Francis I. of France at Madrid, and she was no sooner seen than loved by the amorous monarch. Though Francis forgot himself in the arms of his favourite mistress, he yet attempted to cover her dishonour by marrying her to one of his flatterers, whom he created duke of Estampes. In the declining years of the monarch, the dutchess, who still possessed the influence of her charms, entered into correspondence with the emperor Charles V. to counteract the views of the dauphin, afterwards Henry II. and of his mistress Diana de Poitiers; and by informing the foreign monarch of the plans of the court she gained his confidence, and ensured his promises towards the duke of Orleans, the dauphin's brother, whose cause she espoused. By her perfidious communications Charles, at the head of an almost mutinous and famished army, was enabled suddenly to take Epernay and Chateau-Tierri, where the magazines of the French troops were deposited without apprehension of attack; and as no measures were taken by the dauphin without consultation with Francis, every secret was imparted to the faithless mistress, and by her to the enemy, so that the ruin of the kingdom seemed inevitable. A quarrel however arose between Charles and Henry VIII. of England, and the peace of Cressy saved France. After the death of Francis the worthless favourite returned to her country seat, and was saved from the prosecution of her husband, who wished to punish her for adultery, by the interference of the reigning monarch. She died a protestant.

ESTAMPES, Leonor d', bishop of Chartres in 1620, and in 1641 archbishop of Rheims, was zealous in the assembly of the French clergy against the Jesuits, 1626, who in two publications had attacked the authority of the king in church affairs. The censure of d'Estampes was however resisted, and the French clergy showed such influence that in the states general of 1614 the tiers etat could never obtain the declaration, "that no power, temporal or spiritual, has the right to dispose of the kingdom, and to dispense the subjects from their oaths of fidelity." The monks, however, were silenced by pope Benedict XIV.

ESTCOURT, Richard, a native of Tewkes-

bury, Gloucestershire, who at the age of 15 escaped from his friends and joined a company of strolling players at Worcester, where he first appeared on the stage in women's clothes, in the part of Roxana in Alexander the Great. His disguise did not prevent his discovery, he was pursued to Chipping-Norton, by his father, who immediately bound him to an apothecary in Hatton-garden, London. In this engagement he continued till business failed him, though others declare he quitted his master abruptly, and wandered about the country for two years. He went afterwards to Ireland, where he was well received, and appeared at Drury-lane for the first time, in the part of Dominic in the Spanish Fryar. His chief merit consisted in mimicry. Without great powers of his own, he could imitate with wonderful success the greatest players of the time, though he frequently offended the audience by the introduction of sentences which the author never wrote. He became, by his manners and conversation, a great favourite of the town, and when the chief wits and leading men of the times, and among them the duke of Marlborough, erected the beef steak club, Estcourt was appointed providore, and wore as the badge of his office, a gold gridiron suspended from his neck by a green silk ribbon. Some years before his death he quitted the stage. He died 1713, and was buried at St. Paul's, Covent-garden. He left two dramatic pieces, Fair example, a comedy, 1706, 4to. and Prunella, an interlude, 4to.

ESTHER, a Jewess, mistress to Casimir III. king of Poland, in the 14th century, from whom she obtained great privileges for her nation.

ESTHER, a Jewish maid, of the tribe of Benjamin, whom Ahasuerus king of Persia took for his wife, after his divorce from Vashti. She had the good fortune to defeat the machinations of Haman against her nation, and she saw her cousin Mordecai raised to the same honours which the fallen favourite possessed. This great deliverance of the Jews was celebrated by a particular feast called Purim. The Ahasuerus of Scripture is supposed to be Darius son of Hystaspes.

ESTIUS, William, a native of Gorcum in Holland, divinity professor, and chancellor of Douay university, where he died 1613, aged 71. He was author of commentaries on the epistles, two vols.—annotationes in præcipua et difficiliora Scripturæ loca, fol.—martyri Edmundi Campiani, &c.

ESTOILE, Pierre, de l', grand auditor of the chancery of Paris, died 1611. From his MSS. were published his journal of Henry III. beginning May, 1574, to August, 1589, improved by du Fresnoy, 1744, 5 vols. 8vo.—Journal of the reign of Henry IV.

four vols. 8vo. improved also by du Fresnoy. These works are valuable, and illustrate the private history of France. The author under the character of ease and openness, conceals a severe and sarcastic disposition.

ESTOILE, Claude de l', son of the preceding, was member of the French academy 1632, and died 1652, aged 54. He was one of the five authors consulted by Richelieu in the making of his bad plays. D'Estoile wrote some poems and plays, and said that, like Moliere and Malherbe, he read his pieces for the stage to his maid-servant, on whose approbation, proceeding from simple and ingenuous motives, he could depend. His odes are published in the recueil des poetes Francois, 1692, five vols. 12mo.

ESTOUTEVILLE, William d', of an illustrious Norman family, was archbishop of Rouen, and a cardinal. He reformed the university of Paris, and enjoyed the confidence of Charles VII. and Lewis XI. and was a man of great firmness of character, and of the strictest integrity, and very charitable. He died at Rome 22d December, 1483, aged 80. Besides his archbishopric he held six bishoprics in France and Italy, four abbeys, and three grand priories, and was dean of the cardinals.

ESTRADES, Godfrey count d', marshal of France, and viceroy of America, was also an able negotiator. He was ambassador in England in 1661, and the next year he negotiated with Charles II. for the evacuation of Dunkirk, which he effected, though contrary to the wishes of the English parliament. In 1666, he had a dispute with Vatteville the Spanish ambassador, about the precedency in London, and the year following he negotiated the peace of Breda, and in 1673, assisted at the conferences of Nimeguen. He died 26th February, 1686, aged 79. His negotiations were printed at the Hague 1742, nine vols. 12mo. from the originals, which consisted of 22 vols. fol.

ESTREES, John d', page to queen Anne of Brittany, was afterwards grand master of the artillery of France, and died 1567, aged 81. He distinguished himself greatly in several battles, and especially at the taking of Calais 1558. He improved the manner of casting cannon. He was the first gentleman of Picardy who embraced the protestant religion.

ESTREES, Francis, Annibal d', son of the preceding, was born in 1573, and embraced the ecclesiastical profession, and was made bishop of Laon by Henry IV. He soon however quitted the church for the army, and distinguished himself at the taking of Treves, and by other military exploits. He was made duke, peer, and marshal of France, and was employed in 1636, as ambassador to the court of Rome, where he offended the pope Urban and his nephews, for which he was recalled. He died at Paris 5th May, 1670, aged 98. He wrote in an unadorned style, but with great fidelity, memoirs of the regency of Mary de Medicis, printed 1666, 12mo. and relation of the siege of Mantua in 1630, and another of the conclave which elected Gregory XV. pope, 1621.

ESTREES, Cæsar d', cardinal, abbot of St. Germain des Prés, was son of the preceding, and was born 1628. He was made bishop of Laon 1653, and produced a reconciliation between the pope's nuncio, and four of the French bishops who resisted his authority. He was afterwards employed by the French king at the court of Bavaria, and also at Rome, where he skillfully conducted himself to procure the elections of the popes Alexander VIII. Innocent XII. and Clement XI. He accompanied Philip V. when he took possession of the Spanish throne, and he died 18th December, 1714, aged 87, respected as an able negotiator, a benevolent man, and an agreeable companion.

ESTREES, Gabrielle d', sister of Francis Annibal d'Estrées, became the favourite mistress of Henry IV. who saw her first in 1591, at the castle of Cœuvres. The king was so partial to her that to please her he embraced the popish religion, and determined to marry her, though he was himself married to Margaret de Valois. While engaged in procuring the divorce, Gabrielle died suddenly, 10th April, 1599. It was suspected that she was poisoned by the financier Zamet, as her head the day after her death was so distorted that her beautiful features had totally disappeared. During her amours she had married d'Amerval, lord of Liancourt, with whom however she never cohabited. She had three children by Henry. The king put on mourning for her, and honoured her memory as if she had been a queen. Though passionately fond of her, Henry did not however forget his duties to his subjects; and when Gabrielle was displeased with some of his ministers, and solicited their dismissal, he firmly replied that he would sooner part with ten mistresses than one of his favourite and long-tried servants.

ESTREES, Victor Marie d', vice admiral of France, after his father John, was born 1660. He bombarded Barcelona and Alicant, 1691, and again in 1697 he besieged Barcelona. In 1701 he was made commander-in-chief of the French and Spanish fleets, and in 1703 was created marshal of France, and afterwards grandee of Spain, and knight of the golden fleece. He was a man well acquainted with literature, as he was member of several learned bodies. He died at Paris 28th December, 1737, aged 77.

ESTREES, Lewis Cæsar duke d', marshal of France and minister of state, was born first July, 1695. His father was Francis Michael le Tellier de Courtanvaux, and by his mother he was descended from John count d'Estrées, vice-admiral of France. He first distinguished himself in the war against Spain, and afterwards in the war of 1741, where, at the blockade of Egra, the battle of Fontenoi, the sieges of Mons and Charleroi, and the victory of Lafeldt, under marshal Saxe, his bravery was conspicuous, and his services were most meritorious. In the war of 1756 he was placed at the head of the French forces in Germany, and he gave battle to the duke of Cumberland at Hastenback, and paved the way for the success of Closterseven, which Richelieu, who superseded him through intrigue, obtained over the Hanoverians. He was made a duke in 1763, and died 1771, second January, aged 76, leaving no children behind him.

ETHELBERT, king of Kent, became a Christian by the preaching of Austin, who came to England at the invitation of Bertha the queen, daughter of Caribert king of France. He enacted a code of laws, and died 616, in the 56th year of his reign.

ETHELBERT, second son of Ethelwolf, succeeded his brother Ethelbald as king of England 860, and was a popular and benevolent prince.

ETHELRED, son of Edgar, was king of England after his brother Edward the Martyr, 978. To deliver himself from the oppressive tax which he paid to the Danes, called Danegelt, he caused those unfortunate foreigners to be all murdered, in consequence of which Sweyn, the Danish king, invaded the kingdom, and obliged him to fly to Normandy. After Sweyn's death he resumed his authority, and died 1016.

ETHELWOLF, king of England 838, went to Rome to improve the education of his son, the great Alfred. He died 857, and was buried at Winchester.

ETHEREGE, George, a dramatic writer, born 1636, of an ancient family in Oxfordshire. It is supposed that he studied at Cambridge, and afterwards applied himself to the law at one of the inns of court in London. His comedy of "The comical revenge, or love in a tub," appeared in 1664, and recommended him to the wits of the times, to Charles duke of Dorset, Villiers, duke of Bucks, Wilmot earl of Rochester, sir Car Scroop, Sedley, Saville, &c. in whose company he shone as a man of humour, lively in his conversation, and of a refined taste. His second play appeared with equal applause in 1668, called "She would if she could," and the last in 1676, called the "Man of mode, or sir Fopling Flutter." Of these three plays the last was the most finished, and as it represented the characters and censures on the vices of some of the fashionable men of the times, it was for some time very popular. His gayety and intemperance rendered him poor, but to recruit his finances, he paid his addresses to a rich old widow, who however refused to marry him except he was knighted; and to make her a lady, therefore, and obtain her fortune, he solicited the honour of knighthood, which was conferred about 1683. Etherege, whose manners were so fascinating that he was humorously called gentle George, and easy Etherege, was greatly patronised by the dutchess of York, in whose household he was, and by whose influence he was sent ambassador abroad. He was at Ratisbon, in 1683, where, after entertaining some company, and probably drinking with more freedom than prudence, he tumbled down stairs and broke his neck, though some accounts state that he followed his master James II. to France upon his abdication, and died soon after. Etherege had no children by his wife, but he had a daughter by Mrs. Barry, the actress, with whom in those days of licentiousness and general depravity he lived. Besides his plays he wrote various sonnets, songs, and short poems, which with great ease and elegance contain the voluptuous descriptions, and the immoral levities which were so fashionable in the reign of Charles II. His comedies, though very popular, are not free from licentiousness; and however we may admire the politeness of the dialogue, the sprightliness of the conversation, the faithful delineation of the characters, and the interesting intricacies of the plots, yet the loose tendency and the impurities of the whole cannot escape the severest censures of every friend of virtue and morality. Sir George Etherege had a brother, who was a soldier in the wars of king William, and who died at Ealing, in Middlesex, about the third or fourth of George I.

ETHRYG, George, or Etheridge, or Edrycus, a native of Thame, Oxfordshire, educated at Corpus Christi college, Oxford, of which he became fellow 1539. In 1553 he was appointed king's Greek professor, but in Elizabeth's reign he was dismissed from the office in consequence of the persecution which he had encouraged against the protestants in Mary's reign. He then practised medicine at Oxford with success, and engaged in the education of young persons of his persuasion, though he was exposed to severe trials on account of his popish tenets. He was living in 1588, but the year of his death is unknown. He excelled in the knowledge not only of the Greek and Hebrew, and of medicine, but also of music. Some of his musical compositions and of his Latin poems are extant in manuscript.

Steirmark, in the beginning of the 18th century. He wrote Synopsis rei nummarie veterum, Steyer. 1724, 12mo.

ETTMULLER, Michael, a physician, born at Leipsic, 26th May, 1644, where he took his degree of M.D. 1666. After travelling through France, England, Holland, and Italy, he was appointed assessor of the medicinal faculty 1676, and in 1681 professor of botany. He died in consequence of an unsuccessful operation in chymistry, March 9th, 1683. He wrote several things on medicinal subjects, and some of his works were published by his son at Frankfurt, 1708, and afterwards by professor Cyrillo, five volumes, folio, Naples, 1729.

ETTMULLER, Michael Erne St., son of the preceding, was born at Leipsic 26th August, 1673, and educated there and at Wittemberg. He took his degree of M.D. at Leipsic, 1699, after visiting England, Holland, and Germany, and was elected professor of anatomy and surgery at the Lazaretto, Leipsic, 1706, and after many honourable appointments he was made in 1730 director of the imperial academy of naturæ curiosorum, and died 25th September, 1732. He published his father's works, with a preface, and wrote several learned and curious treatises on medical subjects.

EVAGORAS, king of Cyprus, was defeated by the Persians, and was assassinated 374, B.C. His grandson of the same name was deposed by his uncle Protagoras, and at last put to death by Artaxerxes Ochus.

EVAGORAS, a Greek writer in the age of Augustus, author of a history of Egypt, &c.

EVAGRIUS, a monk of the fifth century, author of Altercatio Simonis Judæi et Theophili Christiani.

EVAGRIUS, a bishop of Antioch, whose election was disputed by Flavianus. He died 392.

EVAGRIUS, Scolasticus, a historian of Epiphania, in Syria, in the sixth century, author of six books of ecclesiastical history from 431 to 594, printed Paris, 1544, and edited again, Cambridge, 1720, fol.

EVAGRIUS, Ponticus or Hyperborita, a monk of the fourth century, surnamed Ponticus, from the place of his birth. He was archdeacon of Constantinople, and wrote some treatises, in which he espoused the tenets of Origen.

EVANGELISTA, a capuchin of Canobio, in the Milanese, who was general of his order, and died after his return from the council of Trent, 1595, aged 84. He was also a learned civilian, and wrote consulta varia in jure canonico, &c.—Annotationes in L. L. decretalium, Milan, 1591.

EVANS, Cornelius, son of a Welchman, by a Provence woman, was born at Mar-scilles. During the civil wars he played the part of an impostor, and came to an inn at Sandwich, in 1648, pretending that he was the prince of Wales who had escaped from France. When the imposition was discovered he was sent to Newgate, but he had the dexterity to extricate himself from confinement, and though search was made after him, it never was known what became of him.

EVANS, Arise, a Welch conjurer, brought up at Oxford. He took orders, and resided on a curacy at Enfield, in Staffordshire, from which place he fled on account of the irregularities and the immorality of his conduct. He came to London in 1632, where Lilly learned astrology under him. He was considered as so powerful in the management of supernatural beings, that he was solicited by lord Bothwell and sir Kenelm Digby to show them a spirit. At the appointed time, when all were within the magical circle, and after some invocations, Evans was suddenly carried out of the room, and thrown into a field at Battersea-causey, near the Thames, where he was found by a countryman the next morning asleep. These astrological incantations were the fashionable study in the reign of Elizabeth and James I. and when nobles and learned men lent their influence to the profession, it is no wonder the vulgar believed them. Evans died about the time of the rebellion.

EVANS, Abel, known best by the name of Dr. Evans the epigrammatist, was of St. John's college, Oxford, where he took his degree of M.A. 1699, and of D.D. 1711. He was intimate with the wits and poets of the times, especially Pope, dean Swift, &c. He was vicar of St. Giles's, Oxford, and bursar of his college. His poetry is now forgotten. A good specimen of it may be seen in Nichols's select collections, especially his "apparition," &c. and "Vertumnus," and some epigrams.

EVANS, John, D.D. a dissenting minister, born in Shropshire, 1680. He was ordained minister of a meeting in Shropshire, and in 1716 succeeded Dr. Williams as pastor in Petty France, Westminster. He was popular as a preacher. He printed some occasional sermons, but his thirty-eight sermons on the Christian temper is his best work, in great esteem with many divines. He died of the dropsy, 1732, aged 52.

EVANS, Caleb, a native of Bristol, where his father was a dissenting baptist minister. He became also himself a preacher, and instructed young people for the dissenting ministry. He was made D.D. by the king's college, Aberdeen, and died 1791, aged 54. He published Scripture doctrine of the Son and Holy Spirit—hymns for public worship—address to serious professors of Christianity—the doctrine of atonement, or Christ crucified.

EVANS, Evan, a native of Cardiganshire, educated at Jesus college, Oxford. Though a clergyman, he obtained no preferment, but unfortunately addicted himself to intemperate drinking, and died 1790, aged 60. He published two vols. of sermons by Tillotson and others, translated into Welch—the love of our country, an English poem—dissertatio de bardis, with specimens of Welch poetry, 4to.

EVANS, John, deputy governor of Pennsylvania, arrived in that capacity December, 1703. His administration was unpopular, and he was removed by impeachment. Gookin succeeded him in March, 1709.  L.

EVANS, Nathaniel, minister and poet, was born in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, in 1742, and graduated at the college in that city in 1765. Having been ordained by the bishop of London, he entered on a mission near the close of that year, under the patronage of the Society for Propagating the Gospel, in Gloucester county, New-Jersey, where, after labouring nearly ten years, he died 29th October, 1767. He had a high reputation for talents, and left a variety of manuscripts, from which a selection of poetry and prose was soon after published.  L.

EVANSON, Edward, a native of Warrington, educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, after which he became curate to his uncle at Mitcham, Surrey, and then obtained in 1768 South Mimms living, Middlesex. In 1770 he was presented to the living of Tewkesbury, Gloucestershire, and afterwards to Longdon, Worcestershire. His conduct in these parishes, and the alterations which he presumed to introduce in the liturgy and in the forms of the church duty, highly offended his auditors; but, though he escaped the punishment of the ecclesiastical law, from some irregularity in the proceedings adopted against him, his unpopularity continued to increase, and he resigned his livings in 1778. He afterwards resided at Mitcham, where he took some pupils, and he died at Colford, Gloucestershire, 25th September, 1805, aged 74. He published without his name in 1772, the doctrines of a trinity and the incarnation of God, examined on the principles of reason and common sense, &c.—the dissonance of the four generally received evangelists, 1792, 8vo.—Argument against and for the observance of Sunday, &c.—letter to Dr. Priestley—reflection on the state of religion in christendom, &c.—and he was also engaged in a controversy with bishop Hurd, on the subject of prophecy. An account of the prosecution established against him was published 1774, fol.

EVANTIUS, an old Latin poet, who wrote “de ambiguis, sive hybridis animalibus,” generally printed with Petronius et Achrosticon in funus genitoris sui Nicholai,” inserted among the works of Eugenius of Toledo.

EVANTUS, called also Evantius, Eventius, and Aventius, a bishop of Vienne in the sixth century. He assisted at several councils, and died 586.

EVARISTUS, bishop of Rome, 100, was martyred nine years after. He gave to the emperor an excellent apology for the Christian religion.

EBULIDES, a philosopher of Miletus, author of some comedies, and a tract against Aristotle.

EUCHADIUS, Augustinus, a Latin historian, author of “vitæ octo imperatorum et descriptio Danubii,” preserved in the library at Vienna.

EUCHARIUS, or HOUCARIUS, Eligius, a divine and poet of Ghent, who studied at Paris, and then settled in his native country, in the beginning of the 16th century. He wrote the lives of St. Levinus, Coleta, and Bertulfus—a comedy of the patience of Chryselleis—panegyric of St. Agnes and Catherine—and some other works.

EUCHERIUS, archbishop of Lyons, was canonized for his great piety. He assisted at some councils, and wrote various works, in the ascetic taste of the times; and died about 454.

EUCLED, a celebrated mathematician of Alexandria, whose books of geometry are well known. Ptolemy was among his pupils. He flourished B. C. 300.

EUCLED, a philosopher of Megara, the disciple of Socrates, and the founder of the sect of wranglers.

EUDÆMON, John Andrew, a Jesuit, born in the Island of Candia, died at Rome 1625. The best known of his works is “admonitio ad regem Ludovicum XIII.” 4to. which was censured by the Sorbonne, and the assembly of the clergy, and answered by Garasse.

EUDES, John, brother of the historian Mezerai, was born at Rye, in the diocese of Sees, in 1601. In 1643, he founded the congregation of the Eudists, which greatly increased in Normandy and Brittany. He died at Caen 19th August, 1630, aged 79, and left several devotional works.

EUDOCIA, or ATHENAI, an Athenian lady, daughter of the philosopher Leontius. When left little property by her father, who bequeathed his inheritance to his two sons, she went to Constantinople, and became the favourite of the empress Pulcheria, and in 421, married the emperor Theodosius, who, in a fit of jealousy, divorced her. She retired upon this to Jerusalem, where she died, devoted to religious duties, 460. She wrote some Greek poems, &c.

EUDOCIA, or EUDOXIA, surnamed Macrembolitissa, ascended the imperial throne of Constantinople at the death of her husband, Constantine Ducas, 1067. One of her generals, Romanus Diogenes, conspired against her; but the empress condemned him to death, and afterwards, struck with the elegance of his person, she pardoned him, and when he had retrieved his character by valour and fidelity, she made him her husband. In 1071, her son Michael proclaimed himself emperor, and shut up his mother in a monastery, where she ended her days in devotion and study. Some MSS. of her writing on mythology, &c. were preserved in the French king's library.

EUDOCIA, Feodoreuna, daughter of the boyar Feodor Lapookin, was made, 1689, the first wife of Peter the Great, whom he chose out of the hundred young girls that he had by proclamation assembled at Moscow. Her complaints against the infidelity of her husband produced her disgrace. She was hurled from the throne, divorced in 1696, and confined in a convent at Suddal. In her retirement she formed an intimacy with general Glebof, and, trusting to the predictions of a fanatic bishop, she expected the death of her husband, and her restoration to power under the reign of her son. Peter was informed of her plans, and she was scourged by two nuns, and then immured in the convent of Nova Ladoga, and afterwards in the fortress of Shlusselburgh, from which she was released at the accession of her grandson Peter II. at whose coronation she was present. She died in the monastery of Devitza, 1731, aged 59. Glebof was cruelly put to death by order of the inhuman Peter, and with his last breath he asserted his innocence, and that of the injured empress.

EUDOXIUS, an Arian of Arabisso, in Lesser Armenia, bishop of Germanicia, and then of Antioch, from which he was deposed. He was made patriarch of Constantinople by Constantius, and died 370, at Nicæa. He wrote a discourse on the incarnation of the Word.

EUDOXUS, of Cnidus, studied in Egypt with Plato, and opened a school of philosophy at Athens.

EVELYN, John, a learned writer, descended of an ancient and respectable family, in the county of Salop. He was born at Wotton, in Surrey, 31st October, 1620; and after being educated at Lewes grammar-school, he entered at Baliol college in 1637. At the beginning of the civil wars, he obtained permission to travel from king Charles himself, and in 1644, he left England. To enlarge his mind by observations on the manners and habits of various countries, to examine accurately their commercial and agricultural concerns, and the curiosities, the productions, the antiquities, the arts, and the sciences, of every place, was the great and the commendable object of his intentions; and to these pursuits, so honourable to himself, and so advantageous to his countrymen, about seven years of his life were devoted. In 1647, while at Paris, he married Mary, the only daughter of sir Richard Browne, bart. the king's minister at the French court; and on his return to England, in 1651, he fixed his residence at her seat, at Sayes court, near Deptford, in Kent. Attached by choice to a life of retirement, he had little concern with public affairs; but after the expulsion of Richard Cromwell from the protectorate, he was zealously engaged in promoting the restoration of the royal family, and his services were acknowledged by Charles at his return. At the establishment of the royal society, in 1662, Mr. Evelyn was appointed one of the first fellows, and counsel; a distinction to which he was entitled by his virtues and the great merit of his works. In 1664, he was made one of the commissioners of the sick and wounded, and was afterwards appointed one of the commissioners for the rebuilding of St. Paul's. In 1669, he visited Oxford, where he was honoured with the degree of LL.D. This was granted out of respect, not only to his great abilities and universal beneficence, but the active part which he had taken in procuring the Arundelian marbles, which, by his intercession with lord Henry Howard, were handsomely presented to that learned body, for which he, together with the noble donor, received the thanks of the university by their delegates. About this time, he was nominated one of the members of the board of trade; and under James II. he was one of the commissioners to execute the office of lord privy seal; and after the revolution, he became treasurer of Greenwich hospital. This great and good man died in the 86th year of his life, 27th February, 1706, and was interred at Wotton, in a stone coffin, over which was this inscription: "That living in an age of extraordinary events and revolutions, he had learned from thence this truth, which he desired might thus be communicated to posterity, that all is vanity which is not honest, and that there is no solid wisdom but in real piety." His wife survived him till 9th February, 1709, in her 74th year, and she was deposited in a stone coffin near him. By her he had five sons and three daughters. All the sons except one died young, and only one daughter survived him, Susannah, married to Mr. Draper, of Addiscombe, Surrey. Mr. Evelyn's works amount to more than 25 various publications, besides communications and other papers inserted in the transactions of the royal and other societies. Of these, the most known are his sculptura, or the history and art of chalcography and engraving in copper, with an ample enumeration of the most renowned masters and their works, with the new manner of engraving, or mezzotinto, communicated by his highness prince Rupert to the author of this treatise, London, 1662, 8vo. a very learned and valuable work, edited again in 1755, and highly commended by Mr. Walpole—Sylva, or a discourse of forest-trees, and the propagation of timber in his majesty's dominions, to which is annexed, Pomona, concerning fruit-trees, &c. 1664, folio, a popular work, which, as the author says in the second edition, 1669, was the cause that more than two millions of timber-trees had been furnished in the three kingdoms. The sixth edition of this excellent book was published by Dr. A. Hunter, of York, enriched with notes and a life of the author, 1776. He wrote also a parallel of ancient architecture with the modern, &c. the third edition of which appeared in 1733, folio—kalendarium Hortense, 1664, a publication many times edited, and from which all modern gardening books are borrowed—public employment and active life preferred to solitude, in reply to Sir George Mackenzie's book on a contrary title—the perfection of painting demonstrated from the principles of art, &c.—a philosophical discourse of earth, relating to the culture and improvement of it for vegetation, &c.—mundus muliebris, or the lady's dressing-room unlocked, and her toilet spread, in burlesque—Numata, a discourse on medals, ancient and modern, with some account of heads and effigies, &c. Besides these, he planned, but never completed, a general history of all trades—also elysium Britannicum. It was a happy addition to the virtues and extensive powers of mind which he possessed, that he was in easy and independent circumstances, which left him no wish unsatisfied which a man of worth and virtue could form. His library was large and selected; his grounds and gardens about his mansion were neatly cultivated, and adorned with all the embellishments of nature and art which his fertile genius could suggest; and among his friends he could number the greatest and the most ingenious and learned men of the times. His services to literature and mankind have been celebrated by Cowley, Joseph Glanville, Dr. Wotton, bishop Burnet, Roger North, &c. and, among foreigners, by Morhoff, and others. He was also an artist, for "if he had not been," says Mr. Walpole, "I should have found it difficult to deny myself the pleasure of allotting him a place among the arts he loved, promoted, patronised. If I have once or twice criticised him, they are trifling blemishes, compared with his amiable virtues and beneficence. It may be remarked, that the worst to be said of him is, that he knew more than he always communicated. His life was a course of inquiry, study, curiosity, instruction, and benevolence. The works of the Creator, and the mimic labours of the creature, were all objects of his pursuit. He adored from examination, was a courtier that flattered only by informing his prince, and was really the neighbour of the Gospel, for there was no man that might not have been the better for him. He promoted the royal society, he obtained the Arundelian marbles for the university of Oxford, and he proposed to Mr. Boyle the erection of a philosophical college for retired and speculative persons, and he had the honesty to write in defence of active life against Mr. Mackenzie's essay on solitude. He knew that retirement in his own hands was industry and benefit to mankind, in those of others laziness and inutility."

EVELYN, John, son of the preceding, was born at Sayes court, near Deptford, 14th January, 1654. In 1666, he went to Oxford, under the care of Dr. Bathurst, of Trinity college, but did not till two years after become a member of the university. When little more than 15, he wrote that elegant Greek poem which is prefixed to the second edition of his father's Sylva. The powers of genius thus early displayed were cultivated with the greatest attention, and gave birth to some other original pieces of poetry, inserted in Dryden's miscellanies. He also translated, in elegant language, the four books of gardens from the poems of Renatus Rapinus, 1673—besides Alexander's life, from Plutarch, inserted in the 4th volume of Plutarch, by several hands—and the history of the grand viziers, &c. with the secret intrigues of the seraglio, 1677, 8vo. He married Martha, daughter of Richard Spenser, Esq. by whom he had two sons and three daughters. He was one of the commissioners of the revenue in Ireland, and died in the flower of his age, in London, 24th March, 1698, aged 45. His eldest son and two daughters died infants; the other daughter married the eldest son of lord chancellor Harcourt; and the son married, 1705, the daughter of Mr. Boscawen, and was in 1713, created a baronet. He was a commissioner of the customs, and fellow of the royal society.

EVERARD, Sir Richard, baronet, governor of North Carolina under the proprietors, was appointed in 1724, but did not arrive in the colony until 1725. Burrington was his predecessor. His administration was disturbed by frequent altercations with the council. In 1729, the proprietors of Carolina surrendered the province into the hands of the king, who appointed Burlington governor of the northern division. He died in London, Feb. 17th, 1733, and was succeeded by his son Richard, in his title and estate.

EVERDINGEN, Cæsar Van, a Dutch painter, born at Alcaer, died 1679, aged 73. His victory of David over Goliath, in the church of Alcaer, is his best piece. His nephew, Albert, was eminent as a landscape painter. He died 1675, aged 54.

EUGENE, Francis, prince of Savoy, was born in 1663. He was son of Eugene Maurice, general of the Swiss and Grisons, governor of Champagne, and earl of Soissons, by Olympia Mancini, niece of cardinal Mazarin. He was early intended for the church, and received an abbey from the French king, as a step to a cardinal's hat; but the death of his father, before he was 10 years of age, altered the prospects of his future life. The unjust banishment of his mother to the Low Countries raised his indignation; and as Curtius and Cæsar seemed more favourite authors with him than all the divines of the church, he painted for military employments, and when refused by the king he removed to Vienna with his brother Philip. The emperor received them with great courtesy, and from that time the two brothers, rejecting the offers of France, determined to become the faithful subjects of the imperial house. They soon distinguished themselves against the Turks; but the death of Philip, whilst bravely fighting, left Eugene to avenge his fall, and to conduct his regiment to victory. In 1683, Eugene displayed astonishing powers of valour in the presence of the princes and generals of the Austrian troops, in the raising of the siege of Vienna; and at New Lausel and Buda his bravery again became so conspicuous, that the duke of Lorraine, in presenting him to the emperor, said, "May it please your majesty, this young Savoyard will some time or other be the greatest captain of the age." The declaration of war against the empire by Lewis XIV. called forth all the abilities of Eugene; he was removed from the less important campaign against the Turks, to resist the French; and he so effectually blocked up Mantua, that for two years his enemies were unable to advance a single step in Italy. The peace between Savoy and France, in 1696, enabled Lewis to negotiate with Eugene; but the offer of the government of Champagne, of a marshal's baton, and of an annual pension of 2000 pistoles, could not shake his fidelity to the emperor. His attachment was so well tried, that he was made commander-in-chief of the imperial forces in Hungary, where he completed the campaign by the total defeat of the Turkish army, commanded by the grand seignor in person, 1697. In this famous battle, fought at Zenta, near Peterwardin, the Turks lost 20,000 men killed, 12,000 drowned, and 6000 prisoners, besides oxen, camels, and horses, and a booty which amounted to several millions of pounds sterling, whilst the Germans had no more than 430 men killed. The peace of Carlowitch, in 1699, was thus ensured by the valour of Eugene, and put an end to a war of 15 years, but new laurels awaited the hero, on the death of the king of Spain. While France claimed the succession, the emperor set forth also his title to the crown, and Eugene was sent to Italy to oppose the French forces under Villeroi. Though inferior in numbers, Eugene obtained the superiority in every encounter, and planned his measures with such wisdom that he surprised Cremona, and carried Villeroi away his prisoner, by a coup-de-main. To the imperialists were soon added the English, who viewed with jealousy the elevation of the duke of Anjou to the throne of Spain, and resented the acknowledgment of the pretender for king of England by Lewis. Eugene at the head of the imperial council of the war, and in the field, displayed his usual abilities, and the battles of Schellenburg, Blenheim, Turin, &c. became the scenes of the superior powers of his mind and of the successful execution of his plans. His influence was so great that his enemies determined to cut him off by poison. He accordingly, in 1710, received a letter, enclosing a paper poisoned to such a degree that it made him, and three more who touched it, ready to swoon, and killed a dog upon the spot upon his swallowing the noxious contents. In 1712, he came over to England, to induce the court to continue the war; but he was surprised to find his friend and comrade Marlborough in disgrace, and a new ministry totally averse to his measures. He, however, received the honour due to his rank and merit; he was magnificently feasted in the city of London; he received a sword worth 5000*l.* from the queen, which he wore on her birthday; but in the midst of the compliments paid him he still showed his respect for Marlborough, by taking his abode solely with him. Unsuccessful in London as a negotiator, he returned to the armies, where he was forced to act upon the defensive, to check the advance of the French forces into Germany. In March, 1714, he signed with marshal Villars, preliminary articles of peace, which were the September following concluded by a solemn treaty. He was received at Vienna in the most flattering manner by the emperor; but, in the bosom of peace, new victories awaited him. The Turks began to threaten the imperialists in 1716, and Eugene, placing himself at the head of the army in Hungary, defeated them with dreadful slaughter, and took Tameswacr, of which they had had possession 164 years, and afterwards besieged and reduced Belgrade. After the peace with the Turks, Eugene had little to do with the disputes between Spain and the emperor. In 1733, he was, however, engaged in the wars between the imperialists and the kings of France, Spain, and Sardinia, where his usual prudence and success were eminently displayed. He died at Vienna, 10th April, 1736, aged 73. His death was sudden, as the preceding day he had entertained company, and he is supposed to have been choked in the night by a strong defluxion of rheum. This heroic general deserved equal commendation in the character of a private man. He was affable, modest, generous, and humane. He was also the patron of learned men, and himself no indifferent scholar. Thomas à Kempis's book, de imitatione, was the constant companion of his travels and campaigns, and he wisely observed, with Gustavus Adolphus, that a good Christian always made a good soldier. His collection of books, pictures, and prints, is preserved in the imperial library. His funeral sermon was preached by cardinal Passionei, nuncio at Vienna, from these words of Maccabees, "Alexander, son of Philip the Macedonian, made many wars, took many strong holds, went through the ends of the earth, took spoils of many nations. The earth was quiet before him. After these things he fell sick, and perceived that he should die."

EUGENIUS I. St. pope, after Martin, 654, died three years after, 1st June. He was a pious and benevolent pontiff.

EUGENIUS II. succeeded Pascal I. 824, and died three years after, 27th October. He supported the water ordeal, and was an advocate for image worship, though it was condemned by the council of Paris.

EUGENIUS III. was made pope 1145; but dissatisfied with the tumultuous conduct of the Romans, he retired to Pisa, and thence to Paris, and to Rheims, where he called a council. He died at Tivoli, 7th July, 1153.

EUGENIUS IV. Gabriel Condolmero, a Venetian, elected pope 1431, after Martin V. He had a violent dispute with the council which had assembled at Basil, and issued a bull to dissolve it; but the bishops resisted his authority, and he was at last obliged to assent to their resolutions, and to confirm them. Another council at Ferrara was equally obstinate, though the pope proposed a reconciliation and union between the eastern and western churches, supported by the presence and authority of the emperor John Palæologus, and of several Greek bishops. The sudden breaking out of a plague dispersed the council, which removed to Florence; but the terms of pacification which were there adopted were soon violated. The council of Basil presumed to depose the pontiff, and to appoint Amadeus VIII. duke of Savoy in his room, under the title of Felix V.; but the cause of the dishonoured Eugenius prevailed, and he died at Rome in the full enjoyment of his privileges, 1447, aged 64.

EUGENIUS, a grammarian, whom count Arbogastus proclaimed emperor in Dauphiné, after the death of Valentinian the younger, 392. Though successful in his first attempts upon Milan, and in his invasion of Italy, he was soon after defeated by Theodosius, and fell in battle, 394.

EULER, Leonard, an illustrious mathematician, born at Basil, 14th July, 1707. His father, Paul Euler, who was Protestant minister of Riehen, intended him for the ministry, and he instructed him himself in mathematics, for the groundwork of all other improvements; but the genius of the son was bent to philosophical pursuits, rather than theology. Encouraged by the Bernoullis, he soon followed them, 1727, to Petersburg, where Catherine I. had founded, in 1723, an academy of sciences, and in 1727, he was appointed adjutant to the mathematical class of the academy. His different publications on the nature and propagation of sound, on curves, on the calculus integralis, the movement of the celestial bodies, and other useful subjects, had already raised his reputation, and ranked him among the greatest of philosophers. The powers of his mind were indeed astonishing. While his fellow-academicians asked four months to complete an important calculation, he finished it in three days, but so intense had been his application that it produced a fever, which robbed him of the sight of one of his eyes. He gained, in 1740, with Maclaurin and D. Bernoulli, the prize of the academy of Paris, on the nature of tides; and the labours of these three illustrious men, thus adjudged equally meritorious, traced the effects, though by different roads, to the same causes. In 1741, he removed to Berlin, at the invitation of the king of Prussia, and assisted the monarch in the establishment of an academy of sciences, whose memoirs he enriched by valuable communications. Still indefatigable, he produced his theory of the motions of the planets and comets, the theory of magnetism, the theory of light and colours against Newton's system of emanations, and the theory of the equilibrium and motion of floating bodies and the resistance of fluids. In 1773 he also published his theorie complete de la construction et de la manœuvre des vaisseaux, which valuable work was translated into all languages, and was rewarded with 6000 livres from the French king, as his theorems before had been rewarded with 300*l.* from the British parliament. His labours of thirty years on the most intricate subject of infinitesimals were communicated to the public by his "introduction to the analysis of infinitesimals," and followed by lessons on the calculus integralis, and differentialis. Thus engaged in the cause of science, and for the benefit of mankind, he continued in the enjoyment of health to a good old age, and while arranging his thoughts on the motion of the acrostical globes, and conversing with his friend Lexell on the new planet, he was suddenly attacked by a fit of apoplexy, as he played with one of his grandchildren at tea-time. The stroke was sudden, and immediately fatal. "I am dying," were his last words, and a few hours after he expired, 7th September, 1783, aged 76 years five months and three days. Besides the works already enumerated, there are many others, equally valuable, on geometrical and philosophical subjects. He was a man, indeed, as his impartial and eloquent eulogist, Fuss, has mentioned, of astonishing powers, great and extensive erudition, and of such retentive memory that he could repeat the whole of the Æneid, and in one night he calculated in his head the six first powers of all the numbers above 20, which he repeated the next day most correctly to his astonished friends. Affable, humane, and benevolent in his conduct, he could abandon the most abstruse studies to mix with the general amusements of society, and, with unusual vivacity, enter into all the trifles and the frivolous anecdotes which often fill up the vacuum of company. His piety was ardent but sincere, he loved mankind, and defended the great truths of religion with earnestness and fidelity. He was twice married, and was father of thirteen children; four of whom only survived him. The eldest son was his assistant and successor; the second, physician to the empress; and the third, lieutenant-colonel in the artillery; the daughter married major Bell. These four children gave him thirty-eight grandchildren, among whom he was viewed as a venerable and deservedly respected patriarch. The list of his works makes fifty pages, fourteen of which contain the MS. works. The printed works amount to thirty-eight volumes, and are found in the Petersburg, Paris, Berlin acts, &c.

EULOGIUS, a patriarch of Alexandria, intimate with Gregory the great. He wrote against the Novatians, and died 603.

EULOGIUS, the martyr of Cordova, put to death by the Saracens, 859, after being elected, but not consecrated, archbishop of Toledo. He wrote a history of some martyrs, &c.

EUMATHIUS, a Greek writer of anatomical compositions. He wrote Ismenias and Ismene. The age in which he lived is unknown. He is sometimes called Eustathius.

EUMENES, a celebrated general of Alexander the Great. He was at last overpowered in the dissensions which divided the generals of Alexander, and put to death by Antigonus, 316 B. C.

EUMENES, a king of Pergamus, B. C. 263. His nephew of the same name, was king, 197 B. C. and reigned 38 years.

EUMENIUS, an eminent orator, about 310 A. D.

EUNAPIUS, a physician of the 4th century, a violent enemy of Christianity. He wrote the lives of philosophers and sophists, the history of the Cæsars, &c.

EUNOMIUS, a native of Cappadocia, in the 4th century, disciple of Ætius, and founder of a sect called Eunomians, who denied the essential deity of Christ. He was made bishop of Cyzicum, 360, but was several times banished for his fanatical opinions, and died very old, 394, after experiencing a great variety of sufferings.

EUPHEMIA, Flavia Elia Marcia, the concubine, and then the wife of the emperor Justin I. died without children, 523. She showed herself a great and benevolent princess on the throne.

EUPHEMIUS, a patriarch of Constantinople, who quarrelled with the popes about the insertion of names among the saints, and was banished by Anastasius to Ancyra, where he died, 515.

EUPHORION, a Greek poet and historian of Chalcis, in Eubœa, B. C. 274. There were two other writers of the same name.

EUPHRANOR, an Athenian painter and sculptor, B. C. 352.

EUPHRATES, a heretic of the 2d century. He and his followers imagined that our first parents were deceived by Christ, in the form of a serpent, and therefore they paid divine honours to serpents, and thence were called ophites, or serpentarians. There was a Platonic philosopher of this name under Perdiccas, and another, a stoic, in the age of Adrian.

EUPOLIS, a comic poet, of Athens, B. C. 435, said to have been thrown into the sea by Alcibiades, because he had written a play to satirize him.

EVERMOND, St. Charles de St. Denis lord of, a well-known French writer, of a noble family in Normandy, born at St. Denis le Guast, April 1st, 1613. He was educated in the college of Clermont, Paris, and at Caen, and being a younger son, was intended for the law, but his inclinations turned to a military life, and before he was sixteen, he obtained an ensigncy. He signalized himself in the army, and was as well known for his politeness and literary accomplishments, as for his valour in the field, so that the duke of Enghien admiring his character, made him lieutenant of his guards to have him near his person. He was at the siege of Arras, in 1640, and served in the campaigns of Rocroy and Friburg, and was wounded in the knee, in the battle of Nortlingen. After the taking of Furnes in 1646, the duke commissioned him to convey the news to the court, and to concert with Mazarin measures for the siege and reduction of Dunkirk, but he was in 1648, for some satirical remarks, dismissed from the confidence and friendship of the duke, who unfortunately loved raillery, but was not magnanimous enough to pardon it. He was afterwards reconciled to the court, and the king, well acquainted with his merits, made him in 1652, a major general, and granted him a pension of 3000 livres a year. He served in Guienne under the duke of Candale, and after a confinement of three months in the Bastile for reflections on Mazarin's character, he was permitted to attend the campaign of Flanders in 1654. In 1657, he fought a duel with the marquis de Force, which proved so offensive to the court, that he retired into the country, till his friends could procure his pardon. In the campaign of 1649 he served in Flanders, and soon after, he accompanied Mazarin in the negotiation and conclusion of a treaty with the Spanish ministry. Of this journey and negotiation he gave a written account to the marquis of Crequi, which contained such severe reflections on the character of Mazarin, and such odious charges of sacrificing the honour of France to private interest, that the composition was considered as treasonable, and though the cardinal was dead, the writer was obliged to fly to Holland, in 1661, from the persecution of the court. From Holland he immediately passed to England, where he had been sent the year before by the French king, to congratulate Charles on his restoration, and he was received with great courtesy by Buckingham, and the English nobility. Devoting himself here to literature, and the society of his friends, he did not, however, forget his native country, and he solicited his return from the court, but to no purpose. He afterwards visited Flanders, Spa, and Liege, and wished to fix his residence in Holland, but the invitations of Charles, by the hands of Sir William Temple and lord Arlington, prevailed upon him to return to England, where the king granted him a pension of 300*l.* a year. On the death of Charles he lost his pension, and his applications to the French king for pardon, by the means of his friend Crequi, proved ineffectual; but though deserted by his country, he refused to accept near James's person the honourable office of private secretary of the cabinet. The revolution proved more favourable to his interests, William honoured the illustrious stranger with his friendship, and while he liberally patronised him, he delighted in his conversation, and eagerly heard from him the recital of the wars and adventures of his youthful days. At last the French king relented, and offers of reconciliation were sent by count Grammont, but St. Evremond now refused to quit a country where he had been so hospitably treated, and where his old age and infirmities could meet with a continuation of long-experienced comforts. He died on the 9th of September, 1703, of a strangury, in his 95th year, and was buried in Westminster abbey, where a monument was erected to his memory. St. Evremond was an accomplished gentleman, and though his morals were not rigid, he was generous in his conduct, humane, and benevolent. Though suspected by Bayle of being a free-thinker, he always professed the Romish faith, and though occasionally giving a loose to satire, and making pleasure the sole business of life, he never spoke with jocularly, or indecorous freedom of religion or morality. Common decency, says he, and the regard due to one's fellow-creatures, will not suffer it. He describes himself as a philosopher equally remote from superstition and impiety, a voluptuary, who has no less aversion for debauchery than inclination for pleasure, who lived in a condition, despised by those who have every thing, and envied by those who have nothing, but relished by those who make reason the foundation of their happiness. He is well pleased with nature, and does not complain of fortune, he hates vice, is indulgent to frailties, and laments misfortunes. He searches not after the failings of men to expose them, and only finds out the ridiculous in them for his own diversion. Of his works, which consist of light pieces of poetry and prose, the best edition is that of Amsterdam 1726, five vols. 12mo. with two other volumes of pieces attributed to his pen, with his life prefixed by des Maizeaux. They have been translated, London, 1728, 3 vols. 8vo.

EURIPIDES, a Greek tragic poet, born at Salamis about 480 B. C. Only nineteen of his sublime tragedies are extant.

EURYDICE, wife of Amyntas, king of Macedonia, was the mother of Philip, the father of Alexander, and conspired against her husband.

EURYDICE, daughter of Aridæus, was put to death by Olympias, with the rest of her family.

EUSEN, Lawrence, an English poet, descended from an Irish family, and born at Spotsworth in Yorkshire, where his father was rector. He was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, and upon taking orders, was made chaplain to lord Willoughby de Broke. He was also patronised by lord Halifax, and by the duke of Newcastle, whose marriage with lady Henrietta Godolphin he celebrated in verse, for which the duke, on Rowe's death, appointed him laureate, 1718. This elevation was viewed with jealousy by the contemporary bards: and Pope, without any known cause, assigned to the laureate a distinguished place in his Dunciad. Eusden died at his rectory at Coningsby, Lincolnshire, 27th September, 1730. One of his biographers has asserted, that in the latter part of his life, he became a very great drunkard, but perhaps without authority. He left a MS. translation of Tasso. Some of his poems are preserved in Nichols's select collection.

EUSEBIA, abbess of St. Cyr, or St. Saviour's, at Marseilles, who is said to have cut off her nose, to secure herself from the brutality of Saracen ravishers. Her nuns followed her example, but they were all murdered by the disappointed barbarians, 731. A similar story is related of an abbess of Coldingham in England.

EUSEBIUS, a Greek bishop of Rome after Marcellus, 310. He violently opposed the readmission of lapsed Christians to the communion, for which he was banished to Sicily by the emperor Maxentius, and died the same year.

EUSEBIUS, Pamphilus, an ecclesiastical historian, born at Palestine, and made bishop of Cæsarea, 313. He opposed Arius, though his personal friend, and died about 338. He wrote the life of Constantine,—an ecclesiastical history, &c.

EUSEBIUS, a bishop of Berytus, and afterwards of Constantinople, who died 341.

EUSEBIUS, a bishop of Emesa, in Syria, author of some homilies. He died 360.

EUSEBIUS, bishop of Vereell, in Piedmont, strenuously defended Athanasius, and died 371.

EUSEBIUS, bishop of Samosata, favoured but afterwards opposed Arianism, and died by the fall of a tile, 378.

EUSEBIUS, bishop of Doryleum in Phrygia, was deposed by the Eutychians, whom he opposed, 449.

EUSTACE, John Skey, an officer who served in the American army during the war of the revolution. He held for some time the place of aid-de-camp to general Lee, and afterwards served in that capacity with general Greene. At the close of the war he removed to Georgia, and entered on the practice of the law. While there he received the appointment of adjutant general. In 1794 his love of a military life led him to France, where he obtained the commission of brigadier general, and afterwards that of major general, in which station he served the French for a considerable time. In 1797 he commanded a division of the French army in Flanders. He returned to the United States in 1800, and spent the remainder of his life in retirement in the state of New-York. His death took place at Newburgh in 1805.

EUSTACHE, David, a protestant minister, of Montpellier, sent in 1669 by the Synod of Ludun, to address the French king. His speech to the monarch on this occasion was much admired. He was author of some theological and controversial tracts.

EUSTACHIUS, Bartholomew, an Italian physician of the 16th century, born at San Severino. He settled at Urbino, and afterwards at Rome, where his anatomical tables were engraved in 1552, though not published till 1714, and the second edition 1728. His opuseula anatomica were republished by Boerhaave, 1707. He died 1570.

EUSTATHIUS, a Romish saint, bishop of Bœrea and Antioch. He was banished by Constantius for opposing the Arians, and he died at Trajanopolis 360. His writings are lost.

EUSTATHIUS, a learned Greek commentator on Homer and Dionysius the geographer. He was bishop of Thessalonica, and died about 1194.

EUSTOCHIUM, a Roman lady, like her mother Paula, well skilled in Greek and Hebrew. She was a disciple of St. Jerome, and lived in a monastery at Bethlehem, from which she fled during a persecution, and died 419.

EUSRATIUS, a bishop of Nicæ, whose commentaries on Aristotle's analytics and ethics, have been published at Venice 1534 and 1536, and Paris 1543. He lived in the 12th century. There was a priest of Constantinople of that name in the 6th century, author of a work on the state of the dead.

EUTHYMIUS, an Isaurian, made patriarch of Constantinople, by Leo VI. 906, and displaced by Alexander II. He died in exile 910 or 911, and was buried at Constantinople.

EUTHYMIUS, Zigabenus, or Zigadenus, a Greek monk of Constantinople, the favourite of Alexius Comnenus. He wrote at the emperor's command, Panoplia dogmatica orthodoxæ fidei, or the whole armour of the orthodox faith, against heretics. He wrote nine other works besides. The time of his death is unknown, though it was after 1118.

EUTOCIUS, a Greek mathematician of Ascalon, in Palestine, who wrote commentaries on the conics of Apollonius, published in Halley's edition. He wrote also commentaries on Archimedes, published at Oxford 1792. He is a very learned, accurate, and judicious commentator. He flourished in the sixth century.

EUTROPIUS, Flavius, a Latin historian, secretary to Constantine. He wrote an epitome of the Roman history.

EUTROPIUS, an eunuch, minister to Arcadius. He was consul 399, but proved in his conduct so tyrannical, that he was banished, and afterwards beheaded.

EUTYCHES, abbot of a convent near Constantinople, opposed violently the Nestorians, and maintained, in his zeal, that Christ's body was an ærial form, and therefore not human. These notions were censured in the council of Constantinople, 448, and Eutyches was deposed, though another council was summoned to reverse the sentence; and a third, composed of 630 bishops, confirmed the sentence of the first, and declared that in Christ were united two natures without mixture or confusion.

EUTYCHIANUS, pope, a native of Tuscany, successor of Felix 275, and succeeded in 283, by Caius, on his martyrdom.

EUTYCHIUS, a monk of Amasea, made patriarch of Constantinople by Justinian 553, and deposed by him 564. He was restored by Tiberius II. and died 585, aged 73.

EUTYCHIUS, a Christian author, born at Cairo 876. He practised physic with great success among the Mahometans, and afterwards became, in 933, patriarch of Alexandria, and exchanged his name of Said Ebn Batrick for its Greek correspondent word Eutychius. He wrote, in Arabic, annals from the beginning of the world to 900, curious, but not always authentic. He wrote also de rebus Siciliae, preserved in MS. in Cambridge public library; and died 950. An extract from his annals relating to the church of Alexandria appeared, in Arabic and Latin, at Oxford, by Selden, 1642, 4to. and the whole annals were published, Arabic and Latin, by Pocock, 1659, 4to.

EUZORIUS, a deacon of Alexandria, deposed and condemned by the council of Nice for his attachment to the tenets of Arius. He satisfied Constantine on articles of faith afterwards, and was made bishop of Antioch 361. He baptized Constantius, and died 376.—Another of the same name was bishop of Cæsarea.

EWALD, John, a native of Copenhagen, who, in the hopes of seeing the world, embraced the military profession, and became a sergant in the Prussian service. He afterwards deserted from his regiment, and returned to Denmark, where he studied divinity, but did not enter into orders.

Poetry was his favourite pursuit, and, to enlarge his understanding, he studied the best English poets. He wrote poems in the style of Ossian—Adam and Eve, a dramatic poem—a theatrical piece called the fisherman—and other poems, which possess great merit, and rank high in the temple of poetry. He died 1781, aged 38, and his works were collected together at Copenhagen in 1791, in 4 vols.

EWING, John, D.D. provost of the college of Philadelphia, was born in East Nottingham, Maryland, in 1732. He was graduated at the college at Princeton, New-Jersey, in 1755; and afterwards served two years as a tutor in that seminary. In 1759 he was settled pastor of the first presbyterian church in Philadelphia, and continued in the labours of the office till his death. He was in 1779 elected provost of the University of Philadelphia, a station for which he was excellently qualified by his extraordinary attainments in science, and happy talent for instruction; and whose duties he discharged with a high reputation. He was accounted one of the best scholars among his cotemporaries, both in literature and science, and one of the most able preachers. He died in 1802. A volume of his sermons and his lectures on natural philosophy have been given to the public, and are honourable monuments of his talents and learning.

EXPILLI, Claude d', president of the parliament of Grenoble, was born at Voiron, Dauphiny, and died at Grenoble 1636, aged 75. He was a writer of some merit, though better known as an upright magistrate. He published pleadings, Paris, 4to. 1612—poems, 4to. 1624—a life of Bayard, 1650—a treatise on French orthography, 1618, fol.

EXUPERIUS, a Romish saint, bishop of Toulouse, distinguished for his charity in the time of a famine, after parting with all his property, he sold the gold and silver utensils of the church, to supply the necessities of the poor. He died about 417.

EYCK, Hubert Van, a painter, born at Maseik on the Maese, died 1426, aged 60. He painted much for Philip the good, duke of Burgundy, his friend and patron.

EYCK, John Van, brother and disciple to the preceding, died 1441, aged 71. He is supposed to be the inventor of painting in oil, which he discovered by mixing linseed oil in the composition of a brilliant varnish. The secret was conveyed to Italy by one of his pupils, and divulged to the world. He is sometimes called John of Bruges. His historical pieces and landscapes are much admired.

EYKENS, Peter, a painter of Antwerp, born 1599. His last supper, and John preaching in the desert, are admired pieces, preserved in the churches at Antwerp.

EYMAR, A. M. d', a deputy from Forcalquier to the states-general in 1789, evinced his attachment to the opinions and the system of Rousseau, as a lover of republicanism. He was sent as ambassador to Piedmont, and discovered the treaty which the Sardinian king had made to espouse the cause of the confederates against France; and in consequence of this, by his intrigues, he forced the unfortunate monarch from his Italian dominions. He was afterwards prefect of Leman, and died at Geneva 1805. He wrote some small tracts, not devoid of merit.

EZEKIEL, the third of the great prophets, was son of Buzi, and descended from Aaron. He was a captive at Babylon with Jehoiachim king of Judah, 597 before Christ, and there he wrote his prophecies, on the banks of the Chebar. His style, according to bishop Lowth, is bold, vehement, and tragical, abounding with figurative expressions, and worked up occasionally to a degree of tremendous dignity. He foretold to his people the coming of the Messiah, and their restoration.

EZEKIEL, a Greek Jew and poet, author of some tragedies on Scripture subjects. Large fragments of his tragedy of the departure of the Israelites from Egypt are preserved by Clemens of Alexandria and Eusebius. It is supposed that he flourished about 300, or according to some, 200 years before Christ.

EZRA, one of the descendants of Aaron, son of Seraiah. He shared the captivity of Babylon, and was permitted by Artaxerxes to conduct a colony of his countrymen to Jerusalem, and to rebuild the temple and establish the laws of Moses, about 467 before Christ. A book bearing his name in the Bible, and two in the Apocrypha, are preserved. He died in Persia, or according to Josephus, at Jerusalem.

FAB

FABER, John, a German divine, born in Suabia, and, from one of his works against the reformers, called the Mallet of Heretics. He was made, 1526, confessor to Ferdinand, king of the Romans, and in 1531, advanced to the see of Vienna, where he died, 1542, aged 63. He owed his elevation to his zeal in the defence of the papists against Luther and his adherents. His works, which display warmth and fluency of language, are contained in 3 vols. folio, Cologne, 1537—1541.

FABER, Basil, a zealous Lutheran, born 1520, at Soraw, in Lusatia. He was teacher in the schools of Nordhausen, Tennstadt, and Quedlinburg, and rector of Erfurt. His chief, and most valuable work is Thesaurus Eruditionis Scholasticæ, published 1571, and improved afterwards by Cellarius and others. The best edition is 2 vols. fol. 1735. Faber died 1576.

FABER, Antonius. Vid. FEVRE, Anthony.

FABER, Jacobus. Vid. FEVRE, James.

FABER, Nicolaus. Vid. FEVRE, Nicolas.

FABER, Tanaquil. Vid. FEVRE.

FABERT, Abraham, an officer, who raised himself, by his extraordinary merit, to the dignity of marshal of France under Lewis XIV. He distinguished himself in 1635, at the siege of Turin, 1640, when he was badly wounded, at the siege of Perpignan, 1642, and in 1654, at the taking of Stenai. As he was not duly qualified by nobility of ancestors, he refused the collar of the royal order, observing, he would not be decorated with a cross, with his soul disgraced by an imposture. Though brave, he was childishly addicted to astrological calculations.

FABIAN, Robert, a merchant of London, sheriff and alderman of his native city, where he died, 1512. He had some skill in Latin and English poetry; but his chief work is his "Chronicle of England and France," first printed 1516, and again 1553, 2 vols. folio. The first volume begins with Bute, and ends at the death of Henry II. and the second, which is very valuable, ends 1504. Stow calls the work a painful labour, to the great honour of the city, and of the whole realm. Because he spoke too plainly of the revenues of the church, Wolsey caused as many copies of the book as possible to be destroyed. Fabian was buried at St. Michael's, Cornhill.

FABIAN, a saint of the Romish church, made pope 326. He was active in the dissemination of Christianity and the building of churches, and he suffered martyrdom in the persecution of Decius.

FABIUS, Maximus Rullianus, a Roman, master of the horse to the dictator Papius. He triumphed over seven nations, and was himself dictator, B. C. 287.

FABIUS, Maximus Quintus, an illustrious Roman, who opposed Annibal in Italy, and in consequence of his dilatory, but salutary measures, was called Cunctator. When the senate refused to ratify a ransom of prisoners on which he had agreed, he sold his estates to pay the money. He died B. C. 203.

FABIUS, Pictor, the first Latin historian mentioned among the Romans, B. C. 225.

FABRE, Jean Claude, a priest of the oratory of Paris, who died there 1753, aged 85. He is known as a laborious, but not judicious, compiler. He wrote two dictionaries, an indifferent translation of Virgil, and a continuation of Fleury's Ecclesiastical History, and some articles of Richelet's Dictionary.

FABRE, N. a native of Languedoc, famous for his filial piety. When his father was condemned to the galleys for his adherence to Calvinism, in 1752, he unperceived, took his place among the condemned, and remained there for six years in confinement, till this virtuous sacrifice was made known to Mirepoix, the governor of the province, who liberated him, and presented him to the court as an illustrious character.

FABRE, D' EGLANTINE, Philip Francis Mazaire, was born at Carcassone, 28th Dec. 1755, and, with a restless spirit, became successively an actor, a comic writer, and a statesman. In the convention he was the friend and confidential associate of Danton, Des Moulins, and the other promoters of the massacres, and of the miseries of France, and though originally poor, he soon became very rich. Robespierre, who viewed his assumed consequence with jealousy, hurled him from his eminence before the revolutionary tribunal, and he was guillotined, 5th April, 1794. He wrote some plays which possess merit, and he is particularly known as the person who recommended and introduced in France that puerile calendar which combated the habits, the opinions, and the prejudices of the rest of Europe.

FABRETTI, Raphael, a learned antiquary, born at Urbino 1619. He studied at Cagli and Urbino, and then practised at Rome as an advocate. He was sent by cardinal Imperiali to negotiate into Spain, and he conducted himself there with such success and ability that he was made procurator fiscal of the kingdom. After 13 years' residence in Spain he returned to Rome, where he was appointed judge of appeals to the capitol, and afterwards auditor of the legation of Urbino, under Cerri the legate. Some time after he was engaged in drawing up the apostolical briefs of the pope's vicar, and lastly was secretary of the memorials to pope Alexander VIII. After Alexander's death he devoted himself to his favourite pursuits, the study of antiquities, and with his horse, to which his friends gave the name of Marco Polo, he made excursions in the neighbourhood of Rome to visit and examine whatever was most rare, curious, and valuable. Innocent XII. had such respect for him that he drew him from his retirement to make him master of the secrets of the pope's temporal state. He died 7th Jan. 1700. He published the valuable works, De Aquis et Aqueductibus Veteris Romæ Dissertationes tres, 4to. 1680—De Columnâ Trajanâ Syntagma, &c. fol. 1683. Jasitheiad Gronovium Apologema, in ejusque Titivilitiâ, sive de Tito Livio Somnia Animadversiones, 1686, 4to.—Inscriptionum Antiquarum, &c. Explicatio, fol. 1699, &c. He was learned, and in his researches indefatigable.

FABRI, Honoré, a learned Jesuit, born at Bellay, near Lyons, 1607; professor of philosophy at Lyons, and penitentiary at Rome, where he died 1688. He wrote several large works on theology, optics, plants, &c. and he is said by some to have discovered the circulation of the blood before Harvey.

FABRIANO, Gentile da, a historical painter of Verona, who merited to be raised to the honours of Venetian nobility, and died 1412, aged 80.

FABRICIUS, Caius, a Roman general, who obtained some victories over the Samnites and Lucanians, and indignantly rejected the offers of Pyrrhus, who attempted to bribe his integrity. He afterwards discovered to Pyrrhus the plot which his physician had formed to poison him. He died B. C. 250.

FABRICIUS, George, a learned German, born at Chemnitz, in Misnia, 1516, and famous for his Latin poetry. He travelled to Italy as tutor to a nobleman, and at Rome he composed his work called Roma, containing an interesting and very animated description of that city. After returning home, he was for 26 years master of the school of Messen, where he died 1571. His poems, which are written with great powers of genius, and in the most elegant and correct language, appeared at Basle 1567, 2 vols. 8vo. He wrote also some odes, hymns, &c. besides prose works, such as the Annals of Messen, in seven books, Origines Saxonicae, 2 vols. folio, &c. 2 vols. on the affairs of Germany, &c.

FABRICIUS, Jerome, an Italian physician, called Aquapendente, from the place of his birth. He studied languages at Padua, and acquired his medical knowledge under Fallopius. He practised for 40 years at Padua, and with such repute that Venice, sensible of his great merits, settled an annual pension of 1000 crowns of gold on him, besides the honour of a golden chain, and of a statue. He died about 1603, and left 2 vols. folio, the one on surgery, published Holland, 1723, and the other on anatomy, Leyden, 1738.

FABRICIUS, William, a surgeon, born near Cologne, who became public physician at Berne, where he died 1634, aged 74.

He wrote tracts on gangrene and sphaecelus—on burns, on gun-shot wounds, on lithotomy—Six Centuries of Observations and Cures, &c. 1606, in 4to. His works were all published at Frankfort in fol. 1682.

FABRICIUS, John Lewis, a native of Schaffhausen, professor of theology and philosophy at Heidelberg, and also ecclesiastical counsellor to the elector. He was author of tracts De Viis Dei, et quousque sunt similes Viis Hominum—De Symbolicâ Dei Visione—on Infant Baptism, &c. He died at Frankfort 1697, aged 78.

FABRICIUS, John Albert, a learned German, born at Leipsic, 11th Nov. 1668, and educated at Quedlinburg. He showed astonishing powers of application, and after staying five years in the house of his friend Meyer at Hamburg, he was chosen professor of eloquence in that city 1699, and created D.D. at Kiel. He was invited by the landgrave of Hesse Cassel, to settle in his dominions, but so great was his reputation at Hamburg, that the senators prevailed upon him, by a superior salary, not to relinquish his residence among them. This most indefatigable scholar, equally admired for his modesty, and the simplicity of his manners, died at Hamburg, 3d April, 1736. Of his numerous works, the most useful are Bibliotheca Latina, sive Notitia Auctorum Veterum Latinorum quorumcumque Scripta ad nos pervenerunt, 2 vols. 4to. republished by Ernesti, 3 vols. 8vo.—Bibliotheca Græca, sive Notitia Scriptorum Veterum Græcorum, quorumcumque Monumenta Integra aut Fragmenta, Edita extant, tum Plerorumque ex MSS. et Deperditis, 14 vols. 4to.—Codex Apocryphus Novi Testamenti, Collectus, &c. 3 vols. 8vo. 1719—Codex Pseudepigraphus Veteris Testamenti, 2 vols. 8vo. 1722 and 1723.—Bibliographia Antiquaria, sive Introductio in Notitiam Scriptorum qui Antiquitates Hebraicas, Græcas, Romanas, et Christianas Scriptis illustraverunt, 4to. 1716,—Delectus Argumentorum, et Syllabus Scriptorum qui veritatem Relig. Christ. adversus Athecos, &c. asseruerunt, 4to. 1725.—Salutaris Lex Evangelii, &c. 4to. 1731.—Bibliotheca Mediæ et Infimæ Latinitate, 5 vols 8vo. 1734, and 6 vols. 4to. 1754, Padua.

FABRICIUS, Vincent, a learned German, born at Hamburg, 1613. He wrote Latin poetry with great ease and elegance. He was counsellor to the bishop of Lubec, and afterwards syndic to the city of Dantzic, where he became burgomaster, and was 13 times deputy to Poland. He died at Warsaw, during the diet of the kingdom, 1667. The first edition of his poems was printed 1632 at the recommendation of his friend Daniel Heinsius; but the best is that of Leipsic 1635, under the care of his son.

FABRICIUS, Baron, a German writer, the favourite of Charles XII. with whom he resided as envoy of the court of Holstein, during that monarch's captivity at Bender. He was afterwards in the service of Stanislaus of Poland. He was also in the service of George I. and he accompanied him in his last journey to Hanover, so that the king actually died in his arms. Fabricius is known for his interesting letters, which give an account of Charles XII. while resident in Turkey. They have been translated, and they appeared in London, 1761, 8vo.

FABRICIUS, Charles, a painter, born at Delft. His house was destroyed by the blowing up of a powder magazine, and he with his pupil Spoor perished. He was in the flower of youth, and promised the fairest talents for fame.

FABRONI, Angiolo, a native of Marradi in Tuscany, educated at Fienza and at Rome. He was made by Peter Leopold prior of St. Lorenzo's church at Florence, and afterwards curator of Pisa university. He wrote an account of the learned men of Italy in the 17th and 18th centuries, of which 21 vols. were published, and one was left unfinished. He published also an account of Cosmo, Lorenzo, and the other illustrious members of the house of Medicis, besides some religious tracts, &c. He died at Pisa 1802, aged 70.

FABROT, Charles Hannibal, a French lawyer, born at Aix in Provence, 1580, where he became advocate and professor of law. In 1617 he came to Paris, and in 1637 he was prevailed upon by Seguier the chancellor, who granted him a pension, to give an edition of the Basilicæ, or constitutions of the Eastern emperors. This great work appeared in 7 vols. fol. 1647, with a Latin translation and notes, and two years after he published Cedrenus, Nieetas, Anastasius Bibliothecarius, Constantine Manasses, and Glycas, in 2 vols. fol. with curious notes. In 1658 he published the works of Cujacius, revised and with notes, 10 vols. fol. His great application brought on disorders which put an end to his life, 1659. He wrote besides notes on the Theodosian code, and a treatise against Salmasius, &c.

FACCIOLATI, Giacomo, an Italian orator and grammarian of Padua, who died 1769, aged 87. He edited Cicero's Oration pro Quinct. and wrote some philological and other learned works.

FACCHETTI, Pietro, an eminent painter of Mantua, who died at Rome 1613, aged 78.

FACINI, Pietro, an historical painter of Bologna, who died 1602, aged 42. He was pupil to Annibal Caracci. His Christ with the three disciples, and Mary weeping at the death of Lazarus is in the Wilton collection.

FACIO, Bartholomeo, a learned Italian, born at Spezzia near Genoa. He was secretary to Alphonso king of Naples, and intimate with Æneas Sylvius, afterwards pope Pius II. He died about 1457. He wrote de Bello Veneto Claudiano, seu inter Venetos et Genuenses, anno 1391, Svo. 1578—de Rebus ab Alphonso Neapolit. gestis, Libri decem—de Humanæ Vitæ Felicitate ad Alphonsum Neap. Reg.—de Viris Illustr. sui Temporis, 1745. His enmity to Laurentius Valla was almost proverbial.

FACUNDUS, bishop of Hermianum in Asia, known for his defence of the three chapters, at the council of Constantinople, 547. In consequence of his zeal on this occasion, and in favouring the Nestorians, he was banished by Justinian, but in his exile he still defended his opinions, and wrote no less than 12 books addressed to the emperor.

FADLALLAH, or Chodsa Raschid Addin, a Persian historian, vizier to Cazan the sultan of Taurus. He wrote, at the desire of his master, a History of the Moguls, finished 1294, to which he added a supplement. The first part of the work appeared in French by la Croix.

FÆRNUŠ, Gabriel, a native of Cremona, known as a critic and a poet in the 16th century. He was the favourite of cardinal de Medicis, afterwards Pius IV. He wrote Latin elogies, besides pieces of criticism, and notes on Terence, so valuable that Bentley has inserted them whole in his edition of that poet. He wrote also in iambic verse 100 fables, so much in the style of Phædrus, that Thuanus has accused him of concealing from the world that Latin fabulist then unknown, to procure celebrity for his own composition; but of his 100 fables only five treat the same subjects as Phædrus, and therefore the idea of either deceit or plagiarism is puerile. Faernus died at Rome, 1561.

FAGAN, Christopher Bartholomew, a French comic writer, who died 1755, aged 53. He was like his father clerk in a public office at Paris, and devoted his leisure to poetry. Of his works collected in 4 vols. 12mo. 1760, the most approved comedies are, the Rendezvous, and the Ward, written in a delicate and lively style. Though a man of genius, he was averse to business, negligent of his dress, and very shy.

FAGE, Raimond de la, a self-taught genius in drawing with the pen, or Indian ink, born at Lisle-en-Albigeois in Languedoc. He was highly complimented by Carlo Marat, but his intemperance ruined his prospects; as his time was generally spent at the ale-house where he frequently discharged his bills by producing a sketch. He died 1690, aged 42.

FAGIUS, Paul, a protestant minister, born at Rheinzabern in Germany, 1504. His German name was Buchlein. He was educated at Heidelberg and Strasburg, and after making great proficiency in Hebrew, which then was become fashionable, he undertook in 1527 the care of a school at Isna, where he married. He afterwards abandoned this employment, and entering into orders he distinguished himself in 1541 by his zeal in administering to the necessities and comforts of the poor, during the plague which raged at Isna and the neighbouring places, from the infection of which he happily escaped. He afterwards preached at Strasburg, and became professor at Heidelberg, where he published some works for the advancement of Hebrew literature. During the persecution of the protestants in Germany he was invited to England by Cranmer, where he came with Bucer in 1549. These two learned men were then engaged at Cambridge to complete a new translation of the Bible, Fagius of the Old, and Bucer of the New Testament. This was never completed, as Fagius died of a fever at Cambridge, in Nov. 1550, and Bucer about a year after. The bodies of these two protestant divines were dug up and burnt under the gallows, in the ignominious reign of Mary. Fagius wrote on the Hebrew language and on the Targums.

FAGNANI, Prospero, an Italian, secretary to the holy congregation, and author of a commentary on the five books of the decretals. He died 1678, aged 80.

FAGNANO, Julius Charles count of, marquis of Toschi, a native of Sinigaglia, who published at Pesaro, 1750, his works in 2 vols. 4to. in which he treats in a clear manner of the discoveries of the property and of the use of the geometrical curve, called the Lemniscate. He died 1760, aged 70.

FAGON, Guy Crescent, an eminent physician, born at Paris. He early supported the doctrine of the circulation of the blood, and gained the royal approbation by his indefatigable researches in collecting plants on the Alps, and in the South of France. He was made professor of botany and chymistry in the royal gardens, and gradually rose to be physician to Lewis XIV. in 1693. It was by his advice that the king sent Tournefort to collect plants in the East. Though of a delicate constitution he lived by proper regimen to the age of 80, and died 1718, leaving two sons, one of whom became a bishop, and the other a counsellor of state.

FAGUNDY, Stephen, a Portuguese Jesuit.

author of Questiones de Christianis officiis et Casibus Conscientiæ, in Ecclesiæ Præcepta—de Justitiæ, &c. He died at Lisbon 1645, aged 63.

FAHRENHEIT, Gabriel Daniel, an ingenious experimentalist, born at Dantzic, 14th May, 1686. He was intended for commerce, but his genius was bent to philosophical pursuits. In 1720 he improved the thermometer by substituting mercury for spirits of wine, and fixed the extremity of his scale at the point of cold, which he had observed in Iceland in 1709, but at Petersburg the cold had been known forty degrees below the ° of this thermometer. The English in general have adopted his scale, but the French adhere to Reaumur's. He travelled through Holland and on the continent in pursuit of knowledge, and died 16th Sept. 1736. He wrote a Dissertation on Thermometers, 1724.

FAILLE, William de la, a syndic of Toulouse, who died 1711, aged 96. He wrote an interesting though inelegant history of his native city, 2 vols. fol.

FAIRCLOUGH, Samuel, a native of Haveril, educated at Queen's college, Cambridge. He was minister of Barnardiston, and afterwards of Ketton, Suffolk, and was ejected for nonconformity, 1662. He was a most amiable character in private life, and though he disapproved of some things in the liturgy, he was the friend of episcopacy. He published a sermon preached at sir Nat. Barnardiston's funeral, and some other tracts, and died 1678, aged 84. His son Samuel was ejected from Houghton Conquest rectory, Bedfordshire, and died 1691, and his other son Richard was also ejected from Wells living, Somersetshire, and died 1682.

FAIRFAX, Edward, an English poet in the reigns of Elizabeth and James, son of sir Thomas Fairfax of Denton, Yorkshire. He early displayed practical talents, and according to Dryden himself, a judge of merit, he deserved to be ranked above Spenser in point of harmony. His first attempt was a translation of Tasso's Godfrey of Bouillon, a performance very respectable, and highly valued by the wits of the times, and esteemed greatly by James and Charles I. He wrote also some eulogues, beside controversial treatises on the pope's infallibility, &c. and deserved the amiable character of a modest, benevolent man, who preferred solitude and peace to the war and tumults of the times. He died about the year 1632, at Newhall, between Denton and Knaresborough. His son William translated Diogenes Laertius into English.

FAIRFAX, Thomas lord, eldest son of Ferdinando lord Fairfax, was born at Denton, Yorkshire, 1611. He early devoted himself to the profession of arms, and after serving in Holland under lord Vere with great credit, he embraced the party of the Presbyterians in the civil war, and fought against the king. He was engaged in the North, where he suffered some defeats, especially at Adderton Moor 1643, but he retrieved his affairs and his fame in the battle of Marston Moor, and for his services was intrusted with the chief command of the army on the resignation of lord Essex. He contributed greatly to the king's defeat at Naseby 1645, and afterwards marched to the reduction of the West. In 1648, he succeeded to the title on the death of his father, who had like himself been very active in the cause of the parliament, and the same year he reduced Colchester, and much to his disgrace, ordered the brave defenders, sir George Lisle, and sir Charles Lucas, to whom he had promised pardon, to be shot. On the king's trial it was supposed that he would interfere, but during the execution he was kept at a distance from the dreadful scene, engaged with Col. Harrison, by the intrigues of Cromwell, in the hypocritical attitude of offering up prayers to God. After the destruction of royalty he favoured the views of the usurper, he was made doctor of laws at Oxford, and treated with unusual ceremony in London, but when offered by the parliament the command of the army against the revolted presbyterians of Scotland, he pertinaciously refused it, and it was granted to Cromwell. He afterwards lived in retirement, and at the restoration he was reconciled to the king, and went to the Hague to congratulate him on the change of the republican government. He wrote an interesting account of his public life, and died 1671.

FAIRTHORNE, William, an English painter, who became a soldier during the civil wars, and being taken at Basing-house was banished for refusing to swear allegiance to Cromwell. He studied abroad under Champagné, and on his return home applied himself chiefly in engraving, in which he also excelled. He wrote a book "upon drawing, graving, and etching," celebrated by Flatman the poet, and died at Blackfriars 1691, aged 75. His son William acquired celebrity by mezzotinto engraving.

FAISTENBERGER, Anthony, a painter of Inspruck, who died, 1722, aged 44. His landscapes, cascades, rocks and rivers, were all in a masterly style. His younger brother Joseph was equally eminent in landscape painting.

FALCANDUS, Hugo, a respectable and accurate historian of Sicily, who published an account of the affairs of his afflicted country for 23 years under William I. and II. His preface was written 1126. The time of his death is unknown.

FALCONBERG, Mary, countess of, the third daughter of Oliver Cromwell, and second wife of Thomas viscount Falconberg. She possessed great beauty, and so much spirit and activity that, as Burnet observes, she was more worthy to be protector than her brother. On Richard's deposition she exerted herself strenuously for the restoration of Charles II. with whom her husband was in great favour. She died 14th March, 1712.

FALCONE, da Benevento, secretary to pope Innocent II. was author of a Chronicle or History of Naples from 1102 to 1140.

FALCONER, William, a Scotsman, who came to London in 1672, where he published the "Shipwreck," in three cantos, a very ingenious and pathetic poem. He wrote also that useful compilation the Marine Dictionary, 4to. His merits recommended him to the patronage of the great, and especially of the late duke of York. As he was a sailor, he unfortunately perished in the Aurora, in 1769. This ship was proceeding to the East Indies with Messrs. Vansittart, Serafton, Ford, and other gentlemen, and after touching at the Cape of Good Hope, was never heard of.

FALCONET, Camille, a French physician, the friend of Malebranche, born at Lyons 1671. He was elected, in 1716, into the French academy, and from his excellent collection of nearly 500,000 volumes, he liberally enriched the royal library with such books as were deficient. He had lived to the age of 91 in 1762, and is supposed to have, like Fagon, prolonged life by his medical skill. He wrote a translation of Villemont's Systema Planetarum—an edition of the Pastorals of Daphnis and Chloe, translated by Amyot—an edition of Desperier's Cymbalum Mundi, besides Dissertations.

FALCONIA, Proba, a Latin poetess in the age of Theodosius, born at Horta in Etruria. She wrote from Virgil a poetical canto, containing the History of the Creation, and of the life of our Saviour.

FALDA, Giovanni Baptista, an Italian engraver of the last century, whose etchings in aqua fortis are much admired. His views of palaces, fountains, &c. in Rome, are esteemed very curious.

FALETI, Jeronimo, a poet of Savona, near Genoa, who published in 1557 a poem on the Wars of Charles V. and other poems. He was also distinguished as an orator, historian, and statesman, and was employed as ambassador to Venice, by Hercules, duke of Ferrara.

FALIERI, Ordelafo, a doge of Venice, who went with a fleet in 1102 to assist Baldwin of Jerusalem in the conquest of Syria. On his return he conquered Dalmatia, Croatia, and other provinces, and afterwards lost his life at the siege of the revolted city of Zara in Dalmatia, 1120.

FALIERI, Marino, a doge of Venice, 1354, who conspired to make himself absolute by the assassination of all the senators. His plot was discovered, and he lost his head at the age of 80, and more than 400 of his associates were hanged.

FALK, John Peter, a learned Swede, born at Westrogothia, and educated at Upsal, where he studied medicine and also botany under Linnæus. He was made professor of botany in the Apothecaries' garden at Petersburg, and keeper of the natural history cabinet, and he published Observations on his Travels, 3 vols. 4to. 1785, Petersburg. In a fit of melancholy, to which he was often subject, he unfortunately destroyed himself, 1774, aged 47.

FALKENSTEIN, John Henry, a native of Franconia, made, in 1714, director of the academy of noblemen at Erlingen. He was next in the service of the bishop of Eichstadt, and afterwards of the margrave of Anspach. He left the protestant for the Roman catholic religion, and died 1760, aged 78. He published the Antiquities of Nordgan in the diocess of Eichstadt, 3 vols. folio, and other works on ecclesiastical and antiquarian subjects.

FALKLAND, lord. Vid. CARY.

FALLE, Philip, author of the History of Jersey, where he was born 1655. He entered, at the age of 14, at Exeter college, Oxford, and afterwards removed to Alban hall. He was rector of St. Saviour's in the island, and came over as one of the deputies of the states to William and Mary. He also published three sermons preached at St. Hilary's, 1692, Whitehall, 1694, and before the lord mayor, 1695.

FALLOPIUS, Gabriel, a celebrated Italian physician and anatomist, born at Modena, 1490. He travelled through Europe, and afterwards practised with the greatest success and reputation. He was professor of anatomy at Pisa, 1548, and three years after at Padua, where he died 9th October, 1563, aged 72. He made various discoveries in anatomy, and especially the tubes by which the ova descend from the female ovarium into the uterus, called from him "Fallopian tubes." His works, which are all on subjects of medicine and anatomy, were published in 3 vols. folio, Venice, 1584 and 1606.

FALS, Raymond, a medal engraver, born at Stockholm, 1658. He settled at Paris, where he obtained a pension of 1200 livres, and died at Berlin, 1703.

FALSTER, Christian, a Danish critic of Flensburg, the time of whose death is not accurately ascertained. He wrote supplementum Linguæ Latinæ, 1717—Animadversiones Epistolice—Quæstiones Romanæ—Cogitatione Philologicæ—Sermo Panegy- ricus, &c. Vigilia prima Noctium Ripensium—Amoritates Philologica, 3 vols.—the 14th satire of Juvenal translated into Danish, 1731.

FANOURY, Samuel, a dissenting minister, born in the west of England. He settled at Salisbury, where for 20 years he took some pupils, and had the care of a congregation; but his writings against Calvinism exposed him to persecution, and driven from his residence, he came to London. About the year 1740, or 1745, he established the first circulating library in the kingdom; but, however, his plans did not succeed to his wishes, and after advertising for subscribers, and offering to teach the classics, so as to enable his pupils to write and speak fluently in 12 months for 12 guineas, he sunk into poverty and neglect, and from the corner of one of the streets in the Strand, where he had a shop, he retired to Hoxton square, where his indigence was relieved by the charitable contributions of his friends. He died 8th June, 1768, aged 90. As a preacher it is said that he was zealous and persuasive, without being popular or eloquent. His publications, which were numerous, are mentioned in the Gent. Magazine, 1784, p. 271.

FANNING, Edmund, LL.D. was a native of Connecticut, and was graduated at Yale college in 1757. He studied law and settled at Hillsborough, North Carolina, and at the time of the insurrection of that state in 1770, suffered severely from the regulators, in his person and property. He embraced the British cause at the commencement of the revolution, and commanded a party of royalists, and was celebrated for his talents, activity, and severity towards the Americans. After leaving the country, he was appointed lieutenant governor of Nova Scotia and of Prince Edward's Island, and promoted to the rank of general. He died at London in 1818.  L.

FANNIUS, surnamed STRABO, a Roman, who is known by his law to curb the extravagance of his countrymen. His son was an elegant orator. A historian of the same name in Trajan's age, wrote an account of Nero's reign, now lost.

FANSHAW, Sir Richard, an English gentleman, 10th son of Sir Henry Fanshaw, of Ware park, Herts, where he was born 1607. After studying at Cambridge, he travelled on the continent, and in 1635, was engaged in the service of Charles I. who sent him as envoy to Spain. In 1644 he attended the king at Oxford, and was made by the university doctor of laws, and afterwards appointed secretary to Charles prince of Wales, whose wanderings he shared in the west of England, and in the islands of Scilly and Jersey. He was treasurer of the navy under Rupert, in 1648, and was created 1650, a baronet by Charles II. and sent as envoy to Spain. He was taken at the battle of Worcester, and imprisoned in London, from which, however, he was liberated in consequence of a severe illness, by giving bail. In 1659, he visited the king at Breda, by whom he was knighted, and at the restoration he was made master of requests, and secretary of the Latin language. He afterwards was ambassador in Portugal, to negotiate the marriage of Charles and the infanta Catharina, and on his return, 1663, he was sworn of the privy council. He was in 1664 sent as ambassador to Philip IV. of Spain, with whose successor he concluded a treaty of peace in 1665. He died at Madrid, 16th June, 1666, of a fever, as he was preparing to return home. His body was embalmed, and brought over to England, and deposited in All-Saints' church, Hertford, and afterwards removed to a new vault in Ware church. He had by his wife Anne, daughter of Sir John Harrison, six sons, and eight daughters, of whom only one son, and four daughters survived him. Though engaged in political affairs, he found time to write some respectable pieces, and among them a translation in rhyme of Guarini's Pastor Fido, 1646, a translation of Fletcher's Faithful Shepherdess into Latin verse—Odes of Horace translated into English—Virgil's fourth Æneid—and Camoens' Lusiad, translated into English, besides some poems and original letters, published during his embassies in Spain and Portugal, 1702.

FARDELLA, Michael Angelo, an eminent professor of natural history and astronomy at Padua, was born at Trapani in Sicily, and died at Naples 1718, aged 68. He wrote several works, now little known.

FARE, Charles Augustus, marquis de la, a captain in the French guards, better known as a writer, and as the author of Memoirs and Reflections on the reign of Lewis XIV. 12mo. and of some little pieces of poetry which possess genius and merit. He began to be a poet when 60 years old, and died 1712, aged 68.

FAREL, William, an able reformer, born at Gap in Dauphiné, 1489. He studied with great assiduity at Paris the Hebrew and Greek tongues, but soon after he became a teacher, the spirit of persecution against the protestants drove him from France. He went to Strasburg, and then to Switzerland, and he successfully engaged with the duke of Wirtemberg, to introduce the reformation into Montbeliard, Aigle, Morat, and other places. He afterwards went to Geneva, but his violence against popery was resisted by the clergy, and he retired, though in 1534 he was recalled. In 1538 he was again banished from Geneva with Calvin, and retired to Basil, and then to Neufchatel. Zealous in the cause of reformation, he laboured assiduously as a preacher, and though exposed to a thousand dangers from persecution and from the jealousy of the papists, he escaped them all, and after increasing his proselytes at Metz and the neighbouring places, he visited Calvin on his death-bed at Geneva, 1514, and expired himself the next year on the 13th Sept. at Neufchatel. At the age of 69 he married, an event in his life which exposed him to the ridicule of his enemies. Erasmus, among others, has spoken of him severely, but rather unjustly, when he calls him a false, virulent, and seditious evangelist. Nothing could, indeed, resist the zeal of Farel, though surrounded by drawn swords, though interrupted by the ringing of bells, and by the clamours of his enemies, he yet preached boldly and successfully, and made as many converts as any of the reformers. He wrote some few things on controversial subjects.

FARET, Nicholas, one of the first members of the French academy, known more for the excellent statutes which he formed for the new Institution, than the books he wrote. He was the friend of count d'Harcourt and Vaugelas St. Amand, and died 1646, aged 46.

FARIN, Emanuel de Sousa, a Portuguese knight, who accompanied Rodrigo, as ambassador to Rome. He died at Madrid, 1650, aged 60, reduced to poverty, by his negligence of his property. He wrote poems in a manly and nervous style, collected into seven volumes after his death, besides moral and political discourses, commentaries on the Lusiad of Camoens, a history of Portugal to the reign of Henry the cardinal, and Portuguese Europe, Asia, Africa, and America. Though a Portuguese, he preferred the Castilian language to his own.

FARINACCIO, Prosper, an Italian lawyer, born at Rome, died 1618, aged 64. His works in 13 vols. fol. are much esteemed at Rome. They are all on law subjects.

FARINATO, Paul, an Italian painter, born at Verona 1522. His mother died in giving him birth, and he and his wife both expired at the same moment in 1606. One of his paintings in St. George's church, Verona, is as much admired as that of Paul Veronese, which is placed near it. He was equally eminent as an orator, sculptor, and architect, and it is said that he was also a good swordsman.

FARINELLI. Vid. BROSCHI.

FARINGDON, Anthony, an English divine, born at Sunning, Berks, 1596. He was educated at Trinity college, Oxford, of which he became fellow and tutor, and afterwards he was vicar of Bray, near Maidenhead, 1634, and divinity reader in Windsor chapel. In the civil wars, he was ejected from his parish, and reduced to great poverty, till invited by Sir John Robinson, alderman of London, to officiate at St. Mary Magdalen, Milk-street, London, where he died September, 1658. He published in 1657, a folio volume of his sermons, dedicated to his patron Robinson, and after his death two other folio volumes of his MS. sermons were published by his friends.

FARMER, Hugh, a dissenting minister, educated under Dr. Doddridge. He settled at Walthamstow, and lived in the house of his friend Mr. Snell, where he died 5th Feb. 1787. He wrote a dissertation on Miracles, 8vo.—a treatise on the Worship of Human Spirits among the Heathens, 8vo.—on Christ's Temptation, 8vo.—and on the Demoniacs, 8vo.

FARMER, Richard, a learned native of Leicester, educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he became fellow and tutor, and took his degree of M. A. 1760. In 1766 he published his valuable essay on the learning of Shakspeare, in which he maintains that the bard obtained his knowledge of ancient history and mythology from translations, and not from original classical authors. He was in 1767 made one of the Whitehall preachers, and in 1775 he was elected master of his college, and then took his degree of D.D. He obtained afterwards a prebend, and the chancellorship in Litchfield cathedral, the place of librarian in Cambridge, and afterwards a prebend of Canterbury, which he exchanged for a residentiaryship of St. Paul's. He had collected materials for the history of his native town, which however he gave, together with the plates, to his friend Mr. Nichols, for his Leicestershire history. He died 1797, aged 62, and his valuable collection of scarce and curious books was sold by public auction, after his death.—

He was born May 4th, 1735. His ancestors for several generations had resided in Warwickshire, and one of the family emigrated from Anceley, in that county, to New-England about 1673, and settled at Bellerica, Massachusetts, where his descendants still continue.  L.

FARNABY, Thomas, an eminent grammarian, born in London, 1575. He was servitor of Merton college, Oxford, and was seduced by the Jesuits, and persuaded to leave his country and religion, and retire to Spain. Tired of the discipline of his new instructors, he at last with difficulty escaped, and went a voyage with Sir Francis Drake and Sir John Hawkins, 1595. He afterwards served as a soldier in the Low Countries, and then returned to Cornwall, poor and destitute. He settled at Martock, Somersetshire, where he taught grammar with great success, and then came to London, where he met with much encouragement, and had not less than three hundred pupils. In 1616 he took his master's degree at Cambridge, and was admitted ad eundem at Oxford, and about 1636, on account of the sickness prevalent in London, he removed to Seven Oaks, Kent, where his usual success attended him, and enabled him to purchase an estate there, and another in Sussex. During the civil wars he became obnoxious to the parliament, because he had said it was better to have one king than 500. He was therefore imprisoned in Newgate, and though his enemies wished to transport him to America, he was removed to Ely house, Holborn, where he continued till within a year of his death. He died 12th June, 1647, and was buried at Seven Oaks. His works were—Notæ ad Juvenalis et Persii Satiras, 1612—Notæ ad Senecæ Tragædias, 1613—ad Martialis Epigr. 1615—ad Lucani Pharsalia, 1618—Index Rhetoricus, &c. 1625—Florilegium Epigrammat. Græc. 1629—Notæ ad Virgil. 1634—Systema Grammatic. 1641, &c. His works display every where great erudition, and his notes, says Boyle, are of great use, being short, learned, and designed to clear up the text.

FARNESE, Peter Louis, son of pope Paul III. by a secret marriage, before he became a cardinal, was made duke of Parma and Placentia. His debaucheries, and the tyranny of his government, rendered him so unpopular, that he was assassinated at Placcencia, 1547, two years after his elevation.

FARNESE, Alexander, eldest son of the preceding, was born 1520. He was made bishop of Parma by Clement VII. and advanced to the purple in 1534, by his grandfather Paul III. by whom he was employed as ambassador to Germany, France, and the Low Countries. His talents as a negotiator were very great, and he was respected for his learning, as well as patronage of literature, and of learned men. He died at Rome, 1589. Charles V. said of him, when dean of the sacred college, that if all the members resembled him, the college would be the most august assembly in the world.

FARNESE, Alexander, third duke of Parma, was nephew to the cardinal. He distinguished himself at the siege of Lepanto, and at the taking of Antwerp, and succeeded in 1578 John of Austria, as governor of the Low Countries. He received a mortal wound at Rouen, when it was besieged by Henry IV. of France, and he died at Arras, 1592.

FARNEWORTH, Ellis, an English divine, born at Bonteshall, Derbyshire, where his father was rector, and educated at Chesterfield and Eton, and then at Jesus college, Cambridge. He was presented to the rectory of Carsington, Derbyshire, 1762, by dean Yorke, and died there 25th March, 1763. He wrote the life of pope Sixtus V. from the Italian of Leti, folio. 1754—Davila's history of France, 2 vols. 4to. 1757—Machiavel's works translated 1761, reprinted 1775, 4 vols. 8vo.

FARQUHAR, George, an eminent comic poet, son of a clergyman, born at Londonderry, 1678. He was educated at Dublin college, and afterwards engaged himself with a company of players. In this employment, at the representation of Dryden's Indian Emperor he was nearly converting the play into a real tragedy, for forgetting to exchange his sword for a foil, he, as Guyomar, wounded his antagonist Vclasquez so dreadfully that from that moment he in terror bid adieu to the stage: He came to London in 1696, and at the repeated solicitations of Wilks, the actor, he turned his thoughts to the composition of a theatrical piece. His opportunities of study and meditation were improved by the kindness of lord Orrery, who gave him a lieutenant's commission in his regiment. In 1698 his first comedy appeared, called "Love in a Bottle," and was well received. In 1700 "The Constant Couple, or Trip to the Jubilee," was acted, and gave Wilks the opportunity of displaying Sir Harry Wildair with all the gayety, animation, and vivacity of the character. The same year Farquhar was in Holland, and he has given a facetious and interesting account of the place and people in two letters. In 1701 appeared "Sir Harry Wildair, or the sequel to the Trip to the Jubilee," which was received with uncommon approbation. He published in 1702 miscellanies, or collections of poems, letters, and essays, and the next year came out his "Inconstant, or the Way to Win him." In 1704 appeared his "Stage Coach," the next year "The Twin Rivals," and in 1706 "The Recruiting Officer," dedicated to "all friends round the Wreckin," a hill near Shrewsbury, where he had observed on a recruiting party the manner in which clowns are inveigled into the army, and the milk-maids are robbed of their virtue and happiness, by the arts of military men. His last comedy was the Beaux' Stratagem, the good success of which he did not see, as the unkindness of a courtier, who had promised, and forgot, to patronise him, and the pressure of his debts, broke his heart. He died April, 1707, before he had reached his thirtieth year. He had married in 1703 a lady who had fallen in love him, and who to gain the affections of a needy and dissipated suitor, had falsely represented herself as a woman of great opulence. He married, but though bitterly disappointed, he never upbraided his wife with the artifice, but became a tender and indulgent husband. He left two daughters, whom in his papers he had recommended to the friendship and patronage of Wilks. Wilks became a father to them, he procured a benefit for each of them, and continued his parental fondness, even after they were settled in business. For the success of his comedies, Farquhar is indebted to the natural delineation of his characters, the interesting tendency of his plots, and the flowing graces and sprightliness of his wit. The same popularity attends them now as upon their original production, though it is to be lamented, that a licentiousness and spirit of indelicacy much to be censured are observed throughout, to be attributed not so much to depravity of heart in the author, as to the impure taste of the age in which he wrote.

FASSTOLFF, Sir John, a valiant general, of an ancient family, born at Yarmouth, in Norfolk, about 1377. He attended the duke of Clarence, as lieutenant of Ireland, about 1405 and 1406, and in 1408 he married a rich widow of that kingdom, and soon after went over to France, where, under the English regency, he was promoted to places of trust and honour. He returned home, 1440, covered with laurels bravely won in the field, and in his private conduct now he exhibited the hospitable, generous, and benevolent man. He bestowed large legacies on Cambridge, to build the schools of philosophy and civil law, and was a most liberal benefactor to Magdalen college, Oxford, founded by his friend Wainfleet. He died 1459, aged upwards of 80, according to what Caxton, his cotemporary, has mentioned. Shakspeare has been severely censured for abusing this great and good man under the character of Sir John Falstaff. The age and the name of these two knights are so different, that the apparent coincidence must be purely accidental. Fastolf, as is well observed, was a young and grave, discreet and valiant, chaste and sober commander abroad, and eminent for every virtue at home; but the Falstaff of the poet is an old, humorous, vapouring, cowardly, lewd, lying, drunken debauchee. It is besides to be recollected, that Shakspeare's Falstaff was first acted under the name of Sir John Oldcastle, though modern critics dispute it.

FAVART, Charles Simon, a Parisian, known for his operas, which are numerous, and deservedly admired. He died at Paris, 1793, aged 83.

FAVART, Marie Justine Benoitte, a famous French actress, wife of the preceding, born at Avignon, 1727. Her maiden name was du Roncerai. She was never surpassed in the sensibility, ease, and liveliness of her comic characters. She died at Paris, 1772.

FAUCHET, Claude, a French antiquarian, historiographer to Henry IV. He died

1601, aged 72, overwhelmed in debts. The monuments of his extensive reading and deep researches are to be found in his Gaulish and French antiquities—a treatise on the liberties of the Gallican Church—on the origin of Knights, Armorial Bearings, and Heraldry—origin of Dignities and Magistracies in France. These works, printed together in 4to. 1610, are curious, but so inelegant, that, it is said, the perusal of them gave Lewis XIII. a distaste for reading.

FAUCHET, Claude, a native of Dorne, in the Nivernois, who became vicar-general to the archbishop of Bruges, and preacher to Lewis XVI. The theatrical manner, and ridiculous affectation of his delivery, however, offended the devotion of the monarch, and in consequence of this disgrace, Fauchet, at the revolution, was most hostile to the government. He was one of the most active in the destruction of the Bastille, and preached a thanksgiving sermon on the event, and in his enthusiastic conduct showed himself so forgetful of his character and profession, that he called Jesus Christ the first sansculotte of Judea. These extravagancies rendered him popular with the mob; he was deputy from Calvados in the national assembly and in the convention, and became the constitutional bishop of Bayeaux. He was at last accused as a disaffected person before the revolutionary tribunal, and guillotined 1793, in his 49th year. He wrote a panegyric on St. Lewis, before the French academy—a funeral oration for the duke of Orleans—discourse on Universal Manners—eulogy on Benjamin Franklin, &c.

FAUCHEUR, Michael le, a French protestant divine, admired as a preacher at Montpellier, Charenton, and Paris. After hearing him discourse on duelling, marshal de la Force said, "if a challenge was sent to me, I would refuse it." He died universally regretted at Paris, 1667. He wrote a treatise on Oratorical Action—sermons in Svo.—Christian Prayers and Meditations—a treatise on the Eucharist, against cardinal Perron, Geneva, folio.

FAUGERES, Margaretta V. an American lady, was the daughter of Ann Elizabeth Bleecker, born in 1777, and was distinguished for her literary accomplishments. Her youth was spent at Tomhanc. She afterwards resided and married in New-York. Many of her poetical pieces were published in the periodical works of the day, and much admired. To the volume of her mother's works, which she published, she added memoirs of her own life, and several essays of her own, and afterwards she produced the tragedy of Bellisarius. By the profligacy of her husband, Peter Faugeres, a physician of New-York, she was reduced to extreme poverty, and after his death, in 1798, resorted to teaching for support. She died in January, 1801.

FAULKNER, George, a printer of eminence, the first who raised his profession in Ireland to credit and respectability. He was the friend of dean Swift, and of lord Chesterfield, whose letters to him under the name of Atticus, are much admired. He had the misfortune to break his leg, in consequence of which Foote, with more humour than good breeding, introduced him in his Orators, 1762, in the character of Peter Paraph. The insult was felt, and Faulkner commenced an action against the mimic, which, however, was dropped by the interference of lord Townshend. He raised himself to opulence by the success of his "Journal," and was universally respected for his fair and upright conduct in his profession. He died Alderman of Dublin, 28th August, 1775.

FAUQUIER, Francis, lieutenant governor of Virginia, succeeded Dinwiddie in the administration in 1768. He was a man of fine talents and education, of great excellence of character, and a warm friend to liberty, science, and religion. His administration was pre-eminently popular and useful. He did much to polish manners, raise the standard of taste, and promote the progress of knowledge in the colony. He died March 3d, 1768.

FAVOLIVS, Hugo, a Dutch physician and poet, author of Hodoeporican Byzantium, in 3 books, published at Louvain, 1563. He died 1585.

FAVORINUS, a Platonic philosopher in the age of Adrian. He was born at Arles in Gaul, and taught at Rome.

FAVORINUS, Varinus, originally Guarini of Favera, near Camerino, in Italy, the place of his birth, was a disciple of Politian, and became a Benedictine monk. In 1512, he was keeper of the Medicean library of Florence, and in 1514, was made bishop of Nocera, and died 1537. He published in 1523, his Greek Lexicon at Rome, one of the first of modern Lexicons, compiled from Suidas, the Etymologicum Magnum, Hesychius, &c. the best edition of which is that of Bartoli, folio, Venice, 1712. He wrote besides Cornucopiæ et Horti Adonidis, and Stobæus' Apophthegmata, translated.

FAUR, Guy de, lord of Pibrac, a native of Toulouse, eminent as an advocate, and sent by Charles IX. as ambassador to the council of Trent, where he manfully defended the liberties of the Gallican church. In 1565, he was made advocate general in the parliament of Paris, and in 1570, counsellor of state. In 1572, he vindicated the massacre of St. Bartholomew, no doubt compelled by his superiors, as his own character was mild, humane, and far from vindictive. He made peace between the court and the protestants under Henry III. whom he had accompanied to Poland, when he was elected king there. He possessed great influence with his master, and was created one of the chief presidents of the court of law. He died 1584, aged 56. He published some speeches, but he is best known by his "Quatrains," or Moral Stanzas of four lines, so much admired at that time, that they were translated into all languages, and into English by Sylvester.

FAVRE, Anthony, Faber in Latin, a profound lawyer, born 1557, at Bresse. He was governor of Savoy, and was engaged in several negotiations between that dukedom and France. He died 1624. He wrote 10 volumes, folio, on jurisprudence and civil law, besides quatrains preserved among those of Faur, lord of Pibrac.

FAVRE, Claude. Vid. VAUGELAS.

FAUST. Vid. FUST.

FAUSTA, Flavia Maximiana, second wife of the great Constantine, caused by false accusation the death of Crispus, her son-in-law. She was suffocated in a bath for her incontinence, 327.

FAUSTINA, Anna Galeria, daughter of Ann. Verus, and wife of Antoninus Pius, disgraced herself by her debaucheries, and died 141. Her daughter was equally licentious.

FAUSTUS, an English monk of the fifth century. He was abbot of the monastery of the Lerin Islands 433, and in 466 made bishop of Riez, in Provence. He wrote a homily on Maximus, his predecessor in the bishopric. He was banished from his see in 481, and died soon after.

FAWCETT, Sir William, an English general, born at Shipden-hall, near Halifax, Yorkshire. He received his education at a grammar-school in Lancashire, and early embraced the military profession, and served in Germany during the seven years' war under Eliot and Granby. His abilities were applauded by the king of Prussia, who made him liberal offers to accept a command in his army, but he preferred the service of his native country, and was gradually promoted to the rank of a general, and made knight of the bath, colonel of the third regiment of dragoon guards, and governor of Chelsea hospital. He died 1804, and was buried with great military pomp in Chelsea college chapel. He translated from the French count Saxe's revelies, or Memoirs on the Art of War, 4to. 1757—Regulations for the Prussian Cavalry, from the German, 1757—Regulations for the Prussian Infantry, and the Prussian Tactics, 1759.

FAWKES, Francis, an ingenious poet, born in Yorkshire, 1721, and educated at Leeds school, and afterwards at Jesus college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts. Upon taking orders, he settled at Bromham, Yorkshire, and then removed to Croydon, Surrey, where Herring, the primate, noticed him, and gave him, in 1755, the vicarage of Orpington, with St. Mary Clay, Kent, which he exchanged in 1774 for the rectory of Hayes. He died 26th Aug. 1777. He published an ode inscribed to his patron Herring, and lamented his death in 1757, in a pathetic elegy. His poems appeared by subscription, 1761, in 8vo. but his chief merit was translation, as is evinced by his spirited versions of Anacreon, Sappho, Bion, Moschus, and Musæus, 1760, 12mo.—and the Idyllia of Theocritus, 1767, 8vo. His Apollonius Rhodius appeared 1780. A Bible, with notes, was published in his name.

FAYDIT, Anselm, a Provençal poet, or troubadour of celebrity, noticed by the princes of his time for his wit and the elegance of his manners. He was relieved from indigence by the liberality of Richard Cœur de Lion, who admired his poetry, and he died at Aix, 1220. He wrote a poem on the death of his benefactor Richard, the Palace of Love, imitated afterwards by Petrarch, besides comedies, one of which "Heregia dels Prestes," reflected severely on the corruption of the church.

FAYDIT, Peter, a priest of the oratory, who was born at Riom in Auvergne, and died there 1709, aged 60. He is known for his satirical attacks on great characters, especially Bossuet and Fenelon, for his Telemachus, and his illustrations of Ecclesiastical History, 8vo.—his treatise on the Trinity, &c.

FAYETTE, Louisa de la, a French lady of great celebrity. She was maid of honour to Anne of Austria, and enjoyed the confidence of Lewis XIII. without sullyng her good name or her virtue. So great was her influence upon this monarch that she reconciled him to his queen, and when she had thus served the man whom she respected, she retired uncontaminated to a convent, and took the veil. Lewis visited her in her retreat, but she resisted every invitation to the court. She died in her convent, universally beloved, and deservedly admired for that uncommon display of virtue and self-command which, in a young and beautiful woman, could resist the most flattering offers of distinction and of rank, and sacrifice the world and her innocent attachment to a king, to the meek spirit of devotion.

FAYETTE, Marie Madeleine, countess of, daughter of Aymer de la Vergne, governor of Havre de Grace, and wife of count de la Fayette, is celebrated for her knowledge of literature and of the fine arts, and her intimacy with Rochefoucault, Huetius, Menage, Segrais, and other learned men. She died 1693. Though abused for levity of conduct by the author of the memoirs of Madam de Maintenon, she is represented by Madam de Sevigné as a woman of respectable and exemplary character. She wrote Zaide—La Princesse de Cleves—La Princesse de Montpensier, romances—Memoires de la Cour de France, 1688 and 1689—Histoire d'Henriette d'Angleterre—divers portraits, &c. These works are still esteemed. She is the first, says Voltaire, who exhibited in her romances the manners of people of fashion in a graceful, easy, and natural way.

FEATLEY, Daniel, or FAIRCLOUGH, an English divine, born at Charlton, Oxfordshire, March, 1582. He was educated at Magdalen college school and Corpus Christi, Oxford, of which he became fellow, 1602. He distinguished himself so much by his extensive knowledge of school divinity, and by his eloquence as a preacher, that he was sent as chaplain to sir Thomas Edmund's embassy to France, where he continued three years. He became in 1613, rector of Northill, Cornwall, and chaplain to Abbot, the primate, who made him rector of Lambeth. In 1617, he took his degree of D.D. and afterwards received from his patron, the primate, the rectory of All-Hallows, Bread-street, London, which he exchanged for Acton, and he was the last provost of Chelsea college. He suffered much in his property by the civil wars, and hardly escaped with his life, as he was seized and imprisoned in 1643, for opposing the covenant. He grew so weak and dropsical from the confinement, that he was permitted to remove to Chelsea college, where he died, April, 1645. He was a very able disputant, and a most smart scourge, says Wood, of the church of Rome. He published nearly 40 works, all of the polemical kind, besides "Cyanea Cantio," 1629, and the scholastic duel between him and king James.

FECHE, or FECHTIUS, John, a Lutheran divine of Brisgaw, who settled at Dourlach, and afterwards at Rostock. He died 1716, aged 80. He wrote a History of Cain and Abel, with notes, &c. 8vo.—a treatise on the Religion of the modern Greeks—another against the Superstitions of the Mass, &c.

FECKENHAM, John de, so called as being born of poor parents, near that forest in Worcestershire. His right name was Howman. His promising abilities were observed and improved by the priest of his parish, and he was educated carefully in the monastery of Evesham, and afterwards at Gloucester-hall, Oxford, where, in 1539, he took the degree of B. D. He was afterwards chaplain to Bishops Bell and Bonner, and in 1549, he was committed to the tower for refusing, it is said, to administer the sacraments after the manner of the protestants. On Mary's accession he was released, and raised to distinction in the church. In 1554, he disputed at Oxford with Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, before they suffered martyrdom; but though favoured by the papists, he exercised every office of benevolence and kindness towards the suffering protestants. In 1556, he was made D. D. by the university of Oxford, in compliment to his great learning, and his many private virtues, and the same year he was appointed abbot of Westminster. On Mary's death, Elizabeth, before her coronation, sent for him, and as he had interested himself warmly in her favour during the last reign, she acknowledged his services, and offered him the archbishopric of Canterbury if he would conform, which he absolutely refused. In the queen's first parliament he was the last abbot that sat there, and he then spoke so boldly against the reformation, that he was sent to the tower in 1560. He continued in custody, either in the house of some bishop, or in a public prison, the rest of his life; but though he acknowledged the queen's supremacy, he never would conform to the reformation. He died a prisoner in Wisbech castle, in the isle of Ely, 1585. Though a violent papist, he was a most humane and charitable man, whose mildness, piety, and goodness of heart, have been warmly commended by Camden, Fuller, Burnet, Dart, and Reyner. His works were chiefly sermons and controversial tracts, now little regarded.

FELIJO, Benedict Jerom, a Spanish Benedictine, who attempted by his writings and example, to correct and reform the vitiated notions of his countrymen. His Teatro Critico, in 14 vols. 4to. is a work of great merit, which, with great freedom and spirit, censures the ignorance and licentiousness of the clergy, and exposes the futility of pilgrimages, pretended miracles, and superstitious exorcisms. This unusual boldness against the prejudices of the times, proved very offensive to the church, and the author was, with difficulty, saved from the horrors of the inquisition. He died 1765.

FELIUS, Everard, a learned German, born at Elburgh, in Guelderland. After devoting himself with great assiduity to literature at Berne, he returned home; but the invasion of the Spaniards under Spinola so terrified him, that he retired to France, where he taught Greek, and was honoured with the friendship of Casaubon, Thuanus, Du Puy, and other learned men. As he walked one day at Rochelle, attended by a servant, he was invited into a house by one of the citizens, and from that moment, it never could be known what became of him, though the mysterious occurrence was diligently inquired into by the magistrates of the place. He was then young, but had given great specimens of superior learning. Of his MS. works were published Antiquitatum Homeriarum Libri Quatuor, 12mo. Leyden, 1677—De Atheniensium Republicâ—De Antiquit. Atticis, &c. very learned and interesting.

FELIBIEN, Andrew, counsellor and historiographer to the French king, was born at Chartres, 1619. He improved himself at Paris, and also at Rome, where he attended as secretary de Fontenay-Mareuil, ambassador to that court from France. On his return he was patronised by Fouquet and Colbert, and placed by the king in offices of respectability and importance. He was one of the first members of the academy of inscriptions and medals, and died June 11th, 1695, aged 76, leaving five children. His principal works are Entretiens sur les Vies et les Ouvrages des plus Excellens Peintres, Anciens et Modernes, 5 vols. 4to.—Les Principes de l'Architecture, de la Sculpture, et de la Peinture, avec un Dictionnaire des Termes Propres, de ces Arts, de l'Origine de la Peinture, &c.—Descriptions of several Entertainments given by the king, &c.—the Conferences of the Royal Academy of Painting, &c.—the description of the Abbey de la Trappe, &c. His Dialogues on the Lives of the Painters is the work most admired. It is elegant and profound. In his private character, Felibien was very amiable, a good man, not ambitious, but possessed of every Christian virtue. He first gave the name of great to Lewis XIV. in the inscriptions of the Hotel de Ville.

FELIBIEN, John Francis, succeeded his father in all his appointments, and inherited all his taste and knowledge of the fine arts. He wrote an Historical Collection of the Lives and Works of the most celebrated Architects, 4to. 1687—Description of Versailles, ancient and modern, 12mo.—Description of the Church of Invalids, folio, 1706, and 1756. He died 1733.

FELIBIEN, James, brother of Andrew, was archdeacon of Chartres, and died 25th Nov. 1716. He wrote Des Instructions Morales—and Pentateuchus Historicus.

FELIBIEN, Michael, son of Andrew, was of the congregation of St. Maur, and was engaged to write the History of Paris, which he did not live to complete. It was finished by Lobineau, 5 vols. fol. 1725. He died 10th Sept. 1719, aged 53. He had published, in 1706, the history of the Abbey of St. Denys, in folio.

FELIX, was the governor of Judea before whom Paul preached with such effect as to cause him to tremble. He was recalled by Nero for his oppression.

FELIX, Bishop of Urgella in Spain, supposed, with his friend Elipand, archbishop of Toledo, that Christ was Son of God only by adoption, an opinion which drew upon him the resentment of Charlemagne, and his deposition from his see. He died an exile at Lyons, 815.

FELIX I. pope after Dionysius, 269, was put to death 274, and canonized. His epistle against Sabellius and Paulus Samosatenus is preserved.

FELIX II. was in 355 elevated to the papal chair by Constans, during the exile of Laberius. On the return of his rival, Felix, supported by the authority of Constans, wished to retain his office conjunctly with him, but the Romans exclaimed, "one God, one Christ, one pope," and he retired to exile, and died 365.

FELIX III. successor of Simplicius, quarrelled with the emperor Zeno, in defence of the privileges of the Western church, and died 492.

FELIX IV. a native of Beneventum, was raised to the papal chair after John I. 526, and died four years after. He was a prelate of great piety and exemplary goodness. He was the first who introduced the extreme unction in the church.

FELL, Dr. John, a learned prelate, born at Longworth, Berks, 23d June, 1625. He was educated at Thames school, and at the age of 11 was admitted at Christ-church, Oxford, where his father was dean. During the civil war he bore arms for the king, and for his loyalty he was expelled from the college, and lived in retirement till the restoration, when he was made prebendary of Chichester, and canon and dean of Christ-church. He was very liberal to his college, and built the tower over the principal gate, into which in 1683 he caused to be removed the bell called great Tom, said to have been originally brought from Oseney abbey. In 1666, and the three following years, he served the office of vice-chancellor, and by his indefatigable attention he contributed much to restore the good order and ancient discipline of the university. In 1675-6 he was made bishop of Oxford, without giving up his deanery, and now, besides charitable contributions, he applied a large part of his income to the rebuilding of Cuddesden palace. He died 10th July, 1686, and was buried in Christ-church cathedral, where an inscription by Aldrich, his successor, marks his grave. He wrote the Life of Dr. Hammond, 1660—Historia et Antiquitates Universitatis Oxon, 2 vols. folio, translated from Wood's—Alcinoi in Platonicam Philosophiam Introductio—In Laudem Musices Carmen Sapphicum—St. Clement's two Epistles to the Corinthians, Greek and Latin—Allestree's Life—sermons—an edition of Cyprian's works, and other classics. The bishop's father, Dr. Samuel Fell, was born in St. Clement Danes parish, London, 1594, and was educated at Westminster and Christ-church. He was successively minister of Freshwater, isle of Wight, chaplain to James I. prebendary of Worcester, dean of Lichfield, and in 1638 dean of Christ-church. He died 1st Feb. 1648-9, of a broken heart, in consequence of the murder of his royal master. He wrote Primitiæ, seu Oratio, &c. 1626, and Concio Latina ad Baccalau-reos, &c. 1627.

FELL, John, a dissenting minister, born at Cockermouth, 1732. He was originally a tailor; but after living in that employment in London, he acquired some knowledge of the classics, and became pastor of a congregation at Beccles, Suffolk, and afterwards Thaxsted, Essex. He was afterwards tutor at an academy at Homer-ton, from which he was dismissed, says his biographer, for reading a newspaper on a Sunday. A subscription of 100 guineas was made that he should preach sermons on the evidences of Christianity. Four only of these discourses were delivered at the Scots' church, London Wall, when the preacher fell a victim to a dropsy, 13th Sept. 1797. The sermons were continued and published by Dr. H. Hunter. Fell was the author of Answers to Farmer's Essay on the Demoniacs—and his treatise on the Idolatri of Greece and Rome—Genuine Protestantism—an Essay on the Love of one's Country—a Letter to Burke on the Penal Laws—an Essay on English Grammar, &c.

FELLER, Joachim Frederic, a learned German, born at Leipsic, 1673. He was secretary to the duke of Weimar, and travelled much to visit foreign libraries. He died 1726. The best known of his works is Monumenta Varia Inedita, Jena, 1714, in 12 numbers, 4to. He wrote also Miscellanea Leibnitiana—Genealogy of the House of Brunswick.

FELLER, Francis Xavier, an ex-jesuit, born at Brussels. He wrote an Historical and Literary Journal from 1774 to 1794, at Luxemburg—a Geographical Dictionary—Observations on Newton's Philosophy—and Buffon's Epochs of Nature examined—an Historical Dictionary, 8 vols. 8vo. Liege, said by the editors of the Nouveau Dictionnaire Historique, to be pirated from their own work. He died at Ratisbon, 1802, aged 67.

FELLTHAM, Owen, an English writer born in the reign of James I. in Suffolk, where his family had been settled for several generations. Few particulars are known of his history, though it appears that his learning and virtues recommended him to the notice of the earl of Thomond, in whose family he lived for some years in easy and honourable dependence. He wrote Resolves, Divine, Moral, and Political, a work of great merit, and singular excellence, of which the 12th edition appeared in 1709, in 8vo. This book, so valuable for its refined sentiments of morality, its pointed delineations of duty, and its interesting tendency to instruct the mind and improve the heart in the road of virtue, has lately been edited with a few alterations by Mr. Cumming, and deservedly recommends itself to universal perusal. Felltham wrote besides some prayers for the use of lady Thomond's family, &c. The time of his death is unknown, though he was living in 1677.

FELTON, John, an Englishman, known in history as the assassin of Villiers, duke of Buckingham, 1628, a crime which he committed out of fanatic zeal, in the full persuasion that he thus served God and man. He was tried and executed for the foul deed. He had been a lieutenant in the army which besieged the isle of Rhé, and because he did not succeed to a company on the death of his captain, who was slain in the attack, he quitted the army in disgust, and became a bigoted dissatisfied puritan. His grandfather of the same name had, in the reign of Elizabeth, affixed on the palace gates of the bishop of London, the bull of Pius V. by which the queen was declared a heretic, and her subjects incited to rebellion. He was tried and executed for this conduct, 1570. His son Thomas was a Franciscan, and came to England as a missionary, for which he was executed, 1588.

FELTON, Henry, principal of Edmund-hall, Oxford, dedicated to his pupil, the duke of Rutland, his dissertation on reading the Classics, and forming a Just Style, a work of merit. He wrote also a volume of sermons, and died 1739.

FENDALL, Josias, governor of Maryland, who exercised also the powers of chief justice, received his appointment from the commissioners of parliament in 1658. He had previously been appointed governor by the proprietors, but rendered himself unworthy of their confidence by his intrigues, which caused great confusion in the province. In June, 1660, he was succeeded by Philip Calvert. Twenty years after he was fined forty thousand pounds of tobacco, and banished from the province for his seditious practices.

FENELON, Francis de Salignac de la Motte, archbishop of Cambrai, was born of an illustrious family at the castle of Fenelon, in Perigord, 6th August, 1651. He was educated at Cahors, and afterwards finished his studies at Paris, and began early to acquire popularity as a preacher. At the age of 24 he took orders, and in 1686, after the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he was sent by the king at the head of the missionaries who were to convert the protestants of the coast of Saintonge and the Pays de Aunis, who had not yet submitted to the influence of military force. In 1689 he was appointed tutor to the dukes of Burgundy, Anjou, and Berri, and he displayed such abilities in the education of these princes, that the king in gratitude for his services gave him the abbey of St. Valery, and soon after the see of Cambrai, to which he was consecrated by Bossuet, 1695. In 1697 he was exposed to religious persecution, by the publication of his explication of "the maxims of the Saints concerning the Interior Life," in which he supported the claims of Madame Guyon to exalted devotion, and her mystical interpretation of Solomon's Song. There was little in her book, that merited attention, but as Fenelon defended her cause, his authority alarmed some of the French prelates, and conferences were held for some months between him and Bossuet, bishop of Meaux, Noailles, bishop of Chalons, and Troncon, superior of St. Sulpicius. Fenelon was offered to sign a recantation of his opinions, and when he refused, the affair was referred to the king, and then to the decision of the pope, who in condemning the archbishop's book, declared that he had erred from excess of love of God, and his opponents from excess of love of their neighbour. This affair, to which such importance was attached, was supposed to arise from the wish of preventing the appointment of Fenelon to the office of almoner to the dutchess of Burgundy, which was immediately filled by Bossuet. Fenelon, with true Christian meekness, submitted to the decision of the pope, and read the sentence, and his recantation in his own diocess, where, by his exemplary life, he gave lustre to the episcopal office. He afterwards assisted the Jesuits, in their successful attack against the Jansenists, and procured the disgrace of Noailles their patron, and the condemnation of their writings. The work from which Fenelon derives immortality is his "Telémachus." It was indeed exposed to the jealousy of Lewis and his courtiers, who pretended to see the character of Madame de Montespan in Calypso, of Mademoiselle de Fontanges, in Eucharis, of the dutchess of Burgundy, in Antiope, of Louvois, in Protesilaus, of James II. in Idomenus, and of Lewis XIV. in Sesostris, but though its publication was prohibited in France, it appeared at Paris surreptitiously in 1699, and in a corrected form at the Hague, 1701. Such is the merit of the work, that it ranks, though in prose, among epic poems, and by the elegance of its style, and the sublimity of its moral, it has secured universal applause, and has been translated.

into all the modern languages of Europe. The last part of Fenelon's life was spent in the conscientious discharge of the pastoral office in his diocese, where his benevolence and goodness of heart gained him the affection and gratitude of his people, and his reputation the respect even of his enemies, for Marlborough, when victorious in the country, ordered the lands of the great and good Fenelon to be spared. This amiable prelate died 7th Jan. 1715, aged 63. Besides his Telemachus, and his Explication of the Maxims, he wrote some other valuable works, a treatise on the Education of daughters, 12mo. much admired—Dialogues of the Dead, 2 vols. 12mo.—Dialogues on Eloquence, and the Eloquence of the Pulpit, 12mo.—Lives of ancient Philosophers, abridged, 12mo.—Spiritual Works, 4 vols. 12mo.—a Demonstration of the Existence of God, 12mo.—Directions for the Conscience of a King—Sermons, &c.

FENNER, Arthur, succeeded Mr. Collins as governor of Rhode-Island in 1789, and continued in office until 1805. He was the son of Arthur Fenner, Esq. whose ancestors were among the earliest inhabitants of Providence; and previously to his election as governor, was clerk of the superior court. He died at Providence, October 15th, 1805, aged 60.

FENTON, Elijah, an English poet, the youngest of twelve children, born at Shelton, near Newcastle-under-Line, Staffordshire. He was educated at Cambridge, but his opposition to government prevented his entering into orders, and he became usher in Mr. Bonwicke's school at Headly in Surrey. He afterwards was master of Seven Oaks school, and next was appointed secretary to lord Orrery, and tutor to his son lord Boyle. By Pope's recommendation, he was placed as a useful assistant near Craggs, secretary of state, whose early death prevented his comfortable settlement. Though not rich, he ended his life in ease and tranquillity, and died at the house of lady Trumbal, East-Hamstead, Berks, 13th July, 1730. He published in 1709, "Oxford and Cambridge verses," and in 1717, a volume of his own poems, and in 1723, his tragedy of Mariamne, collected out of Josephus. He also assisted Pope in the Odyssey, and translated the 1st, 4th, 19th, and 20th books. He also edited Waller's poems, with notes, and published a life of Milton, commended by Dr. Johnson. Fenton, though of no superior genius as a poet, yet possessed great merit, as the choice and friendship of Pope fully testify. His epitaph was written by Pope, and the praises bestowed on him are not overcharged, for he was an honest man, unenvied by rivals, mild, humane, and benevolent in his conduct, and he lived "content with science in the vale of peace."

FENTON, Sir Geoffrey, an eminent writer, descended from a good family in Nottinghamshire. He served queen Elizabeth in Ireland, where he became member of the privy council, 1591, and where he married the daughter of Dr. Robert Weston, lord chancellor of the Island. He was afterwards appointed to the secretaryship of the lord lieutenant, and continued in that responsible office under all the changes of government. He died 19th October, 1603, in Dublin, at the house of the earl of Cork, who had married, in 1603, his only daughter. He translated Guiciardini's Wars of Italy, dedicated to queen Elizabeth, besides Golden epistles from Guevara's works, &c.

FERAJUOLI, Nuzio, an Italian painter, born in 1661. He was pupil to Luca Giordano, and is eminent for the beauty and correctness of his landscapes, and the transparency of the waters.

FERDINAND I. emperor of Germany, second son of the archduke Philip, was born at Medina, in Castile, 1503. He was crowned king of Hungary and Bohemia 1527, on the death of his brother-in-law, Louis the younger, the last king, and in 1531, he was elected king of the Romans, and in 1558, he succeeded as emperor on the abdication of his brother Charles V. He governed with moderation and prudence, and after making peace with the Turks, and producing a reconciliation between the kings of Sweden and Denmark, he died of a dropsy at Vienna, 25th July, 1564, aged 61.

FERDINAND II. archduke of Austria, and son of Charles, duke of Stiria, was made king of Bohemia 1617, and of Hungary 1618, and raised to the imperial throne 1619. His subjects of Bohemia revolted, and placed on the throne Frederic V. elector Palatine, but Ferdinand attacked, and defeated them at the battle of Prague, 1620, and the dukedom of the usurper was given to Maximilian, duke of Bavaria. The fortunes of the unfortunate Palatine were supported by Christian, king of Denmark, but the victories of Tully, the imperial general, rendered his opposition hopeless, and obliged him to sue for peace, 1629. These brilliant successes roused against Ferdinand, the king of France, and Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, and the Imperial general was defeated at Leipsic, 1631, though soon after the Swedish conqueror fell, covered with glory, in the celebrated battle of Lutzen. The battle of Nortlingen in 1634, proved favourable to the cause of the Germans, and the following year, tranquillity was restored among the rival powers. Ferdinand died at Vienna, 8th Feb. 1637, aged 59.

FERDINAND III. surnamed Ernest, eldest son of the preceding, was made king of Hungary 1625, of Bohemia 1627, and of the Romans 1636, and elected emperor on his father's death. He pursued the same plans of ambition and aggrandizement as his father, but in his war against the Swedes, his troops were defeated by Bernard duke of Weimar, who in four months gained four important victories. The French under the great Condé supported the Swedish arms, and Ferdinand was besieged in Ratisbon where he held a diet of the empire. In 1645, another battle was fought and won by Condé at Nortlingen on the same spot, where the Swedes had been eleven years before defeated. Tranquillity was at last restored to the empire by the peace of Westphalia, 1648, and the treaties of Osnaburg and Munster, which granted Pomerania to the Swedish monarch, and made him one of the members of the Germanic body, and tolerated the Lutherans and Calvinists in the midst of the Roman Catholic religion. The emperor died 1657, aged 49. He was three times married.

FERDINAND I. king of Castile and Leon, surnamed the Great, was son of Sancho III. king of Navarre. He defeated in battle Alphonso king of Leon, 1037, and caused himself to be crowned king of Leon, and of the Asturias, the next year. He next marched against the Moors, took several of their towns, and penetrated into the heart of Portugal, and afterwards he attacked his brother Garcias, king of Navarre, whom he deprived, in a decisive battle, of his crown and of his life. He died 1065, and divided his kingdom among his sons, and thus created causes for civil wars.

FERDINAND II. younger son of Alphonso VIII. king of Leon and Castile, made war against the Portuguese, and took their king Alphonso Henriques prisoner. He made the wisest and most temperate use of his victory, and died 1187, after a reign of thirty years.

FERDINAND III. St. son of Alphonso IX. obtained the crown of Castile by the abdication of his mother Berengere, 1217, and ascended the throne of Leon on his father's death, 1230. He made successful war against the Moors, and took Cordova, Murcia, Seville, Xeres, Cadiz, &c. and died 1252, as he was meditating an invasion of the kingdom of Morocco. He was a wise monarch, and he established some salutary laws for the protection of his subjects, and the more impartial administration of justice. He was canonized by Clement X. 1617.

FERDINAND IV. succeeded to the throne of Castile 1295, at the age of ten. His minority was governed by the prudent administration of his mother Mary. He made war against the Moors, and against Grenada, and died suddenly, 1312, aged 27.

FERDINAND V. surnamed the Catholic, was son of John II. king of Arragon. He married in 1469, Isabella of Castile, and thus united the two kingdoms of Castile and Arragon. He made war against Alphonso king of Portugal, and defeated him at Toro 1476, and he next turned his arms against the kingdom of Grenada, which he totally subdued after a war of eight years, and thus put an end to the Moorish power, which for 800 years had flourished in Spain. Ambitious and enterprising, Ferdinand next turned his arms against Navarre, and by means of his brave general Gonsalvo of Cordova, he conquered part of the kingdom of Naples, but whilst his dominions were thus enlarged in Europe and in Africa, a new continent submitted to his power by the great discoveries of the immortal Columbus. Ferdinand left four daughters, and died 1516.

FERDINAND VI. surnamed the Wise, was son of Philip V. and Mary of Savoy, and succeeded his father 1746. He was a most benevolent prince, he restored liberty to prisoners, he extended his forgiveness to deserters and smugglers, and appointed two days in the week when he freely gave access to his subjects, and redressed personally their grievances. He engaged in the war of 1741, and in the peace of 1748, he obtained for one of his brothers the crown of the two Sicilies, and for the other the dutchies of Parma and Placentia. In his government he was prudent, and deservedly popular, industry was encouraged, abuses were reformed, and canals were made to convey plenty and commerce through the country. He died without children at Madrid, 10th August, 1759, aged 46.

FERDINAND I. succeeded in 1458 to Alphonso of Arragon as king of Naples and Sicily. Though he protected commerce, and encouraged the liberal arts among his subjects, yet he was unpopular on account of his debaucheries and cruelties. He died little regretted 1494, aged seventy.

FERDINAND, king of Portugal, after Peter, 1367, died 1383. He assumed the title of king of Castile, after the death of Peter the cruel, and in consequence, was engaged in war with Henry of Transtamare, whose daughter he was obliged to marry to re-establish the general tranquillity. He was again unfortunate in another war, though supported by the English.

FERDINAND I. grand duke of Tuscany after his brother Francis II. 1587, was eminent for his wisdom in the government, and for the vigour with which he made war against the pirates who disturbed the commerce of his subjects in the Mediterranean. He died much respected, 1609.

FERDINAND II. grand duke of Tuscany, succeeded Cosmo II. and gained the respect of the neighbouring princes, by the firm neutrality which he maintained during the wars between France and Spain. He ably supported the Venetians in their war in Candia, and died 1668, after a reign of forty-eight years.

FERDINAND of Cordova, a learned Spaniard of the 15th century, who was not only well skilled in the logic of Aristotle, and the learning of the ancients, but an accomplished master in the polite arts, so that he passed among the vulgar for a magician. He wrote de Artificio Omnis Scibilis—and Commentaries on Ptolemy's Almagest, and on the Bible.

FERDINAND LOPEZ, a Portuguese, who went to the East-Indies in the 16th century, and published an interesting account of his voyage, &c.

FERDINAND, Charles, a native of Bruges, known as a poet and philosopher. He died at Paris 1494, author of a treatise on the Tranquillity of the Soul.

FERDINAND, JOHN, a Jesuit of Toledo, author of Divinarum Scripturarum The-saurus, fol. 1594. He died at Valencia 1595, aged 59. Another of that name was a Dominican of Arragon, who published a commentary on Ecclesiastes, and died 1625.

FERDINAND DE JESUS, a Carmelite monk in Spain, very eloquent, so that he was surnamed the Golden mouthed. He wrote Commentaries on Aristotle, the Bible, &c. in the 17th century.

FERDINANDI, Epiphanius, a native of Obianto, eminent as a physician. He wrote Observationes et Casus Medici—de Vita Propaganda—de Peste—Theoremata Medica, &c. He died 1638, aged 69.

FERDONSI, Hassan Ben Scharf, a Persian poet, whose epic poem called Schanah-meh is very celebrated. It is the labour of thirty years, and consists of 60,000 verses, each of which is a distich. It contains the annals of the kings of Persia. He died at Thous 1020.

FERG or FERGIRE, Francis Paul, a painter, born at Vienna 1689. He studied under Hans Graaf and Grient, and improved himself by travelling. He came to London, where he was much esteemed, but an imprudent marriage ruined all his expectations. He was found dead at the door of his lodging 1740, worn out with disease and wretchedness. His landscapes are beautifully enriched with ruins of castles and towers.

FERGUS I. king of Scotland, son of Fergus king of the Irish Scots. It is said that he assisted the Scots in repelling the Piets, and that for his services he was elected king. He was drowned as he returned to Ireland, 404.

FERGUSON, Robert, a divine, ejected from the living of Godmarsham in Kent, for nonconformity 1662. He afterwards kept a school, and then devoted himself to politics, and became a court spy. He was next the associate of the unfortunate Monmouth, whom as it is thought he betrayed, as he was fickle in his attachments, and faithful to no party. He wrote the Interest of Reason in Religion, 8vo.—a Discourse concerning Justification, &c. and died poor, 1714.

FERGUSON, Robert, a native of Edinburgh, who studied divinity, but preferred poetry and literary fame to all other pursuits. He obtained a place in the sheriff clerk's office, Edinburgh, but dissipation abridged his days, and he died insane in the Lunatic Asylum of Edinburgh 1774, aged 24. His pastoral, humorous, and lyric poems have been edited in Dr. Anderson's collection.

FERGUSON, James, an ingenious Scotchman, self-taught as a philosopher, born of poor parents at Keith in Bamfshire, 1710. He was for four years a common shepherd, and in this solitary employment he marked accurately the position of the stars with a thread and bead. His ingenuity was observed and encouraged by his opulent neighbours, who had him instructed in arithmetic, algebra, and geometry, and under the patronage of sir James Dunbar, for many years, he supported himself by drawing and taking portraits. His ingenuity was so great that after the accidental sight of a watch and of a clock, he made one of each with wood. In 1744 he came to London, and in consequence of his astronomical rotula to show the new moon and eclipses, he was introduced to the learned and ingenious, and made fellow of the Royal Society. He was a man of inoffensive manners, mild and benevolent in his character. George III. at his accession granted him a pension of 50*l.* a year, and occasionally took great delight in his conversation. He invented some useful instruments, and died 16th Nov. 1776. He wrote "Select Mechanical exercises," 1773—Introduction to Electricity, 1770—to Astronomy, 1772—treatise on Perspective, 1775—and Astronomy Explained on Newton's principles, edited for the fourth time 1770—Lectures on Mechanics, Hydrostatics, Hydraulics, Pneumatics, &c. edited the fifth time, 1776, &c.

FERGUSON, William, a Scotch painter, who died 1690. He travelled into Italy, and excelled in representing dead birds, game, and still life.

FERGUSON, Adam, a distinguished writer, was born in 1724, at Logierait, in Scotland, of which parish his father was minister. He was educated at the school of Perth, from whence he removed to St. Andrews, and after obtaining his degree of master of arts, he went to Edinburgh to qualify himself for the ministry. His first situation as a clergyman was in the capacity of chaplain to the 42d regiment of foot, with which he served in Flanders till the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, and then returned to Edinburgh; where, in 1759, he was appointed professor of natural philosophy, which chair he afterwards resigned for that of moral philosophy. In 1767 he published his "Essay on Civil Society," which was well received, and the author honoured with the degree of doctor of laws. Soon after this he married a niece of Dr. Black; and in 1773 he accompanied the late earl of Chesterfield on his travels. In 1776 he published an answer to Dr. Priece on "Civil Liberty," which procured him the favour of the ministry, who appointed him secretary to the mission sent to America in 1778, to effect a reconciliation between the two countries. On his return, Dr. Ferguson sat down to the duties of his professorship, and the composition of his "History of the Roman Republic," which work was published in 3 vols. 4to. in 1783. He now resigned his professorship in favour of Mr. Dugald Stewart, and took that of mathematics as less laborious. In 1793 he reduced his lectures to the form of "a Treatise on Moral and Political Science," 2 vols. 4to.; and not long afterwards went abroad. On his return he settled at St. Andrews, and died there, Feb. 22, 1816. Besides the works already noticed, he published "Institutes of Moral Philosophy," 8vo. as a text book for students in that class.

W. B.

FERMAT, Peter, an eminent mathematician, born at Toulouse 1590, where from his knowledge of the law he became counsellor in the parliament, and an upright magistrate. As a philosopher he may be said to have prepared the way for the Infinites of Newton and Leibnitz, and to have introduced new geometry. He was connected with Des Cartes, Huygens, and Pascal, and died 1664. His works, highly valued, were published at Toulouse, 2 vols. fol. 1679. His son Samuel was eminent as a literary man, and wrote some learned dissertations.

FERMOR, William count Von, a native of Phaskow, the son of a Scotchman. He, like his father, was in the Russian service, and greatly distinguished himself against the Turks. In 1755 he was commander of the Russian forces, and for his services in defeating the Prussians he was made count of the empire by the emperor Francis.

He defeated the king of Prussia at the famous battle of Zorndorf, and afterwards took Berlin. He died 1771, aged 64.

FERNANDEZ, Anthony, author of Commentaries on Isaiah, and the Visions of the Old Testament, was superior of the Portuguese Jesuit missionaries in India, and died in Portugal 1628.

FERNANDEZ, Benedict, a Portuguese Jesuit, author of Commentaries on Genesis, and on St. Luke's Gospel. He died at Lisbon 1630.

FERNANDEZ, Alphonso, a Spanish Dominican, author of an ecclesiastical history of his own times, and of other works. He died about 1640.

FERNEL, John Francis, physician to Henry II. of France, was born at Montdidier in Picardy, 1506. He applied himself to study with the most indefatigable zeal at Paris, and he made such progress that his lectures on philosophical subjects were greatly admired for eloquence and erudition. He afterwards studied physic, and when admitted to practice, he divided his time between his patients and his books, allowing himself scarce five hours of rest in 24. When invited to court by the king, whose friendship and good opinion he had secured by curing one of his favourites, he excused himself, and when solicited to accept honours and places of emolument, he modestly refused, and preferred the retirement and studies of private life to every other pursuit. On the death of the king's first physician, he was at last obliged to settle at the court, but the sudden death of his wife, who fell a sacrifice to her grief in leaving her relations to come to live at Fontainebleau, so affected him that he died within a month after, 1558. He wrote several works on medical subjects in high repute, as he was considered one of the great restorers of medicine. His practice was so great that his gains were yearly 12,000 livres.

FERNOUILLOT DE FALBAIRE, Charles George, a French author, who died May, 1801, aged 74. He wrote some articles in the Encyclopedie, besides dramatic pieces of considerable merit.

FERRACINO, Bartolomeo, a self-taught mechanic, born at Bassan in Padua 1692. He was a sawyer, and his invention of a saw which worked by the wind recommended him to the notice of the great. He built a famous bridge over the Brenta in his native town, and died soon after the completion 1764. An account of his life and inventions was published by Memo, Venice.

FERRAND, James, a French physician of Agen. He wrote a book "on the Distemper of Love," Paris, 1622, which in treating of the passion as of a bodily disease, and of the frequent uneasiness, and fatal consequences of its pleasures, shows the great erudition of the author.

FERRAND, Lewis, a French lawyer, born at Toulon 1645. He was an advocate of the parliament of Paris, and died there 1699. His works, which are neither accurate nor brilliant, are chiefly on religious subjects.

FERRAND, Anthony, a counsellor of Paris, who died there 1719, aged 42. His madrigals, songs, epigrams, &c. are well known. He was the rival of J. B. Rousseau in poetry.

FERRAND, James Philip, a French painter in enamel, was born at Joigni in Burgundy, and died at Paris 1732, aged 79. He wrote a treatise on Enamel Painting, and another on Miniatures, 12mo.

FERRANDUS, Fulgentius, a deacon of Carthage, who died before 551. He was disciple of St. Fulgentius, and wrote some books, enumerated by Cave.

FERRAR, Robert, a native of Halifax, Yorkshire, educated at Cambridge and Oxford, and made bishop of St. David's by the influence of Cranmer, to whom he had been chaplain. He was imprisoned on suspicion in Edward's reign, and under Mary he was burnt as a heretic at Caermarthen, 1555.

FERRAR, Nicholas, native of London, son of an East India merchant. He was educated at Cambridge, and after travelling on the continent, he was made secretary to the Virginia company, and in 1624 elected member of parliament, and directed, with two others, to draw the impeachment against lord Cranfield, the treasurer. He soon after retired to Little Gidding, Huntingdonshire, where he established a protestant monastery, and devoted himself to devotional pursuits. In 1626 he took deacon's orders, and died 1637. He had translated from the Spanish Valdesso's Considerations on Religion.

FERRARI, Lewis, a native of Milan, who studied under Cardan, and became professor of mathematics at Bologna, where he died 1565, aged 45. He is known for his invention of the method of resolving bi-quadratic equations.

FERRARI, Antony Mary Zachary Bartholomew, founder, with James Morigia, of the order of the Barnabites at Milan, 1520, confirmed by pope Paul III. 1535. This order flourished greatly. Ferrari died superior of his foundation, 1544.

FERRARI, Octavian, an Italian author, born at Milan, 1518. He was much respected as a professor of ethics and politics at Venice, Padua, Milan, and other places of Italy. He died at Milan, 1586, considered for his learning as a second Aristotle. He wrote de Sermonibus Exotericis, 1575—de Origine Romanorum, 1607—a Latin translation of Athenæus, and Notes on Aristotle.

FERRARI, Francisco Bernardino, of the same family as the preceding, was born at Milan, 1577. He was a doctor of the Ambrosian college, and he was encouraged by the archbishop of Milan, to travel not only to improve himself, but to make a collection of books. This valuable selection, made in Spain, Italy, and in other countries, laid the foundation of the Ambrosian library. Ferrari died at Milan, 1669, aged 92. He wrote de Antiquo Ecclesiasticarum Epistolarum Genere, Libri tres, 1613—de Ritu Sacrarum Ecclesiæ Catholicæ Concionum, Libri tres, 1620—de Veterum Acclamationibus et Plausu, Libri septem, 1627. These works are very curious, and display the great erudition and deep researches of the author.

FERRARI, Octavio, of the same family, was born at Milan, 1607, and educated at the Ambrosian college, of which he became professor of rhetoric at the age of 21, on account of his great proficiency. Six years after he was invited by the republic of Venice to Padua, where as professor of Greek, of eloquence, and politics, he collected a great number of pupils, and restored the declining reputation of the university. His learning was so extensive, and his fame so deservedly established, that Christina of Sweden honoured him with presents, and Lewis XIV. settled on him a pension of 500 crowns for seven years. He died, 1682, respected for his amiable manners, and that sweetness and humanity of character which procured him the name of Pacificator. His works are chiefly on classical antiquities, the most known of which is Origines Linguæ Italicæ, fol. 1676, a subject treated before by Scaliger, in 24 books, now lost.

FERRARI, John Baptist, a Jesuit of Siena, who published a Syriac Dictionary, 4to. 1622, to explain the Syriac words in the Bible. He wrote also de Malorum Aureorum Culturâ, et de Florum Culturâ, 1633, and 1646, and died 1655.

FERRARI, Giovanni Andrea, a painter of Genoa, who died 1669, aged 70. He excelled in the representation of flowers, fruits, &c.

FERRARIENSIS, a general of the Dominicans, who died 1528. His real name was Francis Sylvestre. He wrote on philosophy, &c.

FERRARS, George, a learned man, born of an ancient family near St. Albans, 1512. He was educated at Oxford, and removed to Lincoln's inn, and soon distinguished himself as an advocate under the patronage of Cromwell, earl of Essex. He became afterwards a favourite with Henry VIII. and his arrest, when he was member of parliament for Plymouth, created such confusion, that in the event, it established the privileges of the members of the house. On the fall of Somersct under Edward VI. he was named lord of Misrule, to entertain the public with pastimes, and for twelve days he exhibited at Greenwich all the pomp and magnificence of assumed greatness, to the satisfaction of the court, and the gratification of the populace. Ferrars possessed such versatile talents, that though the religion of the court frequently changed at the caprice of the sovereign, he continued still a favourite with all, and died a protestant at Flamstead, Herts, 1579. He wrote the history of Queen Mary, which was inserted in the chronicle under the name of Richard Grafton. He also contributed to the poetical work, called "the Mirror for Magistrates," published 1559—the Fall of Robert Tresilian, Chief Justice, &c.—the tragedy of Thomas Woodstock, duke of Gloucester—tragedy of king Richard II.—the story of Eleanor Cobham, &c.

FERRARS, Edward, a Warwickshire poet, educated at Oxford. He was a favourite with Henry VIII. and died 1564. He wrote, according to Wood, some comedies and tragedies.

FERRARS, Henry, of the same family as the preceding, was educated also at Oxford, and made large collections for the history of his native county. His valuable papers laid the foundation of Dugdale's Antiquities of Warwickshire. He was esteemed by Camden, and distinguished himself also as a poet. He died 1633, aged 84, leaving behind him, says Wood, the character of a well-bred gentleman, a good neighbour, and an honest man.

FARRAUD, N. a native of Daure, near the Pyrenees, who was a deputy in the convention, and distinguished himself by his enmity to the monarchy. He was commissary in the armies of the Rhine, where he behaved with coolness and intrepidity, and on his return to Paris, when opposing the attack made on the convention, 26th May, 1795, he was shot through the heart with a pistol. His murderer was executed, and the convention appointed a day to celebrate his obsequies.

FERREIN, Antony, a French anatomist, who died at Paris, 1769, aged 76. He published lectures which he had read on medicine, and lectures on Materia Medica, each 3 vols. 12mo.

FERREAS, Don John of, a Spanish divine born at Rabanezza 1652, and educated at Salamanca. His wit and learning recommended him to the court, from whose favours he refused the pressing offer of two bishoprics. He was made member of the academy of Madrid 1713, and appointed Librarian to the king. He contributed much to the Spanish Dictionary, published by the academy, 1739, in 6 vols.

fol. He died 1735, leaving several works in philosophy, divinity, and history, the best known of which is his history of Spain, translated into French, by Hermitilly, 10 vols. 4to.

FERRETI, or FERRETUS, a poet and historian of Vicenza, of the 14th century, who contributed much to the revival of learning in Europe. He wrote a history of his own times from 1259 to 1328, in seven books, and other works in verse and prose, in Italian.

FERRETI, Emilio, an Italian lawyer, born at Castelfranco, Bologna, 1489. He was employed at Avignon, by Leo X. to whom he was secretary. He died at Avignon, 1552. His Opera Juridica were published after his death.

FERRETY, Giovanni Batista, a Benedictine monk of Vicenza, who published at Verona, in 1672, "Musæ Lapidariæ," in folio, which contain inscriptions from ancient monuments. The time of his death is unknown.

FERRI, Paul, a learned divine, born at Metz, 1591, and educated at Montauban. He became a minister in his native town, and gained popularity by his eloquence, and his dignified address as a preacher. He zealously employed himself to reconcile the protestants, and for these benevolent motives he was accused by his enemies of being bribed by Richelieu to form a coalition of the two religions. He died 1669, of the stone, and more than 80 calculi were found in his bladder. He published, 1616, Scholastici Orthodoxici Specimen, a book approved by Du Plessis Mornay—Vindiciæ pro Scholasticis Orthodoxis 1619—and General Catechisme de la Reformation, 1654.

FERRI, Ciro, a painter, born at Rome 1634. He was the disciple and happy imitator of Peter de Cortona, and the excellence of his pieces, on which he set a very high price, recommended him to the patronage of pope Alexander VII. and of his three successors. The duke of Florence also granted him a pension to finish the imperfect pictures of Cortona, and honourably nominated him chief of the Florentine school. Ferri was equally great as an architect, and several palaces and altars at Rome were raised from his designs. It is said that he died through chagrin at seeing the superior colouring of Bacici's picture of angels near his own works in the palace of Navona, 1689, at the age of 55.

FERRIER, Arnaud de, a lawyer, born at Toulouse, 1506, and, from the greatness of his abilities, called the Cato of France. He was professor of the university, and afterwards counsellor of the parliament of Toulouse, and he was, in 1562, deputed by the French king to the council of Trent, where the boldness of his harangues in favour of his master offended some of his Italian hearers. He afterwards went to Venice, where he assisted father Paul in the collection of materials for the History of the council of Trent. He was at heart a protestant, and professed it at the solicitation of Du Plessis Mornay. He was made chancellor to the king of Navarre, and he formed the design to declare the French king head of the Church, after the example of England. He died in his 79th year. He wrote some works.

FERRIER, Jeremy, a divinity professor at Nismes, who, from protestant became papist, even after declaring in a public disputation that Clement VIII. was Antichrist. He was afterwards made state counsellor to the French king, and he attended him in Brittany in 1626. He was patronised by Richelieu, and wrote some tracts, especially "Catholique d'Etat," in favour of his religion and principles. He died of a hectic fever 1626. He had a large family, but only one daughter, who married Tardieu, and of whom some anecdotes are recorded in Boileau's tenth satire.

FERRIER, Lewis, a poet, born at Avignon. He was imprisoned for some licentious verses in his "Preceptes Galantes," but liberated by interest. He wrote Anne of Brittany, Adrastus, and Montezuma, tragedies, which, in a feeble style, have some pathetic passages. He died in Normandy 1721, aged 69.

FERRIER, John, a Jesuit of Rodez, in Rouergue, confessor to the French king after Annat, in 1670. He opposed the Jansenists, and wrote his famous book, on probability, against them. He died 1674.

FERRIERES, Claude de, a doctor of civil law at Paris, who wrote several valuable books on jurisprudence. His compositions enriched the booksellers, but left him and his family very poor. He died 1715, aged 77. His works are, of the Jurisprudence of the Justinian Code—of the Digest—of the Novellæ, &c. His son Claude Joseph wrote a Dictionary of Law, 2 vols. 4to. 1771.

FERRON, Arnauld du, a lawyer of Bourdeaux, who died 1563, aged 48. He wrote in elegant Latin in the style of Terence, and continued to the reign of Francis I. the Latin History of France by Paulus Æmilius the Veronese. It was published at Paris 1555, and very highly esteemed for curious and interesting details.

FERTE, Henry de Senecterre Mareschal de, a famous general under Lewis XIII. and his successor, distinguished at the siege of Rochelle 1626, and at the battles of Rocroi and Lens. In 1650, he defeated the duke of Lorraine at the battle of St. Nicholas, and was made marshal of France, but in 1656 he was taken prisoner at Valenciennes by the Spaniards. He died 1681, aged 82, respected as a warrior, but inferior to Turenne, whose fame he envied.

FERUS, John, a superior of the Gray Friars at Metz, known as a preacher, and as an able commentator on the Bible. His works, which favour the protestants, are inserted in the Index Expurgatorius. He died 1654.

FESTUS, Porcius, was the proconsul of Judea, before whom the apostle Paul appeared, and by whom he was on his appeal sent to Rome.

FESTUS, Pompeius, an ancient grammarian, author of a Tract de Significatione Verborum, abridged from Flaccus.

FETTI, Dominico, a painter born at Rome, 1589, and educated under Ludovico Civoli, of Florence. He studied and imitated the paintings of Julio Romano, and was patronised by the duke of Mantua, whose palaces he adorned with his highly finished pieces. He ruined his constitution by licentious indulgences at Venice, and died in his 35th year. His pictures are very scarce, and much sought after. His sister, a nun, was also a good painter, and she adorned her convent at Mantua, with some of her pieces.

FEVARDENTIUS, or FEWARDENT, Francis, a Franciscan friar of Constance, Normandy, born 1541. He was a furious and bigoted opposer of the protestants, against whom he preached with great virulence. Even the third and fourth Henries were objects of his attack, and against them he directed all his thunder from the pulpit. He published the five books of Irenæus, corrected and illustrated with learned notes, and edited the last time at Paris, 1639. He wrote also controversial tracts. He died 1641.

FEULLÉE, Lewis, a French naturalist, born in Provence, 1660. His great abilities were honourably employed by Lewis XIV. in different parts of the world, to advance the knowledge of natural history, and at his return he received a pension, and an observatory was built for his residence at Marseilles, where he died 1732. He wrote a journal of observations physical, botanical, &c. on the coasts of South America, 3 vols. 4to. and presented the French king with a large folio of curious drawings, &c. executed in the South Seas.

FEUQUIERES, Anthony de Pas, marquis of, a native of Artois, distinguished as a general, and made a marshal for his services in Germany. He wrote Military Memoirs, 4 vols. 12mo. in which he spoke with unusual severity against the general officers of his age, and died 1711, aged 63.

FEURBORN, Justus, a German protestant of Westphalia, author of several theological works in Latin. He died rector of the university of Giessen, 1656, aged 69.

FEVRE, Claude, a French painter, who died in London, 1675, aged 42. His portraits, flowers, historical pieces, &c. were much admired.

FEVRE, Guy le, sieur de la Boderie, a poet, born in Lower Normandy. He was well skilled in oriental literature, and published some works in Syriac and Chaldee, and assisted in editing Montanu's Polyglott Bible. He died 1598, aged 57.

FEVRE, Anthony le, brother to Guy, was employed near the person of Henry IV. of France, and sent as ambassador to England, and to other countries. He died 1615, aged 60. His memoirs appeared at Paris, 5 vols. 12mo.

FEVRE, Nicholas le, a French Jesuit, author of a treatise on true religion—and a critical examination of Bayle's works. He died 1755.

FEVRE, James le, or Jacobus FABER, a learned Frenchman, born at Estampes, in Picardy, 1440. He was suspected of protestantism, and therefore exposed to persecution, and after taking refuge at Meaux, Blois, and Guienne, he at last found a safe retreat at Nerac, under the protection of Margaret, queen of Navarre, sister of Francis I. He died there 1537, nearly 100 years old. Though not professedly a protestant, he yet disapproved of many of the tenets of the church of Rome, and he held a conference with Bucer and Captio, at Strasburg, about the reformation of the church. In 1512, he published a translation of St. Paul's epistles, with notes, and gave the rest of the New Testament in 1522, with copious commentaries. Though the intimate friend and correspondent of Erasmus, he quarrelled with him in consequence of some disputed passages in Scripture, and Erasmus, much to his honour, after repelling the attack, solicited the continuance of his friendship. It is said that he was murdered in his bed, after weeping in the presence of queen Margaret, and lamenting that he had not, like many of his disciples, had the fortitude to become a martyr in the defence of his opinions.

FEVRE, Nicholas le, or Nicholaus FABER, an ingenious and learned man, born at Paris, 2d June, 1544. In his youth, he had a dreadful accident, while cutting a pen, a small piece of the quill flew into his eye, and caused such acute pain, that he lifted, in sudden anguish, the knife to his eye, and struck it out of the socket. He studied the civil law at Toulouse, Padua, and Bologna, and after residing 18 months in Rome, he returned to Paris, and applied himself to belles lettres. His edition of Seneca appeared in 1587, with learned notes. He also devoted some time to mathematics, and with such success that he discovered the falsity of Scaliger's demonstration of the quadrature of the circle. On the accession of Henry IV. to the crown, he was made preceptor to the duke of Condé, and after the king's death, he held the same office in the education of Lewis XIII. He died 1611. His works, which are few, were collected after his death by his friend le Begue, in a 4to. volume, 1614, Paris. He was not indeed anxious to appear as an author, but he was more willing to communicate instruction and intelligence to those who enriched the world with literary productions, and therefore for his liberality, and for his modesty, and the amiable qualities of a private character, he is deservedly commended by Baillet, Lippsius, and others.

FEVRE, Tanaquil, or Tannequi, a learned man, father of Madame Dacier, was born at Caen in Normandy, 1615. After studying with the greatest success at home, and under the care of his uncle, he went to Paris, and was soon recommended to the patronage of Richelieu, who settled a pension of 2000 livres upon him, to inspect the books published at the Louvre. The death of his patron, and the neglect of the next minister Mazarin, altered his plans of life, and he turned protestant, and accepted a professorship in the university of Saumur. Here his learning and his reputation drew pupils from all quarters, but an unfortunate assertion that he could pardon Sappho's love for her own sex, since it produced a beautiful ode, proved the cause of a dispute with the university, and at last in 1672, he was invited to remove to Heidelberg. A fever however prevented his departure, and he died 12th Sept. 1672. He left a son of his own name, who was a protestant divine in Holland, and at London, but became a Roman catholic at Paris, and published a Tract de Futilitate Poeticæ, 1697, and besides Madame Dacier, another daughter married to Paul Bauldri, professor at Utrecht. Faber was agreeable in his person, but rather effeminate, as to appear with neatness he procured gloves, &c. from London, and essences from Rome. He published among other books, Luciani de Morte Peregrini Libellus, 4to. 1563.—Diatribæ Flavii Josephi de Jesu Christi Testimonium suppositum esse, 1655, 8vo.—Epistolarum, Pars Prima, 1659, Secunda, 1665,—a short account of the lives of Greek poets—the life of Theseus, from Plutarch—Méthode pour Commencer les Humanités Grecques et Latines—editions of Xenophon's Convivium, of Plato's Alcibiades, of Plutarch's de Superstitione, besides notes on Apollodorus, Longinus, and other classics.

FEVRE, Roland le, a painter, born at Anjou, though called sometimes a Venetian. His naked figures were much ad-jured. He stained marble curiously. He died in England, 1677.

FEVRET, Charles, a French civilian, born at Saumur, 1583. He studied the law at Hedleberg under Godefroy, and in 1607 he returned to Dijon, where he married Anne Brunet of Beaulne, by whom he had 19 children, 14 of which were born in eight years. He was a popular advocate at Dijon, and became counsellor of the three estates of the province. When Lewis XIII. came to Dijon to punish an insurrection, Fevret was the only person considered as capable to plead the cause of the insurgents, and to petition the monarch, and so eloquent and persuasive was his address, that the king desired him to print it, and forgave the rebels. His abilities rendered him universally known, the princes of Condé appointed him their counsellor, and he held the same honourable office also with Frederic Casimir the palatine of the Rhine. He died at Dijon, 1661, aged 78. He published, 1645, a Latin treatise de Claris Fori Burgundici Oratoribus—and in 1653 his famous "Traite de l'Abus," which has been frequently reprinted. He also translated Pibrac's Quatrains into Latin verse, &c.

FEVRET DE FONTETTE, Charles Marie, great grandson of the preceding, was born at Dijon, 1710, and became eminent as a lawyer, and obtained a pension from government. He was member of the academy of belles lettres, and was laboriously employed in editing "le Long's Bibliothèque Historique de la France," which he enlarged from one to five large folio vols. He died 1772.

FEUSTKING, John Henry, a native of Holstein, who became professor and doctor of divinity in the university of Wittemberg. He was also confessor to the elector of Saxony, and counsellor to the duke of Saxe Gotha, and died 1713, aged 41. He wrote various works in German and in Latin.

FÉYDEAU, Matthew, a doctor of the Sorbonne, born at Paris, 1616. He was a zealous Jansenist, and died in exile at Annonai, in Vivares, 1694. He wrote "Meditations on Providence and the Mercy of God," under the name of Pressigny, and the "Catechism of Grace," &c.

FIASELLA, Dominico, an Italian historical painter, who died 1669, aged 80. He was also called Sarazena from the place of his birth near Genoa.

FICHARD, John, a lawyer and syndic, of Frankfort on the Mayne, where he died 1581, aged 69. The best known of his works are, Virorum Qui Superiori Nostroque Sæculo Eruditione et Doctrinâ Illustres atque Memorabiles Fuerunt, Vitæ, 1536, 4to.—Vitæ Juris-consultorum, 1565.—Onomasticon Philosophico-Medico Sy- nonymum, 1574—de Cautilis, 1577—Councilum Matrimoniale, 1580.

FICINUS, Marsilius, a learned Italian, born at Florence, 1433, and educated at the expense of Lorenzo de Medicis, to whom his father was physician. He distinguished himself as an able scholar, a great philosopher, physician, and divine, and under the patronage of his friends Lorenzo and Cosmo de Medicis, he restored in the west the study of the platonic Philosophy, and translated not only his favourite author Plato, but also Plotinius, Proclus, Iamblicus, Porphyrius, &c. Though originally a skeptic, the eloquent preaching of Savanorola brought him to a due sense of religion and of religious duties, but like many of the learned of his time, he still remained devoted to astrology. By care and a proper regimen he supported his naturally feeble constitution to the age of 66. He died at Correggio, 1499, and soon after, as Baronius gravely affirms, appeared according to his promise to his friend Michael Mercatus, to prove thus the immortality of the soul. His writings sacred and profane are very numerous; they were collected and printed at Venice, 1516, and at Paris 1641, in 2 vols. folio.

FICORONI, Francesco, a Roman medalist, who died 1747, aged 83. He wrote several works in Italian, on medals and antiquities, published at Rome.

FIDANZA, Johannes, a philosopher, poet, and theologian of Tuscany, called also St. Bonaventure, and from his learning styled the seraphic doctor. He died 1274, aged 53, author of some books now little known.

FIDDES, Richard, an English divine, born at Hunmanby near Scarborough, Yorkshire, 1671. He entered at Corpus Christi college, and afterwards removed to University college, Oxford, and after taking his bachelor's degree he returned to Yorkshire, where in 1693 he married. In 1694 he was presented to the living of Halsham, but the marshy situation of the place proved so injurious to him that he was suddenly deprived of his speech, and never after completely recovered it. Thus disabled from performing his duty, he came to London 1712, and no longer able to shine as before as an eloquent preacher, he determined to maintain himself by his pen. By the friendship of Swift he was recommended to lord Oxford, who made him his chaplain, but the hopes of preferment and independence vanished at the death of the queen and the changes of the ministry. By the recommendation of Dr. Radcliffe, his relation, he took his degree of B.D. and afterwards was honoured with that of D.D. by the university. He died at Putney, 1725, aged 54, leaving in destitute circumstances his wife and six children. Of his writings the most known are, "a Body of Divinity Explaining the Principles and the Duties of Natural and Revealed Religion, 2 vols. fol.—52 Discourses—and the Life of Cardinal Wolsey, in fol. These works appeared under the patronage of a large subscription, but their popularity was severely attacked. Staekhouse found great fault with the body of divinity, and for the life of Wolsey the author was acrimoniously censured in the London journal, as being a friend to popery, and the secret enemy of the reformation. Dr. Knight afterwards, in his life of Erasmus, repeats the accusation, and charges Fiddes with favouring the claims of the pretender, as he wrote his book in the house and under the eye of Atterbury, whose opposition to the Hanoverian family was then very unpopular. These charges may now be considered as puerile. Fiddes wrote for his bread, but he certainly wrote for a party, and while he wished to please one part of the nation, he was sure that his compositions would be viewed with a jaundiced eye by the other.

FIELD, Richard, an English divine, born at Hempstead, Herts, 1561, and educated at Magdalen college, Oxford. He afterwards removed to Magdalen-hall, and soon distinguished himself as a preacher and a powerful disputant, so that in 1594 he became reader to Lincoln's Inn Society, from one of whose members he obtained the living of Burrowclere, Hants. In 1593 he was appointed chaplain to queen Elizabeth, and under James, her successor, he was made successively canon of Windsor and dean of Gloucester. The bishopric of Oxford was intended for him, but he died before the appointment was conferred in form, 21st Nov. 1616, aged 55. He was a man highly respected for his learning, and anxiously devoted to the healing of dissensions in the church, so that at one time James wished to employ his great abilities to produce a reconciliation between the Lutherans and Calvinists of Germany. The first time the king heard him preach he quaintly observed, "this is a field for God to dwell in," and almost in similar words he was styled by Fuller, "that learned divine, whose memory smelleth like a field which the Lord hath blessed." The most famous of his works is his "Four Books of the Church," augmented with a fifth in the second edition, which appeared 1610. His memory was retentive to a surprising degree, so that whatever he read he accurately remembered. He was not, however, only a learned man, but he was most universally benevolent, exemplary in his family, religious in his behaviour, and in every thing a good Christian.

FIELDING, Henry, the celebrated novelist, was born at Sharpham park, Somersetshire, 22d April, 1707. His father was a lieutenant-general in the army, and grandson to an earl of Denbigh, and his mother was daughter of the first judge Gould. Young Fielding was educated at home, under the care of Mr. Oliver, a clergyman, whom he afterwards turned to ridicule in the humorous but coarse character of parson Trulliber in Joseph Andrews. He then went to Eton, where he formed an early intimacy with the future leading men of the age; with Lyttleton, Fox, Pitt, Hanbury, Williams, and others, and then, when 18, he passed to Leyden, where he devoted himself to the study of civil law for two years. Being ill supplied with money by his father, who had taken a second wife, and had another rising family to provide for, he returned to London, and in that scene of dissipation, regardless of the calls of temperance and of virtue, he gratified every passion, and laid the seeds of future evils and of lasting infirmities. With a straitened purse he soon found that something must be done for bread. He therefore commenced author, and produced his first dramatic piece, "Love in several Masques," 1727, which, together with "the Temple Beau," the next year, drew forth the applauses of crowded audiences. He was not, however, always successful, and he ventured to publish one of his pieces, bearing in the title, "as it was damned at the theatre-royal, Drury-lane," but the severity of criticism, and the frowns of disapprobation were unheeded in the friendship and patronage of the great and powerful, especially of the duke of Argyle and lord Lyttleton. About the year 1734 he married Miss Craddock at Salisbury, a woman of great beauty, and a fortune of about 1500*l.* but this, together with the estate of Stower, Dorsetshire, which fell to him by his father's death, and which with economy might have rendered him comfortable and independent, was quickly squandered away in expensive hospitality, and an improper show of equipage and magnificence, and at 30 Fielding found himself poor, and destitute of every resource. He now applied to the law, and in due time was called from the Temple to the bar, and began to make a respectable figure in Westminster hall; but the frequent attacks of the gout, and all the diseases ingrafted on a licentious youth, prevented the success which his abilities fairly promised. To maintain himself and a wife and children, whom he tenderly loved, he again had recourse to his pen, and various pamphlets and tracts were ushered into the world anonymously. In the full vigour of genius he produced his Joseph Andrews, and Tom Jones, novels so universally admired, as to be above the praise of his biographer. His "Wedding Day," however, did not meet on the stage the success which he expected, and while he meditated on the gloomy aspect of his affairs, the death of his wife came to embitter the cup of his affliction, and it proved so poignant, that his friends dreaded the loss of his senses. By time he recovered the severity of the blow, and he began again to struggle against fortune, he undertook to contribute to two periodical papers, but reduced as his income was, he found great assistance in the appointment of justice of the peace for the county of Middlesex, which was procured by the influence of his friends, and which, though unpopular and odious, was discharged by him with impartiality and attention. In the busy avocations of this office he planned and executed his Amelia, a work very respectable, but certainly inferior to Tom Jones. His constitution was now so enfeebled that his friends advised his removing to the softer climate of Lisbon, and two months after he arrived there he died, 1754, aged 48. Yet though weak, and labouring under the attacks of disease, he employed his pen in the humorous journal of his voyage to Lisbon, published in London, 1755. Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote an Essay on Conversation—on the Knowledge and Characters of Men—A Journey from this World to the next—the History of Jonathan Wild, &c. His dramatic pieces are twenty-six in number, and the whole of his works has been published in several sizes, with an Essay on his Life and Genius, by Arthur Murphy. He left a second wife with four children. His biographer, who views his character with the partiality of a friend, and the candour of a historian, attributes much in the history of Fielding's life to slander and defamation; but he wisely observes, that quick and warm passions should be early controlled, and that to their licentious indulgence the author of Tom Jones sacrificed his health, his happiness, and the prospect of a lengthened life. When poor he was no longer the master of his actions, and he had often recourse for subsistence to those measures which his honour disowned, and his pride regarded with shame. So fatal to all happiness and peace is the wild indulgence of those passions which providence has given to man for his comfort, if decently enjoyed, and for his misery if riotously abused. Some years after Fielding's death, the French consul at Lisbon, de Meyrionnet, offered to erect a monument over his grave, but the English factory, roused by the generous views of a stranger, discharged a debt due to departed literary merit.

FIELDING, Sarah, third sister of the preceding, was born 1714, and died unmarried, 1768. She possessed the abilities and genius of her brother, which she evinced in the Cry, and in David Simple, and in the letters published as from the principal characters of the work. She also translated Xenophon's Memorabilia.

FIELDING, Sir John, the fourth half brother to Henry Fielding, was his successor in the office of Westminster magistrate. Though blind from his youth, he discharged his duty with great activity and impartiality, and for his services to the public received the honour of knighthood, 1761. He published various tracts on subjects of police, charges to the grand jury, essays on important subjects, but it is supposed that most of these appeared under his borrowed name, and that he wrote nothing but Cautions against the Tricks of Sharpers, 1777: He died at Brompton, Sept. 1780.

FIENNES, William, lord Say and Sele, born at Broughton, Oxfordshire, 1582, was educated at Winchester and New college, Oxford, of which he became fellow as related to the founder. He was raised from the dignity of baron to that of viscount by James I. but in the reign of his successor he showed himself violent, inconstant, and vindictive. In the long parliament of 1640 he was very active with Hampden and Pym, and though made master of the court of wards, he slighted all reconciliation with the king, so that he was attainted of treason for not attending the king's person at Oxford. After the king's death he left the presbyterians, whom he had hitherto supported, and joined himself to the independents, and during the usurpation he was created one of Cromwell's peers. At the restoration he was greatly noticed by Charles II. made lord privy seal, and lord chamberlain, though, as Wood observes, he had been a grand rebel for 20 years, and while others who had been reduced to a bit of bread for his majesty's cause, were left to pine and languish under insult and disappointment, and though a promoter of the rebellion, and in some respect accessory to the murder of Charles, he died quietly in his bed, 14th April, 1662, and was buried with his ancestors at Broughton. He is called by Whitlock a man of great parts, wisdom, and integrity, and Clarendon, allowing him the same merit, describes him as ambitious, the enemy of the church, and a violent and dangerous leader of the discontented party. He wrote some political tracts, besides an attack against the quakers, who it seems were numerous and troublesome in his neighbourhood.

FIENNES, Nathaniel, second son of the above, was born at Broughton, 1608, and like his father, educated at Winchester and New college, Oxford, of which he became a fellow. He travelled on the continent, and at Geneva, and in Switzerland, confirmed that aversion, which he derived from his father, against the church. At his return he was made member for Banbury, and displayed the same violence against the royal party as his father. During the civil wars he was colonel of horse, under Essex, and governor of Bristol, which he too easily yielded to the assault of prince Rupert, for which he was condemned to lose his head. His father's influence, however, saved him, and he left the army disgraced, but still virulently animated against the king. He joined the independents, like his father, and when Cromwell became protector, he was made one of his privy council, and sent among his lords. At the restoration he retired into the country, and died at his seat of Newton Tony, near Salisbury, 1669. He wrote some things in support of Cromwell's usurpation, and in another tract defended his conduct at Bristol. Clarendon represents him as an able man, and in council inferior only to the great Hampden.

FIENUS, Thomas, a physician, born at Antwerp, 1566. He travelled over Italy, and at his return was made professor of physic at Louvain, and physician to the duke of Bavaria. He died at Louvain, 1631. He wrote "de Viribus Imaginationis," in which he relates a curious story of a hypochondriac who thought himself so large that he could not get out of his room—de Formatione et Animatione Fœtus—Apologia pro eodem—de Cauteriis—Libri Chirurgici.

FIESCHO, John Lewis, a noble Genoese, who conspired against Andrew Doria, with the intention of delivering the galleys to the French, and of making himself sovereign in the room of his rival. He was drowned in the attempt, 1st Jan. 1547, and the plot abandoned by his associates, and his family banished from Genoa to the fifth generation. He was then only 22 years old.

FIGINO, Ambrozio, a painter born at Milan, the disciple of Lomazio. His descent from the cross is seen at Wilton, and much admired. He died 1590.

FIGRELIUS, Edmundus, a learned Swede, professor of history at Upsal. He wrote a book de Statu Illustrium Romanorum, 1656, and died 1676.

FILANGERI, Gactano, a native of Naples, who studied, but never practised the law. He was in 1777 employed about the court as gentleman of the bed-chamber, and as an officer of marine, and in 1787 was raised to an office in the college of Finance. He wrote a popular work on legislation, the first vol. of which appeared in 1780, and the 5th in 1791. He died 1787, aged 35.

FILELFO, Francis, or PHILEPHUS. Vid. PHILEPHUS.

FILESAC, John, doctor of the Sorbonne, 650 and dean of the faculty of theology at Paris, died 1638. His works appeared 1621, 3 vols. 4to.

FILICAJA, Vincentio di, an elegant poet of Florence, who died 1707, aged 65. He was senator in his native city, and his wants were honourably and liberally relieved by Christina, queen of Sweden. His poems, which are in a delicate and refined style, were collected by his son in folio, and reprinted at Venice, 3 vols. 12mo. 1747.

FILMER, Sir Robert, an English writer, born at East Sutton, in Kent, and educated at Trinity college, Cambridge. He died 1688. He wrote the Anarchy of a limited and mixed Monarchy—"Patriarchia," in which he proves the original government to be monarchical, derived from the patriarchs and heads of families—and "the Freeholders' Grand Inquest." His Patriarcha was attacked by Locke.

FINÆUS, Orontius Finé, professor of mathematics in the college founded by Francis I. at Paris, was born at Briançon, Dauphiné, 1494. By his genius and application he recommended himself to the notice of the great, but though as a mathematician, and as a man of letters, he was highly respectable, yet he was pinched by poverty, and at his death, in 1555, he left his wife and six children in very reduced and distressed circumstances. He invented a clock in 1553, and pretended that he had found out the quadrature of the circle. His works were collected in 3 vols. folio, 1532, 1542, and 1556.

FINCH, Heneage, earl of Nottingham, son of Sir Heneage Finch, recorder of London, was born in 1621. He was educated at Westminster school, and Christ church, Oxford, and at the Inner temple he assiduously applied himself to the study of law. He was made solicitor-general to Charles II. and created a baronet, and in 1661, he was elected member for the university of Oxford. He was very active in the impeachment of lord Clarendon, in 1667, and in 1670, he was made attorney-general, and three years after lord keeper, and raised to the peerage. In 1675, he was appointed lord chancellor, and in 1691, he was created earl of Nottingham, and died the year after. He was a man of great wisdom and eloquence, and though born in dangerous and troublesome times, he so conducted himself that he retained in every situation the good opinion of the king and of the people. Burnet has commended him for his attachment to the church, Dryden has recorded him in his Absalom and Achitophel, in the character of Amri, and for his powers in oratory, he acquired and deserved the name of the Roscius and Cicero of England. Some of his speeches in parliament, and on judicial causes, have been published.

FINCH, Daniel, earl of Nottingham, son of the preceding, was born in 1647. Though he was one of the privy counsellors who proclaimed the elevation of the duke of York to the throne, he never appeared at court during the reign of James, but upon his abdication he wished the appointment of a regent, and not the setting up of another king. He was secretary under William, and held the same office under Anne, till 1704. At the accession of George I. he was one of the lords for the administration of affairs, and was declared president of the council. He retired from public affairs 1716, and died 1730. He wrote a very elaborate book in reply to Whiston's letter to him on the Trinity, for which he was thanked by the university of Oxford.

FINCH, Edward, brother of Sir Heneage Finch, first earl of Nottingham, was vicar of Christ church, London, from which he was ejected by the parliamentary inquisitors. The crimes alleged against him were, that he preached in a surplice, worshipped the great idol set up in the church, i. e. the altar, and associated with women. He died Feb. 1st, 1642, much respected.

FINCK, Thomas, a native of South Jutland, who took his medical degrees at Basil, and became physician to the duke of Sleswick. He was made, in 1691, professor of mathematics at Copenhagen, and in 1692, professor of eloquence, and 1693, of medicine. He wrote tracts, Geometriæ Rotundi—de Constitutione Matheseos—de Medicinâ, &c. He died 1656, aged 95.

FINET, Sir John, a gentleman of respectability among the courtiers of James I. and Charles I. He was born at Soulton, near Dover, in Kent, and died 1641, aged 70. He wrote "Fineti Philoxenus," a book on the precedence, treatment, audience, and punctilios observed towards foreign ambassadors at the English court, 1656.

FINLEY, Samuel, D.D. president of the college at Princeton, New-Jersey, was a native of Armagh, Ireland, and born in 1715. He came to Philadelphia in 1734, and devoting several years to the study of the classics and theology, was ordained as an evangelist in 1740. Happening in his itinerant labours to preach at New-Haven, in violation of a law prohibiting such ministers to teach in that state, he was seized by the magistrates, and carried out of the colony. In 1744, he was settled at Nottingham, Maryland, where he laboured near seventeen years with distinguished fidelity and success. He also established a useful academy there. On the death of Mr. Davies, he was chosen president of the college of New-Jersey, and removed to Princeton in July, 1761. After occupying that station with reputation five years, he died at Philadelphia, July 17th, 1766. He possessed a vigorous mind, was distinguished for piety, and rendered his life highly useful, both to the church and the seminary over which he presided. ☞ L.

FINLEY, Robert, D.D. a highly respectable and useful minister of the American Presbyterian church, was born at Princeton, New-Jersey, in 1772. He early entered the college of his native town, and was graduated A.B. in his sixteenth year. After spending several years in the instruction of youth in the learned languages, in New-Jersey and South Carolina, he was licensed to preach the Gospel in Sept. 1794; and in June, 1795, ordained to the work of the Gospel ministry, and installed pastor of the church of Basking-Ridge, in his native state. Here he remained, highly useful, and universally beloved, until 1817, when he accepted the presidency of the university of Athens, in Georgia. He had scarcely entered on the duties of this office, when he was removed by death, deeply regretted by the friends of the institution, and by all who knew him. He published several sermons, which were considered creditable both to his talents and piety. But his highest distinctions were activity and usefulness as a pastor, and great sagacity, address, and judgment in the instruction and management of youth. The degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon him a few months before his death, in the 46th year of his age. ☞ L.

FIRENZUOLA, Angelo, an Italian poet, born at Florence, and patronised by pope Clement VII. He was for some time an advocate, and then became an ecclesiastic, and died at Rome, 1545. His prose works were published at Florence, 1548, 8vo. and his comedies and other poetical pieces the year after, and in 1763, in 3 vols.

FIRMIUS MATERNUS, Julius, a Christian writer of the fourth century, of whom little is known. His book, "de Errore Profanarum Religionum," has been often printed, and is a valuable performance. The eight books of astronomy or mathematics, printed at Venice, 1497, which bear his name, are supposed not to be by him, or at least to have been written by him before he was converted from heathenism to Christianity.

FIRMILIAN, bishop of Cæsarea, in Cappadocia, the friend of Origen, and president of the council of Antioch against Paul of Samosata. He died 269.

FIRMIN, Thomas, a most benevolent Englishman, born at Ipswich, June, 1632. He was apprenticed by his parents who were puritans, to a linen manufacturer in London, and in 1660, married a citizen's daughter, who died after bringing him two children. He married again in 1664, and had several children. He was very prosperous in his business, and he honourably employed the fruits of his industry and success to the most charitable purposes. He was in his religious opinions a Socinian, but he nevertheless was held in esteem by the clergy, by Wilkins, Whichcot, and especially Tillotson, who frequented his company even when archbishop. He was settled in Lombard-street, and the ravages of the plague in 1665, and the fire of 1666, gave full activity to his extensive benevolence. In 1676, he erected a warehouse in Little-Britain for the industrious employment of the poor in the linen manufacture, and in 1682, he established another manufactory of the same kind at Ipswich for the benefit of the protestants who had fled from France on account of religious persecutions. For the last 20 years of his life, he was governor of Christ hospital, London, to which he was a great benefactor. There was indeed scarce a charitable institution to which he did not liberally contribute, with the most humane and benevolent of intentions. This worthy and great character, died 20th Dec. 1697, aged 66, and was buried in the cloisters of Christ hospital, where, in the wall near his grave an inscription records his real merits. He published in 1678, Proposals for the Employing of the Poor, and the Prevention of Beggary, &c. 4to.

FIRMIN, Giles, a native of Suffolk, educated at Cambridge, where he studied physic, which he afterwards practised in New-England. On his return to England he took orders, and became minister of Shalford, from which he was ejected for non-conformity, 1662. He resumed the practice of physic, and died 1697, aged 80. The best known of his works is "the Real Christian."

FIRONZABADI, surnamed Sharazi, a learned Persian, author of Al Tanbidh, or general information on the Mahometan law in the 11th century. Another of the same name wrote the Ocean, or a dictionary of the Arabic language, and died 1414.

FISU, Simon, a native of Kent, educated at Oxford, from whence he went to Gray's Inn, and studied the law. He fled into Germany in consequence of his acting in a play, in which severe censures were thrown upon Wolsey, and there he met William Tyndale, likewise an exile. He wrote, in 1527, "the Supplication of Beggars," which is a violent satire on bishops and clergy, and the perusal of this piece by Henry VIII. and Anne Boleyn, restored him to favour, and after Wolsey's fall he returned, and was graciously treated by the king. He died of the plague, 1571. He translated the Dutch book called the Sum of the Scriptures.

FISHER, John, an English prelate, born at Beverley, Yorkshire, 1459. He was educated at Michael-house, a college afterwards incorporated with Trinity college, Cambridge, and in 1495, when fellow, he served the office of proctor, and that same year he was elected master of Michael-house, and then became confessor to Margaret, dutchess of Richmond, mother to Henry VII. who by his advice founded St. John's and Christ colleges, at Cambridge, and among other acts of great benevolence, founded both the divinity professorships in the universities. In 1501, he took the degree of D.D. and was made vice-chancellor of Cambridge, and in 1504, was nominated bishop of Rochester, and the next year accepted the headship of Queen's college, Cambridge. On Luther's appearance he stood forth as the champion of Rome, but though long favoured by the king, he fell under his displeasure, 1527, on account of his zealous defence of the queen, in the affair of her divorce. In 1530 he narrowly escaped poisoning by one Rouse, who threw, in the cook's absence, poison into the gruel, of which, luckily, the bishop did not taste, but which proved fatal to two of the servants, and nearly so to 15 others who partook of it. Upon the question of the king's supremacy in 1531, Fisher opposed it with great freedom, and increased the dissatisfaction of the court, by listening to the predictions of the holy maid of Kent, and more at last by refusing to take the oaths of allegiance to the king, and to his children, by Anne Boleyn. He was committed to the Tower for this contumacy, and though solicited by his friends he refused to alter his opinion, or assent to the lawfulness of the divorce, and the marriage of the king. He was attainted of high treason, but he might have languished in confinement the rest of life, had not the gratitude of the pope been unseasonably manifested towards him. Pleased with the firmness of the venerable bishop, Paul III. in 1535, created him a cardinal, an honour which displeased Henry so much, that he gave orders that none should bring the hat into his dominions. The measure was unworthy of a king, but when Fisher, more ambitiously than wisely, had declared to Cromwell, whom Henry had sent to examine him, that he would receive from the pope the cardinal's hat, the angry monarch swore by the mother of God, that he should wear it on his shoulders then, for he would leave him never a head to set it on. He was therefore soon after arraigned, and condemned to suffer death for high treason, and on the 22d June, 1535, he was beheaded, and his head fixed on London-bridge the next day. He was then nearly 77. Of his learning, his several works, which are chiefly on controversial, subjects, &c. which appeared together at Wurtzburg, in folio, 1595, are evident proof. As he was the literary opponent of Erasmus, the opinion of that illustrious author must be considered as impartial. He describes him as a man of great and extensive powers of mind, and for integrity, sweetness of temper, and greatness of soul, far superior to all the men of his age.

FISHER, Mary, an enthusiastic quaker, in the 17th century, who travelled to Constantinople, with the chimerical intention of converting the grand Signior. Mahomet heard her with patience, and sent her back to her country in safety. She afterwards married a preacher of her persuasion, and then went into Languedoc, to attempt the conversion of the protestants there to the tenets of the quakers.

FISHER, Alexander M., professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in Yale College, Connecticut, was born in Franklin, Massachusetts, in 1794. He was graduated at Yale College, in the year 1813, and in 1815 appointed a tutor in that seminary. In 1817, he was advanced to the professorship of mathematics and natural philosophy. He early discovered very uncommon talents for the acquisition and communication of knowledge, and excited the highest expectations of his usefulness and distinction. His power of attention, quickness and clearness of apprehension, rapid discernment of the relations of objects, accuracy of judgment, and independence, caution, and originality in investigation, are rarely equalled, and constituted a genius of the highest order for the department of science to which he devoted his attention; and his attainments were as extraordinary as his endowments. After having once delivered his course of lectures, he undertook a voyage to Europe, to improve himself in his professional studies, and perished in the wreck of the packet Albion, on the coast of Ireland, on the 22d of April, 1822. He possessed great amiableness, modesty, and delicacy of taste, and his conduct was marked by an uncommon regard to religious obligation. Several of his scientific papers may be seen in Silliman's Journal of Science and the Arts.  L.

FITZGIBBON, John, earl of Clare, was the son of an Irish barrister, and born in 1749. He was educated at Dublin and Oxford, after which he studied the law; and, in 1784, became attorney-general in Ireland. In 1789 he received the great seal, and was created baron Fitzgibbon. In 1793 he was made viscount Clare, and in 1795 was raised to the earldom. To these honours was added an English barony in 1799. He was the great promoter of the union of the two countries, and died at Dublin, January 28th, 1802, leaving two sons and two daughters.—W. B.

FITZHERBERT, Sir Anthony, a learned lawyer, born of an ancient family at Norbury, Derbyshire. He was educated at Oxford, and at one of the inns of court, London, and soon distinguished himself as a lawyer. In 1511, he was made serjeant at law, in 1516 knighted, and in 1523 appointed justice in the court of common pleas. After a life supported in his high station with integrity and honour, he died 27th May, 1535, and was buried at Norbury, leaving a numerous family well provided for. He wrote the office of Justice of the Peace, &c.—the office of Sheriffs, &c. and other law tracts, besides “of the Surveying of Lands”—and the book of husbandry, &c.

FITZHERBERT, Thomas, grandson to Sir Anthony, was born in Staffordshire 1552, and educated at Oxford, either at Exeter or Lincoln college. As he was a zealous catholic, he left the university without a degree, and retired to privacy, but on account of his bigoted principles, and his attachment to the Jesuits Campian and Parsons, he exposed himself to difficulties, and fled as a voluntary exile to France, 1532. He afterwards went to Madrid and Milan, and at last entered into the society of Jesus at Rome, 1614. He was afterwards at Brussels, and for 22 years presided over the English college at Rome, where he died 1640, aged 88, and was buried in the college chapel. He was a man of great learning, and he wrote several books on controversial subjects, against Barlow, Downe, Andrews, and other divines. His treatise concerning policy and religion, in three parts, was much admired by papists and protestants.

FITZHERBERT, Nicholas, grandson to Sir Anthony, and cousin to Thomas, was born 1550, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford. In 1572, he went abroad as a voluntary exile, on account of his religious principles, and settled at Bologna, and afterwards at Rome, in the house of William Alan, the English cardinal. He was unfortunately drowned in a journey from Rome 1612. He wrote Casæ Galatæi de Bonis Moribus, 1595—Oxoniensis in Angliâ Academiæ Descriptio 1602—de Antiquitate et Continuatione Catholicæ Religionis in Angliâ, 1608—Cardinalis Alani Vitæ Epitome, 1608.

FITZJAMES, James, duke of Berwick, natural son of the duke of York, afterwards James II. by Arabella Churchill, sister to the duke of Marlborough, was born at Moulines, 1671. He was early inured to the labours of a military life, and was wounded at Buda 1686, and signalized himself at the defeat of the Turks at Mohatz, and afterwards in Ireland at the siege of Londonderry, and at the battle of the Boyne. In 1703, he headed the French troops in Spain, reduced the rebels in the Cevennes, and in 1705, took Nice, and for his services was made marshal of France by the king. He gained the famous victory at Almanza, over the English and Portuguese under Galloway, 1707, and thus secured the Spanish crown, on the head of Philip V. He was killed at the head of the French army, by a cannon ball, at the siege of Philipsburg, in Germany, 1734. He was a man of a benevolent character, generally poor from the great sacrifices which he made to support the emigrants in his father's cause. Montesquieu has drawn up his character, and 2 vols. of his memoirs have been published, 12mo. by Margon.

FITZ-STEPHEN, William, a monk of Canterbury, of Norman extraction. He was present at the murder of Becket, of which he wrote an account. His description of London in that account is very curious, and is the oldest extant. He died 1191.

FIXMILLNER, Placidus, a native of Linz, in Austria, who early studied mathematics, at Strasburg, under Stuard, and afterwards embraced a monastic life, and was ecclesiastical professor for 40 years at Kremsmunster. He directed also his attention to celestial observations, and published some ingenious works on astronomical subjects, besides tracts on the canon law, and on ecclesiastical affairs. He died 1791, aged 71.

FIZES, Anthony, a famous physician of Montpellier, who died there 1765, aged 75. His works are esteemed. Opera Medica, 4to. 1742—Leçons de Chymie, 1750.—Tractatus de Febribus, 12mo. 1749.—Tractatus de Physiologia, 12mo. 1750, and dissertations.

FLACOUR, F. de, directing general of the French East India Company, was also at the head of a colony in Madagascar, in 1648, which he was obliged to quit. On his return to France, he published an account of the island, in one vol. 4to.

FLACCUS, Caius Valcrius, a Latin poet in the age of Vespasian, author of the Argonautica.

FLACIUS, or FRANCOVITZ, Matthias. Vid. FRANCOVITZ.

FLAMEEL, Bertholet, a historical painter of Liege, who died 1675, aged 61. He improved himself in Italy, and was noticed at Florence by the grand duke. Some of his pieces adorn the churches of Paris and of Liege.

FLAMEL, Nicolas, a notary of Paris, born at Pontoise. He suddenly rose from poverty to extensive opulence, and gave rise to a report that he had discovered the philosopher's stone. His riches, however, were nobly used in the relief of indigence, and in the erection of hospitals. It is supposed that his riches arose from successful speculations in commerce, at that time little known. He was living in 1399, and Lucas amused his readers by declaring that he had seen him in India after his decease. Some works on Alchymy have been attributed to him.

FLAMINIO, Giovanni Antonio, an orator, poet, and historian of Bologna, author of the lives of Albertus Magnus, of St. Dominic, &c. He died 1536, aged 72.

FLAMINIO, Marc Antonio, son of the preceding, born at Imola. He was patronised by cardinal Farnese, who appointed him his secretary at the council of Trent, an office, which his infirmities prevented him to execute. He died at Rome 1550, aged 57. His letters and epigrams appeared 1561, 8vo.—and his paraphrase of thirty Psalms, 1558. His latinity is very pure. He was learned, and his other writings are much esteemed.

FLAMINIUS, or FLAMININUS, Titus Quintus, a Roman consul, celebrated for his defeat of Philip of Macedon, B.C. 198, and his restoration of the liberties of Greece. He prevailed upon Prusias to deliver up Hannibal.

FLAMINIUS, Nobilis, an Italian, eminent as a divine, and as a critic. He wrote a treatise on Predestination, corrected the Vulgate edition of the Septuagint, and died at Lucca, 1590.

FLAMSTEED, John, an able astronomer, born at Derby, Aug. 19th, 1646. He was educated in his native town, but a severe distemper prevented the designs of his parents, in sending him to the university, and when he left school in 1662, he saw for the first time an astronomical book, Sacrobosko's de Sphærâ. This fixed deeply his attention, and directed all his thoughts to astronomical subjects. He not only constructed dials, but by the help of Street's Caroline tables, he calculated very accurately an eclipse, which was to happen 22d June, 1666, and so ingenious did this appear, that the calculation was shown to Mr. Halton, a gentleman of property and mathematical knowledge in the neighbourhood, who applauded the young astronomer, and supplied him with fresh books for his studies. In 1669, he communicated his calculations of the eclipses of the fixed stars by the moon, to the Royal Society, and received the thanks of that body, by the hands of its secretary Oldenburg, and one of its members, Collins. In 1670, his father, who had hitherto viewed his studies with jealous dissatisfaction, pleased with his correspondence with learned men, advised him to go to London, which he willingly did to visit his friends Collins and Oldenburg. At Cambridge, he became acquainted with Barrow, Wroe, and Newton, and he now entered at Jesus college at that university, where he continued his astronomical studies with increasing zeal. In 1673-4, he wrote his Ephemeris, to show the folly of astrology, to which he added tables of the moon's rising and setting, and at the request of his friend Sir Jonas Moore, he compiled an account of the tides, and constructed a barometer for the use of the king. On taking his master's degree at Cambridge, he wished to take orders, but his friend Sir Jonas dissuaded him, and procured him the place of astronomer royal, with a salary of 100*l.* a year. This, however, did not prevent Flamsteed's purpose, he was ordained by bishop Gunning, and when, in 1675, the first stone was laid for the building of Greenwich observatory, he lodged at the queen's house there, and observed the apulses of the moon and planets to the fixed stars, and in 1681 published the doctrine of the Sphere, in Sir Jonas Moore's posthumous work of a new System of Mathematics in 4to. In 1684, he obtained the living of Burstow in Surrey, the only preferment he ever held, but though his genius entitled him to higher emoluments, his benevolent heart, was satisfied with moderate competence, more pleased in the pursuit of his favourite studies, and in the friendship of such men as Newton, Halley, Molineux, Wallis, Casini, Wotton, Keil, &c. than in the possession of unbounded opulence. This great and illustrious character died of a strangury, 31st Dec. 1712, and thus, though of a very feeble constitution, lived more than 73 years. He was married, but left no children. His Historia Cœlestis Britannica, of which the best part was printed before his death, was published by his widow 1725, in 3 vols. fol. and dedicated to the king. His papers, as he himself tells us in his preface, had been examined by the direction of George, prince of Denmark, by Roberts, Newton, Gregory, Arbuthnot, Wren, and others, and, under this high recommendation, were afterwards presented to the public.

FLANDRIN, Peter, a native of Lyons, who studied the veterinary art under his uncle professor Chabert, and acquired some celebrity in the knowledge of comparative anatomy. He visited England and Spain in search of information about the management of cattle and the improvement of wools, and published an interesting treatise on the subject. He wrote besides various memoirs, and was made member of the national institute. He died 1796.

FLASSANS, Taraudet de, a Provençal poet of the 14th century, born at Flassans. He wrote a poem called Lessons to avoid the Treacheries of Love, for which he was rewarded by de Ponteves with a piece of land. He was employed by queen Joan to make a remonstrance to the emperor Charles IV. which he ably executed.

FLATMAN, Thomas, an English poet, born in Aldersgate-street, London, 1633, and educated at Winchester and New college, Oxford. He left the university without a degree, and became barrister of the Inner Temple, but never followed the law as a profession. He now turned author, and wrote several light poems, one of which, on the death of lord Ossory, was read by the father, the duke of Ormond, with such gratification that he sent the author a mourning ring, with a diamond in it, worth 100*l.* In his younger days Flatman expressed his abhorrence to the marriage state by a song beginning with these lines :

*Like a dog with a bottle tied close to his tail, and when, as Wood says, he was afterwards smitten with a fair virgin, and more with her fortune, he espoused her in 1672, and on his wedding night his jovial companions serenaded him with his favourite song. He died in Fleet-street, London, 1688. He was an indifferent poet; but, says Granger, succeeded better as a painter, as one of his heads is worth a ream of his Pindarics. His poems, third edition, were printed 1682, in one vol. 8vo.

FLAVEL, John, an English divine, born in Worcestershire, and educated at University college, Oxford, where he took his degree of B. A. He was ejected from his living at Dartmouth, in 1662, for nonconformity, and retired to Hudscott, near South Molton. He returned to his living on the indulgence granted by Charles II. and died there 1692. He wrote Navigation and Husbandry spiritualized, &c. His works, which are respectable, were published 2 vols. fol. and 6 vols. 8vo.

FLAVIAN, a patriarch of Antioch, where he died 404.

FLAVIAN, a patriarch of Constantinople after Proclus 447. He condemned the Eutychian heresy in a synod, for which, by the opposite faction, he was deposed, scourged, and banished to Lydia, where he died in consequence of the ill treatment which he had received.

FLAVIGNI, Valerian de, doctor of the Sorbonne, canon of Rheims, and Hebrew professor of the royal College, was born at Laon, and died at Paris 1674, very old. He assisted in the Polyglott of Le Jay, and was a violent polemic.

FLAVITAS, patriarch of Constantinople after Accacius. Zeno, the emperor, was so superstitious as to suppose that an angel would come down to inscribe the name of the new prelate on a piece of paper which he left on the altar; but Flavitas, by bribing the chamberlain, inserted his own name, and was made bishop; but died three months after, and the artifice being, in consequence, discovered, cost the guilty chamberlain his life.

FLAUST, John Baptist, an advocate of the parliament of Rouen. He was fifty years employed in the composition of his Explication of the Jurisprudence Usage of Normandy, 2 vols. folio. He died 1783, aged 72.

FLÉCHIER, Esprit, a celebrated French prelate, born 1632, at Perne, near Avignon. He distinguished himself as a popular preacher, and became known as an elegant scholar, by his poetical description of a carousal in pure Latinity. His funeral orations were much admired, especially that on Turenne, and that on Montausier, which raised him to the same rank of reputation with the well-known Bossuet. In 1679 he wrote his history of Theodosius the Great, and in 1685 he was honourably promoted to the see of Lavaur, on which occasion the king said, Be not surprised I have so long delayed to reward your merit; I was afraid of losing the pleasure of hearing your discourses. In 1687 he was translated to Nismes, where, as a preacher and a bishop, he was successful in drawing many of the protestants to the catholic faith. In the famine of 1709 his charity and benevolence were unbounded. This most virtuous and exemplary man died 1710, lamented, says d'Alembert, by the catholics, regretted by the protestants, having exhibited to his brethren an excellent model of zeal and charity, simplicity and eloquence. His works are Cœuvres Mêlées—Panegyric of Saints—Funeral Orations—sermons, 3 vols. 12mo.—the History of Theodosius—Gratiani de Casibus Illustr. Vir. the Life of Ximenes, 4to. letters, 2 vols. 12mo.—the Life of Cardinal Commendon, 4to.—posthumous works. Those who compare Bossuet with Flechier observe, that the former has less elegance but greater strength, and that the style of his rival is more flowing, finished, and uniform. Bossuet owes all to nature, Flechier much to art.

FLECKNOE, Richard, an English poet, formerly, it is said, a jesuit. At the revolution, when Dryden was dismissed, as being a catholic, from the office of laureate, Flecknoe was appointed as his successor, which so exasperated the bard, that he vented his indignation in a severe satirical poem, called, from his humble antagonist, Mac Flecknoe. He wrote some plays, one only of which was acted. His Damoiselles A-la-mode, and his Love's kingdom were both hissed off the stage. He wrote besides enigmas and epigrams, besides the "Diarium," in burlesque verse. The time of his death is unknown.

FLEETWOOD, William, an English lawyer, recorder of London in Elizabeth's reign, was natural son of Mr. Fleetwood of Hesketh, Lancashire. He was educated at Oxford, and studied the law in the Middle Temple, and soon distinguished himself by his abilities. He was made recorder of London 1569, he showed himself very active against inass-houses, and popish priests. In 1580 he was made sergeant at law, and in 1592 sergeant to the queen. He died 1593, and was buried at Great Missenden, Bucks, where he had an estate. He was married, and had some children who survived him. He was an eloquent orator, says Wood, and his skill as a politician recommended him much to the notice of Leicester. He published an oration at Guild-hall before the lord mayor—a table of Ploten's Reports—the Office of a Justice of the Peace, 1658—Annalium tam Regum Edwardi V. Richardi III. Henrici VII. quam Henrici VIII.—Titulorum Ordine Alphabet et Elenchus, 1579 and 1597.

FLEETWOOD, William, an English prelate, descended from the Lancashire Fleetwoods, and born in the tower of London 1st Jan. 1656. He was educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge, and on taking orders, became an eloquent preacher. He was made chaplain to king William, and afterwards obtained a fellowship at Eton, and the rectory of St. Austin's, London. He was installed canon of Windsor 1702, but in 1705, he quitted the tumults of the town, and much to the concern of large audiances, who attended his eloquent and persuasive discourses, he retired to the privacy of Wexham rectory, in Bucks. In 1706, without any solicitation on his part, or that of his friends, he was nominated to succeed Beveridge in the see of St. Asaph, and in 1714 he was translated to Ely. He died at Tottenham, in Middlesex, where he had retired for change of air, 4th August, 1723, and he was buried in Ely cathedral, where his lady, who soon followed him to the grave, erected a monument over him. His only son, Dr. Charles Fleetwood, rector of Cottenham, Cambridgeshire, did not long survive him. Bishop Fleetwood's character was respectable in every point of view. Admired as a preacher, he made an exemplary life, and a benevolent heart, the noblest ornaments of his persuasive eloquence in the pulpit. As a bishop he was beloved by his clergy, and did not arrogantly assume that superiority over them which conscious merit disdains, but illiberal pride asserts. As a writer he was highly respected, his sermons and divinity tracts were widely circulated; but the firmness of his opinions, however, drew upon him the censure of the house of Commons. His preface to his sermons, on the deaths of Mary, of the duke of Gloucester, and of William, and on the accession of Anne, gave such offence to the ministry that the book was burned publicly, 12th May, 1712; but it was more universally read, and even appeared in the Spectator, No 384. Besides these, Fleetwood published Inscriptionum Antiquarum Sylloge, 8vo. 1691—a translation of Jurieu's Method of Devotion, 1692, the 27th edition of which appeared 1750—an Essay on Miracles, 8vo. 1701—the reasonable Communicant, 1704—Sixteen Practical Discourses on the Relative Duties of Parents, &c. 2 vols. 8vo. 1705—the Thirteenth of Romans vindicated, 1710—the Judgment of the Church of England in Lay Baptism and Dissenters' Baptism, 1712—the Life of St. Wenefrede, 1713—Chronicon Preciosum, or Account of English Money, Price of Corn and other Commodities for the last 600 Years, 1797, besides smaller works.

FLEMING, Robert, a North Briton, born at Bathens, 1630. He was educated at St. Andrews, and at the age of 33 became pastor of a congregation, from which office he was ejected after the restoration. He then settled at Rotterdam, in Holland, as minister of the Scots' congregation there, and died 25th July, 1694. His "Fulfilling of the Scriptures" has been a popular work among the dissenters.

FLEMING, Robert, son of the preceding, was a native of Scotland, and educated at Leyden and Utrecht. He settled at Leyden as minister, and then removed to Amsterdam, from whence he came to London, and officiated at the Scotch church, Lothbury, and at Salters' hall. He wrote, among other things, sermons—tracts—Christology, 3 vols. 8vo.—the Rise and Fall of Popery, of which it is said that many passages are particularly applicable to the first events of the French revolution. He died 1716.

FLEMING, Caleb, a native of Nottingham, pastor of a dissenting congregation in London, and in 1752, called to be assistant to Dr. Foster at Pinner's hall. He wrote a Survey of the Search after Souls, and other tracts, and in his tenets he was a strict Arian. He died 1773, aged 75.

FLEMMING, or FLEMMYNGE, Richard, a native of Croston, Yorkshire, educated at University college, Oxford, and made prebendary of York 1408. He was, in 1442, made bishop of Lincoln, and went as deputy to the council of Constance. The pope raised him to York; but as the king refused his consent he continued bishop of Lincoln till his death, 1431. He was founder of Lincoln college, Oxford, and was a strenuous opposer of Wickliffe's doctrines, which he afterwards warmly embraced. To his disgrace he was instrumental, however, in digging up the bones of that bold reformer, according to the impotent resolutions of the Constance council.

FLESSELLES, N. de, a French magistrate, respectable for his loyalty, and the mildness of his manners. He attempted in vain to repress the tumults which preceded the revolution; but on the 14th of July, 1789, his benevolent and patriotic interference proved fatal at the taking of the Bastille. He received a shot from a pistol, and his head, being cut off, was carried on a pike in triumph through the streets.

FLETCHER, Dr. Richard, father of the dramatic poet, was born in Kent, and educated at Benet college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He was made dean of Peterborough, 1583, and three years after attended the Scotch Mary's execution, where he displayed more zeal than good sense in pressing that unfortunate queen to turn protestant. In 1589 he was advanced to the see of Bristol, in 1592 translated to Worcester, and 1594 to London. After the death of his wife he took a second, lady Baker, a woman of great beauty, about 1595, and this so offended Elizabeth, who was averse to the marriage of the clergy, especially of bishops, that she caused Whitgift to suspend him. Though afterwards restored to favour, the queen's conduct sat heavily upon him, and he died suddenly in his chair 1596. As he was fond of tobacco, then little known, Camden imputes his death to an immoderate use of it.

FLETCHER, Giles, brother to the bishop, was educated at Eaton and King's college, Cambridge, where he took the degree of LL.D. 1581. His abilities were employed by queen Elizabeth, as commissioner in Scotland, Germany, and the Low Countries, and in 1588, he was sent as ambassador to Russia, to reconcile the Russians to the English commerce, and to efface the disadvantageous impressions which the jealousy of the Dutch and other powers had excited. On his return he was made secretary to the city of London, and in 1597 treasurer of St. Paul's. He died 1610. He wrote a curious account "of the Russian Commonwealth," with a description of the fashions and manners of the people, 1590, 8vo. The book was suppressed, but appeared in Hakluyt's collection, 1643.

FLETCHER, John, a dramatic writer, son of the bishop of London, was born in Northamptonshire 1576. He was educated at Cambridge, probably Benet college, and distinguished himself as a writer of plays conjointly with Beaumont. He also assisted Ben Jonson in his "Widow," and after Beaumont's death he consulted Shirley in the formation of the plots of his pieces. The respective share of these joint authors is not known, though it is said that Beaumont's judgment corrected the redundancies of Fletcher's wit. Once at a tavern the brother bards debated upon the plot of a tragedy, and Fletcher being overheard by the waiter to say that he would kill the king, he and his friend were both seized for high treason, till explanations proved to the magistrate that the intended murder was the innocent sacrifice of a theatrical hero. Fletcher died of the plague in London 1625, and was buried in St. Mary Overy's church, Southwark. Fletcher was ranked with Jonson and Shakspeare, in the great triumvirate of chief dramatic authors, by Edward Philips, and Dryden says that his plays, as possessing gayety in the comic parts, and pathos in the more serious characters, were acted more frequently than those of Jonson or Shakspeare. Now, though they possess great merit, the plays of Beaumont and Fletcher are little regarded, and seldom appear on the stage. The plays of the poet, amounting to above 50, were first edited together, 1679, folio, and lately by Colman, 10 vols. Svo. 1778.

FLETCHER, Phineas, a poet, son of Giles Fletcher. He was educated at Eaton, and elected to King's college, Cambridge, 1600. He was made minister of Hilgay, in Norfolk, 1621, by sir Henry Willoughby, and died there about 1650. He is known as the author of "Purple Island," a poem containing an allegorical description of man, and very popular at the time of its publication. He wrote besides "Piscatory Eclogues," which were published at Edinburgh 1772, and the Purple Island, with Giles's "Christ's Victory," 1783, London.

FLETCHER, Giles, brother of Phineas, was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he took the degree of B.D. He died at his living of Alderton, Suffolk, 1623, equally beloved, says Wood, of the muses and graces. His "Christ's Victory," was first published 1610, and again 1640, and it is a poem of some merit, as the personifications are very natural, and the language dignified.

FLETCHER, Andrew, son of sir Robert Fletcher, of Saltoun, Scotland, was born 1653. He was educated under bishop Burnet, and when in parliament he so strongly opposed the measures of the court that he was obliged to leave the country and go to Holland. He landed in the West of England with Monmouth 1685, and afterwards fought against the Turks in the Hungarian army. The revolution restored him to his country, and he became a commissioner to settle the government of Scotland. He died in London 1716. His works, which are all on political subjects, and in the bold style of theory, appeared together in 1 vol. Svo. 1732.

FLETCHER, Abraham, a native of Little Broughton, Cumberland, brought up under his father, as a tobacco-pipe manufacturer. From this humble occupation, by severe application, he raised himself to public notice, and though self-taught in reading and in writing, he so improved himself that he became at the age of 30 a teacher of mathematics; and as astrologer and universal doctor, he acquired a fortune of 3000*l*. His Universal Measurer, Svo. is a work of great merit, and exhibits in the most favourable view his perfect knowledge of mathematics. He died 1793, aged 79.

FLETCHER, Benjamin, governor of New-York, succeeded Ingoldsby in August, 1692, and continued in the administration until 1698. He was passionate, avaricious, and arbitrary, and rendered himself unpopular. He gave the colony of Connecticut some trouble by endeavouring to obtain the command of its militia, which had been improperly given him in his commission. Piracy prevailed on the coast during his administration, and he was accused of countenancing it. He was during the same period governor of Pennsylvania, but resigned the administration into the hands of Markham, his deputy.

FLEURIEU, Charles Peter Clarel de, a hydrographer, was born at Lyons, in 1738. He became a captain in the marine service, and, in 1790, was appointed minister of that department. In 1792 he was made tutor to the dauphin, but soon afterwards was thrown into prison by the revolutionary party. Buonaparte nominated him to the offices of intendant of horse and governor of the Thuilleries, which places he resigned in 1805. He died in 1810. Fleuriu published a work, entitled "Decouvertes des Francois en 1768 et 1769, dans le sud-est de la Nouvelle Guinée," 4to. 2. A voyage to prove some time-pieces, 2 vols. Svo. He spent many years in completing a great "Hydrographic Atlas," but left it unfinished.—W. B.

FLEURY, Claude, a French advocate, born at Paris 1640. After being at the bar nine years he took orders, and in 1672 became preceptor to the princess of Conti, and in 1680 to the count de Vermandois. Under Fenelon he was subpreceptor to the dukes of Burgundy, Anjou, and Berri, and for his services he was made abbot of Loc-dieu, which he resigned in 1706 for the rich priory of Argenteuil. In 1716 he was confessor to Lewis XV. and died 1723, aged 82, greatly respected for his learning and virtues. His works are numerous, the chief of which are, Manners of the Israelites—Manners of the Christians—Ecclesiastical History, in 13 vols. 4to. a valuable book—Institution of Ecclesiastical Law—a treatise on the choice and method of Studies—Duties of Masters and Servants—treatise on Public Law, 2 vols. 12mo.

FLEURY, Julian, the learned editor of the Delphin Apuleius, in 2 vols. 4to. He began Ausonius, but did not complete it.

FLEURY, André Hercule de, a famous cardinal, born at Lodeve in Languedoc, 1653, and educated at Paris. Recommended by abilities, and by a pleasing address and handsome figure, he rose from canon of Montpellier to be bishop of Frejus, and was appointed by Lewis XIV. preceptor to his grandson, after Bossuet and Fenelon. In 1726 he was made cardinal and prime minister, though aged 70, and so active was his conduct, and sagacious his measures, that the kingdom of France prospered greatly under his administration, the succession war was gloriously finished, and Lorraine added to the French dominions. His economy, however, neglected and ruined the marine, and in the war of 1740, his plans were not crowned with victory, so that it is said, he died with a heart broken with grief, 1743. Without the pride of Richelieu, and the avarice of Mazarin, he possessed great abilities, and though the misfortunes of the last war were attributed to him, he rather deserved the gratitude of the nation for his prudent management of the finances, and more for the benevolence of his heart.

FLINDERS, Matthew, a navigator, was born at Donington, in Lincolnshire, and was bred to the sea, in the merchant service, till the year 1795, when he went as midshipman with captain Hunter to New South Wales, where he formed an acquaintance with Mr. George Bass, a surgeon, who had a great ardour for voyages of discovery. These two friends ventured, in a small boat called "Tom Thumb," to explore the coast of that extensive country. An account of the discoveries which they made was published by colonel Collins, in his account of that settlement. In 1801 Mr. Flinders was sent out in the command of the Investigator, to prosecute his researches in those seas; which mission he discharged with great credit; but his vessel was afterwards lost, and, in his voyage home, aboard a schooner, he was obliged to put into the Isle of France; where the governor, De Caen, in defiance of the law of humanity, condemned the vessel, and detained the commander above six years. Though he obtained his liberty at last, he could not recover his journal, which the French kept, in order to appropriate to themselves the merit of those discoveries in Terra Australis, which belonged to our countryman. Captain Flinders, however, drew up an account of his voyages, which was just completed at the press when he died of a disorder occasioned by the cruelty he had experienced in 1814.—W. B.

FLINK, Godfrey, a Dutch painter, pupil of Rembrandt. He died 1660, aged 44. He imitated his master in the execution of his pieces, but afterwards studied the Italian manner.

FLIPART, John James, a French engraver, who died at Paris, 11th July, 1782, aged 67. He possessed great merit, and in private life was an amiable man.

FLOCQUET, Stephen Joseph, a musician of eminence, was born at Aix in Provence, and died at Paris 1785, aged 35. His operas were received with the most flattering applause on the French stage.

FLODOARD, or FRODOARD, a French historian of Epernai. He was an ecclesiastic in the church of Rheims, where he wrote a Chronicle from 916 to 966—and a History of his Church from its foundation to 949. The best edition is that of 1617. He wrote also poetry, and died 966, aged 73.

FLOGEL, Charles Frederic, author of a History of the Human Understanding—History of Comic Literature—Present State of the Belles Lettres in Germany, &c. in German, was professor of philosophy in the college of noblemen at Leignitz, where he died 1788, aged 59.

FLOOD, Henry, an Irish orator, son of the chief justice of the king's bench in Ireland. He was educated at Dublin university, and at Oxford, where he was honoured with the degree of M.A. 1752. He sat in the Irish house of commons for Kilkenny, and afterwards for Callan, and he acquired great popularity by his eloquence and the measures which he proposed, but his consequence ceased when he obtained a seat among the English commons, and his addresses on subjects of reform and on public occasions were received with little interest. He died 1791. He wrote a Pindaric Ode to Fame—a Poem on the death of Frederic Prince of Wales, found in the Oxford collection, and some of his speeches have also appeared in print. His property after the death of his wife is bequeathed to Dublin university for the foundation of a professorship, and for enriching the public library by the purchase of MSS. &c.

FLORENTINO, Stephano, a historical painter of Florence, who studied under Giotto, and died 1350, aged 49.

FLORIAN, John Peter Claris de, a native of Languedoc, educated under the care of his relation Voltaire, by whose influence he obtained the office of page to the duke of Penthièvre. Though honoured by his patron, and promoted in the army, he preferred literary reputation to all other objects, and published in 1782 his first work Galathée, a romance. He wrote afterwards Theatre, Voltaire et le Serf de Jura, which obtained the prize of the French academy—Estelle—Numa Pompilius, &c. During the revolution his sentiments expressed in Numa drew upon him the resentment of Robespierre, who imprisoned him, but after the tyrant's death he was liberated, and died at Seaux, 13th Sept. 1794, aged 39. He began during his confinement a poem on William Tell, which was never completed. He wrote also Ebrahîm, a poem, &c.

FLORIMOND DE REMOND, a native of Guienne, counsellor in the parliament of Bourdeaux. He opposed warmly the Calvinists, and wrote on Antichrist—the Origin of the Heresies, &c. and died 1602.

FLORIO, John, the Resolute, as he styled himself, was born in London in the reign of Henry VIII. His parents, who were Waldenses, and descended from the Florii of Sienna in Tuscany, had fled from the persecutions of popery in the Valteline, and settled finally in England under Elizabeth, after a short absence during Mary's bigoted reign. Florio taught Italian and French in the university of Oxford, and was admitted at Magdalen college. He was tutor in those languages to prince Henry, and to Anne the queen of James I. to whom he was clerk of the closet. He died of the plague at Fulham 1625, aged 50. Of his works the principal are, "first Fruits and second Fruits," containing proverbs and witty sentences—Garden of Recreation—a translation of Montaigne's Essays—and an Italian and English Dictionary, fol. 1597, a work of merit. He married the sister of Sam. Daniel, the poet.

FLORIS, Francis, a painter of Antwerp, born 1520. He was like his father a sculptor till the age of 20, and then he studied painting under Lambert Lombard, and by imitating Angelo he acquired celebrity and opulence. He worked seven hours each day, and devoted the rest of the time to drinking. He died at the age of 50. He was called the Raphael of Flanders.

FLORUS, Lucius Annæus, a Latin historian, related to Seneca and Lucan. He wrote an abridgment of the Roman history, 116, A. D.

FLORUS, surnamed Master, a deacon of Lyons in the 9th century, author of Commentaries on St. Paul's Epistles—an Answer to Erigena, on predestination, and other works.

FLOYD, William, one of the signers of the declaration of American independence, was a member of the committee of correspondence of New-York in 1774, and a delegate to congress from Suffolk county. He continued in that station until near the close of the revolution, after which he removed to the then unsettled valley of Oneida, and resided there during the remainder of his life. In 1789 he was again elected a member of congress. In 1792 he was one of the electors of president and vice president, and was repeatedly appointed to the same office at subsequent elections. He died at Western, August 3d, 1821, aged 89. ¶ I.

FLOYER, sir John, a native of Hinters, Staffordshire, educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where he took his medical degrees. He afterwards settled as a respectable practitioner at Lichfield, and was knighted. He wrote the Touchstone of Medicines, 2 vols. 8vo—the Virtues of Cold Water, 8vo. and died 1720, aged 71.

FLUDD, Robert, an English philosopher, son of sir Thomas Fludd, knight, born at Milgate, Kent, 1574. He was of St. John's college, Oxford, and after taking his degrees in arts, applied to physic, and travelled in France, Spain, Italy, and Germany, to improve himself. He took his degrees in medicine 1605, and settled in London, and became fellow of the college of physicians. He began to publish about 1616, and was a voluminous writer, chiefly on the powers and wonders of Alchymy, and the Rosierueian doctrines. His works are in Latin, and written in an obscure and mysterious language. They amount to about 20, and are all mentioned in Wood's Athenæ. Two of his productions were against Kepler and Mersenus, and they were answered by those great philosophers.

FLYNT, Henry, minister, was a native of Dorchester, Massachusetts, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1693. Seven years after he was chosen a fellow of that institution, and in 1705 appointed a tutor, which office he held during the extraordinary period of forty-nine years, and assisted in the education of many of the most eminent men of his country. He was respectable for learning, and esteemed as a preacher. He died in 1760. ¶ L.

FOES, or FOESIUS, Anutius, a learned physician, born at Metz 1528. He was well skilled in Greek and Latin, and translated the works of Hippocrates into Latin, as also the commentaries of Galen. His abilities are praised by Huetius. He practised physic at Lorraine with reputation, and died 1596.

FOGLIETA, or FOLIETA, Uberto, a learned Genoese priest, banished from his country on account of the freedom of his writings. Cardinal d'Este, at Rome, became his patron, and he died there 1581, aged 63. He wrote Historia Genuensium, 12 lib. fol. 1585—de Ratione Scribendæ Historiæ Elogia Clarorum Ligurum, 4to.—de Causis Magnitudinis Turcarum Imperii—Della Repubblica di Genoa, 8vo. &c.

FOHI, the first king of China, and the founder of the monarchy, about 20 years after the deluge. He removed the seat of empire from Xen Si, to Chin Cheu, and he invented instruments of music, and established proper laws respecting marriage, instead of the prevalent promiscuous intercourse of the sexes. It is said that he reigned 115 years, but fable is strongly in-fermixed with his history. His memory is still revered by the Chinese.

FOINARD, Frederic Maurice, a native of Conches in Normandy, who was eminent as a Hebrew scholar, and became vice-principal of the college of du Plessis. He published Breviarium Ecclesiasticarum, 2 vols. 8vo.—Genesis Explained, French and Latin, 2 vols. 12mo.—the Psalms in historical Order, &c. and died 1743.

FOIX, Mark Anthony, a jesuit, eminent as a preacher. He died provincial of the college of Billon, Auvergne, 1687, aged 60. He published the Art of Preaching—the Art of Educating a Prince, 12mo., &c.

FOIX, Odel de, lord of Lautrec, a French general of eminence. He was wounded under Lewis XII. at the battle of Ravenna, 1512, and appointed governor of Milan by Francis I. The success of Colonna, however, soon after drove him from Milan, Pavia, Lodi, Parma, and Placentia, and after the unfortunate battle of Bicoque he retired to Guienne, 1522. In 1528 he re-entered Italy, took Pavia, and boldly besieged Naples, before which he died. His body was conveyed to Spain, and 20 years after buried in the tomb of the great Gonsalvo of Cordova.

FOLARD, Charles, a French officer born at Avignon 1669. His military genius was roused by the reading of Cæsar's commentaries, and at the age of 16 he became a soldier. His father confined him in a monastery, but he escaped, and still more attached to the army, became aid-de-camp to Vendome, who commanded in Italy 1702, and intrusted him with part of his forces. He was honoured for his services with the cross of St. Louis, and had a pension of 400 livres settled on him. In 1705 he was wounded at the battle of Casano, and in consequence lost the use of his left hand. In 1706 he defended Modena against prince Eugene, by whom he was taken prisoner some time after the battle of Blenheim. In 1711 he was made governor of Bourbourg, in 1714 he assisted in the defence of Malta against the Turks, and afterwards went into the service of Charles XII. of Sweden. He accompanied him in his invasion of Norway, and was present at his death, at the siege of Frederickshall, 1718. On his return to France he served as colonel under the duke of Berwick, and afterwards applied himself to the study of the military art. He died at Avignon 1752, aged 83. He wrote some valuable commentaries on Polybius, in 6 vols. 4to. a book of new discoveries in war—a treatise Concerning the Defence of Places. Though not an accomplished writer, yet his publications show great knowledge of the military art.

FOLENGO, Theophilus, known by the assumed name of Merlin Coccaey, was of a noble family in Mantua. He fled from Bologna, and for some time was in the military profession, which he quitted for the society of the Benedictines in St. Euphemia monastery. He died 1544, aged 51, at the priory of St. Croce, Bassano. The best known of his works are "Opus Macaronicum," 1651, a popular work—Orlandino, 1526, and Chaos del Triperuno, two licentious poems—on the three Ages of Man, 1527,—le Humanita del Figlio di Dio, 1533.

FOLENGO, John Baptist, a Benedictine monk of Mantua, who died at Treviso, 1559, aged 69. He was author of Commentaries on the Epistles of St. James, St. Peter, and the first of John, 1555, 8vo.—a Commentary on the Psalms, 1557, folio, &c.

FOLKES, Martin, an English antiquary and philosopher, born at Westminster 1690. He was of the Royal Society, London, and became its president after sir Hans Sloane 1741. He contributed much to the philosophical transactions, and was a great connoisseur of old and modern coins. He died in London 1754. Boyer's anecdotes contain an ample account of him. He wrote a 4to. volume of English Silver Coin, from the Conquest to his own time.

FONCEMAGNE, Stephen Laurent de, a native of Orleans, who died at Paris 26th Sept. 1779, aged 83. He was first preceptor to the duke of Chartres, and is known for some memoirs in the academy of inscriptions, of which he was a member.

FONSECA, Anthony de, a Dominican of Lisbon, educated at Paris, where he published remarks on Cajetan's Commentaries on the Bible, 1539. He was preacher to the king, and theological professor at the university of Coimbra.

FONSECA, Peter, a Portuguese writer, author of a system of metaphysics in 4 vols. folio. He died 1559.

FONT, Joseph de la, a French comic writer, author of five comedies and some operas. He died 1725, aged 39, hurried to his grave by his intemperance and love of pleasure.

FONT, Pierre de la, a French divine, who died 1699. He wrote "Entretiens Ecclesiastiques," 5 vols. 12mo. and 4 vols. of sermons.

FONTAINE, John de la, a celebrated French poet, born at Chatcau-Thierry, 8th July 1621. After a liberal education he was admitted at 19 among the fathers of the oratory, whom he soon left, but he displayed no genius for poetry till the age of 22, when the accidental hearing of Malherbe's odes on the assassination of Henry roused his powers into a flame. He read with eagerness the best poets of Greece and Rome, of Italy, and of his country, and in the writings of Plato and Plutarch collected all that morality which has enriched and beautified his fables. He married to please his parents, but though he had shown such partialities to his wife as to intrust her in confidence with his compositions, he left her soon with indifference to follow his patroness the dutchess of Bouillon to Paris. Here he procured a pension, and became gentleman to Henrietta of England, after whose death he was received into the house of the witty Madam de la Sabliere, who jocosely observed in parting with her household, she kept only three animals, her dog, her cat, and her la Fontaine. In the company of this learned lady he continued about 20 years, not, however, without paying annually formal visits to his neglected wife, and upon the death of his patroness he refused the invitations of St. Evremond, and others, to come to settle in England. He was attacked by a severe illness in 1692, and then began to think of death and of religion, at the representation of the priest who attended him. The holy monitor reminded him that his tales had an evil tendency, and were frequently licentious, and hostile to good morals, and la Fontaine at last acknowledged the imputation, and promised amendment. Though not a libertine he was most indifferent to religious truths, and he informed the priest with great composure that he had the New Testament, which he thought a tolerable good book. He died 13th April, 1695, and it is said that he was found with a hair shirt on, a proof of sincere repentance according to some. In his character, la Fontaine was a very absent man, who, in the indulgence of his reveries and poetical ideas, would often say the most unbecoming things, and do the most incoherent actions. Meeting one day his son, without knowing him, he observed that he was a youth of parts and spirit, and when informed that it was his own son, he replied with unconcern, I am really glad of it. In the company of some wits and of some eminent ecclesiastics, he asked if St. Austin had more wit than Rabelais. One of the divines eyeing him from top to toe, answered only by observing, that "he had put on one of his stockings the wrong side outward," which was the case. In consequence of his great merit, it is said the intendant forbid taxes to be levied on his family, an honourable mark of respect paid to genius. He wrote besides "Tales,"—fables—comedies—Amours de Psyche, a romance—letters, &c. all of which possess great originality. Four vols. of his miscellanies appeared at Paris, 1744.

FONTAINE, Nicholas, son of a scrivener, admitted at the age of 20 among the society of Port Royal, where he had afterwards the superintendance of the pupils. In 1664 he was confined for four years in the bastille with Sacy, and at last finally settled at Melun, where he died 1709, aged 84. He wrote "Lives of the Saints of the Old Testament," 4 vols. 8vo.—Lives of Saints in General, 4 vols. 8vo.—the Figurative Language of the Bible, 4to.—Memoirs of the Solitaries of Port-Royal, 2 vols. 12mo. Chrysostom's Homilies on St. Paul's epistles, translated, 7 vols. 8vo. For private worth, for learning, and piety, and for indefatigable and patient industry, Fontaine not only equalled but surpassed his contemporaries.

FONTAINES, Peter Francis Guyot des, a French critic, born at Rouen 1685. He took the habit of a jesuit at 15, and quitted the society at 30. For some time a priest, he became a man of wit, and in 1724, he was intrusted by Bignon with the care of the "Journal des Scavans." The severity of his censures drew upon him the accusation of an abominable crime from his enemies, but, after some confinement, his character was cleared up and re-established. In 1731 he began the "Nouvelles du Parnasse, on Reflexions sur les Ouvrages Nouveaux," of which he wrote 2 vols. till the work was suppressed for the severity of its contents. In 1735, he began "Observations sur les Ecrits Modernes," which, after 33 vols. were completed, was also suppressed, 1743. The next year another periodical paper, "Jugemens sur les Ouvrages Nouveaux," was undertaken; but after 11 vols. had appeared, death stopped the labours of the critic, 1745. He published translations of Virgil and other classics, besides those of Pope, Swift, Fielding, and others.

FONTANA, Dominico, a Roman architect and mechanic, born at Milan, 1543. His chief work was the setting up of the obelisk, in front of St. Peter's, which had been buried for many years, and considered as an impracticable thing by all other mechanics. He was deservedly commended and rewarded for the bold and successful execution of this, and in 1592, he removed to Naples as an architect to the king, and died there greatly respected, 1607.

FONTANA, Prospero, a painter, born at Bologna, 1512. He was an able artist, and had among his pupils Ludovico and Annibal Caracci.

FONTANA, Lavinia, daughter of the preceding, died 1602, aged 50. She was eminent as a painter, and was patronised by pope Gregory XIII. whose picture she drew in a very superior style.

FONTANGES, Marie Angelique, dutchess of, successor to de Montespan in the good graces of Louis XIV. was beautiful as an angel, but silly as a goose, says abbé Chosi. She died in child bed, June 1681, aged only 20.

FONTANINI, Juste, archbishop of Ancyra, was born in the Frioul, and died at Rome, 1736. His chief works are Bibliotheca Della Eloquenza Italiana, 2 vols. 4to. 1753.—a Literary History of Aquileia, 1742—a collection of Bulls of Canonization from John XV. to Benedict XIII.

FONTE-MODERATA, a Venetian lady, whose real name was Modesta Pozzo. She was born at Venice 1555, and though placed at first in a monastery, she married, and after 20 years of conjugal happiness, died in child-bed 1592. Her memory was so retentive that she could repeat verbatim a discourse when only once heard. She wrote a poem called "il Floridoro," and another on the Passion and resurrection of Christ, besides "Dei Meriti Delle Donne," a prose work in which she maintains that the female sex is not inferior in understanding to the male.

FONTENAY, Peter Claude, a learned Jesuit, born at Paris. He was engaged to continue Longueval's History of the Gallian Church, and died 1742.

FONTENAY, John Baptiste Blain de, a French painter, disciple of Monoyer, born at Caen 1654. His fruits and flowers are very fine, and the insects on them have the appearance of real life. He was patronised by Louis XIV. who granted him a pension, and apartments in the Louvre. He died at Paris 1715.

FONTENELLE, Bernard le Bovier de, son of an advocate in the parliament of Rouen, by a sister of the great dramatic Corneille, was born at Rouen, 11th Feb. 1657. Though so weak at his birth that his surviving was unexpected, he attained the age of 100, never troubled with attacks of disease till his 90th year, when his eyes became dim and his hearing dull. He died Jan. 1757. He displayed early proofs of genius, and before he had reached his 20th year he had written a great part of his Bellerophon, a tragic opera. He did not, however, shine as a dramatic writer equal to his uncle Corneille, but in his other pieces he exhibits great powers, delicacy of wit, and profoundness of thought, so that Voltaire has truly observed that he was the most universal genius which the age of Louis XIV. produced. His "Plurality of Worlds" is a most fascinating performance, in which he introduces a lady conveying the sublimer truths of philosophy in a dialogue, pleasing, lively, and refined. In his office of secretary to the academy of sciences, in which he continued more 40 years, he devoted himself to the "History" of that learned body, and introduced elegance of language into the most abstruse parts of science. The "Eloges" delivered on deceased members are perused with particular attention and delight, and his apology for Des Cartes' virtues, though in favour of an exploded system, must be read with interest and admiration due to a great but mistaken genius. No man more than Fontenelle deserved and enjoyed the respect and confidence of his contemporaries. In his temper he was mild and affable, and with the feelings of a true Christian he observed that a man should be sparing in superfluities to himself, that he may supply necessities to others. Though originally poor, he acquired, by industry and commendable economy, an independent fortune; but not despising the rest of the world for his superiority of mental talents, and of riches, he said that men are foolish and wicked, but such as they are, we must live among them. He wrote besides the works already mentioned, Pastoral poems, 1688—History of the French Theatre to Corneille—Reflections on Theatrical Poetry, particularly Tragedy, a judicious and valuable work—Elements of Geometry—of Infinities, 1727—a tragedy, and six comedies—Endymion—Moral Discourses—the History of Oracles—Dialogues of the Dead, &c. His works have been published at Paris in 8 vols. 8vo. His Eloge was pronounced by Le Cat.

FONTENU, Lewis Francis de, a French writer, born at Lilledon, in Gatinois 1667. He was a great antiquarian, and contributed much to the Memoirs of the Academy of Inscriptions. A list of his works is preserved in Saxius' Onomasticon 1714. He died 1759, aged 92.

FONTIUS, Bartholomew, a historian of Florence, intimate with Picus Mirandola, and other learned men. He was librarian to Matthew Corvinus king of Hungary at Buda, and died 1513, aged 68. He wrote a commentary on Persius, and some orations.

FOOTE, Samuel, a dramatic writer, called the English Aristophanes, was born at Truro, Cornwall, 1722. His father was commissioner of the prize office, and member for Tiverton, and his mother inherited the paternal estates of her family by the unfortunate quarrel of her two brothers, Sir John Dinely Goodere, bart. and Sir Samuel Goodere, captain of the Ruby man of war, in which both unhappily fell. He was at Worcester college, Oxford, and then removed to the Temple, but the law was too dry and abstruse a pursuit for his volatile temper, and he therefore went on the stage. He appeared first in Othello, but his success in performing the character of other writers did not please him, and he commenced author and actor, in the Haymarket, where, in 1747, he first appeared before the public in "the Diversions of the Morning." This entertaining piece, at first opposed by the Westminster justices, as representing characters in real life, was altered to "Mr. Foote's giving Tea to his Friends," and thus for upwards of 40 mornings drew crowded and applauding audiences. The next year presented "An Auction of Pictures," which met with equal approbation, though it reflected on the popular characters of the day, on Sir Thomas de Veil the justice, Cock the Auctioneer, and Henley the orator. From 1752, to 1761, his success continued uninterrupted by the introduction of new pieces, and the versatility with which he himself represented various characters, and the little theatre, Hay-market, was now considered as the regular summer theatre, after the close of the other two. In 1766, he had the misfortune while at lord Mexborough's to break his leg by a fall from his horse, and to suffer an amputation, but the accident so interested the duke of York, who was present, that in consequence of his influence, a patent was obtained that year for the little theatre. In 1776, his attempt to introduce on the stage the dutchess of Kingston, a lady whose conduct was then much canvassed before the public, not only proved abortive, but brought upon him the malicious accusation of unnatural practices. Though acquitted of this foul charge, yet the blow he felt from the imputation weakened his constitution, and brought on a paralytic fit. He recovered, but the following year, as he proceeded to France by the advice of his physicians, he was taken ill and died a few hours after at Dover, 20th Oct. 1777. In his private character, Foote was respectable, and the wit and humour of his conversation were very powerful. Dr. Johnson, as Boswell relates, met him for the first time at Fitzherbert's. Having no good opinion of the fellow, says he, I was resolved not to be pleased, and it is very difficult to please a man against his will. I went on eating my dinner, pretty sullenly, affecting not to mind him, but the dog was so very comical, that I was obliged to lay down my knife and fork, throw myself back in my chair, and fairly laugh it out. Sir, he was irresistible. His dramas are 20 in number, mostly built on temporary topics, and full of personalities. He borrowed liberally from Moliere, but made all his own by his own peculiar powers of humour and originality. His works have been collected and published in 4 vols. 8vo. His life has been published with entertaining anecdotes by Mr. Cooke.

FOPPENS, John Francis, professor of divinity at Louvain, and archdeacon of Mechlin, edited Miræus's Opera historica Diplomatica, and compiled Bibliotheca Belgica, 2 vols. 4to. from the labours of learned Belgians, and other works, and died 1761, aged 72.

FORBES, Patrick, a Scotch prelate, of a noble family, born in Aberdeenshire 1564. He was educated at Aberdeen and St. Andrews, and being ordained presbyter at the age of 28, he was, in 1618, raised to the See of Aberdeen, much against his will, but at the pressing solicitations of king James. This great and good man died 1635, aged 71. His Commentary on the Revelations appeared, London, 1613. He was a great benefactor to Aberdeen university, of which he was chancellor, and he revived the professorship of law, physic, and divinity.

FORBES, John, son of the preceding, was made bishop of Aberdeen by king James. He was expelled from the divinity professorship at Aberdeen by the Covenanters, and after two years residence in Holland, he returned to his native country, and ended his days at his estate at Corse, 1648. He was a very learned man, as his theological and historical institutions fully evince. His works were published at Amsterdam, 2 vols. fol. 1703.

FORBES, William, bishop of Edinburgh, was born at Aberdeen 1585, and educated there. After studying at Leyden, and in the universities of Germany, he came to England, where he rejected the Hebrew professorship at Oxford, that he might re-establish his health by returning to the air of his native country. He was highly esteemed by his countrymen, and as his health would not permit his frequent preaching, he was appointed principal of the Marischal college, Aberdeen. On the foundation of the see of Edinburgh by Charles I. Dr. Forbes was honourably placed by the monarch to fill it, but he enjoyed his dignity only three months, and died 1634. He was a man of extensive learning, but was very moderate in his opinions, and pacific in his temper, as his treatise to diminish controversies, printed, London, 1658, and reprinted at Frankfort 1707, fully proves.

FORBES, Duncan, a Scotch judge, born at Culloden, 1685. He studied at Edinburgh, Utrecht, and Paris, and on his return to Scotland, 1710, practised as an advocate. In 1722, he was elected member for Invernesshire, and 1725 was made lord advocate. In 1742, he was raised to be lord president of the court of sessions, and, in the rebellion of 1745, he nobly opposed the Pretender, but the refusal of government to refund what he had lost by his liberal support of the royal cause, proved so disagreeable to his feelings, that it produced a fever, of which he died 1747, aged 62. He was a good Hebrew scholar, and wrote Thoughts on Religion,—a Letter to a bishop on Hutchinson's writings,—Reflections on Incredulity, 2 volumes, 12mo. 1750.

FORBES, JOHN, a brigadier general in the British army, and commander-in-chief of the forces employed in the expedition against fort Duquesne in 1758, was a native of Petincrief, Fifeshire, Scotland, and educated a physician. He left his profession, entered the army, and in 1745 was advanced to the rank of lieutenant colonel. He acted as quartermaster general of the army under the duke of Cumberland, and in 1757 was appointed brigadier general, and sent to America. In the expedition against fort Duquesne he was successful; the fort was abandoned on his approach, and he changed its name to that of Pitt, in compliment to the prime minister. After having concluded treaties with the Indian tribes on the Ohio, he returned to Philadelphia, and there died, March 13th, 1759, aged 49.  L.

FORBES, Eli, D.D. minister, was born at Westborough, Massachusetts, in 1726, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1751. He was settled in 1752 pastor of a church in Brookfield. In 1762 he went as a missionary to the Oneidas, among whom he established a church, and instituted a school. On his return he brought four Indian youths, whom after educating he sent back to instruct their nation. In 1776, being groundlessly suspected of toryism, he was dismissed from his charge in Brookfield, and soon after resettled at Gloucester, where he continued till his death in 1804.  L.

FORBIN, Claude Chevalier de, a French naval officer, born in 1656. He was early brought up to the sea service, and in 1686 became chief admiral to the king of Siam in the East Indies. He afterwards distinguished himself in Europe, on the coast of Spain, and in the service of Lewis XIV. The king was pleased with his valour, and the disinterestedness and generosity of his character, but though favoured by the prince, he was neglected by the ministers, and therefore he retired in discontent from the service, 1710. He died 1733, aged 77. His maxims to persons in the sea service were two, never to interfere with any thing not belonging to their employment, and to pay a blind obedience to the orders they received, however repugnant to their private opinions.

FORBISHER, Vid. FROBISHER.

FORBONNAIS, Francis Veron de, inspector general of the manufactures of France, was born at Mans, 2d October, 1722, and died at Paris at the end of 1800. He was well acquainted with commerce, and the real resources of a kingdom, and he published various intelligent tracts on subjects of finance, politics, and mercantile concerns.

FORCE, Charlotte Rose de Caumont de la, a French poetess, who died 1724, aged 70. Her Castle in Spain, a poem—her secret history of Burgundy, a romance—her tales, and other works, possess merit.

FORCE, James duke de la, son of Francis, lord of la Force, who, with his eldest son Arnaud, was murdered in his bed, on the fatal night of St. Bartholomew. He was then nine years old, and was between his father and his brother in the bed, but being unperceived by the assassins he escaped with his life, a circumstance which Voltaire has recorded in the 2d canto of his Henriade. He fought under Henry IV. and espoused the side of the protestants against Lewis XIII. especially at Montauban, 1621. He soon after made his peace with the king, upon which he was created marshal of France, a duke, lieutenant general of the army of Piedmont, besides a present of 200,000 crowns. He afterwards took Pignerol, and defeated the Spaniards at Carignan, 1630. He was afterwards engaged in the German wars, and took Spire, after raising the siege of Philippsburgh. He died full of years and of glory, 1652, aged 89.

FORD, John, a dramatic poet, in the reigns of James and Charles I. He was of the middle Temple, but the time of his death is unknown. He wrote 12 plays, published between 1629, and 1636.

FORDUN, John de, a Scotch historian, who flourished about 1377. He wrote a history of his country called Scoti-Chronicon, a curious but not accurate performance, published by Hearne, at Oxford, 5 vols. 8vo. and by Goodall, fol. Edinburgh.

FORDYCE, David, a learned Scotsman, born at Aberdeen, 1720, where he was educated, and where he became professor of moral philosophy in the Marischal college. He travelled through France and Italy, and other parts of Europe, and was drowned on his return, in a storm on the coast of Holland, 1751. He wrote Dialogues concerning Education, 2 vols. 8vo.—treatise of Moral Philosophy—Theodorus, a dialogue concerning the Art of Preaching—the Temple of Virtue, a dream, &c.

FORDYCE, James, a Scotch divine, brother to the above, born at Aberdeen, and educated there. He was minister of Brechin, and afterwards of Alloa, and in 1762 he removed to Monkwell-street, London, where he was assistant, and then successor to Dr. Lawrence. He afterwards settled in Hampshire, and died at Bath, 1796, in his 77th year. He is author of Sermons to young Women, 2 vols.—Address to young Men, 2 vols.—Addresses to the Deity—a sermon on the Eloquence of the Pulpit—poems—single sermons, &c.

FORDYCE, George, nephew of the preceding, was born near Aberdeen, and educated in that university, where at the age of 14 he took his degree of M.A. After some residence with his uncle, who was an apothecary and surgeon at Uppingham, Rutlandshire, he went to Edinburgh, and to Leyden, where he took his doctor's degree, 1758. He settled the following year in London, where he distinguished himself as a lecturer on the Materia Medica, and the practice of physic, and in 1770 he became physician to St. Thomas's hospital, and six years after a fellow of the Royal Society. He was in 1787 made a fellow of the college of physicians speciali gratia, an unusual honour, and he died 1802, aged 66. His works are essays on Fevers—on Digestion—Elements of the Practice of Physic—Elements of Agriculture and Vegetation, &c.

FORDYCE, Sir William, a Scotch physician of great repute, who died in London, 1792.

FOREIRO, Francis, a Dominican monk, born at Lisbon, and sent by the king of Portugal to the council of Trent, where he was, in consequence of his abilities, invited to draw up a general catechism. He published, with a commentary, a translation of Isaiah's prophecy, Venice, 1562, and died at Lisbon, 1581.

FOREST, Peter, or FORESTUS, a Dutch physician, born at Alemaer, 1522. He studied physic in Italy, and died medical professor at Leyden, 1597. The most known of his works is "Observations on Medicine," 6 vols. fol. Frankfort, 1623.

FOREST, John, a French landscape painter, born at Paris, where he died 1712, aged 76. He was painter to the French king, and in his manner imitated Titian, Giorgione, and the Bassans.

FOREST, or FORESTA, James Philip, known by the name of Philip Bergamo, the place of his birth, was an Augustine monk, and wrote a chronicle from Adam to the year 1503, a work not very valuable. He wrote a confessional, fol. Venice, 1487—and a treatise of Illustrious Women, fol. 1497, Ferrara.

FORMEY, John Henry Samuel, a native of Berlin, minister of the French church there, and afterwards professor of philosophy in the French college, and then secretary to the royal Berlin academy of sciences, and privy counsellor. He died 1797, aged 86. He was author of Abridgment of Ecclesiastical History—History of Philosophy abridged, both translated into English—Researches on the Elements of Matter—Considerations on Cicero's Tusculanum—the Christian Philosopher—Pensées Raisonnables—Anti-Emile against Rousseau, and other works, and he conducted, with Beausobre, the Bibliothèque Germanique.

FORMOSTS, bishop of Porto, near Rome, succeeded Stephen V. as pope, 891. He was very unpopular in his government, and after death his body was dragged from his grave by the populace, and thrown into the Tiber.

FORSKAL, Peter, a Swedish naturalist, who studied at Gottingen and at Upsal under Linnæus. He went in 1761 with Niebuhr to Arabia, and died there at Jerim, 1763, aged 27. He was author of Thoughts on Civil Liberty, 1759, and from his papers Niebuhr published Icones Rerum Naturalium quas in Itinere Orientali depingit curavit Forskal, 4to.—Descriptiones Animalium et Equarum, &c. 4to.—Flora Ægyptiaco-Arabica, 4to.

FORSTER, John, a protestant Hebraist of Wittemberg, born at Augsburg, 1495. He was the friend of Luther, Reuchlin, and Melancthon, and died 1556. He published a Hebrew Lexicon, 1564, folio, Basle. Another person of the same name published Commentaries on Isaiah, and other works.

FORSTER, George, an ingenious naturalist, who accompanied Cook in his second voyage round the world. He was professor in the university of Cassel, and afterwards at Wilna and Mayence. He next visited Paris, to enable himself to travel to Thibet, but died in the midst of his preparations, 1792, aged 39. He was then representative of Mentz in the national assembly. He wrote a tract on the English Constitution—a Journal of Cook's second voyage, 2 vols. 4to. which he defended against Wales—a Philosophical Journey along the Rhine, 2 vols. 8vo.—a Journey through England, 1790.

FORSTER, Dr. John Reinold, father to the above, studied at Halle, and was minister at Dantzic, and after being some time in Russia he came to England, and was tutor in German and French in Warrington academy. He accompanied Cook in his second voyage, and after his return in 1775, he was created LL.D. by the university of Oxford. He lost his public character in England for publishing, contrary to agreement, an account of the plants discovered in his voyage, in consequence of which he left the country for Germany. He died at Halle, in Saxony, 1799. He is author of Observations made round the World—History of Discoveries in the North—treatises on the Byssus of the Ancients, and other valuable tracts on natural history.

FORSTER, Nathaniel, a native of Plymouth, Devonshire, educated at Plymouth and Eton school, and afterwards at Corpus Christi, Oxford, where he became fellow. He obtained Hethe rectory, Oxfordshire, and in 1750 was chaplain to Butler, of Durham, who made him his executor. He was in 1752 chaplain to Herring, the primate, and two years after obtained a prebend in Bristol cathedral, and Rochdale vicarage, Lancashire. In 1756 he was chaplain to the king, and then preacher to the Rolls. He died 1757, aged 40. He published Platonis Dialogi quinque, &c. 1745—Reflections on the Antiquity of Egypt—Appendix Liviana, 1746—Popery destructive of the Evidence of Christianity, a sermon—Dissertation on Josephus's Account of our Saviour—Biblia Hebraica, sine Punctis, 4to.—on the Marriage of Minors, 8vo. &c.

FIRSTNER, Christopher, an Austrian lawyer, who died 1667, aged 69. After travelling in Italy he was engaged in the negotiations of the peace of Munster, and for his services he was made a member of the Aulic council. He wrote De Principatu Tiberii Notæ Politicæ ad Tacitum—collection of his letters on the peace of Munster—Hypomnemata-Politica, &c.

FORT, Francis le, a native of Geneva, who, from military zeal, served in Holland at the age of 16, and afterwards entered into the army of Peter I. of Russia. He gained the favour of that prince, and was intrusted in 1696 with the siege of Azof, and in this arduous affair he displayed such abilities, that the emperor made him commander of his forces and his prime minister. The resources of his great genius were employed in new modelling the army, and improving the affairs of his imperial patron. He died at Moscow, 1699, and the Czar, afflicted for his loss, paid the last honours to his remains with the most magnificent obsequies.

FORTESCUE, Sir John, an English lawyer, born of an ancient family at Wear Gifford, in Devonshire. He was, according to Tanner, educated at Exeter college, Oxford, from whence he removed to Lincoln's Inn. In 1441 he was made king's sergeant at law, and the next year chief justice of the king's bench. His integrity, wisdom, and firmness recommended him to Henry VI. by whom his salary was raised; but his attachment to the house of Lancaster proved the source of persecution. In the first parliament of Edward IV. he was attainted of high treason, and he followed his exiled master into Scotland, where he was nominated chancellor of England. He embarked for Holland in 1463 with queen Margaret, and continued several years in exile in Lorraine. In this foreign country he employed himself in the composition of his book "De Laudibus Legum Angliæ," written for the instruction of young prince Edward; but not published till the reign of Henry VIII. He afterwards accompanied the queen back to England; but their affairs became more desperate, and with greater love of ease, perhaps than attachment to his master, he reconciled himself to the reigning monarch by writing an apology for his own conduct, and passed the rest of his life in retirement and solitude. The year of his death is unknown, though he lived to nearly his 90th year, and was buried in the church of Ebrington, Gloucestershire, where, in 1677, one of his descendants repaired his monument. He wrote besides, "the Difference between an absolute and limited monarchy, &c." published by J. Fortescue Aland, 1714, besides other works remaining in MS. The best edition of his book "De Laudibus" is that of 1741. His character was very respectable for piety, learning, and benevolence, and, as attached to his country, none deserves a better name.

FORTIGUERRA, Nicolas, an Italian prelate and poet, born 1674. He was made a bishop by Clement XI. but he was so often disappointed by Clement XII. who, as the patron of poets, had promised him a cardinal's hat, that he fell ill in consequence, and died 1735, aged 61. He wrote "Ricciardetto," a burlesque poem in thirty cantos, in a short time, to prove to some of his friends the ease with which he could write in the manner of Ariosto. This poem, though very faulty, exhibits sallies of pleasantry and strokes of genius. It has been translated into French by du Mourrier. Fortiguerra translated Terence into Italian 1736.

FORTIUS, or FORTIS, Joachim, a teacher of Greek and of mathematics at Antwerp, intimate with Erasmus, and other learned men. He died 1536. He wrote "De Ratione Studendi," and other works.

FOSCARI, Francis, a noble Venetian, elected doge 1423. He enlarged the Venetian dominions by the conquest of Brescia and Bergamo, and the towns of Crema and Ravenna, and other places; but these victories cost so dear that the Venetians loudly murmured, and deposed their unfortunate leader. His son shared also his disgrace, and was banished, under false accusations, and the wretched father died two days after his deposition, 1457, aged 84. The son also soon after died in prison, upon the false charge of murdering a senator.

FOSCARINI, Michael, a Venetian senator and historian. He continued Nani's history of Venice, at the public request, and died 1692, aged 64. His work was printed 1692, 4to. and makes the 10th vol. of Venetian historians. He also wrote novels.

FOSSE, Charles de la, a French painter, pupil to Le Brun, born at Paris 1640. He studied in Italy, and at his return he painted the dome of the hotel of Invalids. Lewis XIV. gave him a pension of 1000 crowns, and he became professor and rector of the academy for painting. He was for some time engaged in adorning the duke of Montague's house, now the British museum in London, and received a handsome offer from king William, who admired his genius, and wished him to settle in England; but he declined. He died at Paris 1716.

FOSSE, Anthony de la, nephew to the above, was born at Paris 1658. He was lord of Aubigny, by the purchase of the estate which bears that title, and he was secretary to the marquis de Crequi. When his patron was killed at the battle of Luzara, he brought back his heart to Paris, and celebrated his fall in poetry. He was afterwards in the service of the duke d'Aumont, but he distinguished himself chiefly by his tragedies. His Manlius, which is his best play, is considered by the French as equal to the tragedies of Corneille; but he is less known than he deserves. This amiable poet died in the retirement and modest solitude which he loved, 1708, aged 50.

FOSTER, Samuel, an English mathematician, born in Northamptonshire, and educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he took his degree of M.A. 1623. He was elected in 1636, to the professorship of astronomy in Gresham college, which he resigned the same year, and to which he was again elected in 1641. During the civil wars he formed one of that society of learned men who united for philosophical purposes, and were afterwards incorporated under the name of the Royal Society by Charles II. He not only applied himself to astronomy, and to curious and intelligent observations on eclipses and on celestial bodies, but he constructed and improved with great ingenuity, several mathematical and astronomical instruments. He died at Gresham college, of a decline, 1652. The chief of his works are "the Art of Dialling," 4to. 1638—four treatises of Dialling, 4to. 1654—Miscellanies or Mathematical Lucubrations—descriptions of several Instruments invented and improved. There were two other mathematicians of the name of Foster in the same century; William, a disciple of Oughtred, and author of the Circles of Proportion, and the Horizontal Instrument, 1633, 4to. and Mark, who published a treatise of Trigonometry.

FOSTER, James, a dissenting minister, born 16th Sept. 1697, at Exeter, at the grammar school and in an academy of which place he was educated. With great abilities, a sound judgment, and a ready elocution, he began to preach 1718, but the warm disputes which prevailed in the west of England, and especially Exeter about the trinity, rendered his situation in Devonshire unpleasant, and he removed to Melbourne, Somersetshire, and soon after to Ashwick. He published in 1720 his "Essay on Fundamentals," and his sermon "on the Resurrection of Christ;" but his finances were so low, and his hopes of improving his income so uncertain, that he almost determined to learn the trade of glover from Mr. Norman, in whose house he lived at Trowbridge in Wilts, after his removal from Somersetshire. He was, however, soon after received as chaplain in the family of Rob. Houlton, Esq. and in 1724, he was chosen to succeed, at Barbican, Dr. Gale, a person by whose book on adult immersion, he had been persuaded to be baptized. In 1731, he published his Defence of the Usefulness, Truth, &c. of Christian Revelation against Trindal, and in 1744, after 20 years' service at Barbican, he was chosen pastor of the independents at Pinners hall, and in 1748, received the degree of D.D. from the university of Aberdeen. He attended lord Kilmarnock after his trial in 1746, and died in consequence of a paralytic stroke, 5th Nov. 1753. His character for humanity and benevolence of heart was equal to his learning, popular as a preacher, and liberal in his religious sentiments. He wrote besides the above, "Tracts on Heresy," in a controversy with Dr. Stebbing—4 vols. of sermons, 8vo.—2 vols. of Discourses on Natural Religion, and Social Virtue, 4to. Bolingbroke attributes to him that false aphorism, "that where mystery begins religion ends." Pope has mentioned him with commendation in the preface to his satires.

FOSTER, John, an elegant scholar, born at Windsor 1731, and educated at Eton college, where under the able tuition of Plumtree and Rurton, he distinguished himself as a superior proficient in the Greek and Hebrew languages. In 1748, he was elected to King's college, Cambridge, and afterwards became assistant to Dr. Barnard, whom he succeeded in 1765, in the mastership of Eton college. But though eminent in learning, and great in mental powers, he was deficient in manners, in temper, and in a perfect knowledge of the world, which are so necessary for such a situation, and which were possessed in a high degree by his predecessor Barnard, so that his authority became unpopular, and he at last resigned. His merits, however, were rewarded by a canony at Windsor in 1772, but his infirmities were increasing so rapidly, that he did not enjoy his honours long. He went to the German Spa for the recovery of his health, and died there Sept. 1773. His remains were afterwards brought over to England, and buried at Windsor near those of his father who had been mayor of the town, and over his tomb is an elegant Latin inscription written by himself. He wrote besides a prize dissertation on the doctrines of Epicurus, and the Stoics, Cambridge—an Essay on the Different Nature of Accents and Quantity, with their Use and Application in the Pronunciation of the English, Latin, and Greek Tongues, with the Defence of the Greek Accentual Marks, against Js. Vossius, Sarpedonius, Dr. Galy, &c. 8vo. 1762. It is a curious and valuable performance.

FOSTER, Michael, a learned judge, born at Marlborough, Wilts. He was educated at Marlborough school, and Exeter College, Oxford, and in 1707, entered at the Middle Temple. In 1737, he was elected recorder of Bristol, and in 1745, he was made one of the justices of the king's bench, and then knighted. He died 1765, aged 74. He published an Examination of the Scheme of Church Power, laid down in bishop Gibson's Codex, 1735—Report of some Proceedings on the Commission for the Trial of Rebels in 1746, in the county of Surrey, 1762.

FOSTER, Jedediah, judge of the superior court of Massachusetts, was born at Andover in 1726, and was graduated in 1744, at Harvard College. He established himself at Brookfield, where highly respected for his talents and integrity, he enjoyed a number of civil and military offices. He took his seat on the bench of the superior court in 1776. He was a distinguished member of the body which formed the constitution of Massachusetts, and died during its session 17th October, 1779.

FOTHERGILL, George, D. D. eldest of seven sons, was born the last day of the year 1705, at Lockholme, Westmoreland, of an ancient family. He was educated there, and at Kendal school, and then removed to Queen's college, Oxford, where he became fellow and tutor. In 1751, he was made head of St. Edmund hall, and vicar of Bramley, Hampshire. He died of an asthma, 5th Oct. 1760, and was buried in the chapel of his hall. He was author of 2 vols. of sermons.

FOTHERGILL, John, an eminent physician, born 8th March, 1712, at Carr-end, Yorkshire, of respectable quakers. He was educated at Sedburgh school, Yorkshire, and in 1718, bound apprentice to an apothecary at Bradford. In 1736, he removed to London, and studied two years under Wilmot at St. Thomas's hospital, and then went to Edinburgh, where he took his doctor's degree. He afterwards visited Leyden, and travelled through France and Germany, and 1740 settled in London. He was a licentiate of the college of physicians, London, and fellow of Edinburgh, and of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies. He continued to rise in fame and practice, so that his business brought him little less than 7000*l.* per ann. and enabled him to accumulate a property of 80,000*l.* He died of an obstruction in the bladder, at his house in Harpurstreet, 26th Dec. 1780, and his remains were interred in the quakers' burying ground, Winchmore hill. Besides his medical engagements, he devoted much of his time to natural history, and made a collection of shells and other natural curiosities, which were sold after his death, to Dr. Hunter, for 1200*l.* He formed an excellent botanical garden, at his house at Upton in Essex, and he liberally endowed a seminary of young quakers at Acworth near Leeds, for the education and clothing of above 300 children. He published some tracts, the best of which is "on the Ulcerous Sore Throat," and was a great patron of learned men. He assisted Sydney Parkinson in his account of his South Sea voyage, and at the expense of 2000*l.* printed a translation of the Bible, from the Hebrew and Greek original, by Anthony Purver the quaker, 2 vols. fol. 1764, and in 1780 published Percy's Key to the New Testament, for the use of his seminary. His books were sold by auction in 1781, and his portraits and prints were bought for 200 guineas by Mr. Thane.

FOTHERGILL, Samuel, brother to the preceding, was eminent as a preacher among the quakers. He travelled over England, Scotland, Ireland, and North America to propagate his doctrines, and died 1773, much respected for his private character.

FOUCAULT, Nicolas Joseph, an antiquary born at Paris, 1643. He was intendant in Normandy, and within six miles of Caen, he discovered, in 1704, the ancient town of the Viducassians, of which he published an interesting account, with the history of the marbles, coins, inscriptions, &c. found there. He discovered in the abbey of Moissac de Querci a MS. of Lactantius de Mortibus Persecutorum, afterwards published by Baluze. He died 1721, respected for his erudition, his mildness of manners, and his benevolence.

FOUCHER, SIMON, a native of Dijon, who died at Paris, 1696, aged 52. He was author of a treatise on Hygrometers—on the Wisdom of the Ancients—Letters on the History and Principles of the Academic Philosophy, 6 vols. &c.

FOUCHIER, Bertram de, a dutch painter of Bergen-op-Zoom, disciple to Vandyck. He studied the manner of Tintoretto at Rome, and adopted at his return home the style of Brouwer. His portraits and conversations are much admired. He died 1674, aged 65.

FOUCQUET, Nicolas, marquis of Belle-Isle, was born 1615, and for his talents was early advanced in the state. He was at the age of 35 procurator-general of the parliament of Paris, and at 38, superintendent of the finances. His speculation and extravagance, however, were little calculated to repair the mismanagement of Mazarin, and when he had spent above 150,000*l.* of the public money in adorning his seat at Vaux, and attempted to rival his master in the affection of la Valliere, his ruin was complete. He was arrested in 1661, and condemned to perpetual banishment, exchanged afterwards for imprisonment. He died March, 1680, aged 65, in the citadel of Pignerol.

FOUCQUET, Charles Lewis Augustus, grandson of the preceding, better known by the name of mareschal Bellisle, was born 1684. He entered early into the army and distinguished himself at the siege of Lisle, for which Lewis XIV. promised him his favour and protection. After that monarch's death, he shared the disgrace of the minister le Blanc, and was confined in the Bastille, till his modest justification recommended him to the court, and paved his way to promotion and honour. He was commander in Flanders in the war of 1733, and became the adviser and confidential friend of cardinal Fleury. In 1741 he was created mareschal of France, and in 1742 he assisted at Frankfort at the election of the emperor Charles VII. where his influence was equal to his great magnificence. Afterwards being deserted by the Prussians and Saxons, he effected his escape with great difficulty from Prague, but with sagacious dexterity, so that he was created by the emperor member of the Golden Fleece, and a prince of the empire. He was taken prisoner in 1743 at Elbingerode, near Hanover, and brought over to England. He afterwards served against the Austrians in Provence, and was made peer of France 1748. He was made prime minister 1757, and died four years after, a sacrifice to his zeal in the service of his country, and his anxiety to restore her finances and commerce to a prosperous course. He died Jan. 1761, aged 77. He was a great character, respected in private life, and much attached to the glory of his country. He was a patron of merit, and free from blame, except in his criminal partiality for the fair sex. His only son, born of a second wife, was killed in battle, 1758.

FOUGEROUX, Augustus Denys, an eminent writer, born at Paris, 10th Oct. 1732. He was nephew of Duhamel, and with him he examined with a philosophic eye the quarries of Anjou, Brittany, Naples, &c. and every where made judicious and valuable observations on the various productions of the natural kingdom. He died of an apoplexy, 28th Dec. 1789. He wrote Memoir on the formation of Boue—l'Art de l'Ardoisier—l'Art du Tonnellier—l'Art de Travailler les Cuirs Dorés, &c.

FOUILLON, James, an ecclesiastic, born at Rochelle, and though educated among the jesuits, a favourer of the Jansenists. He edited Arnauld's Letters, and had a share in the History of the Case of Conscience, 8 vols. 1705—and in the Hexaples against the Bull Unigenitus, 7 vols. &c.

FOULON, William, in Latin Gnapheus, was born at the Hague, where he kept a school. He wrote three Latin comedies, Martyrium Johannis Pistorii—Hypocrysis et Acolastus de Filio Prodigio, the most admired, edited with learned notes by Præteolus at Paris, 1554. He died at Horden in Friesland, where he was burgomaster, 1558, aged 75.

FOULON, John, author of a Commentary on the Maccabees—Historia Leodiensis, 3 vols. folio, &c. was a jesuit of Liege who died 1668.

FOULON, N. a French politician, who advised the government to recover its credit by a general bankruptcy. He was placed over the finances at the beginning of the revolution, but in the midst of the general confusion he became one of its first victims. He in vain attempted to conceal himself, when discovered 22d July, 1789, he was dragged with the greatest insult, and in the most excruciating manner to Paris, where he was hanged amidst the acclamations of a rejoicing and ferocious populace.

FOUNTAIN, Sir Andrew, an antiquarian, born at Narford, Norfolk, and educated at Christ church, Oxford. He studied here the Anglo-Saxon language, and published a specimen of his great proficiency in his instructor Hickeys' Thesaurus, under the title of Numismata Anglo-Saxonica and Anglo-Danica, breviter Illustrata ab Andrea Fountaine, eq. aur. and ædis Christi Oxon. Alumno, 1705. He was knighted by king William, and afterwards travelled through Europe in making a collection of valuable pictures, medals, statues, and inscriptions. He was the intimate friend and correspondent of Swift, and he embellished his Tale of the Tub, with excellent designs. Sir Andrew, as a masterly connoisseur of medals and antiques, improved his property greatly by collecting for some of the largest cabinets in the kingdom. He was vice-chamberlain to Caroline, when princess of Wales, and queen, and in 1727 was made warden of the mint, an office which he held till his death, 4th Sept. 1753. He was buried at Narford; a portrait of him by Hoare is preserved at Wilton-house. He is mentioned with great applause by Montfaucon.

FOUQUIER-TINVILLE, Anthony Quentin, a Frenchman of infamous memory, born at Herouan, near St. Quentin. From a bankrupt, he became the friend of Robespierre, and so sanguinary was his conduct, and so ferocious his principles, that he was deemed by the tyrant worthy to be the public accuser. In this office he displayed the most bloody and vindictive character. The young, the aged, the innocent, were hurried with insulting indifference to the scaffold, and in one instance, in four hours, 80 individuals were devoted to immediate death. When one of the jailers observed that a person brought up before the tribunal was not the accused, Fouquier observed with unconcern, that one was as good as the other, and the unhappy victim marched to the guillotine. On another occasion, under a similar mistake, he exclaimed, it matters little, to-day is as good as to-morrow, and the wretched prisoner suffered death. The fall of Robespierre checked not the hand of this monster; on the day of the tyrant's arrest, he observed, on signing the condemnation of 42 persons, that justice must have her course. At last punishment came though late, the vindictive Fouquier appeared before that tribunal where he had exercised such bloody tyranny, and on the 7th May, 1794, he was guillotined, aged 48, and universally execrated.

FOUQUIERES, James, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp, 1580. He was the disciple of Velvet Breughel, and painted for Rubens. He worked for the elector palatine at Heidelberg, and went to Paris, where he died poor through imprudence, 1659. His landscapes are so finely finished as to be scarce inferior to Titian's.

FOUR, du. Vid. LONGUERUE.

FOURCROI, N. an eminent French engineer, who planned the junction of the rivers Scheldt, Moselle, Sambre, Oise, Rhine, and Meuse, by means of canals. He published some valuable tracts, and died 12th Jan. 1791, aged 76.

FOURCROY, Anthony Francis, a French chymist, was born at Paris, June 15th, 1755. He studied at the college of Harcourt, after which he applied to medicine, and the sciences connected with it. In 1776 he published a translation of Ramazzini, "On the Diseases of Artisans;" and in 1780, received the degree of doctor in physic. In 1784, he was appointed professor of chymistry in the royal gardens, and the year following, was admitted into the academy of sciences. He bore a part in the revolution, and was elected a member of the national convention: though he did not take his seat till after the murder of the king. In 1794, he became a member of the committee of public safety, and was consulted on several subjects of importance. On the foundation of the institute he was nominated professor of chymistry. He died December 16th, 1809. His works are—1. Leçons elementaires d'histoire naturelle et de chimie, 5 vols. 8vo. 2. Memoires et observations pour servir de suite aux Elemens de Chimie, 8vo. 3. Principes de Chimie à l'usage de l'École Veterinaire, 2 vols. 12mo. 4. L'Art de connoitre et d'employer les medicamens dans les maladies qui attaquent le corps humain, 2 vols. 8vo. 5. Annales de Chimie, 18 vols. 8vo. 6. La Medicine eclairee par les Sciences Physiques, 12 vols. 7. Philosophie Chimique. 8. Tableaux pour servir de resume aux leçons de Chimie, faites à l'École de Medicine de Paris. 9. Système des Connoissances Chimiques, 10 vols. 8vo. &c.—W. B.

FOURMONT, Stephen, professor of Arabic and Chinese at Paris, was born at Herbelai near that city, 1683. He devoted himself with unusual application to study, and had so retentive a memory, that the most difficult passages became familiar to him. He was so well known as a man of erudition, that once or twice a week, conferences were held at his house, on literary subjects, by learned Frenchmen and foreigners. He was liberally invited by count de Toledo, to settle in Spain, which he declined. He succeeded Galland in 1715, as Arabic professor, and was admitted into the learned societies of Paris, Berlin, and London, and was afterwards secretary to the Duke of Orleans his friend and patron. He died 1743. His works are "the Roots of the Latin Tongue in Metre,"—Critical Reflections on Ancient History, to the time of Cyrus, 2 vols. 4to.—Meditationes Sinicæ, folio—Chinese Grammar in Latin, folio—Dissertation in the Memoirs of the Academy of Inscriptions.

FOURMONT, Michael, brother to the above, was an ecclesiastic and professor of Syriac in the Royal college, and member of the Academy of Inscriptions. He died 1746.

FOURNIER, Peter Simon, a French engraver and letter-founder, born at Paris, 1712. In 1737, he published a table of proportions to be observed between letters, to determine their height. He wrote also dissertations on the rise and progress of the typographical art, published since in 1 vol. 8vo. divided into three parts. His great work is "Manuel Typographique utile aux Gens de Lettres, et à ceux qui exercent les Differentes Parties de l'Art de l'Imprimerie, 8vo. 2 vols. This excellent character, who had done so much for his profession, died 1768.

FOURNY, Honoré Caille du, a learned Frenchman, who assisted pere Anselme in his second edition of Histoire Genealogique et Chronologique de la Maison de France et des Grands Officiers de la Couronne, 1712, since continued to 9 vols. fol. He was auditor of the Paris chamber of accounts, and died 1731.

FOURQUEVAUX, Raymond of Pavia, baron of, an Italian, of the family of Beccari in Pavia, who came to France in the wars of the Guelphs and Gibbelines, and signalized himself in the defence of Toulouse against the Huguenots in 1562. He was for his services made governor of Narbonne, where he died, 1574, aged 66. He wrote the lives of 14 great French generals, 4to. Paris, 1543, much esteemed.

FOWLER, John, an English printer, born at Bristol, and educated at Winchester and New-college, Oxford, of which he became fellow 1555. He resigned in 1559; and went to Antwerp and Louvain, where he learned printing, and employed his talents for the papists against the protestants. He was, according to Wood, a learned man, well skilled in Greek and Latin, a poet and orator, and a judicious critic. He wrote, as well as printed books in favour of his religion. He died at Newmark in Germany, 1578.

FOWLER, Christophe, a puritan of some eminence, born at Marlborough, 1611, and educated at Magdalen-college, and Edmund-hall, Oxford. He took orders, but in 1641, declared himself a presbyterian, and drew crowds after him by the oddity of his gestures and the violence of his appeals in the pulpit. He afterwards was vicar of St. Mary's, Reading, and then fellow of Eton, and an able assistant to the Berkshire commissioners in the ejection of what then were called ignorant and insufficient ministers. At the restoration he was ejected from his preferments, and died 1676, considered as little better than distracted. His writings are not worth mentioning.

FOWLER, Edward, an English prelate, born 1632, at Westerleigh, Gloucestershire, where his father was minister. He was educated at the college school, Gloucester, and removed to Corpus Christi college, Oxford. As he had been brought up among the puritans, he at first objected to conformity with the church, but became afterwards one of its greatest ornaments. As he was an able preacher he was made by the primate, Sheldon, rector of All-Hallows, Bread-street, 1673, and two years after he became prebendary at Gloucester, and in 1681, vicar of St. Giles, Cripplegate, when he took his degree of D.D. He was an able defender of protestantism, and appears as the second of the London clergy, who refused to read king James's declaration for liberty of conscience, in 1688. He was rewarded for his eminent services in the cause of religion, and in the promotion of the revolution, by being made, in 1691, bishop of Gloucester. He died at Chelsea, 1714, aged 82. He was twice married, and by his first wife had several children. He wrote sermons and various pieces on divinity, the most known and useful of which is his "Design of Christianity," often printed, and defended by the author against Bunyan, the writer of the Pilgrim's Progress.

FOWLER, Thomas, a physician, was born at York in 1736. He commenced business as an apothecary in his native city in 1760; but in 1774, he went to Edinburgh, and graduated there in 1778. After this he settled at Stafford, as physician to the infirmary; but in 1791 he returned to York. He died in 1801. His works are—1. Medical Reports on the Effects of Tobacco, 1785. 2. Medical Reports on the Effects of Arsenic, 8vo. 3. Medical Reports on the Acute and Chronic Rheumatism.—W. B.

Fox, Edward, an English prelate and statesman, born at Dursley, Gloucestershire, and educated at Eton, and King's college, Cambridge, of which he became provost 1528. His abilities recommended him to the notice of Wolsey, by whom he was engaged as an ambassador to Rome with Gardiner, to promote the divorce of the king from Catharine of Arragon. He was afterwards sent on embassies to France and Germany, and in 1535 raised to the see of Hereford. He was an active promoter of the reformation, and if inferior to Cranmer in abilities, he was his superior in dexterity. When in Germany he zealously invited the protestant divines to unite themselves to the doctrines of the church of England. He died in London 1538. He wrote in the midst of his political engagements, a book called de Verâ Differentiâ Regiæ Protestatis et Ecclesiasticæ et quæ sit ipsa Veritas, et Virtus utriusque, 1534; translated into English by lord Strafford. His maxims were, that "an honourable peace lasts long, but a dishonourable peace no longer than till kings have power to break it; the surest way therefore to peace is a constant preparedness for war," and "two things must support a government, gold and iron,—gold to reward its friends, and iron to keep under its enemies."

Fox, John, an English divine, and ecclesiastical historian, born at Boston, Lincolnshire 1517. He was entered at Brazen-nose college, Oxford, and afterwards chosen fellow of Magdalen, and in 1543, he became M.A. In his younger years he displayed poetical genius in the publication of some Latin plays on Scriptural subjects, but he afterwards turned all his thoughts to divinity, and to the reformation which now engaged the attention of Europe. To acquire the judgment and information necessary on such important points, he read with great care the Greek and Latin fathers, studied Hebrew, and perused every work from which he could reap information; but his seclusion, and his frequent absence from public worship, alarmed his friends and encouraged his enemies. He was therefore accused of heresy in 1545, and with difficulty escaped with his life by expulsion from college. In his distress, and abandoned by his father-in-law, he was generously received in the house of Sir Thomas Lucy of Warwickshire, to whose children he became tutor. He afterwards married a person of Coventry, and after residing there some time, he came to London, still exposed to the privations of a narrow income. His wants, however, says his son, were relieved by an unknown stranger, who gave him an untold sum of money, and bade him hope for better times, which in three days arrived by his being admitted into the service of the dutches of Richmond, and made tutor to her nephew lord Surrey's children. He lived at Ryegate under the kind protection of this noble family, and though the persecuting Gardiner, in the bloody reign of Mary, plotted his ruin, he remained for some time unhurt by the influence and the dexterity of his worthy pupil, now duke of Norfolk. At last, he escaped from the pursuit of the artful prelate to the continent with his wife, and passing through Antwerp and Frankfort, he settled at Basil, and there maintained himself by correcting the press for the famous printer Oporinus. Here he formed the plan of his great work, and at the end of Mary's reign returned to England, where he was received with all the respect due to his merits. His pupil, the duke of Norfolk, settled a pension on him, and Cecil obtained for him a prebend in the church of Salisbury, but though he might have risen high in preferment by the interest of his friends Walsingham, Drake, Gresham, Grindal, Pilkington, &c. he refused to subscribe to some of the canons, and when urged by Parker the primate, he produced a Greek Testament, adding, to this only will I subscribe. This worthy man, so much and so deservedly respected, was greatly afflicted at the ejection of his son from Magdalen college by the puritans; but while he exhibited the most perfect moderation in his religious sentiments, he dreaded the evils which party and dissension might bring upon the church. He died 1587, aged 70, and was buried in the church of St. Giles, Cripplegate, of which for some time he had been vicar. He left two sons, Samuel, afterwards fellow of Magdalen college, Oxford, and author of his father's life, and Thomas, fellow of King's college, Cambridge, and physician in London. Fox is deservedly celebrated as the author of the history of the acts and monuments of the church, called "Book of Martyrs," published in London 1563, in one volume folio, and afterwards improved and enlarged, and published in a ninth edition 1684, in 3 vols. fol. This work was highly valued by the protestants, while the papists abused it under the name of Fox's golden legend. That Fox is occasionally intemperate and abusive cannot be denied, but though Jeremy Collier accuses him of disingenuity and ill-nature, he is still to be read with interest, as he is accurate, minute, and generally impartial.

Fox, George, the first preacher of the sect called quakers, was born at Drayton in the Clay, Leicestershire, 1624. He was bound by his father, who was a weaver, to a shoemaker and grazier, and the occupation of his youth was chiefly the tending of sheep. He did not however follow the professions in which he had been engaged, as, in 1643, he began his wandering life, and after retiring to solitude, and at other times frequenting the company of religious and devout persons, he became a public preacher in 1647 or 1648. He inveighed, with sullen bitterness, against the drunkenness, the injustice, and the vices of the times, he attacked the clergy, and the established modes of worship, and asserted that the light of Christ, implanted in the human heart, was alone the means of salvation and the right qualification of the gospel ministry. Such doctrines produced persecution, he was imprisoned at Nottingham in 1649, and during the whole course of his laborious life, he suffered the same treatment eight times more, and often with great severity. He married in 1669, Margaret the widow of Thomas Fell, a Welsh judge, who was nine years older than himself, but as she had to attend to a family, by her former husband, and as his avocations were of a spiritual kind, and in distant countries, they did not long live together. In his pious zeal, Fox visited not only England, Ireland, and Scotland, but he extended his travels to Holland and Germany, to the American colonies, and the West-India Islands, recommending in his life and conduct the merits of a meek, devout, and inoffensive character. He died in London 1690. Though illiterate he wrote much. His journal was printed 1694, his epistles 1698, his doctrinal pieces, about 150 in number, 1706. The name of quakers was first given to him and his followers at Derby, in consequence of the odd contortions of their body.

Fox, Richard, a native of Grantham, Lincolnshire. Though of obscure origin, he was well educated at Boston school, and Magdalen college, Oxford, from which he removed in consequence of the plague, to Pembroke hall, Cambridge. He was by the friendship of Morton bishop of Ely, recommended at Paris, to the notice of Henry earl of Richmond, who on his accession to the English throne, made him a privy counsellor, and raised him to the see of Exeter. His abilities were employed by the monarch in various embassies on the continent, and he was translated to the see of Durham, and then to Winchester.

He was a liberal patron of learning, and founded besides several free-schools, Corpus Christi college, Oxford. He died 1528.

Fox, Charles James, an eminent statesman, born 13th Jan. 1749. He was the second son of lord Holland, by the sister of the duke of Richmond, and to the accidental favours of high rank, and of titled relatives, he added the more solid advantages of extraordinary natural genius, and strong powers of mind. These promising talents were seen and cherished by his father, he was instructed to think with freedom, and to speak with readiness and with energy, and after a short initiation at Westminster school, he was removed to Eton, and during his residence in that illustrious seminary, he published the periodical paper called the Spendthrift, in 20 numbers. From Eton, where he formed an increasing friendship with some of the future leaders of the senate, he removed to Oxford, and then devoted himself so zealously to dramatic literature, that he is said to have read every play written in the English language. After making the usual tour of Europe, he was elected, even before he was of age, into parliament for Midhurst, and his first speech was in favour of ministry, and against Mr. Wilkes, and the Middlesex election. After sharing the favours of the minister as a lord of the Admiralty, and afterwards as a lord of the Treasury, he was dismissed from his offices, and had the singular fortune before he reached his 24th year, of being the ablest supporter of the government during one session, and in the next of becoming one of its most eloquent and dangerous opponents. During the American war he was a regular, consistent, and active antagonist of the ministry, and on the removal of lord North he was raised to a seat in the cabinet as secretary of state. The death of lord Rockingham soon after dissolved the new ministry, and Mr. Fox after some time opposing the measures of lord Shelburne returned to power by his well-known coalition with lord North. This event is regarded as an indelible stigma in the political life of Fox, who in the ardour of his zeal had often declared that he would not trust himself in the same room with lord North, but he would employ all his powers to bring him to the scaffold for the flagitiousness of his pretended public crimes. So heterogeneous a union gave great offence to the people, and reflected little honour on the integrity of the two colleagues, and therefore the memorable India-bill proved fatal to their interests, and brought on their downfall. The French revolution was an event which Fox hailed as the harbinger of freedom, happiness, and prosperity, not only to France, but to neighbouring nations, but he lived to witness the fallacy of his rash conclusions. Deserted by some of his once faithful associates, who regarded his systematical opposition to the ministry as disloyal if not treacherous, he formed the design of withdrawing from his attendance in parliament, except on great and constitutional occasions, and the measure was deservedly censured, even by his warmest supporters. In his addresses at some of the public meetings at the Crown and Anchor tavern, which were now considered as substitutes for his parliamentary services, he gave offence to the ministry, and in consequence of his speeches, in which he affected to treat the sovereign with disrespect, his name was struck off from the list of the privy counsellors. In 1803, he returned to his parliamentary duty, and on the lamented death of his great rival Pitt, in the beginning of 1806, he was drawn from the ranks of opposition, and by the advice of lord Grenville, placed as secretary of state for foreign affairs, in the number of those who were most capable of guiding the destinies of the empire in times of the greatest danger and difficulty. In this new and unexpected situation he had the opportunity of witnessing the chicane and perfidy of the government, whose cause he had so long advocated in parliament, and in his negotiation with France he experienced how ill calculated for the happiness and independence of Europe, was the political system of that people, whose extravagancies and crimes he had once regarded as the ebullitions of freemen, and as the forerunner of national forbearance, and of universal peace. Having thus lived to feel the disappointment which a generous mind must experience in a diplomatic intercourse conducted on one part with frankness and sincerity, and on the other with artifice and duplicity, this illustrious statesman fell a prey to the insurmountable attacks of a dropsy. He died at Chiswick-house, 13th Sept. 1806, after undergoing three times in five weeks the painful operation of tapping, and his remains were publicly buried on the 10th Oct. following in Westminster abbey. Of this extraordinary character, it must be acknowledged that he was one of the greatest men this country ever produced. As an orator his powers were gigantic, his eloquence irresistible, vehement, and sublime. It was a torrent which in its impetuous force hurried along its hearers in spite of all opposition. His mind, capacious and intelligent, at one view grasped the whole subject of debate, at one glance he saw the weak and the strong parts of his adversary's defence, and with masterly dexterity he combated the most formidable opponent, and improved every advantage which in the field of debate lay exposed to his attacks. If he was less copious, less elegant, and less sententious than Pitt, if he was deficient in the dazzling and flowery profusion, in the lively sallies of imagination of his great master Burke, he possessed the pathos, the forcible argument, the convincing language, the imposing earnestness which captivated and enchained every hearer. With the most retentive memory, he has been known after the lapse of many hours, when the powers of the mind might grow languid, to answer the arguments of various speakers, and with the most minute arrangement. His manner, if not graceful, was peculiarly animated and impressive, and the fire of his eye was rapid and commanding. His replies always exhibited him as very great, and with all the ardour of genuine oratory he enlivened the debate, not only with new ideas, but with all the clearness of argumentation, and the extensive information with which his comprehensive mind was stored. In a profound acquaintance with the human character, and a mature knowledge of domestic and foreign politics, he was above all others supremely happy. In private life he was universally beloved. He was the convivial friend, the pleasing companion, the man of integrity and honour. He possessed in a high degree the talent which distinguishes man, and the genius which elevates him, nor was he deficient in a portion of that virtue which rises superior to both. His faults, as Burke observed, though they might tarnish the lustre, and sometimes impede the march, of his abilities, were not formed to extinguish the fire of great virtues. In his faults there was no mixture of deceit, of hypocrisy, of pride, of ferocity, or complexional despotism. That much of the popularity which he enjoyed arose from his opposition to his great rival Pitt, as well as from the vast extent of his own mighty powers, cannot be doubted. Though regarded for many years by his friends as the only man whose talents could support and confirm the tottering fabric of the state, it is remarkable that after all his determined and systematic opposition to his rival, he when in office pursued the same plan of politics, and from the champion of popular right, became the accommodating colleague, and the pliant imitator of his predecessor. As a man of letters, Mr. Fox is highly respectable. His letter to the electors of Westminster, passed through several editions, not only on account of the political situation of the times, but the abilities and the force of argument displayed in the address. Some copies of his verses are preserved, and show great genius and strong poetic fire. It was said that he was engaged in the composition of a History of England from the Revolution, and that he visited Paris during the short interval of peace, after the treaty of Amiens, to collect materials, but probably little, if any, progress was made in the work.

FOX DE MORZILLO, Sebastian, a native of Seville, author of tracts de Studii Philosophici Ratione,—de Naturâ Philosophorum, &c. He was invited to become the tutor of Don Carlos, son of Philip III. of Spain, but was unfortunately drowned as he passed from Louvain.

FOXCRAFT, Thomas, minister, was a native of Cambridge, Massachusetts, and graduated at Harvard college in 1714. In 1717 he was ordained pastor of the first church in Boston, where he continued to labour with great popularity as an elegant scholar and a devout and faithful teacher, till his death in 1769. He published a considerable number of occasional sermons, which display a vigorous and accomplished mind, extensive learning, and unfeigned piety.  L.

FRACASTORIO, Girolamo, an Italian poet and physician, born at Verona, 1483. Two singular things are related of him in his infancy. When born his lips adhered so closely together, that the knife of a surgeon was necessary to separate them, and his mother when she took him up in her arms was killed by lightning, and he remained unhurt. He was a man of great parts and address. By his influence pope Paul III. removed the council of Trent to Bologna, on pretence of a contagious disease. He was also eminent as an astronomer and mathematician, and the intimate friend of cardinal Bembo, of Julius Scaliger, who esteemed him inferior only to Virgil, and other learned men. He died of an apoplexy at Gesi near Verona, 1553, and six years after the town of Verona honoured his memory with a statue. His chief poem is "Siphilis, or de Morbo Gallico," his medical pieces—de Sympathiâ et Antipathiâ,—de contagione et Contagiosis Morbis,—de Causis Criticorum Dierum, &c. The works were printed collectively, the best edition that of Padua, 2 volumes, 4to, 1735.

FRACHETTA, Girolamo, a political writer of Rovigno, engaged in several public affairs. His great services procured him enemies, and to escape from their persecution he retired to Naples, where he vindicated his conduct to the Spanish court, and was protected by Benevento, viceroy of Naples, and received a liberal pension. He died at Naples the beginning of the 17th century. His great work is "Il Seminario de Governi di Stato et di Guerra," which contains about 8000 military and state maxims. The work is highly esteemed. The best edition is that of Genoa 1648, 4to, writer born at Paris, 1666, and educated among the Jesuits, Rapin, Jouvenci, La Rue, &c. He taught belles lettres at Caen for four years, but on his return to Paris he quitted the order of the Jesuits, 1694, and devoted himself to the greater cultivation of his mind, and to literary pursuits. As he was well skilled in the classics, and in modern languages, he assisted the abbé Bignon in the Journal des Scavans, and undertook a translation of Plato. He exposed himself unfortunately to the cold air of the night, which brought on convulsions in his head, and though he outlived the attack nineteen years, he yet was unable to labour, and died at last of an apoplexy, 1728, aged 62. His works consist of Latin poems published at Paris 1729, 12mo. with dissertations concerning Socrates, and other subjects inserted in the memoirs of the academy of inscriptions, of which he was a member.

FRAGUIER, Claude Francis, a French

FRANCESCA, Peter, a painter of Venice, eminent in his representation of night pieces and battles. He died 1443.

FRANCESCHINI, Mark Antony, a painter of Bologna, disciple to Carlo Cignani, whose manner he successfully imitated. He died 1729, aged 81.

FRANCHI, Antonio, a painter of Lucca, engaged in the service of the dutchess of Florence, for whom he painted several beautiful pieces. He died 1709, aged 71.

FRANCIA, Francesco, a painter born at Bologna, 1450. He was originally a goldsmith, afterwards a graver of medals, and at last an eminent painter. His Sebastian tied to a tree, was an admirable piece, from which succeeding painters drew the improvement of their art. This story is related of his death. When requested by his friend Raphael to place in one of the churches of Bologna his picture of St. Cecilia, he was so struck with the perfection of a piece which his best skill could not excel, that he fell into melancholy, and becoming consequently consumptive, died 1518, or according to some 1530.

FRANCIS, a Romish saint, born at Assisi in Umbria, 1182. He abandoned the profession of his father as merchant, and devoted himself to austerity. He founded one of the four orders of mendicant friars, which was approved and confirmed by Innocent III. 1210. His followers increased so rapidly that in 1219, his order consisted of five thousand members. He afterwards travelled to the Holy Land, with the intention of converting the sultan Meledin, and offered to throw himself into the flames to prove the truth of what he preached. He died at Assisi 1226, and was canonized by Gregory IX. four years after. His order rose to great consequence in time, and was distinguished not only for its services to the Roman see, but for the popes and other great men whom it nurtured.

FRANCIS of Paulo, a Romish saint, born at Paulo in Calabria, 1416, and founder of the Minims. He retired to a cave, where his austerities drew around him a great number of penitents, who built there a monastery. He was very rigid in his rules, enjoining perpetual abstinence from wine, fish, and meat, with many bodily mortifications. He was invited to France to cure Lewis XI. by his venerable presence, but instead of curing the monarch, he died at Plessis du Parc 1507, aged 91. He was canonized by Leo X. 1519.

FRANCIS XAVIER, a famous ecclesiastic, born at Xavier at the foot of the Pyrenees, 7th April, 1506. He taught philosophy at Paris, and there became acquainted with Ignatius Loyola, whom he assisted in the establishment of the order of Jesuits, and with whom and five others he made a vow to labour in the conversion of infidels. Consequently he embarked at Lisbon 1541 for Goa, and as the apostle of the Indies he preached on the coast of Comorin, at Malacca, in the Moluccas, and at Japan; but as he formed the design of proceeding as far as China, he was cut off by disease, 1552. He was canonized by Gregory XV. 1622. He wrote five books of Epistles, Pavia, 1631, 8vo.—a Catechism and Opuscula.

FRANCIS DE SALES, a Romish saint, born at Sales, near Geneva, 21st Aug. 1567. He studied at Paris and Padua, and in his zeal is said to have converted to the faith 70,000 protestants. In 1612 he was made bishop of Geneva, and founded the order of the Visitation, established by pope Paul V. 1618. Though invited to settle in France by Henry IV. he refused to quit Geneva. He died at Lyons 1622, aged 56, and was canonized by Alexander VI. 1665. His works are, Introduction to a Devout Life—a treatise on the Love of God, and letters, all displaying much piety and goodness of heart.

FRANCIS, of Lorraine, emperor of Germany, was son of Leopold duke of Lorraine, and was born 1708. He married in 1736 Maria Theresia, the daughter of the emperor Charles VI. and after his father-in-law's death 1740, he was associated in the empire by his wife, and after the death of his opponent Charles VII. he was elected emperor 1745. The war which a disputed succession had occasioned was terminated by the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, 1747, but new disturbances arose in 1756, and hostilities again began, till the treaty of Hubertsburg in 1763 restored tranquillity to the empire. Francis was a great patron of literature, of the arts, and of commerce, among his subjects. He died suddenly at Inspruck. 18th Aug. 1765, aged 58.

FRANCIS I. king of France, son of Charles of Orleans, and Louisa of Savoy, was born at Cognac, 12th September, 1494. He succeeded to the French throne on the death of Lewis XII. 1515, and immediately determined to obtain possession of the Milanese, which he claimed as descended from duke Valentine his maternal grandfather. His progress was stopped by the Swiss, but he defeated them in the dreadful battle of Marignan, Sept. 1515, and entering the Milanese obliged the duke Maximilian Sforza to resign his power into his hands. After making treaties with the Genoese and the pope, Francis in 1516 met Charles V. at Noyon, and swore eternal peace between their dominions. This pledge so solemnly given was observed only two days, and Francis, dissatisfied that his rival had obtained the imperial crown against him, sought revenge in war. Successful for a while in Navarre, Francis acquired greater advantages over his enemies in Flanders, and took Landrecies, Bouchain, &c. In 1522 the French under Lautrec were defeated at Bicoque, Cremona and Genoa were taken, Toulon and Marseilles were besieged, and Provence was invaded. Francis flew to the relief of his suffering provinces, and began the siege of Pavia, but was soon after defeated, 24th Feb. 1525, in battle, and made prisoner with the bravest men of his army. On this melancholy occasion he wrote to his mother, and declared that all was lost except his honour. A prisoner at Madrid, Francis was treated by Charles with great and unpardonable severity, and he was restored to liberty in 1526, only upon signing his renunciation to Naples, the Milanese, Genoa, Aost, Flanders, and Artois. The peace of Cambray 1529 put an end to the disputes between the rival sovereigns. Francis took for his second wife Eleanora the emperor's sister, and agreed to ransom for a large sum his two sons who were still detained as hostages at Madrid. Still jealous of the power of his rival, Francis in 1535 seized upon Savoy, while he saw his provinces of Provence invaded, and Marseilles again besieged, but at last a reconciliation was effected by means of the pope Paul III. 1538. The peace was of short duration, Francis attacked Italy, Rousillon, and Luxemburg, but though his general, the duke of Enghien, defeated the imperialists at Cerisoles in 1544, his enemy, supported by the powerful assistance of Henry VIII. of England, made a formidable invasion in Picardy and Champagne. Boulogne and Soissons opened their gates to the conquerors, and fresh victories appeared probable, when the protestant princes united their forces against the conqueror, and stopped his career. Peace was restored with Germany 1544, and two years after with England. Francis died at Rambouillet, 31st March, 1547, aged 53. He had in consequence of his debaucheries contracted the foul disease, which, after a continuance of nine years of increasing pains, proved at last fatal. By his first wife, Claude of France, he had two sons and four daughters, and none by the second. Greater as a warrior than as a king, his whole reign was disturbed by a spirit of jealousy, which he cherished to the last against the power of his rival the emperor, but the protection which he extended to literature, and which procured for him the honourable title of father of letters, has eclipsed the weaknesses of an administration too often guided by prejudice, and disgracefully influenced by the ascendancy of mistresses and of favourites. He was the founder of the royal college of Paris. His life has been written by Gaillard, eight vols. 12mo.

FRANCIS II. son of Henry II. and Catherine de Medicis, was born 1544, and succeeded his father on the throne of France, 1559. He had married the preceding year Mary Stuart of Scotland, and he died after a reign of seventeen months, 5th December, 1560, aged 17. The confidence which he placed in the Guises proved the source of much misery to France, and kindled the flames of civil war.

FRANCIS, duke of Alencon, Anjou, and Berri, son of Henry II. and brother of the preceding, placed himself at the head of the malecontents when his brother, Henry III. ascended the throne. He was seized and imprisoned by order of his mother Catherine de Medicis, but his brother the king restored him to liberty, and thus enabled him to excite fresh troubles. He supported the disturbances in the Low Countries, and was at last crowned, 1582, duke of Brabant, but the oppressive conduct of his government revolted his new subjects against him, and the next year he was obliged to fly to France for safety. He died there 10th Feb. 1584, aged 29. He is known in English history as the suitor of queen Elizabeth in 1581, who flattered his vanity, but with unbecoming coquetry rejected his addresses, after she had given him a ring as a pledge of her affection.

FRANCIS, of Bourbon, count of St. Pol and Chaumont, distinguished himself at the battle of Marignan 1515. He was taken prisoner at Pavia with Francis I. but escaped from captivity. He died at Cotignan near Rheims 1st Sept. 1545, aged 55.

FRANCIS DE BOURBON, Count Enghien, displayed his valour in the service of Francis I. and took Nice and obtained the famous victory of Cerisoles, 1544. He was killed by accident 23d Feb. 1545, aged 27.

FRANCIS DE BOURBON, duke of Montpensier, behaved with valour at the siege of Rouen, and at the battles of Jarnac and of Montecontour, 1572. He was a faithful associate of Henry IV. and he ably distinguished himself in his service at Arques and Ivry. He died at Lisieux, 1592, aged 50.

FRANCIS, of Lorraine, duke of Guise, and of Anjou, was born at Bar, 17th Feb. 1519. He early displayed courage and abilities in war, and his defence of Metz, in 1553, against the arms of Charles V. is deservedly commended. The next year he distinguished himself at the battle of Renti, in which he defeated the Germans, and after some glorious campaigns in Italy and Flanders, he was named lieutenant-general of all the king's armies. His next exploit was against Calais, which he took after a siege of eight days from the English, who had possessed it for 210 years, and this was followed by the fall of Thionville. His services were such that he governed the kingdom under Henry II. and Francis II. and received from the parliament the glorious title of the saviour of his country. The death of Francis II. was the signal for civil war, and while the duke supported the cause of the catholics, the interests of the protestants were ably protected by the valour of Coligni. He took Rouen and Bourges, and defeated his enemies at Dreux, 1562, and he was preparing to besiege Orleans, the chief and strongest town of the protestants, when he was assassinated by a pistol shot from the hands of Poltrot de Méré, one of the Huguenots, 24th Feb. 1563.

FRANCIS DE BORGIA, St. duke of Candia, and viceroy of Catalonia, was grandson of pope Alexander VI. and after filling high offices in the state, he embraced the ecclesiastical profession on the death of his wife, and entered among the Jesuits. He refused the rank of cardinal, and other ecclesiastical honours, and died at Rome, renowned for his piety, 30th Sept. 1572, aged 62. He was canonized by Clement X. 1671. He is author of some pious tracts in Spanish, which have been translated into Latin by Deza the jesuit.

FRANCIS, Lucas, a native of Mechlin, employed as a painter by the kings of Spain and France. His portraits and historical pieces possessed merit. He died 1643, aged 69. His son Lucas, called the Young, was born also at Mechlin, and after studying under Gerhard Segers, acquired celebrity as an artist. He died 1654, aged 48.

FRANCIS, Simon, a native of Tours, eminent as a portrait painter. He died, 1671, aged 65.

FRANCIS ROMAIN, a Dominican of Ghent. He was an able architect, and finished the bridge of Maestricht, and afterwards was engaged by Lewis XIV. in the completion of the Pont-Royal at Paris, which had been left imperfect by Gabriel. He was liberally rewarded for his services and abilities by the French monarch, and died at Paris, 1735, aged 89.

FRANCIS, James Charles, an eminent French engraver, born at Nancy. From Lyons he came to Paris, where he was liberally patronised, but his merits raised him enemies, which circumstances, it is said, hastened his death. He died 1769, aged 52. He published Recueil des Chateaux de Lorraine—Corps-de-Garde after Venloo, &c.

FRANCIS, Philip, D. D. an eminent divine, son of an Irish dean. He is known by his excellent translations of Horace and Demosthenes. He wrote also Eugenia and Constantia, two tragedies not very successful, and for his services as a political writer, it is said, he was rewarded by government with the rectory of Barrow, Suffolk, and the Chaplainship of Chelsea college. He died at Bath, March, 1773, leaving a son, now member of parliament, and formerly one of the supreme council of Bengal.

FRANCIS, Sir Philip, was born in Ireland in 1740. He was educated at St. Paul's school; after which he obtained a place in the secretary of state's office. In 1760 he went in the suite of the English ambassador to Lisbon; but in 1763 he was a clerk in the war office; and in 1773 he went out to India as a member of the council of Bengal, where he fought a duel with Mr. Hastings, and was wounded. He returned to England in 1781, and in the next parliament was elected member for Yarmouth in the Isle of Wight. The impeachment of Mr. Hastings followed, and in that concern his old antagonist had a principal share, though he was not made one of the managers. He became, however, an active member of the opposition. When his friends came into power, he was made knight of the bath. He died December 22, 1818. Some time before his demise, an essay was published endeavouring to show that he was the author of Junius's Letters. He published several political pamphlets and speeches.—W. B.

FRANCISCA, or FRANCES, a Roman lady, founder of a convent at Rome. She followed the doctrines of St. Benedict. She was born 1384, and was canonized 1608.

FRANCIUS, Peter, a native of Amsterdam, who studied at Leyden under Gronovius. After travelling over France and England he became, 1674, professor of rhetoric and history at Amsterdam. He wrote Orationes—Specimen Eloquentiæ Exterioris—besides poems in Greek and Latin, which possess considerable merit. He died, 1704.

FRANCK, George, a native of Naumburg, who so early displayed his abilities that at the age of 18 he received the poetic crown-for his Latin, Greek, German, and Hebrew poetry. He became professor of medicine at Heidelberg, and Wittemberg, and died 1704, aged 61. He is author of Flora Francica, 12mo.—Satyræ Medicæ, 4to.—Epistolæ, &c.

FRANCK, Augustus Herman, a native of Lubeck, professor of oriental languages, and of divinity, at Halle. He distinguished himself by the most active benevolence, and founded at Halle an orphan-house, which, in 1727, contained 2196 children, and more than 130 preceptors. He also promoted the establishment of a mission to propagate the Gospel on the coast of Malabar. He wrote Methodus Studii Theologici—Introductio ad Lectionem Prophetarum—Commentaria de Scopo Veteris et Novi Test.—Manuductio ad Lectionem S. Scripturæ—Observationes Biblicæ—Sermons—Book of Devotions, &c. He died 1727, aged 64.

FRANCK, or FRANCKEN, Franciscus, a Flemish painter, called Old Franck, died 1616, aged 72. He executed his historical pieces from the Scriptures, some of which possess great merit, especially in the colouring, and in the expression of the figures.

FRANCK, Franciscus, son of the above, called Young Francis, died 1642, aged 62. He studied under his father, and improved himself at Venice. His idolatry of Solomon in the Notre Dame of Antwerp is his best piece.

FRANCKEN, Christian, a German in the 16th century, successively a Jesuit, a Sociarian in Poland, a unitarian, and lastly a Roman catholic. He wrote Breve Colloquium Jesuiticum, a severe satire against the Jesuits—de Honore Christi, and other works.

FRANCKENSTEIN, Christian Godfrey, a native of Leipsic, distinguished as an advocate, and more as a man of letters. He wrote the life of Christina of Sweden—History of the 16th and 17th centuries—and a continuation of Puffendorf's Introduction to History, and died, 1717, aged 56. His son James wrote de Collatione Honorum—de Juribus Judæorum Singularibus in Germania, &c. and died, 1733.

FRANCO, Nicolo, a satirist, the friend and rival of Aretin, born at Benevento 1510. He was condemned to death at Rome, 1569, for severe satires on some illustrious persons of that city; but it is unknown whether he suffered. He was an able writer.

FRANCO, Battista, a painter of Venice, who imitated the manner of Michael Angelo Buonarrotti. He died 1561, aged 63.

FRANCOIS, Abbé Laurent, an able opponent of the French philosophers, who died 1782, aged 84. His works, which were useful, were a book of Geography—Proofs of the Religion of Jesus Christ, 4 vols. 12mo.

—Defence of Religion, 4 vols. 12mo.—Examination of the Catechism of an honest Man—of the Facts on which Christianity is founded, 3 vols. 12mo.—Observations on the Philosophy of History, 8vo.

FRANCOIS, Simon, a portrait painter, born at Tours. He was self-taught, and acquired great reputation. He died 1671, aged 65.

FRANCOIS, Lucas, a historical painter, called the Old, was born at Mechlin, and died very rich 1643, aged 69. He was in the service of the kings of France and Spain.

FRANCOIS, Lucas, son of the above, called the Younger, was brought up under his father, and studied under Gerhard Segers. He died greatly respected as a painter, 1654, aged 48.

FRANCOWITZ, Matthias, a protestant divine, the pupil of Luther and Melancthon, born at Albano in Illyria, 1520, in consequence of which he assumed the name of Flaccus Illyricus. He taught the Greek and Latin languages at Wittemberg privately, and was afterwards public professor. He opposed the interim of Charles V. and was concerned in the drawing up of the centuries of Magdeburg. He died 1575. His best work is a Key to the Holy Scriptures, 2 vols. fol. He wrote besides a Catalogue of the Witnesses of the Truth, 4to.—de Translatione Imperii Rom. ad Germanos—de Electione Episcoporum, &c.

FRANCUS, Sebastian, a German anabaptist of the 16th century, who acquired some celebrity by writing books, which were refuted by Luther and Melancthon.

FRANK-FLORES. Vid. FLORES.

FRANKLIN, Thomas, D.D. son of Richard Franklin the editor of the Craftsman, an anti-ministerial paper, was born in London, 1720. He was educated at Westminster school and Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. For some time also he was Greek professor. He was in 1758 made vicar of Ware and Thundridge, and afterwards obtained the rectory of Brasted in Kent. He was also chaplain in ordinary to the king, and died March 15th, 1784. He possessed learning, genius, and application. He translated Phalaris, Sophocles, and Lucian, and he wrote the earl of Warwick, and Matilda, two tragedies which were received with great applause, and also "the Contract," a comedy in two acts, performed at the Hay-market. Voltaire's works appeared translated under his name; but only two tragedies, the Orestes and Electra, were by him. He published also some sermons on the relative duties.

FRANKLIN, Benjamin, an American philosopher and statesman, was born at Boston, New-England, 1706. He was well educated under his father, who was a tallow-chandler and soap boiler, and after being for a little while engaged in the business, he was bound to his father's elder brother, who was a printer. Eager after knowledge, he read attentively in the night, the works which he had printed in the day, and from the pages of Xenophon he derived that energetic ardour which at last raised him to fame and distinction. A difference with his uncle removed him from New-York to Philadelphia, where he maintained himself for some time by his industry, till he was noticed by the governor, Sir William Keith, and encouraged to set up business for himself. With this view he came to London; but soon discovered that the warm assurances of his patron for assistance and protection, were the unmeaning professions of polished life, and, therefore, after working for some time as a journeyman-printer, he, in 1726, returned to Philadelphia, where he settled. By the means of his friends he began business, and published a periodical paper, which was read with avidity. In 1730 he married a widow, whom he had known and courted before her first marriage, and the next year he began the public library of Philadelphia, which was enriched by the valuable contributions of the Penn family, of Collinson, and others, and spread knowledge and information through the province. His Poor Richard's Almanac appeared in 1732, and so pleased the public, on account of the many aphorisms, and the valuable maxims of prudence and economy which it contained, that not less than 10,000 copies were sold in one year. He was, in 1736, made clerk to the general assembly in Pennsylvania, and the next year he obtained the office of post-master at Philadelphia. In 1738 he formed an association for preserving the houses of Philadelphia from fire, and in the war of 1744 he ably promoted some popular measures for the defence of the province, by the voluntary force of the citizens. In 1747 he addressed an account of his discoveries on electricity to his friend Collinson, and explained in a very satisfactory manner the Aurora Borealis, and the laws of thunder and lightning, and he not only recommended the propriety of guarding buildings against the effects of storms, by means of conductors, but showed that the lightning from the clouds is the same as the electric fire. Distinguished as a philosopher, he was equally so as a statesman, and the measures which he recommended in the public assemblies of the province proved his patriotism and sagacity. By his advice the militia bill was passed, and he was, in consequence, appointed colonel of the Philadelphia district. On his appearance in England in 1757, as agent for Pennsylvania, he was received with respect and attention by the public men, and he was honoured with a seat in the Royal Society, and the degree of doctor of laws in the universities of St. Andrews, Edinburgh, and Oxford. He returned home in 1762, and two years after he again visited England, as agent from his countrymen. The spirit which now began to appear in America roused the attention of the government, and Franklin, as a man of knowledge and influence, was called to the bar of the Commons, and examined with respect to the stamp act. His conduct on this occasion was firm and manly, and his answers so clear, that they, and not the questions, appeared to have been prepared with the nicest discrimination of circumstances and of facts. He returned, in 1775, to America, and was elected one of the members of Congress, and during the war he displayed the most active zeal, and proposed the strongest measures for the full emancipation of the colonies from the mother country. He was next employed in completing the negotiations of America with France, and as the resources of his country were low, he embarked with a cargo of tobacco, which he sold at Nantes, to defray the expenses of his mission. He was received with great distinction by the French court; the people admired the singularity of his dress and the simplicity of his republican manners; the poets of the age, and Voltaire particularly, paid respect to his merits, and the government at last, by signing a treaty of offensive and defensive alliance with him, declared war with England. The independence of America was at last acknowledged by the mother country, and Franklin, who had continued at Paris, signed the treaty of peace in 1783, and advanced the interests and glory of his country by forming new connexions with the kings of Prussia and Sweden. He returned to America in 1785, and was received by his countrymen as a venerable father, he was made governor of Pennsylvania, and as a representative he applied the strong powers of his mind to heal the differences which prevailed in the province, by wise laws and conciliating regulations. This respectable man died full of years and of glory, 17th April, 1790, aged 84 years and three months, and his memory was respected by his countrymen, who ordered, on the occasion, a public mourning for two months. The epitaph which he composed for himself is well known. His discoveries in electricity, and his services in the emancipation of his country were depicted by the pen of Turgot in this bold line, placed under his portrait :

Eripuit cælo fulmen sceptrumque tyrannis.

By his patient industry he rose from obscurity, and amassed a very large fortune, part of which he left for charitable and public purposes. He wrote an entertaining account of the first part of his life, which contains many valuable maxims for health, industry, and economy, which has appeared in two small vols. 12mo. with some essays. His political, miscellaneous, and philosophical pieces have been published in 4to. and in 8vo. He contributed some valuable papers also to the philosophical institutions of America.

FRANKLIN, William, son of Dr. Benjamin Franklin, was appointed in 1762 governor of New-Jersey, and was the last royal governor of that province. When the revolution commenced he adhered to the British interest, and was sent prisoner to Connecticut in June, 1776. He was ultimately permitted to retire to England, and was there the agent for the loyalists of New-Jersey and New-York to support their petition for relief, agreeably to the treaty of 1783. He died in England.

FRANKS, Sebastian, a painter, born at Antwerp, 1573. His landscapes and conversation pieces were much admired.

FRANKS, John Baptist, supposed to be the son of the preceding, was born at Antwerp 1600. He studied very successfully the manner of Vanduyck and Rubens.

FRANTZIUS, Wolfgang, a German divine, born at Plawen, in Voigtland, was professor of divinity at Wittemberg, where he died 1620, aged 56. He wrote Animalium Historia Sacra—Tractatus de Interpretatione Sacrarum Scripturarum, 4to.—Schola Sacrificiorum Patriarch. Sacra—Commentar. in Leviticum, &c. and other works.

FRASSON, Claude, a French monk, born at Peronne, in Picardy. He was doctor of the Sorbonne, theological professor at Paris, and superior of the Franciscan convent there. He wrote Dissertationes Biblicæ, 2 vols. 4to.—a valuable system of Philosophy, 2 vols. 4to. He died 1711, aged 91.

FRATELLINI, Giovanna, a paintress, born at Florence 1666, and patronised by the Archduchess Victoria. Her historical pieces and miniatures were much admired. She died 1731.

FRATELLINI, Lorenzo Maria, son of the preceding, was born 1690. He painted under Dominico Gabbiani, and his historical pieces, his landscapes, and fruit were highly finished. He died 1729.

FRAUWENLOB, Henry, a German writer who died 1317. He wrote in favour of the ladies, and they, it is said, attended his funeral, and poured such quantities of wine into his grave, as almost inundated the church.

FREDEGARIUS, the earliest French historian, after Gregory of Tours, was called the Scholastic. His chronicle, in barbarous language, extends to the year 641, and is found in the collections of Duchesne, and Bouquet.

FREDEGONDE, wife of Chilperic, king of France, was born at Avancourt in Picardy, of obscure parents. She was in the queen's retinue, and by her arts, and by the influence of her personal charms, she became the third wife of the weak Chilperic. Raised to the throne, she sacrificed the members of the royal family to her pride and ambition, and by the sword, as well as by poison, she cut off all those whom, either on account of talents, influence, or birth, she regarded as enemies or rivals. She at last completed the measure of her iniquities, by the death of Chilperic, who was assassinated in hunting, that the guilty queen might indulge her criminal passions for her favourite Landri. This detested character, who possessed bravery in the field of battle, died 597.

FREDERIC I. surnamed Barbarossa, was born 1121, and succeeded his father Frederic as duke of Swabia 1147, and in 1152 he ascended the imperial throne after the death of his uncle Conrad III. He passed in 1155 into Italy, where after some difficulties on account of the superiority which the pope claimed over him, he obtained the crown, and consecration from the hands of Adrian IV. The disputes between him and the holy see were kindled anew on the death of Adrian, and Alexander III. the next successor, was soon opposed by the successive elevation of three anti-popes to the chair of St. Peter. The advantages obtained at Rome were followed by the defeat of the Milanese, and by the destruction of their city, and the overthrow of Brescia and Placentia, but at last the troops of Frederic were conquered at the battle of Como, and this disaster produced a peace. The emperor met the pope at Venice, and a reconciliation was effected in 1177. New quarrels however soon arose, till Frederic was prevailed upon by Urban III. to undertake a crusade against Saladin. At the head of a numerous army he marched into the East, and after defeating the Greeks and the Turks, he penetrated into Syria, where death stopped his victories. He died 10th June, 1190, in consequence of bathing imprudently in the Cydnus, in Cilicia, where Alexander the Great, some ages before, had nearly fallen a sacrifice to the same recreation. During the 38 years of his reign, Frederic compensated for the odious vices of pride and ambition by courage, liberality, and benevolence, and the forbidding characters of the tyrant were forgot in the amiable and conciliating manners of the man. By his second wife Beatrix he left five sons, one of whom, Frederic, duke of Swabia, attended him in his Asiatic expedition, and behaved with great valour in the Holy Land, till he was cut off by a severe distemper, which proved also fatal to a great part of his army at the siege of Ptolemais.

FREDERIC II. grandson of the preceding, and son of Henry VI. was born 1194, and was elected king of the Romans two years after. In 1210, he was elected emperor of Germany, on the excommunication of Otho IV. by Innocent III. but he obtained peaceful possession of his power, only after the death of his rival 1218. After settling his affairs in Germany, he went to Italy, where he was solemnly crowned by the hands of Honorius III. 1220, and promised to extend the papal power by undertaking a crusade. This distant expedition was put off for some time till the fear of excommunication from the next pope Gregory IX. obliged him to set out for Jerusalem in 1228. His invasion of the Holy Land was so formidable, that Saladin, Sultan of Babylon, not only made a truce of 10 years with him, but yielded to him some of the Asiatic cities near Jerusalem. This conduct provoked the resentment of the pope, who stirred up war against Frederic, and incited his son and his father-in-law to take up arms against him. Frederic hastened back to Europe to oppose this unnatural conspiracy, and seizing Romagna, Ancona, Spoleto, and Benevento, defeated the plans of his enemies. His partisans in these troublous times bore the name of Gibbelins, while those of the pope were called Guelphs, and carried on their shoulders the impressions of two keys. At last however tranquillity was restored, and Frederic made peace with the Roman pontiff 1230, to be enabled to reduce to obedience his rebellious son Henry, whom he degraded from the title of king of the Romans in favour of his second son Conrad. In 1240, Frederic passed again to Italy, and reduced the Milanese and Sardinia, and after defeating the Genoese and Venetians, and seizing Tuscany and Urbino, he laid siege to Rome. The pope opposed his attack by the terrible denunciation of excommunication. but Frederic disregarded the impotent thunders of the Vatican, and defeated all the forces which were sent to check his progress. The death of the pope soothed for a while the enmities between Rome and Germany, but at last Innocent IV. had the courage to depose this powerful enemy of the holy see, at a council at Lyons 1245, and Frederic, rendered unpopular by the artifice of his opponents, saw Henry of Thuringia elected in 1246, to fill the imperial throne, and the next year, William, count of Holland. Thus insulted and harassed by the insurrections of his subjects in Naples and Parma, Frederic at last sunk under his misfortunes, and died at Fiorenzuola, in Apulia, 13th Dec. 1250, aged 57. He was succeeded by Conrad his son by his second wife Volande, daughter of John of Brienne, king of Jerusalem.

FREDERIC III. surnamed the Fair, was son of Albert of Austria, and was elected emperor 1314, by some of the electors, though the majority placed the crown on his more successful rival Lewis of Bavaria. The battle of Micheldorff, 1322, proved decisive against the claims of Frederic, who was taken prisoner, and died 13th Jan. 1330.

FREDERIC IV. surnamed the Pacific, was son of Ernest, duke of Austria, and ascended the imperial throne 1440, in his 25th year. He was crowned at Rome 1452, by Nicholas V. and was the last of the German princes, who submitted to that ceremony in the capital of the ancient world. He was a weak, indolent, and superstitious prince, and he suffered with the greatest indifference Hungary to rebel and to separate itself from his power, and afterwards he fled from Vienna before his enemies, satisfied to beg his bread from convent to convent. This worthless monarch died 7th Sept. 1493, in consequence of the amputation of one of his legs which mortified, and he was succeeded by his son Maximilian.

FREDERIC I. the Pacific, king of Denmark 1523, after the expulsion of Christian, distinguished himself by the wisdom of his measures, and by his alliance with Gustavus I. of Sweden, and with the Hanseatic towns. After the conquest of Copenhagen, he reconciled to his government the Danish nobility, and rendered himself popular by his liberality, and the prudence and utility of his public measures, and by the introduction of Lutheranism among his subjects. He died 1533.

FREDERIC II. king of Denmark, after his father Christian III. increased his dominions by the conquest of Diethmarsia. He was the patron of learning, and of learned men, and the protection which he extended to Tycho Brahe, added celebrity to his reign. He was for some time engaged in war with Sweden, but tranquillity was restored in 1570. He died 4th April, 1588, aged 54.

FREDERIC III. archbishop of Bremen, succeeded his father Christian IV. in 1648, as king of Denmark. Though he lost some places in a war with Sweden, he enlarged the happiness of his people, by rendering them more independent of the nobles, and by making the crown hereditary, and no longer elective. He died 9th Feb. 1670, aged 61.

FREDERIC IV. succeeded his father Christian V. as king of Denmark, 1699. He joined the Czar Peter, and the king of Poland in hostilities against Charles XII. of Sweden, but he was obliged to make peace, by the rapidity of the victories of his enemy. During the captivity of Charles in Turkey, Frederic drove the Swedes from his dominions, and recovered some of the places which the fortune of war had wrested from his hands. He died 1730, aged 59.

FREDERIC V. grandson of the preceding, ascended the throne 1746, and died after a reign of 20 years. On his death-bed, he called his son and successor Christian VII. and addressed him in these remarkable words, "It is a great consolation to me, my son, in my last moments, to reflect that I have offended no one, and that I have shed the blood of none of my subjects."

FREDERIC AUGUSTUS I. king of Poland, was son of John George III. elector of Saxony, and was born at Dresden 1670. He succeeded to the electorate after the death of his brother 1694, and distinguished himself against the French on the Rhine, and defeated the Turks, in 1696, at the battle of Oltach. By embracing the catholic religion, he recommended himself to the Polish nobles, and was in 1696 elected king, but the glories which he acquired in foreign wars, were eclipsed by the successes of Charles XII. of Sweden, and Frederic beaten at Riga, Clissow, and Frawstadt, was obliged to sign the peace of 1706, by which he was stripped of his dominions, and consented to see the crown of Poland placed on the head of Stanislaus. The battle of Pultowa, and the defeat of the Swedes, proved favourable to his views, he recovered the Polish throne, and maintained his power and independence till his death, 1st Feb. 1733, in his 63d year. He was in his person very athletic, and possessed of prodigious bodily strength. His court was for a long time one of the most brilliant in Europe, and the patronage which he extended to literary characters, and to the arts, reflected the highest honour on his memory.

FREDERIC AUGUSTUS II. son of the preceding, was born 1696, and succeeded his father on the Polish throne 1734. The last years of his life were unhappily embittered by the miseries of war, and the king of Prussia invaded his dominions, and obliged him soon to yield to the rigorous fate of unconditional submission. Augustus was permitted indeed to return to Poland, but Saxony remained in the hands of the conqueror, till the peace of Hubersburg, 15th Feb. 1763. Augustus died the following October. Respectable in private life, this monarch was unequal to the arduous duties of reigning, and whilst he devoted himself to the pleasures of luxury and to indolence, he made no preparations against the attacks of his powerful neighbours of Russia and Prussia. By his wife Mary Josephine, daughter of the emperor

Joseph, he left several daughters, one of whom was the mother of the unfortunate Lewis XVI. of France.

FREDERIC, prince of Hesse Cassel, married in 1715, Ulrica Eleanora, sister of Charles XII. of Sweden, and he obtained possession of the Swedish throne 1720, after the abdication of his wife, who had succeeded on the death of her brother. He made unsuccessful war against the Russians, and died 1751, aged 75, without issue.

FREDERIC WILLIAM, surnamed the Great, elector of Brandenburg, was born at Cologne, on the Spree, 1620. He made successful war against the Poles, but the treaty of Braunsberg, in 1657, put an end to hostilities. In 1674 he joined himself against Lewis XIV. with Spain and Holland, and invaded Alsace, but his progress was checked by the intelligence that the Swedes had laid waste several of his cities, and he returned hastily to repel them, and seized the towns of Stralsund, Ferschantz, and Grispwald. Peace was soon after restored, and Frederic directed all his attention to improve the commerce of his dominions, and joined the Spree to the Oder by the opening of a canal. He died 1688, aged 68, highly respected by his subjects as a liberal, generous, benevolent and patriotic prince.

FREDERIC I. elector of Brandenburg, son of the preceding, was born at Konigsberg 1657. The ambition of this prince was flattered with the hopes of erecting his dutchy into a kingdom, and Leopold the emperor, although he, in 1695, had rejected his solicitations, granted his requests in 1700, provided he assisted him in the war against France, England, Holland, Sweden, and Poland; and in consequence of this elevation his title was fully acknowledged at the peace of Utrecht. The Prussian dominions were increased under him by the acquisition of Guelders, of the county of Tecklenburg, and of the principalities of Neuchatel and Valengin. Frederic died 1713, aged 60. He founded the university of Halle, the royal academy of Berlin, and the academy of nobles. He was three times married. By his second wife, daughter of the duke of Hanover, and sister of George afterwards king of England, he had a son who succeeded him.

FREDERIC WILLIAM I. king of Prussia, was born at Berlin, 15th Aug. 1688, and succeeded his father just mentioned 1713. His reign was begun by a strict reform in the expenditure of the kingdom, and of the 100 chamberlains kept for ostentation by his father only 12 were retained. He unwillingly engaged in war against Charles XII. of Sweden, from whom he took Stralsund. Eager to encourage commerce and industry among his subjects, he invited foreign artisans into his dominions by the offer of liberal rewards, and while he contributed to the prosperity of the nation, he watched over its safety, and created a large standing army of sixty thousand men. The latter part of his life was clouded by an unhappy disagreement with his son the prince royal, and though he married him to the princess of Wolfenbuttle in 1733, he did not derive from that union that concord and reconciliation which he fondly expected. He died 31st May, 1740, aged 52. By Sophia Dorothea, daughter of George of Hanover, he had, besides his successor, three sons and six daughters.

FREDERIC II. son of the preceding, was born 24th Jan. 1712, and ascended the throne of Prussia, 1740. His conduct had been viewed with jealousy by his father, and his attachment to music and to belles lettres was regarded as a mean and dishonourable propensity; but when he attempted to escape from the harsh treatment which he experienced, he was not only seized and sent as prisoner to Custrin, but was obliged to be a spectator of the execution of Kar, the friend and the companion of his domestic sufferings. On his accession to the throne, Frederic laid claims to the province of Silesia which had been long occupied by the German emperor, and all the attempts of Maria Theresa to defend it against his invasion proved abortive. Count Neuperg the Hungarian general was defeated at Molwitz, and, in 1741, all Lower Silesia submitted to the conqueror, and his possession was confirmed by the treaty of Breslaw, 1743. The following year war was rekindled, and Frederic advanced with 100,000 men to the siege of Prague, which he took with 16,000 prisoners, and this advantage was soon followed by the decisive victory of Friedberg, over prince Charles of Lorraine. Another treaty, signed at Dresden 1745, again restored peace to the continent, and Austria ceded to the Prussian conqueror all Silesia, together with the county of Glatz. In 1755 a new war, called the seven years' war, burst forth with increased violence, and while Prussia had for its auxiliary the English nation, Austria was supported by France and by the elector of Saxony, and Frederic soon saw the number of his enemies augmented by the accession of Russia, Sweden, and Germany. Undismayed in the midst of his powerful enemies, Frederic laid the foundation for victory and success in the strict discipline of his army, and in the fortitude and resignation with which he supported the reverses of fortune, and shared the fatigues of his soldiers. Though France attacked his dominions from Guelders to Minden, and Russia penetrated into Prussia, and the Austrians into Silesia, Frederic on all sides rose superior to misfortunes. Though defeated by the Russians he routed the Austrians, and again suffered a check in Bohemia, but on the 5th Nov. 1757, he avenged himself by the terrible defeat of the Austrians and French at Rosbach, and by an equally splendid victory the next month over the Austrian forces at Liss near Breslaw. These important successes appalled his enemies, the Russians and Swedes retired in dismay from Prussia, and Frederic, supported by a liberal supply of money from the English government, and by an army of Hanoverians under the duke of Brunswick, penetrated into Moravia, and laid siege to Olmutz. Though here checked by marshal Daun, he rapidly advanced against the Russians at Custrin, and defeated them in the dreadful battle of Zorndoff. The battle of Hochkirchen against Daun was adverse to his fortunes, and he also suffered a severe check at the doubtful fight of Cunnersdorff against the Russians, and in consequence of these repeated disasters, Brandenburg and the capital fell into the hands of the victorious enemy 1761. The defeat of Daun at Torgau gave a new turn to the affairs of the undaunted monarch, his territories were evacuated by the enemy, and he in every situation displayed such activity, such vigilance, and such resources of mind, that in 1762, a treaty of peace was concluded with Russia and Sweden, and the next year with France and the Empire, by which Silesia was for ever confirmed in his possession. While cultivating the arts of peace, Frederic was still intent on enlarging his dominions, and he joined with Austria and Russia, in 1772, in that unpardonable league which dismembered the defenceless territories of Poland, and added some of its most fertile provinces to his kingdom. In 1777, the death of the duke of Bavaria without children kindled the flames of discord and of war between Austria and Prussia, Frederic placed himself at the head of his troops, but the differences of the rival princes were settled by the peace of Teschen, 13th May, 1779. The last years of Frederic's life were earnestly devoted to the encouragement of commerce and of the arts, justice was administered with impartiality, useful establishments were created, and the miseries of the indigent and unfortunate were liberally relieved by the benevolent cares of the monarch. Frederic died 17th Aug. 1786, aged 75, and he met death with all the resignation which philosophy, unaided by religion, can show. As Frederic was brought up in the school of adversity, he early learnt lessons of stoicism and philosophical wisdom, and unyielding to the caresses of prosperity, he was taught not to sink under the frowns of fortune. From necessity as well as from choice attached to literature in the years of his privacy, he cultivated the muses on the throne, and liberally patronised the lovers of sciences and of the fine arts. His evenings were generally spent in the easy society of men of letters, and after the fatigues of the day he unbent the hero and the king to the wit, the scholar, and the literary disputant. His invitations to learned foreigners were sincere and honourable, and Maupertius, and especially Voltaire, were for a while objects of his particular regard and of his unfeigned esteem. Anxious to redress the grievances of his subjects, he paid the minutest attention to their applications, and a word written at the bottom of each petition by his hand served for his secretaries to convey to the eager suppliants either refusal or reprehension, encouragement or promises. At five in the morning Frederic generally rose from his bed, and after the day was divided between business, recreation, and literature, he retired to his chamber at ten in the evening, and as his meals were regular and simple, and as he was through life a stranger to the licentious propensities which too often dishonour the great and the powerful, he enjoyed a strong constitution with a placid and serene evenness of temper. His conduct in war, the heroic firmness with which he withstood his numerous enemies, and the astonishing presence of mind which he displayed in every difficult situation, not less than his wisdom, the equity of the laws which he established, and the paternal care with which he watched over the happiness of his people, proved him to be a monarch of superior excellence; but though he thus deserved the appellation of Great, it is painful to observe the inconsistency of his principles, the wavering tenets of his faith, and the mighty influence of those two dangerous passions by which he was guided, ambition and avarice. Great as a monarch, Frederic was an infidel at heart, and while he wished to bind to obedience to his government the affection of his subjects by the imposing rites of religion, and by the expectations of another life, he was himself a skeptic in the most offensive degree, and regarded the ties which unite men to an overruling providence only so far as they secured his power or contributed to his aggrandizement. As Frederic did not cohabit with his wife, whom he had married only in obedience to his father, without affection or esteem, he died without issue. His works are numerous and respectable. Four volumes in octavo were published in his lifetime, and fifteen since his death. The chief of these are Memoirs of the house of Brandenburg—a Poem on the art of War, a composition of great Merit—The History of his own Times—the History of the Seven Years' War. All these have been collected together in 25 vols. 8vo. 1790, with an account of his life. M. de Segur has among others published an account of his reign and of his extraordinary character.

FREDERIC, surnamed the Wise, elector of Saxony, was born 1463. He enjoyed the good opinion and shared the councils of the emperor Maximilian, after whose death he might have been placed on the Imperial throne, an honour which he refused, while he supported the election of Charles V. He was one of the first and most zealous friends of Luther, and contributed much to the establishment of the reformed church. He died 1526, and was succeeded by his brother John, surnamed the Constant, whose son John Frederic, when raised to the sovereign power, became a powerful protector of the reformers, and was chief of the famous league of Smalkalde 1536. In the war which followed this league John Frederic was taken prisoner by Charles V. and condemned to lose his head, but the sentence was reversed on condition that he consented to the renunciation of the electoral dignity for himself and his posterity. He died 3d March, 1554, aged 51.

FREDERIC V. elector of Palatine, son of Frederic IV. married a daughter of James I. of England. He was elected in 1619, king of Bohemia by the protestants, but his elevation was opposed by his rival Ferdinand of Austria, and though supported by France and by England, he was defeated the following year, and totally ruined near Prague. The great Gustavus in his invasion of Germany promised to re-establish him in his rights and dominions, but the death of that heroic chief at the battle of Lutzen 1632, not only shattered all his fond hopes, but weighed so heavily on his spirits that he died a month after.

FREDERIC, Colonel, son of Theodore, the unfortunate king of Corsica, was early engaged in the military profession, and served the elector of Wirtemberg, who honoured him with his friendship and presented him with the insignia of the order of merit. He came to England as the agent of the elector, but either unsuccessful in his political negotiations, or overwhelmed with debts and poverty, he in a rash moment committed suicide by shooting himself through the head in the portal of Westminster abbey 1796. This unhappy youth, who seemed to inherit the misfortunes and the imprudence of his father, was author of some publications of merit, Memoires pour servir a l'Histoire de Corse, 8vo. 1768—a description of Corsica, with an account of its short Union to the British Crown, &c. 1798, 8vo. &c.

FREEKE, William, an English Socinian, born 1664. He wrote, in questions and answers, a dialogic on the Deity, and a confutation of the doctrines of Triunity, which drew down the severity of the House of Commons upon him. He was fined 500*l.* his book was burnt, and he made a recantation in the four courts of Westminster-hall.

FREEMAN, John, a painter, in the age of Charles II. His life was attempted by poison in the West Indies, and his constitution ever after retained the fatal effects. In the decline of life, he painted scenes for Covent garden theatre.

FREGOSO, Baptist, doge of Genoa 1478, from which office he was deposed for his haughtiness, and banished to Fregui. The time of his death is unknown. He wrote, like Valerius Maximus, nine books of Memorable Actions—the Life of Martin V—a Latin Treatise on learned Ladies—an Italian Treatise against Love.

FREHER, Marquard, a German, born at Augsburg, 1665. He studied civil law in France under Cujacius, and at the age of 23 was counsellor to Casimir prince Palatine. He was afterwards professor of law at Heidelberg, and engaged in important affairs by the elector Frederic IV. He died at the age of 49. His books on law, criticism, and history, are very numerous and respectable. His abilities, and the amiable character of his private life, are highly commended by Douza, Melchior Adam, Scioppius, Casaubon, and others.

FREIGIUS, John Thomas, a learned German, born at Friburgh, son of a husbandman. He studied the law under Zasius and Ramus, and taught first at Friburgh, and afterwards at Basil, and then at the moment when he thought of retiring from the ingratitude of the world to the peace of a rural life, he was appointed rector of the new college of Altorf, 1575. He died 1583 of the plague, following to the grave a son and two daughters, one of which had, at the age of 12, very promising talents, and a great taste for literature. Of his works the chief are Questiones Geometricæ, and Stereo-Metricæ Logica Consultorum—Ciceronis Orationes Perpetuis Notis Logicis, &c. 3 volumes, Svo. Basil, 1583.

FREIND, John, an English physician of eminence, born 1675, at Croton, in Northamptonshire, where his father was rector. He was educated under Busby, at Westminster, and came in 1690 to Christchurch, where Aldrich presided. His abilities as a scholar were already so distinguished that he then, in conjunction with a friend, published an elegant edition of Demosthenes, and Æschines de Coronâ, and about the same time revised, for publication, the Delphin edition of Ovid's

Metamorphoses. He now directed his attention to physic, and displayed great knowledge of the subject, by addressing a letter concerning the hydrocephalus to Sir Hans Sloane in 1699, and another in 1701 de Spasmi Rarioris Historiâ, which are inserted in the philosophical transactions, No. 256 and 279. In 1703 he drew the public attention to a useful and valuable work, called "Emmenologia, in qua Fluxus Muliebris Menstrui, &c." and in 1704 was elected chymical professor at Oxford. The year after he accompanied lord Peterborough in his Spanish expedition, and after two years' attendance on the army, he visited Italy and Rome, and conversed with Baglivi and Lancisi, men of eminence and medical celebrity. On his return in 1707, he published an account of the earl of Peterborough in Spain, &c. as an able vindication of the honour and character of his friend since the raising of the siege of Barcelona, and during the campaign of Valencia; and the work became very popular, and passed rapidly to a third edition. At this time he was created M.D. and two years after he published his Prælectiones Chymicæ, dedicated to Sir Isaac Newton. This work was censured in the Acta Eruditorum by the German philosophers, and drew forth a defence from the author, inserted in the philosophical transactions. In 1711 he was elected member of the Royal Society, and that year went with the duke of Ormond as physician to Flanders. In 1716 he was chosen fellow of the college of physicians, and at that time had a controversy with Dr. Woodward, of Gresham college, in consequence of his publication of Hippocrates de Morbis Popularibus, and afterwards on the subject of the fever in the smallpox, in which unpleasant dispute more acrimony was shown, on both sides, than prudence or decorum could approve. In 1722 he was elected M. P. for Launceston, in Cornwall, and the freedom and eloquence of his speeches in the house, together with his intimacy with Atterbury, drew upon him the suspicion that he was concerned in the plot of that unfortunate bishop, and consequently he was committed to the Tower, March, 1722-3, from which he was bailed the June following. In his confinement he wrote a letter on some kind of smallpox, addressed to his friend Mead, and he formed the plan of his great work, "the History of Physic," the first part of which appeared in 1725, and the second 1726. He became physician to the prince of Wales, and on his accession to the throne to the queen, whose confidence and esteem he fully enjoyed. He died of a fever, 26th July, 1728, in his 52d year, and was buried at Hicham, Bucks, but a monument was erected to him in Westminster abbey. He left one son, afterwards student of Christ church. His Latin works were published together, London, 1733, in fol. by Wigan, who added a Latin translation of the History of Physic, with an elegant dedication to the queen. Dr. Freind's brother, Robert, was head of Westminster school, and a very learned man. He published Cicero de Oratore, and died 1754.

FREINSEMIUS, John, a learned German, born at Ulm, in Swabia, 1603. He was professor of eloquence at Upsal, librarian to Christina of Sweden, and afterwards professor at Heidelberg, where he died 1660. He was a most able classical scholar, and to the knowledge of Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, united an intimate acquaintance with all the languages of Europe. His critique on Florus, and his notes on Phædrus and Tacitus are valuable, but he derives his greatest celebrity from his excellent supplements to Livy and Quintus Curtius, in which he has been so successful that we almost cease to lament the loss of the originals.

FREIRE de ANDRADA, Hyacinthe, a Portuguese, abbot of St. Mary de Chans, born at Beja, 1597. He was in great favour with John IV. of Portugal, who wished to make him a bishop. He was a man of great levity of character, which probably prevented his advancement in the state, as his abilities might have promised. He died at Lisbon, 1657. His "Life of don Juan de Castro," is esteemed as one of the best written books in Portuguese. He wrote also some poems.

FREMINET, Martin, a French painter, who died at Paris, his birthplace, 1619, aged 52. He was chiefly painter to Henry IV. and honoured with the order of St. Michael by Lewis XIII. He imitated with success the beauties of Michael Angelo, and of Joseph of Arpino.

FREMONT d'ABLANCOURT, Nicholas, nephew and pupil of Perrot d'Ablancourt, retired to Holland at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and was appointed historiographer to the prince of Orange. Besides a defence of his uncle Tacitus against la Houssaye, he translated Lucian's dialogue between the letters and the supplement to the true history, and after his death, which happened in 1693, his Memoirs of the History of Portugal appeared in 12mo.

FRENICLE DE BESSY, Bernard, a mathematician, author of a treatise on Right-angled Triangles—on Combinations—on Resolving Problems by Exclusions, &c. He was very intimate with Mersenne, Fermat, Des Cartes, and other learned men, and died 1675.

FRERES, Theodore, a painter, born at Enkhuysen, 1643. The best of his pieces are preserved in the great hall of Amsterdam. His drawings and designs were in high esteem. He resided for some time at Rome.

FRERET, Nicolas, a learned Frenchman, born at Paris, 1688. Though bred to the law he applied himself to the study of history, and at the age of 25 was admitted into the academy of inscriptions, in consequence of his Discourse on the Origin of the French. This valuable treatise was considered as offensive to the court, and the author was sent to the Bastille, where the reading of Bayle's dictionary rendered him skeptical. He wrote letters "of Thrasylulus to Leucippe," in favour of atheism—Examination of the Apologists for Christianity, &c. He died 1749, aged 61.

FRERON, Elie Catherine, a French journalist, and an able opponent of the new philosophy, was born at Quimper, 1719. He was educated by the Jesuits, but in 1739 he left them, and began the life and profession of author. His "Letters on Certain Writings of the Times," appeared in 1749, and were continued to 13 vols. In 1754 he began his "Année Littéraire," in 7 vols. to which he added yearly 8 vols. to his death in 1776. He was an able and acute critic, but his remarks on Voltaire drew upon him all the violence and fury of the satirist, and he became the hero of his Dunciad. To a well-informed mind, Freron added an excellent private character. He died 10th March, 1776, and besides his periodical publications, wrote miscellanies, 3 vols.—les Vrais Plaisirs, from Marino, and part of a translation of Lucretius, &c.

FRESNAYE, John Vauquelin de la, an early French poet, king's advocate for Caen, and afterwards president of that city. He died 1606, aged 72. He wrote "Satires," which, though inferior to those of Boileau and Regnier, yet possess merit—"the Art of Poetry"—two books of Idyllia—a poem on the Monarchy, all published at Caen, 1605.

FRESNE, Charles du Cange du, a learned Frenchman, born at Amiens, 1610. He studied the law at Orleans, and was advocate of the parliament of Paris. He spent some time in his native town in the pursuits of literature and philosophy, and then settling at Paris, he was in 1668 engaged by Colbert to make a collection from all authors who had written on the history of France. His labours, however, did not please the minister, and he resigned all his engagements in the undertaking, and then finished his "Glossarium Mediæ et Infimæ Latinitatis," 3 vols. fol. an excellent and useful work, often reprinted. He afterwards wrote a Greek Glossary of the middle age, in 2 vols. folio. He wrote also the History of Constantinople under the French emperors, and published besides, editions of Nicephorus, Cinnamus, Anna Comnena, Zonaras, &c. with learned notes. He died 1688, aged 78, leaving four children, who were honourably pensioned by Lewis XIV. in consequence of their father's merit. Du Cange's Latin Glossary was afterwards enlarged and improved, and afterwards abridged in 6 volumes, 8vo. Halle, 1772.

FRESNOY, Charles Alphonso du, a poet and painter, born at Paris, 1611. His father, who was a surgeon, educated him for a physician, but the love of poetry was superior to paternal authority. Under Perrier and Vouet he learned design, and in 1634 travelled to Rome, where his wants, in consequence of the neglect of his offended parents, were very great, till relieved by the liberality of his friend Mignard. Devoting himself to classical studies, he did not, however, pay less attention to anatomy, the rules of perspective and architecture, and the elements of geometry, and with a mind well stored with poetical images, he produced his elegant and laboured poem "De Arte Graphica." His pictures were not numerous, scarce fifty in number, and always parted with for little, and to supply the wants of the moment. On his return from Italy, in 1656, he was solicited to publish his poem; but though encouraged by de Piles, his friend, who undertook a French translation of it, he deferred it, and died before the completion, 1665, aged 53. The poem appeared after his death, with notes by de Piles, and its excellent precepts have been made known to the English by the translations of Dryden, of Graham, and lastly of Mason, in blank verse, with notes. In the colouring of his pieces Fresnoy imitated Titian, and the Caraccis in their designs.

FRESNY, Charles Riviere du, a French poet, born at Paris, 1648. To a strong taste for music, painting, and sculpture, he joined a great knowledge of gardening. He was overseer of the king's gardens; but he sold the appointment to supply his extravagance, and retired to Paris to live by his pen. As a dramatic writer he acquired some celebrity. His follies were such that, as Le Sage has mentioned in the Diable Boiteux, he actually married his laundress, thus to discharge his bills. Besides his comedies he wrote cantatas and songs, which he himself set to music. He died 1724, aged 76. His works were collected in six vols. 12mo. and d'Alembert has drawn a parallel between him and Destouches as a comic writer.

FRETEAU DE ST. JUST, Emmanuel Marie Michael Philip, a French nobleman, who, through disappointment, embraced the popular party against the court at the revolution. After acquiring some popularity in the assembly and the convention by his speeches, he was marked for destruction by Robespierre, and was guillotined 15th June, 1793, aged 49.

FREWEN, Accepted, an English prelate, born in Kent, and educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, of which he became fellow and president. He was chaplain to Charles I. 1631, was made dean of Gloucester, and in 1643 bishop of Lichfield and Coventry. He was translated to York at the restoration, and died at Thorpe castle, 1664, aged 75.

FREY, John Cecil, a German physician, who pretended to be the first in Europe who defended theses in philosophy in the Greek language. He died of the plague, 1631, and his Opuscula appeared after his death by Baledrens.

FREYTAG, Frederic Gottleb, a burgo-master of Nuremberg, who died 1776, aged 53. He was author of Rhinoceros Veterum Scriptorum Monumentis Descriptus, 1747; Analecta Literaria de Libris Rarioribus, 1751,—Oratorum et Rhet. Græc. quibus Statuæ Honor. Causâ positæ sunt, 1752,—an Account of scarce Books, &c. 1776, &c.

FREZIER, Amadée Francis, a native of Chambéry, descended from a Scotch family. He took a survey of Chili and Peru, of which he published an account, 1716, and deserved the cross of St. Lewis for his judicious labours in the fortifying of St. Maloes. He wrote a treatise on Les feux d'Artifice,—Elemens de Stereotomie, &c. and died at Brest, 1772, aged 90.

FRIART, Rowland, an architect of the 17th century, who translated Palladio, and drew a parallel between ancient and modern architecture.

FRICHE, or FRISCHE, James de, a Benedictine, born in Normandy. He edited Ambrose's works, ten vols. fol. Paris, and wrote the Life of St. Augustine, and died at Paris, 1693, aged 52.

FRISBIE, Levi, a distinguished professor of the university in Cambridge, Massachusetts, first of the Latin language, and afterwards of moral philosophy. He was born in the year 1784, and died in the year 1822. He was eminent for his integrity and deep sense of religion; and for his acuteness and force of mind. For the last eighteen years of his life, he was afflicted by a disease of his eyes, which almost deprived him of their use for the purposes of study; and prevented him from giving to the world many proofs of his uncommon powers of intellect. He was, however, the author of several publications, which, after his death, were collected and edited, together with some extracts from the manuscript notes of his lectures. His prose compositions have great merit; and his version of the Epistle of Horace to Julius Harus, is much superior to that of Francis. See "A Collection of the miscellaneous writings of Professor Frisbie ; with some notices of his life and character," Boston, 1823, 8vo.  L.

FRISCH, John Leonard, a native of Saltzbach, founder of the silk manufactures at Brandenburg, and the first encourager of the cultivation of the mulberry-tree in Prussia. He belonged to the academy of sciences at Berlin, and died there, 1743, aged 77. He wrote a German and Latin Dictionary,—a Description of German Insects—Dictionnaire Nouveau des Passages Francois Allemands, &c. 8vo.

FRISCHLIN, Nicodemus, a learned German, born at Baling, in Swabia, 1547. He was educated under his father, who was a minister, and at Tubingen, and so great were his powers that at the age of thirteen he could write with elegance Greek and Latin poetry. He became, at twenty, professor at Tubingen, and in 1580, published an oration in praise of a country life, with a paraphrase on Virgil's Eclogues and Georgics. In this celebrated work he inveighed severely against courtiers, and the satire was felt and resented. Even his life was in danger, so that he fled to Laubach, in Carniola, where he opened a school ; but the insalubrity of the air, and the ill health of his wife and children, obliged him to return home. He afterwards passed to Frankfort, and thence into Saxony, and to Brunswick, and at last, overpowered by his necessities, he wrote to the prince of Wirtemberg for relief ; but his application was disregarded, and he afterwards imprisoned in Wirtemberg castle. From this illiberal treatment he determined to escape, but unfortunately in the attempt, the ropes which he used were so weak that he fell down a deep precipice, and was dashed to pieces on the rocks, in 1590. He left behind him the character of an unfortunate, persecuted man, whose abilities, however, were strongly exhibited in his tragedies, comedies, elegies, and elegant translations from Greek and Latin authors, and also by a well-digested Latin Grammar.

FRISCHMUTH, John, a native of Franconia, who died rector of Jena university, 1687, aged 68. He was author of Illustrations and Dissertations on difficult Passages of Scripture.

FRISIUS, John, a native of Zurich. He became principal of the college there, and introduced the study of the Hebrew, and other oriental languages. Besides a Latin and German Dictionary he translated some of the Scriptures into German from the Hebrew, and died 1565, aged 60. His son John James, was professor of theology and philosophy, and died 1610.—Another son succeeded him as professor. Henry, of the same family, was professor of languages at Zurich, where he died, 1718, author of a treatise De Sede Animæ Rationis,—De Communione Sanctorum, &c.

FRITH, John. Vid. FRITH.

FRIZON, Peter, author of a History of French Cardinals,—a History of the Grand Almoners of France,—the Life of Spondæus, &c. and editor of the French Bible, translated by the Louvain divines, with notes, died at Paris, master of the Jesuits' college of Navarre, 1651.

FROBENIUS, John, an eminent German printer, born at Hammelburg, Franconia. He was educated at Basil, and after great progress in literature began the business of printer there. The respectability of his character, and his constant care of never printing any thing offensive to morals and religion, produced him both celebrity and opulence. He was the intimate friend of Erasmus, and he printed his works. From his press issued a great many valuable editions of different authors, of Jerome, Augustine, &c. He had formed the design of publishing all the Greek fathers, but death prevented the completion. His death, which happened at Basil 1527, was supposed to have been occasioned by a fall five years before, which at last ended in a dead palsy. He was universally lamented ; but by none more than Erasmus, who loved him sincerely, and who, in proof of his affection, wrote his epitaph in Greek and Latin. He left his business to his son Jerome Frobenius, and his son-in-law, Nicolas Episcopius.

FROBISHER, Sir Martin, a celebrated navigator, born near Doncaster, in Yorkshire. He was early brought up to a sea life, and was the first Englishman who attempted to discover a northwest passage to China. After fruitless endeavours to complete his favourite scheme for 15 years, he at last obtained the protection of Dudley, earl of Warwick, and with three barks he sailed from Deptford, 8th June, 1576, in the sight of queen Elizabeth, who, waving her hand bade him farewell. After visiting the coasts of Greenland, and penetrating to a strait to which he gave his own name, he returned, and arrived at Harwich, the 2d October. As he brought with him some of the produce of the lands which he visited, a black and heavy stone, which was on board, was discovered to contain gold, and in consequence a new expedition was quickly planned. With a ship of the royal navy and two barks, he sailed from Harwich, 31st May, 1577 ; and after passing by some very dreadful islands of ice on the coast of Friesland, he discovered and gave names to various bays and isles ; and at last, after loading his ships with some of the golden ore of which he was in pursuit, he came back and reached England at the end of September. The queen received him with great condescension. The ore he had brought was examined before commissioners, and was proved to be valuable; and another expedition was prepared to make still further discoveries. The third expedition, consisting of fifteen ships, sailed from Harwich, on the 31st of May, and returned back with the usual success, at the beginning of October. Afterwards Frobisher served in Sir Francis Drake's expedition to the West-Indies; and three years after, in 1588, he commanded the Triumph in the defeat of the Spanish armada. He was knighted in his own ship for his great services; and afterwards was employed to command a fleet on the Spanish coast. In 1594, he supported Henry IV. against the leaguers and Spaniards, but in an attack against Croyzon near Brest, he was unfortunately wounded by a ball in the hip, 7th November, and died soon after, it is said, through the ignorance of his surgeon, who, by neglecting to extract the wadding, did not prevent the festering of the affected part. This brave man was buried at Plymouth.

FROELICH, Erasmus, a native of Gratz in Styria. He was a Jesuit, and eminent for his knowledge of mathematics and medallie history. He wrote Quatuor Teutermia in Re Nummariâ, 4to.—Annales Regum Styriæ, fol.—de Figurâ Telluris, 4to. and died 1758, aged 58.

FROIDMONT, Libert, a native of Liege, dean of St. Peter's, and philosophical professor at Louvain. He wrote Dissertatio de Cometâ,—Meteorologicorum, Libri Quinque—Brevis Anatomia Hominis—in Actus Apostol. Commentar. He died 1653, aged 66.

FROILA I. king of Spain after Alphonsus, 757, is known for the famous victory which he obtained over the Saracens in Galicia, 760. He established very excellent laws, but his murder of his brother Vimazan was cowardly and cruel; and in consequence of this he lost his life by the hand of his other brother Aurelius, 768.

FROILA II. succeeded his brother Ordoquo on the Spanish throne, 923, and died of a leprosy two years after. He was so cruel in his government that the Castilians revolted against him.

FROISSARD or FROISSART, John, an eminent historian, born at Valenciennes, 1337. Though bred to the church, he was fond of gayer, and travelled through England, Scotland, Italy, and other places. He was for some time in great favour with Philippa, the queen of Edward III. and died canon and treasurer of Chimai about 1410. His "Chronicle" is a valuable work, containing an account of the events which took place in England, France, and Spain, from 1326 to 1400. The best edition is that of Lyons, 4 vols. fol. 1599. It has been abridged by Sleidan, and continued to 1466 by Monstrelet. It has been lately edited and elucidated by the labours of Mr. Johnes.

FROMAGE, Peter, a superior of the Jesuits sent to Egypt and Syria. He published, in Arabic, various religious pieces, at St. John's monastery near Antura, where he had established a press. He died in Syria, after some years' residence there, 1740.

FRONTEAU, John, a native of Angers, chancellor of Paris university, and afterwards prior of Benay in Angers, and St. Magdalen of Montargis, where he died, 1662, aged 48. He wrote the Philosophy of Alamandus,—Antitheses Augustini et Calvini, de Diebus Festivis, fol.

FRONTENAC, Louis, count, governor general of Canada, entered on the office in 1672. He built a fort on lake Ontario, which bore his name. In 1682 he was recalled, but was reappointed to the office in 1689. Though haughty, revengeful, and ambitious, his administration was able, and contributed greatly to the prosperity of the province. He died in 1698.

FRONTINUS, Sextus Julius, a Roman writer under Trajan. He wrote de Re Agrariâ,—Libri Tres Stratagematum, &c.

FRONTO, Marcus Cornelius, a Roman orator, preceptor to Vereus and M. Aurelius.

FROWDE, Philip, an English poet, educated at Oxford, where his intimacy with Addison introduced him to the notice of the great. He was author of some very elegant Latin poems in the Musæ Anglicanæ, and wrote besides, two tragedies, "the Fall of Saguntum" and "Philotas." He died in Cecil-street, Strand, 1738, leaving a most amiable character behind him. No man, says his biographer, could live more beloved, no private man could die more lamented.

FRUGONI, Charles Innocent, an Italian poet, born at Genoa 1692. He entered into the society of the Sommasques, but afterwards with the pope's leave laid aside the clerical character, and became perpetual secretary to the academy of fine arts at Padua. He died 1768 aged 76. His works, consisting of minor poems, were published at Parma 1779 in 9 vols. 8vo.

FRUMENTIUS, a Romish saint, the apostle of the Æthiopians, among whom he was consecrated bishop 331, by Athanasius. He died 360.

FRYE, Thomas, a native of Dublin, who settled in London, where he acquired some eminence as a painter. He afterwards engaged in a China manufactory at Bow, but ill success obliged him to return to his pallet. He attempted also mezzotint engraving. His picture of the prince of Wales painted for Sadlers-hall in 1738, was admired as a well-executed piece. He died in London 1762, aged 52.

FRYTH, John, an English martyr, born at Seven Oaks in Kent. He was educated at King's college, Cambridge, and afterwards went to Oxford, where he became one of the canons in Wolsey's college. The acquaintance and conversation of Tyndale converted him to the tenets of Luther, for which he was imprisoned. Upon his liberation in 1528 he left England, and two years after returned, and began with increased zeal to preach his opinions. His influence was so great that he was sent to the Tower by Sir Thomas More, and refusing to recant he was condemned by the catholic commission, and was burnt in Smithfield 1533. He wrote several treatises against popery, which were reprinted in London in fol. 1573.

FUCHSIUS, or FUCHS, Leonard, a physician and botanist, born 1501, at Wemdingen in Bavaria. He practised at Munich and Ingoldstadt, and was raised to equestrian honours by Charles V. He died 1566, aged 65. The best known of his works is "Historia Stirpium," 1543, folio, Bale.

FUESSLI, John Gaspard, a native of Zurich, eminent as an artist and as a respectable man. He wrote the History of the Artists of Switzerland, a work of merit, and died 1782, aged 76. His son of the same name was a bookseller at Zurich, and published some interesting works on entomology. He died 1786.

FUGGER, Huldric, a learned man, born at Augsburg in 1526, of an ancient and opulent family. He spent much of his property in the purchasing of books and manuscripts, which he printed at the press of Henry Stephens, but his relations were so displeased with his extravagance, as they called it, in the protection and encouragement of literature, that they had him declared by a court of justice incapable of managing his affairs. He retired to Heidelberg, where he died 1584, bequeathing his library to the elector Palatine, with a fund for the decent maintenance of six scholars.

FULBERT, an Italian, educated under pope Sylvester II. He acquired great celebrity in France as a public preacher, and obtained the bishopric of Chartres. He wrote with strong zeal against Berengarius on the eucharist, and was the first who introduced into France the worship paid to the Virgin Mary. He died 1028. His works and letters are extant.

FULDA, Charles Frederic, a native of Wimpfen in Swabia, eminent as a Lutheran divine, and also as a mechanic. He died at Einzingen 1788, aged 66. He was author of a Dictionary of the German Roots—an Inquiry into Language—on the Origin of the Goths—on the Cimbri—on the Deities of Germany—a Chart of History, &c.

FULGENTIUS, St. an ecclesiastical writer, born of a noble family at Talepta about 468. After a liberal education he took the monastic vows, and founded a monastery. He was elected bishop of Vinta in 507, and afterwards of Ruspa, but he shared the persecut on of the African prelates. and was banished by Thrasimond, king of the Vandals, into Sardinia. After the death of Thrasimond he returned to Africa, and died there 533, the first day of the year, aged 55. Of the works of this learned father, the best edition is that of Paris, 4to. 1684.

FULGINAS, Sigismund, a writer of the 15th century, in the service of pope Julius II. He wrote a history of his own times.

FULKE, William, an English divine, born in London, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow 1564. He spent six years at Clifford's Inn, but his fondness for literature was greater than his partiality for the law, though against the wishes of his father. In consequence of his acquaintance with Cartwright, he was suspected of puritanism, and was expelled from his college, but the patronage of the earl of Leicester restored him to public favour, and presented him, 1571, to the living of Warley, Essex, and two years after to Didington, Suffolk. He afterwards took his degree of D.D. at Cambridge, and accompanied as chaplain his patron when ambassador to France, and on his return he was made master of Pembroke hall, and Margaret professor. He died 1589. He wrote several works in Latin and English, chiefly against the papists, and dedicated to queen Elizabeth, and to her favourite Leicester. His Comment upon the Rheims Testament is the most known of his works. It appeared in 1580, and again in 1601, 1617, and 1633, in fol.

FULLER, Nicolas, was born at Southampton 1557, and educated at the free-school there. He became secretary to Horne bishop of Winchester, and to Watson his successor, and afterwards he went as tutor to a Mr. Knight's sons at St. John's college, Oxford, and took his degrees in arts at Hart hall. He became prebendary of Salisbury, and rector of Bishop's Waltham, Hants, and died 1622. He was an able scholar, well skilled in Hebrew, and superior to all the critics of his time. His "Miscellanea Theologica," in four books, a valuable book, was published in Oxford 1616, and London 1617, and it is inserted with some other works in Poole's Synopsis Criticorum. Some of his MSS. are preserved in the Bodleian library.

FULLER, Thomas, an English historian and divine, born in 1608, at Akle in Northamptonshire, where his father was minister. His proficiency was so great that at the age of 12 he was sent to Queen's college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, and afterwards removed to Sidney college, of which he was chosen fellow 1631. That year he obtained a prebend at Salisbury, and was afterwards presented to the living of Broad Windsor, Dorsetshire, where he married. Upon the loss of his wife about 1641, he removed to London, and became minister of the Savoy. In 1642 he preached at Westminster abbey, and gave such offence in his sermon by his zealous support of the royal cause, that his life was considered in danger. He joined the king at Oxford in 1643, but his sermon there, before his royal master, appeared as lukewarm, as that at Westminster had been interpreted as violent, a strong proof no doubt of the moderation to which he warmly exhorted all parties. In 1644, he was chaplain to lord Hopton, and was left with part of his army at Basing-house, when it was besieged by Sir William Waller, and in this situation he behaved with such courage that the parliamentary general raised the siege with loss. Fuller afterwards retired to Exeter, where he was chaplain to the princess Henrietta, and where he continued during the siege of the city, and at the close of the war he returned to London, and became a popular preacher at St. Clement's lane, and afterwards at St. Bride's, Fleet-street. In 1648 he was presented to the living of Waltham, in Essex, by lord Carlisle, and in 1654 he married a sister of viscount Baltinglasse. At the restoration, he found himself a favourite at court, and took his degree of D.D. and would have risen to a bishopric, had not a fever unfortunately carried him off, 16th Aug. 1661. His funeral was attended by 200 of his brethren, and a sermon was preached over him by dean Hardy. The most celebrated of his works are "the Church History of Britain, from the birth of Christ till 1648," with the History of Cambridge University, and the History of Waltham-abbey annexed, 1656—History of the Worthies of England, a valuable book, published in 1662, fol.—Good Thoughts, in Bad Times, and in Worse Times—the History of the Holy War, 1640, fol.—the Holy State, fol. 1642—Pisgah Sight of Palestine, and the Confines thereof, with the history of the Old and New Testament, 1650—Abel Redivivus, or English divines, 1651, 4to.—the Speech of Birds, moral and mystical, 8vo. 1660—Andronicus, or the Unfortunate Politician, 1649, 8vo. besides sermons, &c. His Church History was attacked with severity by Dr. Heylin, and ably defended, but with such moderation that the two antagonists were reconciled in lasting friendship. Dr. Fuller left a son by each of his two wives. He was, in private as well as public life, a very respected and amiable character. His memory is said to have been uncommonly retentive, so that he could repeat a sermon verbatim, after once hearing it, and once after walking from Temple bar to the end of Cheapside, he mentioned all the signs, on both sides of the way, either backwards or forwards. He was in his conversation very humorous. It is said that he once travelled with a friend of the name of Sparrowhawk, and he could not but ask him jocosely what was the difference between an Owl and a Sparrowhawk. The difference is very great, replied his companion, eyeing his corpulent person with a smile, for it is Fuller in the head, fuller in the body, and fuller all over.

FULLER, Isaac, an English painter of some celebrity. The resurrection in All Soul's college-chapel, and that of Magdalen college, and an historical piece only in two colours, in Wadham college, Oxford, are excellent proofs of his great abilities. He studied under Perrier, in France, and was very accurate in the anatomy of his figures, but he often offended in decency and historical truth. He died at the end of the second Charles's reign in London.

FULLO, Peter, an heretical bishop of Antioch, during the exile of Martyrius in the fifth century. He maintained with the Eutychian tenets, that all the three persons of the trinity suffered on the cross.

FULTON, Robert, eminent as the inventor of steam-boats, was born in the town of Little Britain, Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, 1765. His parents, who were Irish, were respectable, and gave him a common English education at Lancaster. He early exhibited a superior talent for mechanism and painting, and in his eighteenth year established himself in the latter employment in Philadelphia, and obtained much credit and emolument by his portraits and landscapes. On entering his 22d year he went to England, for the purpose of improving his knowledge of that art, and was received into the family of Mr. West, with whom he spent several years, and cultivated a warm friendship. After leaving that family, he employed two years in Devonshire as a painter, and there became acquainted with the duke of Bridgewater, and lord Stanhope, the former famous for his canals, and the latter for his love of the mechanic arts. He soon turned his attention to mechanics, particularly to the improvement of inland navigation by canals, and the use of steam for the propelling of boats; and in 1794 obtained patents for a double inclined plane, to be used for transportation, and an instrument to be employed in excavating canals. He at this time professed himself a civil engineer, and published a treatise on canal navigation. He soon after went to France, and obtained a patent from the government for the improvements he had invented. He spent the succeeding seven years in Paris, in the family of Mr. Joel Barlow, during which period he made himself acquainted with the French, Italian, and German languages, and soon acquired a knowledge of the high mathematics, physics, chemistry, and perspective. He soon turned his attention to submarine navigation and explosion, and in 1801, under the patronage of the first consul, constructed a plunging boat, and torpedoes, (differing materially from Bushnell's invention, with which he was acquainted,) with which he performed many experiments in the harbour of Brest, demonstrating the practicability of employing subaquatic explosion and navigation for the destruction of vessels. These inventions attracted the attention of the British government, and overtures were made to him by the ministry which induced him to go to London, with the hope that they would avail themselves of his machines; but a demonstration of their efficacy which he gave the ministry, by blowing up a vessel in their presence, led them to wish to suppress the invention rather than encourage it; and accordingly they declined patronising him. During this period he also made many efforts to discover a method of successfully using the steam engine for the propelling of boats, and as early as 1793, made such experiments as inspired him with great confidence in its practicability. Robert R. Livingston, Esq. chancellor of New-York, and minister of the United States to the French court, on his arrival in France, induced him to renew his attention to this subject, and embarked with him in making experiments for the purpose of satisfying themselves of the possibility of employing steam in navigation. Mr. Fulton engaged with intense interest in the trial, and in 1803, constructed a boat on the river Seine, at their joint expense, by which he fully evinced the practicability of propelling boats by that agent. He immediately resolved to enrich his country with this invaluable discovery, and on returning to New-York in 1806, commenced, in conjunction with Mr. Livingston, the construction of the first Fulton boat, which was launched in the spring of 1807 from the ship-yard of Charles Browne, New-York, and completed in August. This boat, which was called the Clermont, demonstrated on the first experiment, to a host of, at first incredulous, but at length astonished spectators, the correctness of his expectations, and the value of his invention. Between this period and his death he superintended the erection of 14 other steam vessels, and made great improvements in their construction. He obtained a patent for his inventions in navigation by steam in February, 1809, and another for some improvements in 1811. In the latter year he was appointed by the legislature of New-York, one of the commissioners to explore a route for a canal from the great lakes to the Hudson, and engaged with zeal in the promotion of that great work. On the commencement of hostilities between the United States and great Britain in 1812, he renewed his attention to submarine warfare, and contrived a method of discharging guns under water, for which he obtained a patent. In 1814 he contrived an armed steam ship for the defence of the harbour of New-York, and also a submarine vessel, or plunging boat, of such dimensions as to carry 100 men, the plans of which being approved by government he was authorized to construct them at the public expense. But before completing either of those works, he died suddenly, February 24th, 1815. His person was tall, slender, and well formed, his manners graceful and dignified, and his disposition generous. His attainments and inventions bespeak the high superiority of his talents. He was an accomplished painter, was profoundly versed in mechanics, and possessed an invention of great fertility, and which was always directed by an eminent share of good sense. His style as a writer was perspicuous and energetic. To him is to be ascribed the honour of inventing a method of successfully employing the steam engine in navigation, an invention justly considered one of the most important which has been made in modern ages, and by which he rendered himself both a perpetual and one of the greatest benefactors of mankind. He was not indeed the first who conceived it to be possible; others had believed its practicability, and made many attempts to propel boats by steam, but having neither his genius, his knowledge, nor his perseverance, they were totally unsuccessful. Mr. Fulton was familiarly acquainted with many of the most distinguished literary and political characters both of the United States and of Europe, was a director of the American academy of fine arts, and a member of several literary and philosophical societies.  L.

FULVIA, wife of Mark Antony, known for her hatred against Cicero. When the orator's head was brought to her she pierced the tongue repeatedly with a silver bodkin.

FUNCCIUS, or FUNCK, John Nicholas, a celebrated critic, born at Marburg in 1693. He was educated at the university of Rint-len, and wrote some very able and learned treatises, de Origine Latinæ Linguæ, and de Pucritiâ Latinæ Linguæ, &c. He died 1778.

FURETIERE, Anthony, a lawyer, born at Paris 1620, and eminent as an advocate in the parliament. He afterwards took orders, and became abbot of Chalivoy and prior of Chuines. He was expelled in 1685 from the French academy, on the accusation that he had composed "a Dictionary of the French Tongue" which, being borrowed from the same materials, was intended to supersede theirs. This valuable work was published two years after his death, in 1690, 2 vols. folio.

FURINI, Francesco, a painter of Florence, who died 1646, aged 42. His bathing nymphs were particularly admired, but he displayed in his figures more elegance than regard to decency.

FURIUS BIBACULUS, a Latin poet of Cremona, author of some annals and satires, 100 B.C.

FURNEAUX, Philip, a nonconformist, born at Totness, Devonshire. He was assistant to a dissenting congregation in Southwark, and afterwards lecturer at Salter's hall, and in 1753 he succeeded Lowman at Clapham. He was complimented with the degree of D.D. from a Scotch university, and died, 1783, aged 59. He wrote an Essay on Toleration, and letters to judge Blackstone on his Exposition of the Toleration Act.

FURST, Walter, or FURSTIUS, a Swiss, revered as one of the founders of the liberty of his country. He seized in 1307 with some of his brave countrymen, the forts by which his country was enslaved under Albert of Austria, and by their demolition the independence of the Swiss was re-established.

FURSTEMBERG, Ferdinand de, a native of Westphalia, promoted in the church by pope Alexander VII. and in 1678 made bishop of Munster, and apostolical vicar of Northern Europe. He published Monu- menta Paderbornensia, 1672, 4to.—a Collection of Latin poems, &c. and was a liberal patron of literature, and encouraged strenuously the propagation of Christianity in foreign parts. He died, 1683, aged 57.

FUSI, Anthony, a doctor of the Sorbonne, minister of St. Bartholomew church at Paris. He was imprisoned by the Jesuits, whose opinions and conduct he opposed, and accused of incontinency and heresy, but he was afterwards set free, and retired to Geneva, where he publicly embraced the protestant tenets. He wrote against the errors and corruptions of the Romish church, besides an account of his own case, &c. He died, 1630.

FUST, or FAUST, John, a goldsmith of Mentz, to whom with Guttemberg and Schæffer, is attributed the invention of printing. It is more probable that he only assisted Guttemberg with money, to enable him to make moveable metal types at Strasburg in 1444. Koster, however, at Haerlem, invented, in 1430, the cutting of wooden blocks, and Schæffer, in 1452, found out the method of casting metal types. The first printed book with metallic types is Durandi Rationale Divinorum Officiorum, 1459, and afterwards Catholicon Januensis, though it is said that there is a psalter, with the date of 1457, printed at Mentz. Fust died at Paris, 1466, of the plague. The report of his being arrested as a magician at Paris, for having in his possession various copies of the Bible in unusual exactness, is false.

FUZELIER, Lewis, a dramatic writer of Paris, who also conducted the Mercury, a periodical work, from 1744 to 1752, when he died, aged 80. His tragedies, operas, &c. were written with ease and spirit.

FYOT DE LA MARCHE, Claude, count of Bosjam, a native of Dijon, highly honoured by Lewis XIV. and made counsellor of state, and prior of Notre Dame. He wrote a History of the Abbey of St. Stephen, fol. and some religious tracts, and died at Dijon, 1721, aged 91.

GAB

GAAL, Barent, a Dutch landscape painter, the disciple of P. Wouwermans. He was born about 1650, and by imitating his master acquired some celebrity.

GABBIANI, Antonio Domenico, a painter of Florence, patronised by the duke Cosmo III. and sent by him to Rome to improve himself. He was killed by a fall from a scaffold, 1726, aged 74.

GABINIUS, Aulus, a Roman consul, employed against Alexander king of Judea.

GAB

He placed Ptolemy Auletes on the Egyptian throne, and died B. C. 40.

GABRIEL, Severus, a Greek bishop, born at Monembasia in Peloponnesus. He was made bishop of Philadelphia, but, in 1577, came to Venice, and presided over the Greeks in that republic. His various tracts on theological subjects, Greek and Latin, were published, Paris, 1671, 4to.

GABRIEL, Sionite, a Maronite, once professor of oriental languages at Rome, died at Paris, 1648, then professor of Syriac and Arabic. He assisted Le Jay in the Polyglott Bible, and published a translation of the Arabic Geography, called Geographia Nubensis, in 1619, 4to.

GABRIEL, James, a French architect, the pupil of Mansard. He was born at Paris, and died, 1742, aged 77. His merit, as the able builder of several noble edifices in France, placed him in the office of inspector general of buildings, gardens, arts, and manufactures, and of first architect and engineer of bridges and public ways in the kingdom. He was also knight of the order of St. Michael.

GABRIELLE de Bourbon, daughter of count de Montpensier, married, 1485, Lewis de la Tremouille, who was killed at the battle of Pavia, 1525. Her son Charles count of Talmond, was also killed at the battle of Marignan, 1515, and she died, 1516. Her virtues were very great, and some published treatises remain as proofs of her great piety and devotion.

GABRINO, Augustine, a fanatic of Brescia, who called himself prince of the number seven, and monarch of the holy Trinity. His followers, amounting to 80, called themselves Knights of the Apocalypse. He rushed into a church on Palm Sunday, 1694, while the priests were singing, Who is the king of glory? and with a drawn sword he proclaimed himself the king of glory. He was confined in a mad-house, and his sect dispersed.

GABRINO. Vid. RIENZI.

GABURET, Nicolas, an eminent French surgeon, under Lewis XIII. He died, 1662, at an advanced age.

GACON, Francis, a French poet, born at Lyons. He became father of the oratory, and died at his priory of Baillon, 1727, aged 58. He is known for his severe satires against Bossuet, Rousseau, la Motte, and others. Though he had personally attacked almost all the members of the academy, yet the poetical prize was adjudged to him in 1717. The best of his works is a translation of Anacreon. His other pieces are chiefly satirical.

GADDESDEN, John of, an Englishman, the first employed as physician at the court. He wrote "Rosa Anglica," a treatise which contains a compendium of all the practice of physic in England in his time. He was an ecclesiastic and had preferment, and as a medical man was very superstitious, though superior to others of his time.

GADDI, Gaddo, a painter of Florence, who died, 1312, aged 73. His works were chiefly Mosaic, he also excelled in designs.

GADDI, Taddeo, son of the above, was born at Florence, and died, 1350, aged 50. A crucifixion by him is still preserved at Arezzo.

GADDI, Agnolo, the son and pupil of Taddeo, died, 1387, aged 60. He successfully imitated his father.

GADSDEN, Christopher, lieutenant governor of South Carolina, was born about the year 1724. He became early distinguished by his talents and love of liberty. In 1765 he was chosen a member of the congress which met at New-York to petition against the stamp act, and again of that which assembled in 1774. He was one of the first who openly advocated a separation from the parent country. He remained in Charleston during the siege of that city in 1780. Some time after the capitulation took place, by the order of Cornwallis he was seized with many others, and conveyed in a guard ship to St. Augustine, where he was confined in the castle near a year, in the grossest violation of his rights as a prisoner on parole. In 1782 he was elected governor of South Carolina, but declined the office on account of the infirmities of his age. He died in 1805.  L.

GAELEN, Alexander Van, a Dutch painter who died, 1728, aged 58. He was in London, and painted three battles between Charles I. and Cromwell, besides a picture of the battle of the Boyne.

GAERTNER, Joseph, a native of Calu in Swabia, son to the physician of the duke of Wirtemberg. He studied at Tubingen, but his fondness for natural history was so great that he abandoned divinity to devote himself more fully to his favourite pursuits, and to mathematics and medicine. He next attended the lectures of Haller, at Gottingen, and after travelling over part of Europe he took the degree of M.D. and in 1759 applied himself to botany and vegetable anatomy, at Leyden. His visit to England was marked by his friendly reception among men of rank and of science; he was made fellow of the Royal Society and enriched the philosophical transactions with a curious paper on the fructification and propagation of Confervæ, &c. In 1768 he was honourably appointed professor of botany and natural history at Petersburg, and was thus enabled to examine the natural curiosities of the Ukraine with the eye and attention of a philosopher and botanist. He returned to Swabia in 1770, and in 1778 again visited London, to finish the drawings and figures for his great work called Carpology, which he dedicated to sir Joseph Banks. This indefatigable naturalist died, 1791, aged 59, leaving behind him many valuable manuscripts, &c.

GÆTANO SCIPIO, a Florentine painter, who died, 1588, aged 38. His portraits and historical pieces are much admired.

GAFFARELL, James, a French writer, born at Mannes, in Provence, 1601, and educated at the university of Apt in that province. He studiously devoted himself to the Hebrew language, and to Rabbinical learning, and at the age of 22 wrote a large 4to. volume in defence of the mysterious doctrine of the Cabala. He was appointed librarian to Richelieu, and enabled by his munificence to travel into Italy to make a collection of valuable books and manuscripts. On his return his abilities were employed by his patron in the difficult and unavailing task of reconciling the protestants to the papists. He died at Sigonce, where he was abbot, 1681, aged 81. By the recommendation of Richelieu, whom he survived many years, he was dean of canon law at Paris, prior of Revest de Brousse, and commandant of St. Omeil. His works are numerous, learned, and curious. The most known are "Unheard of Curiosities concerning the Talismanic Sculpture of the Persians,—the Horoscope of the Patriarchs and the Reading of the Stars," a work which passed through three editions in six months, and in asserting some bold things concerning magic, drew upon the author the censures of the Sorbonne,—a History of the Subterranean World, with an account of Grottos, Vaults, and Catacombs, seen during his travels, with plates, left unfinished at his death—a treatise of Good and Evil Genii, &c. Though learned he was very superstitious, and more fond of magic than became his knowledge of the world, and his experience.

GAFURIO, Franchino, a native of Lodi, who became head of the choir in Milan cathedral, and also musical professor. He wrote in Latin, Theoricum Opus Musicæ Disciplinæ—Practica Musicæ Utriusque Cantus—Angelicum et Divinum Opus Musicæ Maternâ Linguâ Scriptum—de Harmonia Music. Instrument. &c. He died at Milan, 1520, aged 69.

GAGE, Thomas, an Irishman, monk among the Spanish jacobins, sent as missionary to the Philippines 1625. He acquired some property in his mission, which he came to enjoy in England, where, in 1651, he published his account of the East Indies, translated into French, by order of Colbert, 1676.

GAGE, Thomas, the last governor of Massachusetts appointed by the king, was an officer of distinction in the British army. He first came to America as a lieutenant with Braddock. He was present at the battle in which that general received his mortal wound, and, assisted by another officer, carried him from the field. In 1758 he held a colonel's commission. He was appointed governor of Montreal in 1760, and in 1763 succeeded general Amherst as commander in chief of the British forces in North America. In 1774 he succeeded Hutchinson as governor of Massachusetts, and furnished several regiments to support his measures, soon began the course of illegal and oppressive acts, which drew on the war of the revolution. In 1775 the provincial congress of Massachusetts declared him an enemy to the colony, and released the inhabitants from all obligation to obey his mandates. Not long after, he returned to England, where he died in 1787.

GAGNER, John, a learned Frenchman, born at Paris, and educated there. He was a most able orientalist, and, upon abandoning the popish faith, for the tenets of the English church, he came to England, where, in honour of his merits, the two universities conferred on him the degree of M.A. He lived some time at Oxford, by teaching Hebrew, but during the absence, and after the death, of Dr. Wallis, he was appointed Arabic professor, and delivered lectures to the university, with universal approbation, till his death 1725. In 1706 he edited Jos. Ben Gorion's History of the Jews, in Hebrew, with a Latin translation and notes, 4to. and in 1723 he published Abulfeda's life of Mahomet, in Arabic, with a Latin translation in fol. His translation of Abulfeda's description of Arabia, had appeared in Hudson's Geographiæ Veteris Scriptores Græci Minores, 1712, 8vo.

GAGNY, John, first Almoner to Francis I. was chancellor of Paris university, and author of Commentaries on the New Testament—the Psalms in verse, &c. He died 1549.

GAGUIN, Robert, a French historian, born at Colines, near Amiens, and educated at Paris, where he took his doctor's degree in law. His abilities were employed by Charles VIII. and Lewis XII. in embassies to England, Germany, and Italy. He was royal librarian, and general of the Unitarians, and died 1501, advanced in years. His chief work is "De Gestis Francorum" from 1200 to 1500, in 11 books folio, Lyons, 1524.

GAICHES, John, priest of the oratory, and canon of Soissons, was author of Academical discourses,—Maxims for Pulpit Orators, &c. and died at Paris 1731, aged 83.

GAILLARD, de Lonjumeau, bishop of Apt, from 1673 to his death 1695, is to be recorded as being the first projector of a universal historical dictionary. In the execution of his useful work he patronised his almoner Moreri, and enabled him to consult the libraries of Europe, and the Vatican. According to Moreri's dedication of his first edition, Gaillard was a man of eminent virtues, exemplary in public and private life, and distinguished as the encourager of literature, and of learned men.

GAILLARD, Gabriel Henry, a French writer, was born at Ostel near Soissons, in 1728. He was a member of the French academy, and also of that of inscriptions, and died in 1806. His works are—1. Rhetorique Française, 12mo. 2. Poétique Française, 2 vols. 3. Parallele des quatre Electre, de Sophocle, d'Euripide, de Crebillon, et de Voltaire, 8vo. 4. Melanges litteraires en prose et en vers, 12mo. 5. Histoire de Marie de Bourgogne, 12mo. 6. Histoire de Francois I. 7 vols. 12mo. 7. Histoire des Rivalités de la France et de l'Angleterre, 11 vols. 12mo. 8. Histoire de Charlemagne, 4 vols. 12mo. 9. Observations sur l'Histoire de France, de Messrs. Velley, Villaret, et Garnier, 4 vols. 12mo. 10. Eloge historique sur M. Malesherbes, 8vo. &c.—W. B.

GAINAS, a Goth, who by his valour, became a general under Arcadius, and ruined and destroyed Ruffinus, and the eunuch Eutropius, who were the favourites of their imperial master. He invaded and desolated Thrace, because refused a church for the Arians, according to the promise of Arcadius at Chalcedonia, and was at last killed near the Danube, A.D. 400, and his head carried in triumph through the streets of Constantinople.

GAINSBOROUGH, Thomas, an English painter, born at Sudbury, Suffolk, 1727. He was self-taught, and after trying the powers of his genius, in delineating the scenes of the country, he came to London, where he acquired celebrity, by the superior style of his portraits, and the elegant simplicity of his landscapes. He was of a very benevolent turn of mind, and it is said that he impoverished himself by his extensive liberality. He died 1788, aged 61. His eldest brother was also eminent as an artist, and another, minister of a dissenting congregation at Henley, Oxon, was said to be a very able and ingenious mechanic.

GALADIN, Mahomet, a popular emperor of the Moguls, who died 1605. He gave twice a day audience to his subjects, and was very careful that their complaints should be listened to and redressed, for which purpose he had a bell in his room, with a rope descending into the street, to the ringing of which he punctually attended.

GALANTINI, Hippolito, a painter of Genoa, called also Capucino, as belonging to the fraternity of Capuchins. His miniatures possess delicacy and expression. He died 1706, aged 79.

GALANUS, Clement, an Italian of the order of the Theatin monks, for some years a missionary in Armenia. His grammar of the Armenian tongue appeared at Rome, 1650, and also some treatises in that language, with Latin translations, 2 vols. fol.

GALAS, Matthew, a general who from being page to baron Beaufremont, so distinguished himself by his valour and intrepidity under marshal Tilli, that he succeeded him in the command of the imperial forces. After being in the service of the emperor Frederic II. and of Philip IV. of Spain, he fell into disgrace in consequence of the loss of a battle, against Torstenson, the Swede, near Magdeburg. He was restored afterwards to favour, but died shortly after, at Vienna, 1647, leaving behind the character of a very great general.

GALATEO FERRARI, Antonio, a scholar and physician, born at Galatina, in the territory of Otranto. He was physician to the king of Naples, but retired from the court through ill health, and died at Lecce, in his native province, 1517, aged 73. He wrote "a Description of Iapygia"—a tract in praise of the Gout—Latin verses—a treatise on the elements, &c.

GALATIN, Peter, author of the valuable work, de Arcanis Catholicae Veritatis, edited best in 1672, fol. was a Franciscan monk, about 1530.

GALBA, Servius Sulpicius, emperor of Rome after Nero, was slain by the pretorian guards, who had raised Otho to the imperial throne, in his stead, A.D. 69.

GALE, John, a baptist preacher, born May 26th, 1680, in London. At the age of 17 he was an able scholar, and passed to Leyden to complete his studies, and there took, in his 19th year, his degrees of master of arts and doctor of philosophy. From Leyden, where his abilities had been acknowledged with universal applause, he went to Amsterdam, and studied under Limborch, and began a lasting intimacy with J. Le Clerc. Soon after his return home in 1703, the university of Leyden offered him the degree of D.D. if he would assent to the articles of Dort, which he refused. In 1711 he published his Reflections on Wall's Defence of Infant Baptism, and so high was the character of this work, that he acquired great influence among the dissenters. At the age of 35 he began to preach among the people of his persuasion, and became one of the ministers of St. Paul's alley near Barbican. A meeting upon the disputed subject of baptism, took place between Wall and Gale, but though each endeavoured to convince the other, both parted dissatisfied, and Wall published soon after in 1719, his Defence of the History of Infant Baptism, which was so highly respected that the university of Oxford presented him with the degree of D.D. To this defence it is said that Gale prepared an answer, which death prevented him from completing. He died of a fever, December, 1721, aged 42. Besides the book already mentioned, Gale published some sermons, 4 vols. of which appeared in a second edition, 8vo. 1726. He was in private life a respectable character, much esteemed by bishops Hoadly and Bradford, and by chancellor King.

GALE, Theophilus, a learned dissenter, born 1628, at King's Teignton, Devonshire, where his father was vicar. He entered at Magdalen college, Oxford, in 1647, and in 1649, in consequence of his great proficiency in literature, he was presented with his degree of bachelor of arts. In 1650 he was chosen fellow of his college, and became an active tutor. He afterwards became a popular preacher, and settled at Winchester, but at the restoration he was ejected from his fellowship for refusing to conform, and in 1662 attended as tutor the two sons of lord Wharton to Caen university in Normandy. He returned in 1665, and the following year saw the city of London in flames, but in the midst of the general calamity he had the good fortune to find his papers saved from the conflagration, and "the Court of the Gentiles" was destined to appear before the public. He assisted Rowe in the ministry of his congregation in Holborn, and succeeded him in 1677, and then took a few private pupils at Newington. He died March, 1678, and as a proof of his attachment to the nonconformists, he left his property to trustees for the education of students in his own persuasion, and he also bequeathed his library for the promotion of the same principles in New-England. Besides his Court of the Gentiles, published in four parts, between 1669 and 1677, in which he proved that the theology and philosophy of the pagans were derived from the Holy Scriptures, he wrote "the True Idea of Jansenism," 4to. 1669—the Anatomy of Infidelity, &c. 8vo.—a Summary of the two Covenants, and other tracts.

GALE, Thomas, a learned divine, born 1636 at Scruton, Yorkshire, and educated at Westminster school, and Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow and M.A. 1662. His great abilities recommended him to be professor of Greek in the university, and in 1672 he was elected master of St. Paul's school, and had the honour to receive a handsome present of plate from the city, for writing the inscription on the monument which records the conflagration of London. In 1675 he took his degrees of B.D. and D.D. and the next year became prebendary of St. Paul's, and was made member of the Royal Society in consequence of his presenting that learned body some curiosities, especially a Roman urn with ashes, found at Peckham in Surrey. After presiding with great popularity and national advantage over his school for 25 years, he was made dean of York in 1697, and showed his liberality by not only presenting the new library of his college with five Arabic MSS. but by improving the cathedral, and displaying the hospitality of a virtuous and noble-minded dignitary. He died at his deanery, 8th

April, 1702, aged 67, and was buried in the middle of the cathedral. Though engaged the best part of life in active and laborious employments, he yet devoted much of his time to literature and classical learning. He published in 1671, the Greek Mythologic Authors, Ethic and Physical—Historia Poeticæ Scriptorum, 1675—Rhetores Selecti, Gr. and Lat. 1676—Jamblicus, &c. 1678—Herodoti Historia, Gr. and Lat. 1679—Cicero's works, 2 vols. folio, 1681, and 4—Historia Anglicanæ Scriptorum quinque, 1687, fol.—Historia Britannicæ, Saxonicæ, Ang. Danicæ Scriptorum, quindecim, &c. 1691, fol. and other works.

GALE, Roger, Esq. F.R. and A.S.S. son of the dean, was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow 1697. He was a man of large property, and represented North Allerton in three parliaments, and was commissioner of excise. He was the first president of the Antiquarian Society, and treasurer to the Royal Society. He was considered as one of the most learned and polite scholars of the age. He died at Scruton 25th June, 1744, aged 72. He published Antonini Iter Britanniarum Commentariis Illustratum, T. G. 1709, 4to.—the Knowledge of Medals, by F. Jobert, translated from the French, and other works. He left his MSS. to Trinity college, Cambridge, and his cabinet of Roman coins to the public library there.

GALE, Samuel, the youngest of the three sons of dean Gale, was a man of some learning. He published some essays in the Archæologia, and died 1754, aged 72.

GALEANO, Joseph, a physician of Palermo, eminent also for his knowledge of classical and polite literature. He died 1675, aged 70, much regretted. He wrote several treatises on his profession, and especially "Hippocrates Redivivus, &c." 1650, besides the smaller pieces of the Sicilian poets, 5 vols.

GALEN, Claudius, a celebrated physician of Pergamus, who practised at Rome under Aurelius with great success. He died A.D. 201. He wrote 300 vols. on his profession, &c.

GALEN, Matthew, a native of Zealand, professor of divinity, and afterwards chancellor of Douay university. He wrote Commentarium de Catholico et Christiano Sacerdote, 4to.—de Originibus Monast.—de Missæ Sacrific.—de Sæculi Nostri Chores, &c. and died 1573.

GALEN, Bernard Van, a native of Westphalia, known as a bishop and as a general. He was originally in the service of the elector of Cologne, and then took orders and became canon, and then bishop of Munster, but when the pope refused to confirm his elevation, he determined to secure his power by having a garrison of soldiers devoted to his own interest. The citizens in vain interfered, Galea was resolved to have recourse to arms, but hostilities were suspended, and his attention was drawn to the war against the Turks, in which he had an important command. In this, however, he did not engage, but in 1665, he attacked the United States. Though pacified by the interference of France, he again, in 1672, formed a league with England and France against the States, and afterwards directed his arms against Sweden, in conjunction with Denmark, and distinguished himself in this war, as he had done before, by great valour, but not unmingled with cruelty. He died 19th Sept. 1678, aged 74, little regretted by his people, whom his ambition and intrigues had contributed to render dissatisfied and unhappy.

GALEOTI, Nicholas, an Italian jesuit, author of the lives of the generals of his order, in Latin and Italian, 1748—Notes on the Musæum Odescalcum, 2 vols. fol. &c. died 1748.

GALEOTI, Marcio, a native of Narni, in the papal territories. He instructed youth at Bologna, and afterwards in Hungary, where he became known to the king, Matthias Corvinus, who made him his secretary, and appointed him over the education of his son John, and librarian of Buda. He was invited by Lewis XI. into France, and came to Lyons to meet the king. The unexpected meeting of the king at the gates of the city proved fatal to Galeoti; he, descending too hastily from his chariot, to pay his respects to his majesty, fell down, and being very corpulent, so much injured himself that he died soon after. He published, in 1748, the Bon Mots of Matthias Corvinus, and also a treatise in 4to. "De Homine Interiore, et de Corpore ejus."

GALERIUS, C. Valerius Maximianus, from a herdsman in Dacia became emperor of Rome, and married Dioclesian's daughter. He was warlike, and died 311.

GALGACUS, a Caledonian chief, famous for his noble resistance against the invasion of the Romans under Agricola.

GALIANI, Ferdinand, a noble writer, born at Chieti, in Abruzzi, and educated under his uncle the archbishop of Tarento. In 1750 he published his work on Money and Specie, in consequence of the scarcity of cash in the two Sicilies, and in 1772, appeared his Catalogue of Stones found near Vesuvius, which he presented to Benedict XIV. with this inscription on one of the boxes which contained the collection: Beatissime pater, fac ut lapides isti fiant panes. The witty sentence procured a living from the pope, and Galiani, in 1759, was sent as secretary to the embassy at Paris, where his genius and his talents were seen and admired by the French literati. He returned, in 1779, from Paris, and died at Naples, 1787. Besides his anonymous dialogues on the corn trade, written while at Paris, and which possessed merit, he published a Commentary on Horace—a treatise on the Duties of Princes towards belligerent powers, &c.

GALIGAI, Elconora, the wife of Concini, marechal D'Ancre, was daughter of a joiner and a washerwoman in Italy. She was foster-sister to Mary de Medicis, who loved her with strong affection, and to this partiality were owing her greatness and misfortunes. She came to France with her patroness, and though her features were plain and even disgusting, she married Concini. In this elevated situation she did not show that moderation and self-command which her great powers of mind seemed to promise. She was haughty and imperious, and by her conduct soon gave offence to Louis XIII. the son of her partial mistress, who with the cruelty of those barbarous times, caused her husband to be assassinated, and herself to be brought to trial, though no crime but that of being a favourite and of governing the queen, could be proved against her. She was charged with sorcery; and when questioned by what magic she had so fascinated her mistress, she made this well-known answer, "By that power which strong minds naturally possess over the weak." She was condemned in May, and the July following 1617, she was executed. She had a son and daughter; the daughter died young, and the son returned to Italy to enjoy the vast possessions which his mother's good fortune had heaped together.

GALILEI, Galileo, a celebrated astronomer and mathematician, was born at Florence 19th February, 1564. His father, who was a Florentine nobleman, wished him to apply to medicine, but his stronger attachment to mathematics prevailed, and so rapid was his progress, that in 1589 he was appointed mathematical professor at Pisa. His opposition there to the prevalent maxims of Aristotle, rendered his situation unpleasant, and in 1592 he removed to Padua, and obtained a professor's chair. His treatise on "Mechanics," and his "Balance," or the problem of Archimedes about the crown, now made him known as a man of genius and application. In 1609, while at Venice, he heard of the invention of the telescope by James Metius in Holland, and he immediately applied the powers of his mind to construct and improve that astonishing instrument, by which he penetrated into unknown regions, and displayed the heavens in a new light. He discovered mountains in the moon, and first observed four of the satellites which attend the planet Jupiter, to which he gave the name of Medicean stars in honour of his patron duke Cosmo II. He was in 1610 re-established at Pisa by the duke, with a handsome salary, and he continued his observations on the heavens, and observed the phases of Venus; but his discoveries were too astonishing and too opposite to the doctrines of Aristotle, to escape the censure of the philosophers of the age. No sooner did he embrace the Copernican system, and assert that the sun, disfigured by spots, remains immoveable in the centre of the universe, and that the earth turns round in annual and diurnal motions, than he was summoned before the inquisition for opinions so false in philosophy, and so heretical, and so contrary to the word of God. After a year's confinement in the inquisition prison, he was restored to liberty, 1616, on the promise of renouncing his heretical opinions; but considering forced oaths as not obligatory, he continued his discoveries in the planetary system. In 1632, his dialogues on the two systems of Ptolemy and Copernicus, drew down upon him the vengeance of the monks. Though indeed he left the question undecided, yet he wished to lean to the opinions of Copernicus, and by thus overthrowing the philosophy of Aristotle, and in bold language ridiculing the blindness of his followers, he showed himself an obstinate heretic. He was therefore cited before the inquisition at Rome, and after being made to abjure his errors, and doing penance for his offences, by repeating every week the seven penitential psalms, he was detained in prison till 1634. Indignant at the cruelty of this treatment, and the bigotry and blindness of his persecutors, he yet continued his pursuits; but in silence and fear. His excessive application, and the constant use of his telescope, together with frequent exposure to the night air, had such effect upon him, that in 1639 this venerable man lost his sight. He died three years after at Arcetri near Florence, 8th Jan. 1642, aged 78. Galileo has thus immortalized himself by his important discoveries; he first observed the inequalities on the surface of the moon, and knew her vibration; he planned the accurate calculation of the longitude by the eclipses of the Medicean stars; he invented the cycloid, and observed the increasing celerity in the descent of bodies. His works were collected in 3 vols. 4to. 1718, but it is said that his wife permitted a fanatic monk to peruse, and consequently to destroy many of his valuable manuscripts. His son Vincenzo was a man of genius and abilities, and author of some treatises and inventions in mechanics and music. Among Galileo's pupils, were Vincenzo Viviani the mathematician, Toricelli the inventor of the barometer, &c.

GALISSONNIERE, Rolland Michael Barria marquis, a French admiral, born at Rochefort, 11th Nov. 1693. After serving with distinction in the navy, he was made governor of Canada, 1745, and in 1756 he had a severe engagement near Minorca with the English fleet under Byng. He died the same year at Nemours, 17th Oct. deservedly respected by the nation for bravery, humanity, and benevolence.

GALLAND, Augustus, a French counselor of state, well acquainted with the laws, the history, and royal rights of his country. He wrote Memoirs for the History of France and Navarre, folio—a treatise on the Ensigns and Standards of France, &c. He died about 1644, but at what age is unknown.

GALLAND, Antony, a French antiquary, born of poor parents at Rollo, in Picardy, 1646. He was educated at Noyon and Paris, and in consequence of his great knowledge of the Hebrew and the oriental languages, he was sent to travel in the East by Colbert, and at his return he enriched the literature of his country by his publications. He was member of the academy of inscriptions, and professor of Arabic at Paris, where he died 1715. He published a Collection of Maxims and Bon Mots from oriental writers—a treatise on the Origin of Coffee—an account of the death of the Sultan Osman, &c.—Arabian Nights' Entertainments, and some curious dissertations on medals, &c.

GALLE, or GALLÆUS, Servatius, pastor of the Walloon church at Haerlem, wrote Dissertationes de Sibyllis et Oraculis, 1688, 4to.—besides an edition of Lactantius, with notes 1660, 8vo.—and of the Sibylline Oracles, with notes, &c. He died 1709.

GALLET, N. a French spice merchant, who died at Paris, June, 1757. He is known for some short comic pieces, which appeared on the French theatre with applause. He wrote also songs and poetical trifles, with great neatness and pleasing variety.

GALLIENUS, a Roman emperor, son of Valerian. He was assassinated 268.

GALLIGAI. Vid. GALIGAI.

GALLITZIN, Basil, a noble Russian, in great favour with the regent princess Sophia during the minority of the Czars Peter I. and Iwan, who reigned jointly. He was unfortunate in his military expeditions against the Tartars, and his influence was greatly diminished. When the princess regent was discovered in her secret intrigues to destroy the Czar Peter, and to raise her favourite to the throne by marrying him, she was confined to a monastery near Moscow, and Gallitzin banished to Kargapol, in Siberia. He afterwards recovered his liberty, and retired to a monastery, where he died in great austerity, 1713, at the age of 80. Though unsuccessful in his ambitious views, he was a man of great merit, whose attention introduced improvement and civilization into the Russian empire, and prepared the way for the illustrious reign of Peter the Great.

GALLITZIN, Michael Michaelowitz, prince of, of the same family as the preceding, was born 1674, and distinguished himself under Peter the Great against Charles XII. of Sweden. He commanded ten years in Finland, and concluded the peace of Neustadt. He died 1730, field-marshal, and president of the college of war, and highly respected as an able minister and meritorious general. At the victory of Lerna he asked only the pardon of one of the captives for the reward of his services.

GALLOCHE, Lewis, a painter of the French school, who died rector and chancellor of the Royal academy, 1761, aged 91. He was the disciple of Boullongne, and master of le Moine. The Paris churches are adorned by his pieces.

GALLOIS, John, a learned Frenchman, born at Paris, 1632. He was well acquainted with the ancient and modern languages, and of such universal information and splendid talents that he engaged with de Sallo in the conducting of the Journal des Sçavans, a periodical paper, which, from its commencement, Jan. 5th, 1665, has, under various names, and under different revolutions and characters, claimed the public attention. Gallois was patronised by Colbert, whom he instructed in Latin chiefly in his coach, as he travelled between Versailles and Paris. He was made member of the academy of sciences, 1668, and of the French academy 1673, and after his patron's death, librarian to the king, and then Greek professor of the Royal college. He died of the dropsy 1707, and in 1710, a catalogue of his books was printed, consisting of upwards 14,000 volumes.

GALLOIS, Julien-Jean Cæsar le, a French physiologist, was the son of a farmer, and educated at Caen, where at the outset of the revolution he headed his fellow students, as a Federalist, for which he was obliged to fly from Normandy. He afterwards became a pupil in one of the schools of medicine at Paris, and was admitted to his doctor's degree. He distinguished himself by his "Experiments on the Principle of Life, particularly on that of the Motion of the Heart, and the Seat of this Principle." Much was expected from his farther observations on this abstruse subject; when he was cut off by a peripneumony in February, 1818.—W. B.

GALLONIO, Antonio, an ecclesiastic at Rome, known for his writings on the saints, martyrs, and holy virgins, and especially his work which describes the various cruelties exercised on primitive martyrs, with plates, 1594, in 4to. He died 1605.

GALLOWAY, Joseph, an eminent lawyer of Pennsylvania, was a native of Delaware, and was liberally educated. He was a member of the assembly of that province in 1764, and in opposition to John Dickinson, advocated a transference of the government from the hands of the proprietors to those of the king. He was for some time speaker of the assembly, and a member of the Congress of 1774. In 1776 he deserted the cause of the colonies, and after spending some time with the British in New-York went to England. He there published observations on the conduct of Sir William Howe, in which, notwithstanding his attachment to the British cause, he undisguisedly exhibited and condemned the cruelties of their troops. He also published a work on prophecy, creditable to his talents, learning, and piety. He died in 1803.

GALLUCCI, Tarquinio, an Italian Jesuit, who pronounced an oration on cardinal Bellarmine, and wrote "Virgilianæ Indicationes," in which he asserted in bold and animated language, the superiority of Virgil over Homer, against the opinion of Madame Dacier. He died 1649, aged 75.

GALLUCCI, Giovanni Paulo, an Italian astronomer of the 16th century. He wrote "on the Instruments of Astronomy," 1597—Theatrum Mundi et Temporis, folio, 1507—Speculum Uranicum, folio, &c.

GALLUCCI, Angelo, an Italian Jesuit, born at Macerata. He is author of "Commentarii de Bello Belgico," from 1593 to 1609, Rome, 1674, 2 vols. folio. He died 1674.

GALLUS, Cornelius, a Roman poet, made governor of Egypt by Augustus. He was the friend of Virgil, and he destroyed himself, B.C. 26.

GALLUS, C. Vibius, a Roman emperor after Decius. After two years' reign he was assassinated by his soldiers, 253.

GALLUS, Flavius Claudius Constantius, brother of the emperor Julian, was made Cæsar by Constantius; but afterwards put to death on suspicion of cruelty and ill conduct, 354.

GALLY, Henry, was born at Beckenham, Kent, August, 1696, and educated at Benet's college, Cambridge, where he took his degree of D.D. in 1728, when the king visited the university. In 1721 he was made lecturer of St. Paul's, Covent-garden, and rector of Wanden, Bucks, and in 1728 he was presented to a prebend of Gloucester by King, lord chancellor, to whom he was chaplain. He afterwards had a prebend at Norwich, and became rector of Ashton, Northamptonshire, and St. Giles in the Fields, and in 1735 chaplain to the king. He died August 7th, 1769. He wrote some sermons, besides the Characters of Theophrastus, translated from the Greek, with notes—a dissertation against pronouncing the Greek language according to Accents, 1754, 8vo.—a second dissertation on the same subject, 8vo. &c.

GALVANI, Lewis, an eminent physiologist, born at Bologna. He studied medicine under Galeazzi, whose daughter he married, and in 1762 he began to give lectures in anatomy in his native city. He accidentally discovered, while preparing broth from frogs for his sick wife, that the muscles of these animals were thrown into convulsion by the touch of a dissecting knife, and exhibited all the appearance of the electric shock. The subject was accurately examined by the patient philosopher, and upon incontrovertible grounds he proved that the nerves of all animals are thus powerfully acted upon, and he had the honour of giving his name by this important discovery to this new system of physiology. His observations were communicated to the world in his treatise de Viribus Electricitatis in Motu musculari Commentarius, 1691, and the subject afterwards engaged the attention of Valli, Fowler, Aldini, and especially Volta, who introduced very great improvements in the system. After the death of his wife, in 1790, Galvani became a prey to a severe melancholy, and died 1798, aged 61. He wrote besides tracts on medical subjects, &c.

GALVANO, Antony, a native of the East Indies, governor of the Moluccas. He was prudent and vigorous in his administration, and cleared the sea of pirates, but he reduced himself so much by his liberality that he returned poor to Europe, and not meeting with the treatment which he deserved from John III. king of Portugal, he died in a hospital at Lisbon, 1557.

GAM, David, a brave Welchman at the battle of Agincourt. He observed of the enemy that there were enough to kill, enough to take prisoners, and enough to fly. He fell in the fight in nobly defending the person of Henry V. and just as he expired he was knighted by his grateful sovereign on the field of battle.

GAMA, Vasco, or Vasquez de, an illustrious Portuguese, born at Sines, on the sea-coast of Portugal, immortalized as the discoverer of a passage to the East Indies by the Cape of Good Hope. He set sail from the Tagus, 8th July, 1497, with four ships, and though his expedition was considered as most perilous, he boldly encountered the storms of the African coast, and the more dangerous mutiny of his followers, and on the 20th November doubled the cape, which hitherto had been called the Cape of Tempests, and proceeded as far as Calicut. He redoubled the cape, April, 1499, and returned home after an absence of two years and nearly two months, and was loaded with honours due to his merit and services. In 1502 he again visited the East Indies, with twenty ships, as admiral of the eastern seas, and returned September, 1503, with thirteen ships richly laden. Under John III. he was appointed viceroy of India, and for the third time returned to the country, and fixed the seat of government at Cochin, but he unfortunately died soon after, 24th December, 1525. He was a man of the greatest intrepidity and the most persevering courage, but he also possessed in a very eminent degree the virtues of private life, and for a while forgot his ambition and his fame in deploring the death of his brother and companion, Paulus de Gama. His adventures have been immortalized by the poem of Camoens, called "The Lusiad," translated into English by Mickle.

GAMACHES, Stephen Simon, a member of the French academy of sciences, who died at Paris, 1756, aged 84. He was author of Physical Astronomy, 2 vols. 4to.—Literary and Philosophical Dissertations, 8vo.—System of the Heart—the Elegancies of Language reduced to their Principles, a valuable book.

GAMACHES, Philip de, author of 2 vols. of Commentaries on the Summa of Aquinas, was divinity professor in Paris university, and ably defended the Gallican church against the encroachments of the papal power. He died at Paris, 1625.

GAMALIEL, a Jewish doctor of the law, and a secret disciple of our Saviour. He defended the conduct of the apostles against the machinations of the Sanhedrim, and when Stephen had been cruelly stoned to death, it is said that he caused his remains to be decently buried.

GAMBARA, Lorenzo, an Italian poet, patronised by cardinal Alexander Farnese. He died 1586, aged 90. He wrote a Latin poem on Columbus, besides eclogues, &c. but his poetry is spoken of with great contempt by Muretus.

GAMBARA, Veronica, an Italian lady, born at Brescia. She married the lord of Corregio, and after his death devoted herself to literature and the education of her two sons. She died 1550, aged 65. The best edition of her poems, which possess merit, and of her letters, is that of Brescia, 1759.

GAMBOLD, John, a native of Haverfordwest, educated at Christ church, Oxford, where he took his degree of M.A. 1734. He was, on the presentation of Secker, vicar of Staunton Harcourt, and wrote there "the Martyrdom of Ignatius," a tragedy, 1740, and in 1742 edited at the Oxford press, the New Testament, after Milles. He joined in 1748 the united Moravian brethren, and was for many years their minister in Neville's court, Fetterlane. He was consecrated bishop of his fraternity at the synod, 1754, and in 1765 he established a congregation at Coot-hill, in Ireland. He died in his native town, Sept. 13, 1771, and though an enthusiast he was universally respected for his learning and information, and for his inoffensive manners. He wrote several things for the use of his Moravian brethren, besides a Character of count Zinzendorf—16 Discourses on the second Article of the Creed—and the History of Greenland, translated from the Dutch, &c.

GANDY, James, a painter, who came to Ireland with the duke of Ormond, and died there 1689. He was the pupil and imitator of Vandeyck.

GANGANELLI. Vid. CLEMENT XIV.

GANSEVOORT, Peter, Jun. a distinguished officer in the army of the United States, was born at Albany, July 19th, 1749, of a highly respectable family. In 1775 he was appointed by congress a major in the second New-York regiment, and in August of that year joined the army under Montgomery, which invaded Canada. In March, 1776, he was advanced to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and in November appointed to the colonelcy of the third regiment, and assigned the command of Fort George. In April, 1777, he was transferred to the command of Fort Stanwix, at Rome, and gallantly defended it against the British, under St. Leger, who, after besieging it from the 2d to the 22d of August, retreated. By preventing the co-operation of that general with Burgoyne, he contributed most essentially to the embarrassment and defeat of the latter, and obtained the distinguished applause of the country. In 1781 the state of New-York appointed him a brigadier-general, and he continued in that rank till the close of the war. He afterwards filled a number of respectable offices, among which were, commission of Indian affairs and for fortifying the frontiers, military agent, and brigadier-general in the United States' service, which appointment he received in 1809, and held till his death, July 2d, 1812. He was an eminently brave and skilful officer, discharged the duties of the several stations which he filled with intelligence and fidelity, and was greatly respected and esteemed in private life.

GARAMOND, Claude, a native of Paris, known as an ingenious engraver and letter-founder. He first banished the use of the Gothic, or black letter, and founded his types in so complete a manner that they became universally admired in Europe, and by way of excellence, the small Roman letters were denominated in every country by his name. At the desire of Francis I. he founded three different Greek types, for Robert Stephens, for the publication of the Greek Testament, and of the Greek classics. This ingenious and indefatigable man died 1561, and his types became the property of Fournier the elder, an eminent letter-founder.

GARASSE, Francis, a Jesuit, born at Angouleme, 1585. He displayed his genius by his publication of the elegies on the death of Henry IV. and in a poem in heroic verse addressed to Lewis XIII. on his inauguration. As a preacher he was very eloquent and popular, but he aspired to the public admiration by the force and consequence of his writings. In his style he was violent and scurrilous, and his "Horoscope of Anti-Coton," &c. and his "Calvinistic Elixir, &c." were proofs of the virulence and buffoonery with which he defended his order against the attacks of his enemies. In 1620 he published "Rabelais Reformed, &c." and afterwards in other publications attacked the ghost of Plaquier, an affront which was severely resented by the indignant sons of this reverend father. His "Summe Theologique des Verités Capitales de la Religion Chretienne," published 1625, first raised the torch of dissension and hatred between the Jesuits and Jansenists. The book was attacked by the abbot of St. Cyran, and in 1626 the rector of the Sorbonne complained to his society of the evil tendencies of a composition which recommended heretical opinions, and abounded in false quotations from Scripture. Garasse was in consequence of this, after a solemn examination, censured, but the virulence and animosity which had been excited between the two orders continued to be displayed on both sides with increasing violence. Though supported by the Jesuits in the dispute, Garasse was banished to one of their houses at some distance from Paris. During the pestilence which raged at Poitiers, he showed himself charitably active in the relief of the infected, and fell a victim to the contagion, 14th June, 1631. He is styled by Warburton in his commentary on the Essay on Man, an eminent casuist.

GARBIERI, Lorenzo, a painter of Bologna, pupil to Ludovico Caracci. He died 1654, aged 64.

GARBO, Raphael del, an historical painter of Florence, who died 1534, aged 58. His representation of the resurrection is his best piece.

GARCIA^S II. king of Navarre after Sancho II. died 1000.

GARCILASSO, or GARCIA^S LASSO DE LA VEGA, a Spanish poet, born of a noble family at Toledo, 1500. He was educated under the eye of Charles V. who patronised and esteemed him, and he distinguished himself as much by his valour as by his poetry. After accompanying Charles in his campaigns in Germany, Africa, and Provence, he received a wound on the head from a stone thrown from a tower, when at the head of a battalion, and died three weeks after at Nice, in his 36th year. To his genius and his labours the poetry of the Spaniards is greatly indebted. His works are written not only in elegant language, but with true poetic fire, and his odes are said by Paul Jovius to equal those of Horace in sweetness. His works were published with learned notes by Franc. Sanchez, Naples, .1664, in Svo. There was another Spaniard of the same name, born at Cusco, who wrote the History of Florida, of Peru, and of the Incas.

GARDEN, Alexander, a distinguished Episcopal clergyman, who long resided in America. He was born in Scotland in 1685, and came to Charleston in South Carolina, about the year 1720. Soon after his arrival he became rector of St. Philip's Church in Charleston, in which office he continued for thirty-four years, and died in 1756 in the 71st year of his age. In a short time after he fixed his residence in South Carolina he was appointed commissary of the Bishop of London, for the two Carolinas, Georgia, and the Bahama Islands, and in the discharge of the duties of this high trust was strict, impartial, and exemplary. He was a man of learning, and constant in his attention to the literary as well as the religious interests of the people committed to his care.  L.

GARDEN, Alexander, M.D., was the son of a distinguished clergyman of the same name, belonging to the church of Scotland, where he was born in the year 1728. He received his education in the University of Aberdeen, and afterwards pursued his medical studies with high reputation in the University of Edinburgh. He arrived in South Carolina about the year 1750, and commenced the practice of physic, and also engaged with great zeal in the study of botany. He was an excellent classical scholar, and had made very honourable proficiency in mathematics, natural philosophy, history, and general literature. But natural history was his favourite study, and he made a number of valuable communications to his scientific friends, which were published. The celebrated Linnæus, with whom he corresponded in Latin, gave the name of Gardenia to a flowery shrub in honour of him. Dr. Garden maintained an extensive correspondence with learned men of Europe, and was highly esteemed by them. About the year 1772 he was elected a member of the Royal Society of London. Shortly after his return to Great Britain in 1783, he was appointed one of its councillors, and afterwards one of its vice-presidents. He died in London in the year 1792, in the 64th year of his age.  L.

GARDIE, Pontus de la, a French adventurer in the service of marshal Brisac, and afterwards of the Danes, and then of the Swedes. He was ambassador from Sweden at Vienna and at Rome, and in 1580 he was employed against the Russians, and fought with great success. He was drowned accidentally in the port of Revel 1585.

GARDIN DUMESNIL, N. professor of rhetoric at Paris, was eminent as a scholar, as appears in his Synonymes Latines, in imitation of Girard's Synonymes Francois. He died at Valogne, May, 1802, aged 82.

GARDINER, Stephen, bishop of Winchester, was the illegitimate son of Lionel Woodville, bishop of Salisbury, and brother to Elizabeth the queen of the fourth Edward. He was born at Bury St. Edmunds, Suffolk, 1483, and educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, where his progress in classical literature, and in civil and canon law, was very rapid. His introduction into the Norfolk family, and afterwards into the service of Wolsey, soon rendered him a favourite at court. In the business of the divorce he was sent in 1527 to Rome, where he warmly espoused the cause of his sovereign, and when he found that the pope was inexorable, he turned his attention to procure the dismissal of the virtuous Catharine, without paying any respect to the opinion of the papal court. For his services he was made secretary of state, and in 1531 raised to the see of Winchester. He went afterwards as ambassador to the French court, and when Henry broke off his dependence on the papal see, the new bishop evinced his acquiescence in the bold measure by defending it in his tract de Verâ Obedientiâ. After various employments of confidence and honour, he was at last directed by Henry to draw up articles on an accusation of heresy, against his last wife Catharine Parr, but the devoted queen had the art to avert the storm from her own head upon that of Gardiner, who ever after continued in disgrace with the king. Under Edward VI. he showed himself averse to the introduction of the reformation, and though threatened and imprisoned, he still persevered in his opposition. Under Mary he was restored to his bishopric from which he had been deprived, and he was raised to the high office of lord chancellor and of prime minister. Much to the disgrace of his character he conducted himself in this elevated situation with great caprice and unpardonable cruelty. The protestants who opposed his views were with little ceremony committed to the flames, and these measures of violence and blood were sanctioned by the bigoted queen, and approved by the criminal catholics. He died 12th Nov. 1555, aged 72. In his private character he was not without some good qualities. He was learned, and promoted the cause of learning. His gratitude to Wolsey, to whom he was indebted for part of his greatness, is highly commendable, and though much injured by Henry VIII. he never mentioned his name without marks of respect and affection. That he possessed ambition, the history of his life sufficiently proves, and that he was not unskilled in art and dissimulation is strongly evident from the greatness with which he supported his measures in the midst of jarring factions, and opposite religions.

GARDINER, James, an officer in the army of George II. who on reading a religious book called Heaven taken by Storm, suddenly reformed the licentious conduct of his youth, by the most correct morals, and the most undisguised piety. This worthy man was killed at the battle of Preston-pans, in sight of his own house, 21st September, 1745.

GARENGEOT, René Jacques Croissant de, a French surgeon, born at Vitri 1688. He was royal lecturer on surgery at Paris, and fellow of the London Royal Society, and he acquired great celebrity by the success of his operations, and the ingenious and valuable works which he wrote on his profession. He died at Paris 1759. His works are a Treatise on Surgical Operations, two vols. 8vo.—on Surgical Instruments, 2 vols. 12mo.—the Anatomy of the Viscera, 12mo. &c.

GARESOLES, Anthony, a native of Montauban, where he was divinity professor, and also moderator of the synod of Charrenton. He wrote a Way to Salvation,—de Christo Mediatore,—Explicatio Catecheseos Christ. Relig.—some Latin poems, &c. and died 1650, aged 63.

GARET, John, a Benedictine, of the congregation of St. Maur. He was born at Havre de Grace, and died 1694, aged 69. He edited Cassiodorus, 2 vols. fol. with interesting notes.

GARLANDE, Jean de, a grammarian, born at Garlande en Brie in Normandy. The best known of his works are a "poem on the contempt of the World."—Floretus on the Doctrines of Faith;—Facetus on the duties of Men towards God,—Dictionarium Artis Alchymix, 1571. Basle. He was living in 1081, and as he passed much of his time in England, with William of Normandy, some have imagined that he was an Englishman.

GARNET, Henry, known as one of the conspirators in the gunpowder plot, was born in England, and educated at Winchester school, from whence he went to Rome, and in 1575, took the habit of the Jesuits. In 1586, he returned home as the provincial of his order, and began by secret intrigues to plot the overthrow of the religion of the country. By impiously asserting that the innocent might be involved in the destruction of the guilty, to establish his plans, he encouraged his associates in the forwarding of that dreadful plot which was prevented by a happy discovery. He was in consequence sent to the Tower, and hanged for high treason, at the west end of St. Paul's, May 3d, 1606. Though deservedly punished for his meditated crimes, yet he passed as a martyr among the catholic enthusiasts.

GARNETT, Thomas, a native of Westmoreland, educated at Sedburgh school, under Dawson, from whence he went to Edinburgh to study under Dr. Brown. He afterwards studied surgery in London, and then settled at Harrowgate; but finding success not equally rapid with his expectations, he removed to Liverpool with the intention of emigrating to America. The interference of his friends prevented his leaving the country, and he applied himself to chymistry and natural philosophy, and after reading some lectures on those sciences at Liverpool and Manchester, he was appointed Anderson's lecturer at Glasgow. The establishment of the royal institution in London drew him to the capital, and for two seasons he read lectures to numerous and applauding audiences, after which he resigned, to lecture publicly in his own house, Great Marlborough-street. His prospects of future eminence, however, unfortunately vanished, he died of a fever 28th June, 1802. As an author he was respectable, and as a lecturer intelligent and animated. He published Analysis of the Harrowgate Waters,—a Tour through Scotland, 2 vols. 4to.—a Lecture on Health, 12mo.—various papers, &c. on medical and physical Subjects, and his Lectures on Zoonomia, appeared in 4to. for the benefit of his orphan daughters.

GARNIER, Robert, a French tragic poet, born at Ferté Bernard in Maine, 1534. He studied law at Toulouse, but left it for poetry; and so successful were his attempts that he was compared to Sophocles and Euripides. His merits were rewarded by some honourable offices, and he died 1590. His works, consisting of tragedies, besides elegies, songs, &c. but all in a style and manner which modern improvements render very obsolete, were published at Lyons, 12mo. 1597, and re-printed Paris, 1607.

GARNIER, John, a Jesuit, professor of rhetoric and philosophy, was born at Paris, and died at Bologna, 1681, aged 69. The best known of his works are an edition of Mercator, folio, 1673.—Systema Bibliothecæ Collegii Parisiensis, 4to. 1678, &c.

GARNIER, Julian, a Benedictine monk, who edited St. Basil's works, 3 vols. folio, and died 1723, aged 53.

GAROSALO, Bonvenuto, an Italian painter, born at Ferrara. He succeeded chiefly in copying the pieces of Raphael, and other most celebrated masters. He died 1695, aged 80.

GARRARD, Mark, a painter, born at Bruges in Flanders, 1561. He was in the service of queen Elizabeth, and of Anne the wife of James I. and some of his pieces are preserved in England. He died in London, 1635.

GARRARD, James, governor of Kentucky, was an officer in the revolution, and afterwards a member of the legislature of Virginia, where he contributed much to procure the passage of the religious freedom bill. He was a native of that state, but removed early to Kentucky, and shared in all the perils and privations of the first settlers. He was elected governor in 1796, and was succeeded by Gretnup in 1804. He died at Mount Lebanon, Bourbon county, January 19th, 1822, aged 74.  L.

GARRICK, David, an illustrious English actor. His grandfather was a Frenchman, who left the country at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and his father was a captain in the army, and chiefly resided at Lichfield. David was born at Hereford, where his father was on a recruiting party, and was baptized there in All-Saints church, 20th February, 1716. He was educated at Lichfield school, but was more attached to theatrical pursuits than learning, so that he acted with his fellow-pupils the play of "the Recruiting Officer," and supported himself the character of sergeant Kite. He went afterwards to reside with his uncle, a wine merchant at Lisbon, but soon returned to Lichfield school, and after being six months the pupil and companion of Dr. Johnson, he accompanied him to London in 1735. He was recommended by Mr. Walmsley of Lichfield to Mr. Colson, under whom he might improve himself in mathematical knowledge, and afterwards enter at the Temple. But though he studied for a while under Colson, and entered into partnership in the wine trade with his brother Peter, in Durham yard, not business, but a theatrical life was his favourite object, and soon after the death of his uncle, the Lisbon merchant, who left him 1000*l.* and of his father and his mother, he now without the control of superiors indulged the favourite bent of his heart. The powers with which nature had endowed him were fostered and improved by the conversation and company of the most popular actors, but Garrick, still diffident, flew from a London audience to Ipswich, where in 1741 he performed the part of Aboan in Oroonoko, under the assumed name of Lyddal. His efforts were received with repeated and increasing applause, and thus flushed with provincial approbation, he came to Goodman's fields, and acted Richard III. October 19th, 1741. So superior were his abilities, and so powerful their display, that the other theatres were now left empty, and the house in Goodman's fields was daily crowded with all the beauty, the fashion, and the taste of the town. This success was viewed with envy by his rival heroes Quin and Cibber. By the influence of sir John Barnard, an act of parliament was obtained to shut up the theatre of Goodman's fields, so that Garrick, thus obliged to abandon a situation where he divided the profits with Giffard the manager, made an engagement with Fleetwood the patentee of Drury-lane for 500*l.* a year. Thus popular in England, Garrick passed to Dublin in the summer of 1742, and so prodigious were the numbers which assembled to view this theatrical phenomenon, that in consequence of the crowded houses, and the intense heat of the weather, a contagious disorder fatally broke out in the town, which was called Garrick's fever. In 1747 he became joint patentee of Drury-lane with Lacy, and in July 1749, he married Mademoiselle Violetti, an Italian stage dancer. In 1763 he went with his wife to Paris and Italy, and though some attributed this journey to a jealousy at the successful efforts of Beard in the management of Covent-garden, it was more probably undertaken for the restoration of his health and that of Mrs. Garrick, who received some benefit from the baths of Padua. While on the continent, Garrick was liberally condescending in exhibiting various characters, not only in the presence of the duke of Parma, but before his friends, and so judicious was his discernment, that he foretold the future celebrity of Mademoiselle Clairon, though at that time Dumesnil was the favourite actress of the French stage. He returned to London in April, 1765, but so fearful was he of the public opinion, that with a timidity unworthy of his great character, he always endeavoured to prevent censure, and on this occasion he caused, by means of a friend, to be published "the Sick Monkey," a poem in which, by drawing the censures of animals on himself and his travels, he attempted to blunt the edge of ridicule. In 1769 he projected and conducted the jubilee at Stratford, in honour of Shakespeare, which though admired on one side and ridiculed on the other, should be mentioned with commendation as the homage of a great man, to an immortal genius. By the death of Lacy, in 1773, the whole management devolved on him, and now the fatigues of his situation were so great, and his infirmities were increasing so rapidly, that in June, 1776, he left the stage, and disposed of his moiety to Sheridan, Linley, and Ford, for 35,000*l.* He was seized while at lord Spencer's with a fit, and removed immediately to his house in the Adelphi, where he died three weeks after, 20th Jan. 1779. Besides the display of his astonishing powers on the stage, Garrick merited the public approbation as a writer. The Biographia Dramatica mentions not less than 38 of his plays, some of which were original, and some translations, besides a great number of prologues, epilogues, songs, elegies, &c. A monument has been erected to his memory in Westminster-abbey, and his life has been written by Thomas Davies, 2 vols. 8vo.

GARRIET, Peter, a priest of Montpellier in the 17th century. He wrote an account of Montpellier cathedral, 1631, 12mo.—A chronological view of the Governors of Provence,—Series Præsulum Megalonensium Montispell. ab 451, ad 1652 folio.

GARSULT, Francis Alexander, a learned Frenchman, member of the academy of Sciences. He paid much attention to literature and the arts, and particularly to the history and character of the horse. He died at Paris of a paralytic stroke, November, 1778, aged 85. He wrote the anatomy of the Horse, translated from the English of Snap, 4to.—le nouveau Parfait Marechal, a work of merit,—le Guide du Cavalier,—Traité des Voitures, &c.

GARTH, Sir Samuel, an eminent physician and poet, born in Yorkshire, and educated at Peter-house, Cambridge, where he took his degree of M.D. July 7th, 1691. He settled in London, and was elected fellow of the college of physicians 1692. His assistance and influence were great in the dispute between the physicians and the apothecaries about the establishment of dispensaries, and he boldly supported the former, who with charitable zeal wished to administer to the relief of their fellow-creatures gratis. Irritated at the obstinate conduct of the apothecaries, who violently opposed the benevolent plans of the college, he employed his pen to throw ridicule upon them, and in 1699, produced his "Dispensary," which in a few months went through three editions. The sixth edition of this popular piece appeared 1706, much improved with the episodes and inscriptions, but though it gained so much of the public attention, it wants something of poetical ardour, as Johnson has observed, and no longer supported by accidental and extrinsic popularity, it is now almost forgotten. In 1697, Dr. Garth spoke the annual Latin Speech on St. Luke's day; and in this he showed himself an elegant and refined scholar, and an able and eloquent orator. This high reputation, recommended by polite manners, and agreeable conversation, soon placed Garth at the head of his profession. His noble and spirited conduct, in raising a subscription for the interment of Dryden's corpse, which the licentious son of lord Jefferies had insulted and abandoned, also tended to increase his popularity, and he was one of the first who united to form the Kitecat club, in 1703, composed of above thirty noblemen and gentlemen to support the succession of the Hanoverian family to the throne. In his politics, Garth was the friend of Marlborough and Godolphin, and on their disgrace he, though ridiculed by Prior, employed his pen to defend their conduct, and honour their meritorious services. On the accession of George I. he was knighted with Marlborough's sword, and appointed king's physician in ordinary, and physician general to the army. This very humane and liberal-minded physician died after a short illness, 18th Jan. 1718-19, and his remains were interred at Harrow on the Hill. He was survived by an only daughter, married to the honourable col. William Boyle. His death was universally lamented, and Pope, who loved and admired him, observed that if there ever was a good Christian without knowing himself to be so, it was Dr. Garth. Besides his Dispensary he published "Claremont," on the villa of the duke of Newcastle, and other fugitive pieces, besides an edition of Ovid's Metamorphoses, a book to which he was very partial, &c.

GARTHSHORE, Maxwell, a physician, was born in 1732, at Kircudbright, in Scotland, of which place his father was the minister. At the age of fourteen he was placed with a surgeon and apothecary at Edinburgh, after which he entered into the medical service of the army. In 1756 he settled at Uppingham in Rutlandshire, where he married. After continuing there seven years he removed to London, where he practised with great reputation near fifty years. He was physician to the British Lying-in-hospital, and a fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies. He died in 1812. Some of his papers are in the Philosophical Transactions, and other journals.—W. B.

GARZI, Lewis, a painter, born at Pistoia in Tuscany, and brought up under Andrea Pacchi. He is considered as the successful rival of Carlo Marat, and his finest piece is the painting of the dome of the church of Stigmatie at Rome, by order of Clement XI. undertaken when he was 80. He died 1721, aged 83.

GASCOIGNE, Sir William, chief justice under Henry IV. was born of a noble Norman family at Gawthorpe in Yorkshire, 1350. He was made king's serjeant 1398, and the next year judge of the common pleas, and in 1401, chief justice of the king's bench. He was commissioner to treat with those deluded subjects who had joined the rebellion of the earl of Northumberland, but when archbishop Scroop was taken in arms, he refused, at the repeated solicitations of Henry IV. to condemn him for treason, observing with undaunted firmness that neither the king nor his subjects could legally adjudge a bishop to death. With persevering integrity he pursued his laudable exertions to improve the morals and the jurisprudence of England, and he made some wholesome regulations for the reduction and limitation of attorneys, who it seems were become a public grievance in each county. His presence of mind and his great dignity were most nobly exhibited, when the prince of Wales, determined to rescue one of his servants who was arraigned before the king's bench, presumed to interrupt and even to strike the chief justice. Gascoigne supported the character of his station against the bold aggression, and committed the prince to the custody of the king's bench to await his father's pleasure. The king heard of the circumstance with becoming propriety, and thanked God "that he had given him a judge who knew how to administer, and a son who could obey justice." The venerable judge died soon after, 17th Dec. 1413. He was twice married and left a numerous family. The famous Strafford in the reign of Charles I. was one of his descendants.

GASCOIGNE, George, an early English poet, born in Essex, and educated at both universities according to Wood. He studied at Gray's Inn, and was a soldier in the Low Countries. He cultivated poetry under the patronage of lord Gray de Wilton, and though his verses and language are obsolete, yet he possesses both strength, energy, and elegance. He died at Walthamstow, 1578.

GASPARINI, a grammarian, surnamed Barzizio from the place of his birth near Bergamo. During the troubles of Italy, and the ignorance of the times, he laboured earnestly to restore learning to its ancient splendour. He was professor of belles lettres at Padua, and was patronised by the duke of Milan. He died 1431, aged 61. He wrote in elegant Latin commentaries on several of Cicero's works, besides "Letters and Orations," reprinted 1723.

GASSENDI, Peter, a celebrated French philosopher, born 22d Jan. N. S. 1592, at Chantersier near Digne in Provence. In his infancy he frequently amused himself by gazing at the moon and stars, and as soon as he was able to go to school at Digne, he made such progress that he far outstripped all his fellow-students in every branch of science. After studying philosophy at Aix for two years, he returned to Digne, and at the age of 16 was made teacher of rhetoric, and three years after, he removed to Aix, where he succeeded his old master Fesey as professor of philosophy. His "Paradoxical Exercitations," against Aristotle's philosophy, gained the attention of that humane patron of learning Nicholas Peiresc, and of Joseph Walter prior of Valtte, and by means of these disinterested friends he entered into orders, and gradually rose to the dignity of D.D. and to the wardenship of Digne church, where he continued 20 years. His attention to astronomy had never been relaxed in the midst of all other pursuits, and his reputation became so extensive that in 1645 he was appointed professor of mathematics at Paris. In the discharge of this new office he unfortunately contracted a cold, which assumed such unpleasant symptoms that he left Paris in 1647 to breathe his native air. Here he was patronised by Valois earl of Alais, and while residing under his hospitable roof he planned the life of his benevolent friend Peiresc. He quitted Digne in 1653, and in company with Francis Bernier, a physician, and Anthony Poller, his amanuensis, he came to Paris, and lived in the house of his friend Monmor, master of the court of requests, at whose desire he undertook the life of Tycho Brahe, which appeared 1654, with an account of Copernicus, Purbachius, and Regio-Montanus. His studious pursuits greatly enfeebled his constitution, but he was in some degree relieved by phlebotomy. He had already undergone that operation nine times when he remonstrated, but one of his physicians prevailed upon the other two to assent to the necessity of a repetition of the bleeding, and the yielding patient submitted to it, even to a fourth time. He soon after sunk under his complaints, and placing the hand of his faithful amanuensis on his heart, after hearing that the motion of that spring of life was faint and fluttering, he exclaimed in these last words, "you see what is man's life," and immediately expired, 22d Oct. 1655. His papers were left to the care of his friend Monmor, who with the assistance of an able and impartial judge, perused them and deemed them all worthy of the name of the philosopher. These, therefore, with the books printed before, appeared uniformly in 6 vols. fol. at Leyden, 1658. This great man, who lived and died in the bosom of the catholic church, was the friend and correspondent of Kepler, Longomontanus, Snellius, Hevelius, Galileo, Bullialdi, Kercher, and other respectable scholars, and to his genius, learning, and application, are owing in some degree the rapid improvements in philosophy, which banished the foolish and unreasonable hypothesis of Aristotle and of his followers from the schools of Europe.

GASSION, John de, a native of Pau, distinguished in the army under duke de Rohan, in favour of the protestants, and under Gustavus of Sweden, whose body-guards he commanded in the German wars. On the death of Gustavus he returned to France, and fought under la Force. His valour was eminently displayed at the victory of Rocroy, and he was made a marshal of France in consequence of the honourable wounds he received at the siege of Toulouse, 1643. He was afterwards in the wars of Flanders, and fell at the siege of Lens, 1647.

GAST, John, a native of Dublin, descended from a French protestant family. He was educated at Dublin college, and from the curacy of St. John's church he became rector of Arklow, which he afterwards exchanged in 1775 for St. Nicholas without Dublin. He also obtained the archdeaconry of Glandelagh, and the living of Newcastle, and died 1788, aged 73. He published in 1753 the Rudiments of Grecian History, a work of merit, for which the university of Dublin honoured him with the degree of D.D. without the usual expenses—and a Letter from a Clergyman of the Irish established Church to his Popish Parishioners.

GASTALDI, John Baptiste, a native of Sisteron, who died at Avignon, 1747, aged 73. He was eminent as a physician, and was employed in the household of the French king. He wrote Institutiones Medicinæ Physico-Anatomix, 12mo.—Medical Tracts on Curious Subjects, &c.

GASTAUD, Francis, an ecclesiastic of Aix in Provence, father of the oratory, preacher in Paris, and afterwards a pleader in his native city. He was very violent in his dislikes and in his attachments, and therefore while he supported the opinions of Quesnel, he acrimoniously attacked Girard and his friends. He died 1732 at Viviers, where he had been banished, and as he had insulted the bishop of Marseilles in his writings, he was denied the honours of sepulture. He wrote a set of Homilies, &c.—the Policy of the Jesuits Unmasked, &c.

GASTON, of France, John Baptist, duke of Orleans, was son of Henry IV. and brother of Lewis XIII. and he is known for his deep intrigues against the power of Richelieu. He died 1660, aged 52.

GASTON DE FOIX, duke of Nemours, son of the count d'Etampes, by Mary the sister of Lewis XII. early distinguished himself in the army in Italy. He defeated the Swiss, and obtained a glorious victory at Ravenna, and soon after fell in the field of battle, 1512, aged 24.

GASTRELL, Francis, an English prelate, born at Slapton, in Northamptonshire, about 1662, and educated at Westminster school, and Christ-church, Oxford, where he took the degree of M.A. 1687. He was preacher at Lincoln's inn and Boyle's lecturer, and he distinguished himself not only by his eloquence in the pulpit, but by his writings in defence of the Christian religion. In 1700, he took his degree of D.D. and became chaplain to Harley, speaker of the Commons, and in 1702, he was appointed canon of Christ-church, Oxford. In 1711, he was chaplain to the queen, and in 1714, he was raised to the See of Chester, with permission to retain his canonry. As bishop, he refused to admit Peploe, vicar of Preston, to the wardenship of Manchester college, because he had not taken the degree of B.D. as the statutes required. The candidate had indeed been admitted to that degree by the archbishop, but Gastrell considered a metropolitan degree as nothing, till the interference of the court of king's bench decreed, that the primate's qualification was sufficient. On this occasion the bishop received the solemn thanks of the university of Oxford, for his vindication of their rights and privileges, not only in his conduct, but in the pamphlet, which he wrote in his own defence. Though popular under the administration of queen Anne, Gastrell became obnoxious to the ministers of George I. but though he disliked the arbitrary manners and haughty temper of Atterbury, he boldly opposed the proceedings against him, and censured the conduct of his accusers, as too violent, acrimonious, and uncharitable. He died of the gout, 24th Nov. 1725, and was buried in Oxford cathedral, without any monument. He is well known for his considerations concerning the Trinity, and "Remarks on the Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity, by Dr. Samuel Clarke," besides "the Christian Institutes, or the Sincere Word of God, &c." a useful performance, first published 1707, and his defence of the Christian Religion, against the deists, preached at Boyle's lectures, and afterwards digested into a continued discourse, 1699.

GATAKER, Thomas, an English divine, descended from a Shropshire family, and born 1574, in the parsonage house of St. Edmund, Lombard-street, where his father was minister. He was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, and on the foundation of Sidney college, he was on account of his great abilities admitted one of the fellows. After being tutor, and chaplain to the families of Ayloff, and Sir William Cook, he was appointed, 1601, preacher of Lincoln's Inn. In 1611, he married and took the living of Rotherhithe in Surrey. In 1620, he travelled into the Low Countries, and every where distinguished himself as an able preacher, and an active opponent of the popish tenets. As a writer he excited the public attention by his "Discourse on the Nature and Use of Lots, a treatise historical and theological, 1619, 4to." and by his defence of it, 1623, and so high was his reputation that, on the removal of Dr. Comber, he was offered the mastership of Trinity college, Cambridge, which his infirm health did not permit him to accept. He was one of the assembly of divines who met at Westminster, concerning justification, and other theological subjects, and though he declared strongly in favour of episcopacy, he signed the covenant, in obedience to the sense of the majority of his brethren. In 1648 he was the first of the 47 ministers who signed a remonstrance to the army, and the general, against the design of trying the king, and both in private and in the pulpit, he spoke against the prevailing tenets of the independent faction. He was a sufferer by the violence of the times, yet when his parishioners refused to pay him the composition which they had agreed in lieu of the tithes, he bore the disappointment with patience, and turned his attention to literary pursuits. He married four wives, and died 1654, aged 80, and was buried in his own church. His funeral sermon was preached, and published with a narrative of his life, by Simon Ashe, but he gave directions that no monument or stone should mark the place where his remains were deposited. He was a man who, to extensive erudition, united great moderation and benevolent principles. He opposed strongly in the reigns of James, and Charles I. the high notions of churchmen, and deprecated the fatal consequences which he foresaw would fall on the government, and on the church. The moderation of his conduct drew upon him the abuses and the virulence of the bigoted fanatics of the times, but he always preferred peaceful retirement, and such uniform conduct as his conscience approved, to all the reputation of guilty elevation and successful artifice. As a critic, and a writer, he was highly respected, and Salmasius, Axenius, Colomies, and others, bear honourable testimony to his abilities. He was one of the divines who wrote Annotations on the Bible, especially Isaiah, Jeremiah, and the Lamentations, and Calamy has observed that no commentator, ancient or modern, is entitled to higher praise. He wrote besides "Mareus Antoninus's Meditations, with a discourse on the Philosophy of the Stoics, and a Commentary," 1697 — "Opera Critica," Utrecht, fol. 1668, and he was besides engaged in a controversy with Lilly, the astrologer, in which more learning, and more animosity were shown than became the subject. Some of his MSS. were published by his son Charles, rector of Haggeiston, Bucks, who was also a writer on controversial divinity, and died 1680, aged 66.

GATES, Sir Thomas, was a member of the Virginia company named in the patent of 1606, and was constituted lieutenant general of the colony under lord Delawar in that of 1609. He arrived in May, 1610, and assumed the government. Lord Delawar arriving in June following, it was surrendered to him. Sir Thomas returned to England, and again arriving in Virginia in August, 1611, he succeeded Sir Thomas Dale in the administration, bringing large supplies for the use of the colony. He again returned to England in 1614, and the government reverted to Dale. Gates afterwards went to the East-Indies where he died.

GATES, Horatio, major general in the army of the United States, was a native of England. He entered the British service in early life, and rose by his merits to the rank of major. He was aid to general Monkton, at the capture of Martinico, and was with Braddock at his defeat in 1755. At the close of that war he settled in Virginia, where he resided till the commencement of the revolution in 1775, when he received from congress the appointment of adjutant general, and accompanied general Washington to Cambridge. In June, 1776, he was advanced to the command of the army in Canada. General Schuyler succeeded him a few months in 1777, but in August he resumed his station, and in the following October revived the hopes of his country, and overthrew those of the British, by the capture of Burgoyne and his army. In June, 1780, he was appointed to the command of the southern army, but being soon after defeated by Cornwallis at Camden, was in consequence superseded by General Greene. He was restored to his command in 1782. After the termination of the war he resided on his farm in Virginia, till 1790, when he removed to New-York, where he lived highly respected for his talents, the essential services he had rendered his country, and his piety, till his death, in 1806.

GATIMOSIN, the last of Mexican kings, was nephew to Montezuma. He was cruelly tortured in a fiery ordeal by Cortez and the Spaniards, who wished to discover his treasures, and three years after, he was ignominiously hanged in his capital, with many of his caciques, in the sight of his subjects, 1526.

GAVANTS, Bartholomew, a Barnabite monk, born in the Milanese. He wrote the Thesaurus Sacrorum Rituum, on the Ceremonies, &c. of the Roman church, 5 vols. 4to. with plates—Manuale Episcoporum—a tract on conducting Synods, &c. He died at Milan, 1638, aged 70.

GAUBIL, Anthony, a French missionary in China, where he resided 30 years. He was born at Caillac, 1708, and died 1759. He was interpreter at the court of Pekin, and astonished even the Chinese themselves for his knowledge of their language. He sent some curious anecdotes to Europe, and published a good history of Gengis Khan, 1739, 4to. and a translation of Chou-king, 1771. His eulogium appears in the 31st volume of Lettres Curieuses, et Edifiantes."

GAUBIUS, Jerome David, a native of Heidelberg, who studied medicine under his uncle, a physician at Amsterdam, and afterwards went to Handeryck, and to Leyden. In 1731, he succeeded his illustrious friend and preceptor Boerhaave, as Lecturer of Botany and Chymistry at Leyden, and obtained the medical professorship three years after. He died 1780, aged 75. His works are a Thesis on the Solids, 1725, when he took his doctor's degree—another on the method of Prescribing, and Writing Recipes, a valuable work, 1738—Institutiones Pathologicæ Medicinalis, 4to. 1758.—Adversaria de Variis Argumentis, &c. He also edited Albinus de Præsigniâ Vitæ et Mortis—Cramer's Elementa Artis Docimasticæ, &c.

GAUD, Henry, a painter and engraver of Utrecht, who died 1639. His seven engravings from Adam Elshamier's pictures are much admired.

GAUDEN, John, a prelate, born 1605, at Mayfield, Essex, where his father was vicar. He was educated at Bury St. Edmund's school, and St. John's college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts. In 1630 he married the daughter of Sir William Russell, of Chippenham, Cambridgeshire, and obtained that vicarage, and afterwards the rectory of Brightwell, Berks. From his connexion with Oxford, he entered at Wadham college, and took his degree of D.D. 1641. He was chaplain to lord Warwick, and he preached before the House of Commons, in a style which procured, with their approbation, the present of a large silver tankard, with an appropriate inscription, and afterwards the rich deanery of Bocking, in Essex, for the regular possession of which he obtained the collation of Laud, then a prisoner in the Tower. He submitted to the regulations of the parliament, upon the abolition of the hierarchy, and he was one of the assembly of divines, who met at Westminster, though Godwin was afterwards substituted in his room. When preparations were made to try the king, he was one of those divines who boldly petitioned against it, and after the king's death he published "a Just Invective against those who murdered king Charles I. &c." His zeal was further manifested in printing the "Icon Basilike," with a copy of the MS. of which, written by the unfortunate Charles, he had been intrusted, and though diligent search was made by the parliament for the publisher of that popular book, Gauden had the good fortune to escape discovery. In 1659 he published "the Tears, Sighs, &c. of the Church of England, &c. in 4 books, folio," and so highly approved were his services that he was made, on the death of Brownrigg, preacher to the Temple, and bishop of Exeter. In 1662 he was removed to Worcester, but, it is said, that he was so much disappointed in not being translated to the rich see of Winchester, that he died of a broken heart in September that same year. Though he had cleared upwards of 20,000*l.* by renewing leases at Exeter, his widow, with his five children, petitioned the king for the half year's profits of the see of Worcester, which was refused. Gauden has been censured for his ambition, and he is described by Clarendon, Burnet, Kennet, and others, as so inconstant, ambiguous, and covetous of preferment, that he would follow any party or subscribe to any opinions to gain his ends. Wood says that he was esteemed by all who knew him, that he was a man of vast parts, of unwearied labour, and much resorted to for his most admirable and edifying way of preaching. He wrote several tracts on the politics and theological disputes of the times. Some have considered the Icon Basilike, as wholly written by him, but the style is so superior to that of the bishop, that the king is now regarded as the sole author of it.

GAUDENTIO, a painter of Milan, born about 1480. He adorned the churches of his native city with fresco and oil paintings.

GAUDENTIUS, St. a bishop of Brescia, who obtained his preferment much against his wishes from the hands of St. Ambrose. He wrote sermons—letters—the Life of Philaster, his predecessor, &c. published, Brescia, fol. 1738, and died 427. Another, in the same age, wrote two apologies for the Donatists, of whom he was bishop.

GAUDENZIO, Paganin, a native of the Valteline. He received his education at Rome, where he acquired celebrity as Greek professor, and afterwards at Pisa, where he filled the chair of belles lettres. He wrote Declamationes—Chartæ Palantes—Obstetrix Literaria—Academ. Instar.—de Philosophiâ apud Romanos. Initio et Progressu, 4to. and died 1648, aged 52.

GAVESTON, Peter, son of a Gascon gentleman, is known in English history as the favourite of Edward II. In his elevation he was proud, overbearing, and cruel, and the barons therefore rose up against him, and he was beheaded 1312.

GAULI, Giovanni Baptista, a painter of Genoa, who died at Rome 1709, aged 68. His chief merit was historical and portrait painting.

GAULMIN, Gilbert, a French writer of some celebrity, acquired by his harangues in the society of beaux and belles. He died 1665, aged 60. He wrote Commentaries on Psellus and Theod. Prodromus, besides Remarks on the false Callisthenes,—an edition of Romance of Ismenus and Ismenias, &c.

GAUPP, John, a native of Lindau in Swabia, educated at Jena. He was the protestant pastor of his native town, where he died 1738, aged 71. He was an able mathematician, and wrote Gnomonica Mechanica Universalis, 4to. besides some tracts on Astronomy, Chronology, sermons, &c.

GAURICO, Luca, an Italian professor of astronomy at Ferrara. His prediction that John Bentivoglio would lose the supreme power of Bologna, exposed him to persecution, and he removed to Venice, and then to Rome. He was made bishop of Civita in Naples by pope Paul, who was a great follower of astrology, but he resigned the see in 1550, and came to Rome, where he died 1558, aged 83. His works on astrology and astronomy appeared at Basil, 3 vols. fol. 1575. His brother, Pomponio, wrote Latin poems, tracts on Physiognomy, architecture, &c. and died professor in Naples university.

GAUSSEM, Jane Catherine, a celebrated actress, who, after enjoying for 30 years the applauses of a French audience, retired from the theatre 1664, from motives of religion. She died at Paris 1767, aged 56.

GAUTHIER, Jean Baptiste, a French abbé, chaplain to de Langle, bishop of Boulogne, and to Colbert, bishop of Montpellier, was born at Louviers in the diocese of Evreux 1685. He died of a fall 1755. He wrote against Infidels. His chief works are "a tract against Pope's Essay on Man," which he describes as impious,—Letters against Hardouin and Berruyer, 3 vols. 12mo.—an Attack upon the Jesuits, 3 vols. and other works mentioned in "France Literaire" 1758.

GAY, John, an English poet, born 1688, near Barnstaple, Devon. The only education which he received was at the free-school of his native town, under Luck, who had some knowledge of poetry, but such was his taste for literature, that when his parents, who were poor, though of a respectable family, bound him apprentice to a silk-mercator in London, he attended behind the counter with silent indignation, and, as soon as he could, he purchased his indentures of his master. Now freed from the shackles of business, he cultivated the muses, and was introduced to the wits of the times. Flattered with the friendship of Swift and of Pope, he courted the public approbation by dedicating, in 1711, his first piece, "Rural Sports, a Georgic," to the latter of these high poetical characters. But though successful as an author, his resources were scanty, and his creditors now threatened his liberty, when the patronage of the dutchess of Monmouth, by appointing him her secretary, placed him above want, and called his muse to new exertions. In this sunshine of prosperity he wrote his "Trivia, or the art of Walking the Streets," and the next year he formed the plan of his "Pastorals." In espousing the cause of Pope, who had been insulted by Philips, he not only produced an excellent poem, "the Shepherd's Week," which rivalled his antagonist's performance, but he fixed the friendship and gained the recommendation of his poetical patron. He was flattered by the ministry, and was sent as secretary to lord Clarendon, in his embassy to Hanover. The death of queen Anne seemed to ruin his hopes, but he paid his court to the new ministry, and ensured the patronage of the princess of Wales by a well-timed compliment. He was admitted into the company of the great and powerful, and the sweetness of his manners, and the sincerity of his heart, gained him friends wherever he appeared. He went to Aix in France with Mr. Pulteney, and at his return he introduced on the stage his "Three Hours after Marriage," which did not meet with the same success which his "What d'ye call it" had a little time before commanded. In 1718 he was with Pope at Lord Harcourt's, where he celebrated in beautiful verse the sad catastrophe of the two lovers destroyed by lightning. In 1720, he recruited his finances by a handsome subscription to his poems, in 2 vols. 4to. but the whole, amounting to 1000*l.* was ventured and lost in the unfortunate South Sea scheme. This stroke had such effect upon his spirits that he almost sunk under the loss, but by the friendship and advice of Dr. Arbuthnot he gradually recovered. In 1724 he read his "Captives" before the princess of Wales, and at her request wrote his beautiful and elegant fables for the use of the duke of Cumberland. In 1727 he produced his "Beggars Opera," which met with the most unusual success, and was acted 63 successive nights in London, 50 at Bath and Bristol, and with equal popularity at other places. So great indeed was the public admiration, that the songs of the opera appeared on the fans of the ladies, and the person who acted Polly, though hitherto obscure, became an important character in the history of the town, and at last, though mother of some natural children, she rose by marriage to the rank of a dutchess. This favourite play owed its celebrity to the unpopularity of the court, and the resentment of the poet, who was offered the place of gentleman usher to the young princess Louisa, which he rejected with marked indignation. To take advantage of his situation with the public, he produced a second part to the Beggar's Opera, by the title of "Polly," but the court forbid its appearance on the stage, and Gay had the satisfaction of obtaining an unusually large subscription for its publication. To make his triumph complete, the duke and dutchess of Queensbury embraced his cause, resigned their places at court to patronise him, and ever after made him an inmate at their splendid table. Thus raised to independence and comfort, he began to improve "the Wife of Bath," a play which had been received with indifference in 1714, but the second representation, in 1720, was unsuccessful, and brought upon his spirits a severe fit of melancholy. Some lucid intervals indeed interposed during the gloomy depression, and under the hospitable roof of the duke, at Amesbury, he was enabled to finish his opera of "Achilles." He came to town to present his play to the stage, but an inflammatory fever unhappily brought on a mortification in his bowels, and he died at Burlington-house 11th December, 1732. His bequest to his friend Pope was faithfully complied with, and these his verses were accordingly engraved on his tomb;

*Life is a jest, and all things show it,
I thought so once, but now I know it.*

After lying in state at Exeter change, his remains were conveyed to Westminster abbey, by the duke of Queensbury, and interred in the southeast aisle, against the tomb of Chaucer, where his monument is erected. The opera of Achilles afterwards appeared on the stage for the benefit of his two widowed sisters, Catherine Ballet, and Joanna Fortescue, who inherited equally his property of about 3000*l.* A few years afterwards a comedy, "the Distressed Wife," was published under his name, and in 1754 a humorous piece called the Rehearsal at Gotham. His papers were left to the care of Pope, who suppressed some of them as friendship and delicacy required.

GAY, Ebenezer, D.D. minister of Hingham, Massachusetts, was born in 1696, graduated at the university of Cambridge, Massachusetts, in 1714, and was ordained to the work of the ministry in 1718. He died in 1787, in the 91st year of his age, and the 69th of his ministry. Dr. Gay was a man of strong mind, and extensive information; and stood in the first rank of the divines of New-England in his day. He made a number of publications, which were honourable to his talents and piety.

GAYOT DE PITAVAL, Francis, a French author, born at Lyons. He wrote "Causes Celebres," a voluminous work, in 20 vols. 12mo. which, though interesting in some parts, is yet insipid in style, and inelegant composition. Gayot was unfortunate in all his pursuits. He was successively an abbé, a soldier, and at 50 an advocate. He died 1743, aged 70.

GAZA, Theodore, an eminent scholar, born at Thessalonica, in Greece, 1398. Upon the invasion of his country by the Turks, in 1430, he came to Italy, and by his great assiduity became one of the brightest ornaments to whom Europe is indebted for the revival of learning. He soon gained a perfect knowledge of the Latin language, and was introduced to the patronage of Cardinal Bessarion. In 1450 he came to Rome, and was, with several others, engaged by pope Nicolas V. in translating Greek authors into Latin, and after the death of that pontiff, in 1456, he went to the court of Alphonsus, king of Naples. Two years after, he returned to Rome, and by the patronage of his friend Bessarion, he was presented to a small benefice in Calabria. In his old age he presented one of his performances, beautifully written in vellum, to pope Sixtus IV. and while he expected a liberal reward, he was asked by the pontiff what his expenses had been, and these were carefully repaid, which treatment so excited his indignation that he exclaimed, "It was high time to return home, since the over-fed asses of Rome had no relish but for thistles and weeds." The money he had received he contemptuously threw into the Tiber, and died soon after of grief and disappointment. The works of Gaza consisted of original pieces, and of translations—Grammaticæ Græcæ, Libri quatuor, written in Greek 1495, translated by Erasmus 1522—Liber de Atticis Mensibus, and translation of Cicero's de Senectute, et de Somnio Scipionis, into Greek—and Aristotle's History of Animals, translated into Latin, and other works. Gaza's learning and reputation were so highly respected that, Scaliger says, there were not more than three he was inclined to envy, Theodore Gaza, Angelus Politianus, and Picus of Mirandula. He is ranked among the best translators of Greek authors into Latin, though, indeed, Erasmus objected to the elegance of his Latin idiom, and Huetius, in commending his fidelity and perspicuity, allows that some things might have been rendered better. He died at Rome 1478, aged 80.

GAZALI, OF ABON HAMED MOHAMMED ZEIN EDDIN AL THOUSI, a mussulman doctor, who died at Khorassan, his native place, 1112, aged 56. He wrote "the Several Classes of Sciences which concern Religion." Two others of the same name were authors. One of them wrote a tract on the Mercy of God.

GAZET, William, a native of Arras, who died 1612, aged 53. He was an ecclesiastic, and wrote a Chronological History of the Archbishops of Cambray—Ecclesiastical History of the Low Countries, and other works.

GAZOLA, Joseph, a physician of Verona, who died 1715, aged 54. He is very candid in his works, and acknowledges that patients as often died by the negligence or ignorance of their physicians as by the force of disease.

GAZON-DOURXIGNE, S. M. M. a native of Quimper, was known as a critic, but as a poet little regarded. He died 19th Jan. 1784.

GAZZOLI, Benozzo, an Italian painter, who died 1478, aged 78. He painted landscapes, portraits, and sacred subjects.

GEBER, John, an Arabian physician of the ninth century. He wrote a Commentary on Ptolemy's "Syntaxis Magna," published Nuremberg 1533, and in his labour on alchemy deserved the praises of Boerhaave. His works contain much knowledge, though in such affected jargon that Dr. Johnson has derived the word gibberish from the cant of Geber and his followers. His works are "Astronomy," in nine books, "three books on Alchemy," "Flos Naturarum," "Chymica," &c.

GED, William, an ingenious artist and goldsmith of Edinburgh, who invented a plate for printing whole pages, instead of using a type for every letter. This had first been practised by the Chinese and Japanese in blocks of wood, as pursued by Coster, the European inventor of this simple method. In the prosecution of his plan, Ged applied to the university of Cambridge, in conjunction with some others, to print Bibles and prayer-books after the new method; but much money was sunk in the attempt, and by the villainy of the pressmen and the ill conduct of his partners, the unfortunate adventurer was ruined in his hopes and fortunes. He returned to Scotland 1733, and gave a specimen of his plan by the publication of a Sallust in 1744. He died 19th Oct. 1749. His son James, who had joined him in the Cambridge speculation, became a rebel in 1745, but was pardoned and released in 1748, and died in Jamaica, where he had gone to settle with one of his brothers as a printer.

GEDALIA, a famous rabbi, who died 1448. He wrote an Account of a Chain of Traditions from Adam to the Year of Christ 761, and a treatise on the Creation of the World.

GEDDES, James, a Scotch advocate, born 1710, in the shire of Tweeddale. He displayed great powers of application while at the university of Edinburgh, and was rapidly advancing to opulence and celebrity in the profession of the law when he was cut off by a lingering consumption before he reached his 40th year. To the dry labours of the law he added a very polished and elegant taste for classical literature. He wrote "an Essay on the Composition and Manner of Writing of the Ancients, particularly Plato," published Glasgow, 1748, 8vo.

GEDDES, Michael, a learned divine, for some years chaplain to the Lisbon factory, where the inquisition suspended his ecclesiastical labours, and obliged him to return to England. He was honoured with the degree of LL.D. from the university of Oxford, and made chancellor of Sarum. He died 1715, author of a History of the church of Malabar—the church History of Æthiopia—Miscellaneous Tracts against Popery, 3 vols. 8vo. &c.

GEDDES, Dr. a native of Ruthven, Bamffshire, educated at a village school in the Highlands, and removed, 1758, to the Scottish college at Paris. He became in 1764 priest of a Roman catholic congregation in Angushire, and the next year chaplain in lord Tranquair's family. In 1769 he was minister at Auchinhalrig, Bamffshire, and 10 years after he obtained the degree of LL.D. at Aberdeen, and then removed to London, and officiated in Dukestreet chapel, Lincoln's Inn Fields, and in the Imperial Ambassador's chapel. He began in 1782 his translation of the Bible, of which he published a Prospectus, in 4to. 1786, with an appendix, 1787, addressed to Lowth. At that time he engaged in a controversy with Priestley on the divinity of Christ, and again claimed the public notice by his general answer in 1790 to the various queries, criticisms, and hints offered to him on his meditated work. The first volume of this long-promised translation appeared in 1792, under the auspices of lord Petre, as far as the end of the book of Joshua, but so severe was the opposition made to the work, that the bishops of his persuasion, offended with the liberties and indelicacies of his version, actually suspended him from his ecclesiastical functions. Regardless of the public displeasure, he published his second volume 1797, but in language still more exceptionable, so that he found it necessary to defend himself against the attacks and reproaches of his opponents, and of critics by his "Critical remarks" in 1800. He died 1802, aged 65. He was in his character, irritable, petulant, and vindictive, though

He possessed great learning and a capacious mind, and he is to be censured for the intemperate and licentious perversions which he wished to introduce in the holy Scriptures. He wrote also an apology for the Roman Catholics of Great Britain.

GEDOYN, Nicolas, a French writer, born at Orleans. He studied at Paris, and was a Jesuit for 10 years; but he returned to the world, and as the friend and favourite of Ninon de l'Enclos, he figured as a man of wit and letters. He was member of the French academy, and of that of belles lettres, and in 1732 was made abbot of Notre-dame de Beaugency. He wrote some ingenious essays and dissertations, published 1745, and is chiefly known for his elegant translations of Quintilian and of Pausanias. He died 1744, aged 77.

GEER, Charles de, a native of Sweden, descended from a noble Dutch family, and educated at Utrecht and at Upsal under Linnaeus. He acquired much property by the introduction of new machines in the iron works of Dannemora, and by an apparatus for drying corn by smelting houses. He was, in 1761, made marshal of the court, and knight of the Polar Star, and a baron. He died 1778, aged 58, much respected not only as a man of science, but as a benevolent man, who employed his great resources to the relief and the comfort of the poor. He was author of Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire des Insectes, 7 vols. 4to.—on the Procreation of Insects—and papers on the Transactions of the Academies of Stockholm and Upsal, &c.

GEINOZ, Francis, a learned Swiss abbé, member of the academy of belles lettres at Paris, and author of some valuable dissertations on Ancient Medals—on the Plan and Character of Herodotus, &c. He died at Paris 1752, aged 56, much esteemed for his learning as well as his probity and benevolence.

GEJER, Martin, a native of Leipsic, professor of Hebrew, ecclesiastical counsellor to the elector of Saxony, and author of commentaries on several of the books of the Old Testament, &c.—and a treatise on the mourning of the Hebrews, all in 2 vols. fol. He died 1681, aged 67.

GELASIVS, the elder, bishop of Cæsarea in Palestine, in the fourth century, was nephew of Cyril of Jerusalem. He translated into Greek two books of the ecclesiastical history, &c. He is praised by Theodoret and Jerome for the elegance of his style. A fragment of one of his homilies is preserved in Theodoret.

GELASIVS, of Cyzicus, bishop of Cæsarea about 476, is author of a history of the Nicene Council in three books, not very respectable, according to Photius, for either style or matter.

GELASIVS I. bishop of Rome after Felix II. 492, was engaged in unsuccessful attempts to settle the disputes between the eastern and western churches. He wished also to expunge from the list of saints the name of Acacius, which Euphemius, patriarch of Constantinople, opposed. Some of his works are extant on controversial subjects. He died 496.

GELASIVS II. a Campanian by birth, raised to the pontificate 1118. He was ejected from his see by Cencio Frangipani, consul of Rome, and by the influence of the emperor Henry V. and after in vain endeavouring even by force of arms to regain the popedom, he retired to the monastery of Clugny in France, and died 1119.

GELDENHAUR, Gerard Eobanus, a German, born at Nimeguen 1482. He studied at Deventer and Louvain, and such was the reputation of his learning that he was invited to the court of Charles of Austria, which offer he declined for the office of secretary to the bishop of Utrecht. He visited by order of Maximilian of Burgundy, in whose service he afterwards was, the schools and the churches of Wirtemberg, and was so struck with the zeal and innocent manners of the protestants there, that he abjured for their tenets the popish faith. He afterwards married, and was engaged in the education of youth at Worms, at Augsburg, and lastly at Marburg, where he died of the plague 1542. He was a man well skilled in poetry, history, and rhetoric, but his change of religion, and the freedom with which he inveighed against the pope, offended his friends, and particularly Erasmus, who compared him to the traitor Judas, and spoke with contempt of his conduct and pretended sincerity. He wrote Historia Batavica—Historia suæ Ætatis—Germanic. Histori Illustratio de Viris Illustr. Inferior. Germaniæ, &c.

GELDER, Arnold de, a Dutch painter of Dort, who died 1727, aged 82. He was a disciple and imitator of Rembrandt.

GELDORP, Gualdorp, a painter of Louvain, who died 1618, aged 65. He excelled in portraits and history.

GELEE, Claude, commonly called Claude of Lorraine. Vid. CLAUDE.

GELIENUS, Sigismond, a learned man, born at Prague 1498. He travelled to improve his knowledge of modern languages, and during his residence at Basil, he became acquainted with Erasmus, who recommended him to John Frobenius as a corrector of the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin works, in which his printing-house was engaged. He wrote some valuable works, and especially Latin translations of Dionysius of Halicarnassus, of Appian, Philo, Josephus, Origen, and several others. He also published a dictionary in four languages, Greek, Latin, German, and Slavonian, and showed himself to be a most able and indefatigable scholar. His talents have been deservedly commended by Henry Valesius, Erasmus, and others, and though Huëtius and others impeach his judgment in the great liberties which he took in altering the texts of some authors, especially Arnobius, yet he gave a new turn to whatever passages he did not seem to understand. His disregard for honours was very uncommon, he rejected the splendid offers of the court of Bohemia for the enjoyment of humble life, and though deserving the most affluent fortune, he struggled, says Thuanus, all his life with poverty. He died at Basil 1555, leaving two sons and a daughter.

GELLERT, Christian Furchtegott, an eminent German poet, born at Haynich near Freyberg in Misnia, 4th July, 1715. He studied at Meissen and Leipsic, and as the circumstances of his family were narrow, he maintained himself by being tutor in private families. At the age of 43 he was made professor of philosophy at Leipsic. He died Dec. 1769. He was of a very generous and amiable disposition, but of a hypochondriac habit, and of a constitutional fear of death, which, however, gradually disappeared, so that he expired calm and composed. He acquired universal celebrity by his poetry. His "Fables and Tales," are best known. He wrote besides, hymns, didactic poems, the Devotee, a comedy, &c.

GELLI, John Baptist, an Italian writer, born at Florence, 1498. Though of the humble occupation of a tailor, which he followed till his death, yet he possessed great powers of mind highly cultivated, and wrote some very valuable books. He was universally esteemed for his modesty, and his talents were so much respected that he was acquainted with all the men of genius and learning of his time, and was member of the academy of Florence, and a burges of the city. He died 1563, aged 65. He wrote besides translations from Latin and Greek authors, dialogues after the manner of Lucian, which have been translated into Latin, French, and English, also dissertations, two comedies, la Sporta and l'Errore, and other things.

GELLIBRAND, Henry, professor of astronomy in Gresham college, was born in St. Botolph's parish, Aldersgate, 1597, and educated at Trinity college, Oxford. He became curate of Chiddingtun, Kent, and afterwards devoted the whole of his attention to mathematical pursuits. He took his degree of M.A. 1623, and was intrusted by his dying friend, Briggs, the Savilian professor at Oxford, to complete his Trigonometria Britannica, which he did in 1632.

He was called before the high commission court for permitting his servant, William Beale, to publish an almanac for 1631, omitting the popish saints of the calendar, and substituting the names of the martyrs, for which he was acquitted, though Laud opposed it. Though of a strong enlightened mind, he had not sagacity enough to abandon the Ptolemaic for the Copernican system, and hence his treatises in explanation of plane and spherical triangles—on the improvement of navigation, &c. are confused and unsatisfactory, especially when he treats of the variation of the needle. He died of a fever in his 40th year. He possessed great application as a mathematician, but little genius.

GELON, king of Syracuse, B.C. 484, was universally respected by his subjects for his benevolence and mildness.

GEMELLI-CARRERI, Francis, an Italian writer, author of an interesting account of a voyage round the world, between 1693 and 1698. Some imagine that he never went round the world, but imposed a fictitious account on the public.

GEMIGNAGNO, Vinentio de St. a Tuscan painter, who died 1530, aged 40. He was a disciple and imitator of Raphael.

GEMIGNANO, Giacinto, a painter, born at Pistoia. He died 1681, aged 70. The churches of Rome are adorned with his pieces. His son was also an eminent artist.

GEMINIANI, Francisco, an eminent performer on the violin, and composer, born at Lucca, in Italy, 1680. He studied under Scarlatti and Corelli, and came to England 1714, where he was introduced to George I. He refused to accept the place of master and composer of music in Ireland, because he was a Roman catholic, observing that he never would sacrifice his religion to private interest; and from his particular independence of mind, unwilling to submit to the caprices of the great, he led an unsettled life, and made several excursions into foreign countries. He was so fond of painting, that he injured his income by purchasing pictures, but he found in the earl of Essex a great friend and patron, who supported his necessities. He, however, rejected, as offensive to his independent spirit, the offer of a pension of 100*l.* a year from the prince of Wales. He had employed much time and labour on a treatise on music, which, while on a visit at Dublin, a treacherous female servant conveyed away from his house, and this had such an effect upon him that he died soon after, Sept. 17th, 1762. He composed Corelli's solos into concertos, and published six concertos of his own, besides harpsichord pieces, &c.

GEMISTUS, George, surnamed Pletho, retired to Florence upon the taking of his native city, Constantinople, by the Turks. He lived to above the age of 100, distinguished for his learning and virtues. He was a strong Platonian, and wrote commentaries on the Magic Oracles of Zoroaster—Historical treatises—de Gestis Græcorum post Mantinæ Pugnâ—de Rebus Peloponnes. &c.

GEMMA, Reinier, a Dutch physician, of Dockum, in Friesland, died 1555, aged 43. He was also an able astronomer and mathematician, on which sciences he wrote some valuable works. He practised physic at Louvain. His works are Methodus Arithmeticæ—de Usu Annuli Astronomici—Demonstrationes Geometricæ de Radii Usu, &c.—de Locrum Describend. Ratione, &c.—de Astrolabio Catholico, &c. His son Cornelius was equally eminent, and died 1579, aged 44. He wrote a treatise de Prodigiosa Specie, Naturâque Cometæ, &c.

GENRE, Lewis le, a French historian, born of an obscure family at Rouen, and raised to notice by the kindness of Harlay, archbishop of his province. He died 1733, aged 74. He wrote a History of France, from the commencement of the monarchy to the death of Louis XIII. 3 vols. folio, a valuable work—Manners and Customs of the French—the Life of Francis Harlay, his patron—an Essay on the reign of Louis the Great—the Life of cardinal d'Amboise, &c.

GENRE, Gilbert Charles le, marquis of St. Aubin, counsellor of the parliament of Paris, and master of requests, died at Paris, 1746, aged 59. He wrote "a treatise on Opinion," a learned and elegant performance, 6 vols. 12mo.—Antiquities of the Royal Family of France, 4to.

GENRE, Nicolas le, a French sculptor, who died at Paris, 1670, aged 52. His works are admired for chasteness and elegance of design.

GENRE, Lewis le, a deputy in the national convention, who after being 10 years a sailor, and then a butcher at Paris, displayed himself the fit instrument of the crimes and atrocities of Marat and Robespierre. He figured in all the horrors of the 10th of August, and of September, and the night before the execution of the unhappy Lewis, he proposed in the jacobin club that the body should be cut into 84 pieces, and sent to the 84 departments. In his missions into the provinces, at Lyons, Rouen, Dieppe, &c. he every where spread terror and dismay, but though the friend of Robespierre, he no sooner saw his fall than he attacked him with virulence, and drove away, with a pistol in his hand, all the members of the jacobin club, and brought the key of their hall to the convention. He continued afterwards the enemy of the terrorists, and in his conduct showed deep art and dissimulation, as he had the management to survive every faction. He was member of the council of ancients, and died at Paris, 13th December, 1797, aged 41, desiring in his will, that his body might be sent to the anatomical school for dissection, wishing, as he expressed it, to be useful to mankind even after death.

GENEBRARD, Gilbert, a benedictine monk, born at Riom, in Auvergne, 1537. He espoused in his writings the cause of the league, and after being 13 years professor of Hebrew at Paris, he was nominated to a bishopric, which, however, from his animosity in his pamphlets against Henry IV. he was not permitted to enjoy. By the interest of the duke of Mayence, he afterwards obtained the archbishopric of Aix, but he became there very unpopular by the publication of his treatise against the right of the king of appointing bishops, which was burned by the hands of the hangman. He died 1597, in exile at his priory of Semur, in Burgundy. Besides his acrimonious polemical works, he wrote "a Sacred Chronology," much esteemed—a commentary on the Psalms—"a translation of Josephus, &c."

GENESTUS, Josephus, one of the Byzantine historians who wrote the History of Constantinople from Leo the Armenian to Basilius the Macedonian, in four books, printed Venice, 1733. He flourished 940.

GENEST, Charles Claude, a French poet, born at Paris, 1636. In his attempt to go to India he was taken by the English, and supported himself by teaching French in England. He returned to France, and obtained an abbey, and became member of the Academy. He died 1719, aged 84. He wrote, among other tragedies, Penelope, much admired—some epistles—and a didactic poem on the Proof of the existence of a God, and the Immortality of the Soul.

GENET, Francis, bishop of Vaison, born at Avignon, 1640, son of an advocate, is known for the Theology of Grenoble, 6 vols. 12mo. translated into Latin by his brother the abbé.

GENGA, Jerome, an Italian painter and architect, born at Urbino, founder of the family of the Ghengi. He died 1551, aged 75.

GENGA, Bartholomew, son of the preceding, was eminent as an architect. He died of a pleurisy whilst superintending the fortifications of Malta, 1558, aged 40.

GENGIS KHAN, son of a khan of the Moguls, was born 1193. At the age of 13 he began to reign, but the conspiracies of his subjects obliged him to fly for safety to Aveni Khan, a Tartar prince, whom he supported on his throne, and whose daughter he married. But these ties of kindred were not binding, Aveni joined against Gengis, who took signal vengeance over his enemies, and then with a victorious army directed his power against the neighbouring states, and in the space of 28 years conquered Corea, Cathay, part of China, and the noblest provinces of Asia. His further projects of extended dominion over China were stopped by death, 1227, and his vast kingdom divided among his four sons.

GENNADIUS, a patriarch of Constantinople after Anatolius, 458. He was an able theologian, and active diocesan. Of his works nothing but a fragment of a work against Cyril's anathemas is extant. He died 471.

GENNADIUS, an ecclesiastical writer, who was a priest of Marsilles, and not a bishop, about 493. He wrote "de Dogmatibus Ecclesiasticis" et "Illustribus Ecclesiæ Scriptoribus." He favoured the doctrines of Pelagius.

GENNADIUS, a patriarch of Constantinople, who was at the council of Florence, 1438. He resigned his dignity after enjoying it five years, 1458, and died in a monastery, 1460. He wrote among other things an explanation of the Christian faith in Greek, Latin, and Turkish.

GENNARI, Benedetto, a painter of Bologna, who died 1715, aged 82. He was patronised by Lewis XIV. for whom he painted, and he was also encouraged in England by Charles II. and the English nobility.

GENNARI, Cæsare, son of the preceding, a painter of Bologna, who died 1688, aged 47. He was eminent in historical pieces, and in landscapes.

GENNARO, Joseph Aurelius, a native of Naples, distinguished as an able civilian and as an upright magistrate. The best known of his learned works, which are chiefly on civil law, and written in an easy and pleasing style, is Republica Jurisconsultorum, in which, in the fascinating form of a novel, he gives an account of the most intricate parts of the civil law. This respectable author died 1762, aged 61.

GENOELS, Abraham, a painter of Antwerp, born 1640. He was admired for his landscapes and portraits.

GENOVESI, Anthony, a native of Castiglione, who acquired great celebrity at Naples as a lecturer in philosophy, but exposed himself to the severe censures of bigoted critics, by his metaphysics, in which he recommended the works of Galileo, Grotius, and Newton. The popular odium was averted for a while by the protection of the king of Naples, who appointed him professor of ethics, but his application for the theological chair drew upon him from the clergy the ill-founded charge of heresy. He was afterwards professor of political philosophy, and died 1769, aged 57. He wrote in Italian, a System of Logic—Humorous Letters—Philosophical Meditations on Religion and Morality—Italian Morality, his best work.

GENSERIC, king of the Vandals in Spain, succeeded his father Godegisiles 428. He defeated the Suevi, conquered Africa, pillaged Rome, and became formidable to all the powers on the borders of the Mediterranean. He died 477.

GENSONNE, Armand, an advocate at Bourdeaux, born 10th Aug. 1758. At the revolution he warmly attacked the government, and first gave currency to that horrible opinion, that suspicion was a sufficient reason to condemn a person to death. He, however, wished to refer the sentence of the unhappy Lewis to the primary assemblies, and he had boldness enough to demand in the convention the punishment of the Septembrizers. This proved so offensive to the assembly and to Robespierre, that he was marked for destruction with the Girondists, and was guillotined 31st Oct. 1793.

GENTILE, Ludovico, a painter of Brussels, who died 1670, aged 64. He lived some time in Italy, and painted for churches. His portrait of Alexander VII. is admired.

GENTILIS, de Foligno, a physician, author of commentaries on Avicenna. He wrote also "de Legationibus"—de Juris Interpretibus,—de Advocacione Hispanica, &c. and died at Foligno, 1348.

GENTILIS, Scipio, a native of Ancona, who came into Germany, and studied at Tubingen, Wittemberg, and Leyden, and was professor of civil law at Altorf. He died 1616, aged 51, leaving four children by his wife, a beautiful lady of Lucca, whom about four years before he had married. He wrote "de Jure Publico Populi Romani," "de Conjuracionibus," de Bonis Maternis, &c. Tasso's Jerusalem, translated into Latin verse, 1585, 4to.

GENTILIS, John Valentine, a relation of the preceding, who left his native country, Naples, not to be burnt in consequence of his attachment to Arianism. He fled to Geneva, but was nearly condemned to the flames, by the influence of Calvin. He at last was condemned to lose his head at Berne, for the violence of his religious opinions, 1567.

GENTILIS, Alberico, a native of Ancona, son of a physician. He was a lawyer, and coming to England as attached to protestantism, he was made professor of law at Oxford, and died 1608, aged 58. He wrote six dialogues on the Interpretation of the Law,—a Treatise de Jure Belli, commended by Grotius,—and other works.

GENTILESCHI, Horatio, an Italian painter, born at Pisa 1563. After being admired for his pieces in Genoa, Rome, Florence, and Savoy, he came to England, and was patronised by Charles I. He employed his pencil in adorning the ceilings of Greenwich and York-house, and died in England after twelve years' residence, aged 84. His best work is the portico of cardinal Bentivoglio's palace at Rome.

GENTILESCHI, Artemisia, daughter of the preceding, was eminent as an historical painter. Her David with the head of Goliath, is her best piece. She took some of the portraits of the royal family and of the nobility in England; but chiefly lived at Naples, where her gallantry became as public as her eminence as a painter, and the splendour of her equipage.

GENTILLET, Valentine, a native of Dauphiné, syndic of the city of Geneva. He published, in 1578, an Apology for the Protestants, often edited, and also Anti-Machiavel and Anti-Socinus, 1612.

GENTLEMAN, Francis, an actor, author of eleven dramatic pieces. He died 1784, aged 66.

GEOFFROI, Stephen Francis, a French physician and chymist, born at Paris 1672, son of an apothecary. He visited Italy, Holland, and England, to complete his medical studies, and became professor of chymistry and of medicine at the Royal college at Paris. He died 1731, much respected for his attention and humanity to his patients. His chief work is "Materia Medica" in Latin, 3 vols. 8vo. It was translated by Bergier, and continued by Nobleville, and extended to 17 vols. 12mo.

GEOFFROY, of Monmouth, a British historian, author of Chronicon sive Historia Britonum, a curious book, but too full of legendary tales in the history of the first British kings. He was archdeacon of Monmouth, and bishop of St. Asaph, which he resigned to live at the monastery of Abingdon, where he was abbot. He flourished about 1150.

GEORGE, St. the patron of England, was supposed to have suffered martyrdom in the reign of Dioclesian. Little is known of his history, though he is celebrated by many ecclesiastical writers, and even by some of the Mahometans. The miracles which he is said to have performed are properly regarded as fabulous.

GEORGE of Trebizond, a native of Candia, who came to Rome under Eugenius. He was a popular professor of rhetoric and philosophy at Vicenza, and afterwards became secretary to pope Nicolas V. After residing some time at the court of Alphonso of Naples, he returned to Rome, where he died in a good old age, 1484. He wrote de Arte Rhetoricâ—Reflections on some of Cicero's Orations and Letters, &c. and also translated into Latin Eusebius's Evangelical Preparations—some of the works of Aristotle—Plato de Legibus —Ptolemy's Almagest, &c. besides some controversial works.

GEORGE, the Cappadocian, bishop of Alexandria, was elected bishop of Alexandria by the Arians, after the expulsion of Athanasius, 354. He was of obscure origin, and born in Epiphania, in Cilicia, and for some time he was employed in selling pork and provisions to the army. He afterwards went to Egypt, where though without character or integrity, he was placed on the episcopal seat of Alexandria, by the turbulent opposers of Athanasius. On his elevation he betrayed the most oppressive conduct, he laid taxes severe and arbitrary on the people to enrich himself, and at last became so unpopular, that the populace assassinated him in the sixth year of his episcopacy, 361.

GEORGE, surnamed Amira, a learned Maronite, who came to Rome in the pontificate of Clement VIII. and published a valuable Syriac and Chaldee grammar, 4to. 1596. He afterwards became bishop and patriarch of the Maronites, but he suffered much during the wars between the Turks and the Emirs. He died about 1641.

GEORGE, duke of Clarence, brother of Edward IV. of England, was condemned to death, for conspiring against his brother. As he was permitted to choose his own death, he was, 1478, smothered in a vessel full of Malmsey wine, a liquor to which he was particularly partial. Some suppose that he suffered this cruel treatment from his brother, because it had been foretold by some soothsayer, that the king's children would be deprived of the throne by a man whose name was to begin with a G.; that monster was the duke of Gloucester, Richard III.

GEORGE, prince of Servia, was exposed to the attacks of Mahomet II. to whom he had given his daughter Mary in marriage. After seeing some of his children treated cruelly by the victorious enemy, and his cities depopulated, he died in consequence of a wound which he had received, 1457, in a battle against the Hungarians. He was succeeded by his youngest son Lazarus.

GEORGE LEWIS I. son of Ernest Augustus of Brunswick, elector of Hanover, and Sophia, daughter of Frederic, elector Palatine, and granddaughter of James I. was born 8th May, 1660. He was at the head of the Imperial armies in 1708 and 1709, and behaved with great intrepidity and judgment, and on the death of queen Anne, in 1714, he was called to the throne of England. By espousing the party of the whigs, who had contributed to his elevation, he highly offended the Tories, and instead of reconciling all parties to his administration, he thus sowed the seeds of animosity and rebellion. An insurrection took place in Scotland, in 1715, in favour of the Pretender, and the general tranquillity was restored only after much bloodshed. During his reign, the duration of parliament was extended from three to seven years, and the order of the bath was revived, but the partiality with which the South Sea scheme was patronised in 1720, proved the ruin of several thousand families. George, whose reign was distinguished by firmness and political sagacity, died suddenly at Osnaburg, 11th June, 1727, in his way to Hanover. He had married Sophia Dorothea, daughter of the duke of Zell.

GEORGE AUGUSTUS II. son of the preceding, was born 1683, and succeeded his father as elector of Hanover and king of England 1727. He was engaged in war with the Spaniards, and sent against the American settlements admiral Vernon, who took Porto-bello, though he was unsuccessful in his attack on Carthage. In the continental wars he took an active share, and headed his troops at the battle of Dettingen, 1743, where he obtained a brilliant victory. The insurrection of the Scotch in favour of the Pretender, in 1745, was quelled by the rapidity and valour of the duke of Cumberland, who defeated the rebels at the battle of Culloden 1746. Though the peace of Aix-la-chapelle, in 1748, restored tranquillity on the continent, fresh disputes soon arose, and a new war was kindled, in 1755, in North America. Braddock was defeated, and slain in his expedition in America, and Byng was shot, for not giving battle to the combined fleets, and relieving Minorca in the Mediterranean, but at last the disasters of the war were forgotten in the blaze of the glorious successes, which under the administration of Mr. Pitt, began now to adorn the annals of the country. The destruction of the French power in the East Indies, and the fall of Louisburg, Quebec, and Canada, were followed by the defeat of the French fleet under Conflans, and the triumphs of the English navy all over the world. George died in the midst of the successes of his valiant subjects, by the sudden bursting of the right ventricle of the heart, 25th Oct. 1760, in his 77th year. He had married in 1705, Caroline of Brandenburg Anspach, who died 1737, but his domestic happiness was much embittered by his disputes with his son the prince of Wales, who died 1751. The reign of this monarch was splendid more than useful, he supported the rights of the queen of Hungary in the war of 1741, and in that of 1756, he enlarged the power of his subjects by his conquests in America, and in the East, but luxury and corruption were permitted to flourish unchecked, and the conduct of the sovereign was not always consonant with the strictest principles of morality and virtue.

GEORGE III. king of Great Britain and Ireland, was the son of Frederick, prince of Wales, by the princess Augusta of Saxe-Gotha, and was born May 24th, 1738. He ascended the throne on the death of his grandfather, October 25th, 1760; and was married in the following year to the princess Charlotte of Mecklenburg Strelitz. The kingdom was at that period in a flourishing condition, the public debt amounting to only about 122,000,000. The war with the colonies commenced in 1775, and terminated in 1783. In 1787 he was first afflicted with the malady which obscured his reason, and an interregnum took place until the beginning of 1789, when he was restored. The malady again returned in 1810, and terminated his political life. His death took place January 29th, 1820, in the 82d year of his age, and 60th of his reign. The principal persons at the head of the administration during his reign were, the elder Mr. Pitt, the earl of Bute, lord North, the second Mr. Pitt, and Mr. Addington. His reign was marked by the loss of the colonies, the acquisition of India, the war with the continent arising from the French revolution, and the accumulation of a great national debt.

GERARD, Tom or Tung, the institutor and first grand master of the knights hospitalers of Jerusalem, afterwards of Malta, was born at Amalfi. He took the religious habit at Jerusalem in 1100, and associated with others to relieve all Christians in distress, and bound himself to observe also chastity, poverty, and obedience. He died 1120, and his order was confirmed by Anastasius IV. who divided it into knights companions, clerks, and serving brothers.

GERARD, Balthazar, the assassin of William I. prince of Orange, was a native of Villefans, Franche Comté. He ingratiated himself into the society and the friendship of the unfortunate prince, by an affected air of devotion, and at last perpetrated the deed which he had for six years coolly meditated, by shooting him through the head with a pistol, as he was going out of his palace at Delft. He suffered the same punishment as Ravaillac and Damien, and died a martyr to the church of Rome, July, 1584. The prince of Orange was the head of the protestants, and thence this fanatic was incited by his bigoted clergy to seek, as he said, by his death, the expiation of his sins, and eternal glory.

GERARD, John, a learned protestant divine, born at Quedlinburg, 1582. He wrote, among other things, the Harmony of the Evangelists, Geneva, 3 vols. folio.

1640. He died 1638, divinity professor at Jena.

GERARD, Dr. Alexander, professor of philosophy and divinity in the university of Aberdeen. He was a native of Garioch in Aberdeenshire, and died March, 1795, aged 67. He wrote an Essay on Genius, 8vo.—2 vols. of sermons—an Essay on Taste, 8vo.—on the Genius and Evidences of Christianity, 8vo.—Discourse on Pastoral Care, &c.

GERARD, Gilbert, son of the preceding, was born and educated at Aberdeen. On entering into the ministry he became pastor of the English church at Amsterdam, where he continued several years; and on his return was appointed professor of Greek in King's college, Aberdeen. He succeeded his father in the chair of divinity, was elected one of the ministers of Old Aberdeen, and made king's chaplain for Scotland. He died suddenly, September 28, 1815. Dr. Gerard published—1. On Indifference with respect to Religious Truths, a sermon, 8vo.—2. "Institutes of Biblical Criticism," 8vo. dedicated to Dr. Herbert Marsh, now bishop of Peterborough.—W. B.

GERARD, John, a native of Jena, where he became theological professor and rector of the university. He was author of Harmonia Linguarum Oriental.—Disputatorium Theologic. Fasciculus—de Sepulturâ Mosis—de Ecclesiæ Copticæ Ortu, &c. and died 1668, aged 47. His son John Ernest, died professor of divinity at Geissen, and author of some learned works, 1707.

GERARD, John, a native of Nantwich, Cheshire, educated as a surgeon, and patronised by lord Burleigh in London, of whose garden he had the care. He was very eminent as a botanist, and published an account in Latin, of the trees, shrubs, plants, foreign and domestic, in his own garden, 4to. 1591. His chief work is Herbal, or General History of Plants, 1597, best edited by Johnson, 1633. He died 1607, aged 62.

GERARDI, Christofaro, an Italian painter of Florence, who died 1556, aged 56. He excelled in landscape and the grotesque as well as history.

GERARDI, Mark, a painter of Bruges, who came to England, 1580, and was patronised by Elizabeth. He was equally eminent in history, landscape, and portrait painting, and died 1635, aged 74.

GERBAIS, John, a doctor of the Sorbonne, eminent for his writings in support of the liberties of the Gallican church. These works proved highly offensive to the pope. He died 1699, aged 70.

GERBELIUS, Nicholas, an eminent lawyer, born at Pforzeim. He died very old, 1560, at Strasburg, where he was professor of law. He wrote, among other things, an excellent work containing a description of Greece, Basil, 1550, folio.

GERBERON, Gabriel, a French ecclesiastic, priest of the oratory, and then a Benedictine of St. Maur, was born at Saint Calais, Maine, 1628. Long distinguished at St. Maur as a theological professor, he was ordered to be arrested by Lewis XIV. for the freedom of his opinions on the Jansenist controversy, but he escaped to Holland, and in 1703 was seized by the bishop of Mechlin, and imprisoned at Amiens, and afterwards at Vincennes. He died at the prison of the abbey of St. Denis, 1711, aged 82. His chief work is the General History of Jansenism, 3 vols. 12mo. Amsterdam. Though impetuous in his character, he was firm in his conduct, and exemplary in his piety.

GERBIER, Sir Balthazar, a painter of Antwerp, recommended by Buckingham to Charles I. who knighted him, and sent him to Brussels as resident for the king of Great Britain. He died 1661, aged 69.

GERBILLON, John Francis, a Jesuit missionary in China. He was born in 1654, became a Jesuit 1670, and was sent to China 1685, and died at Pekin 1707, superior of all the missions in China. He wrote an account of his travels, inserted in du Halde's History. He was in great favour with the emperor of China, for whom he wrote Elements of Geometry, from Euclid and Archimedes, splendidly published at Pekin in the Chinese and Tartarian languages.

GERDES, Daniel, a native of Bremen, who took his doctor's degree at Utrecht, and became professor of divinity at Duisburg, and in 1735, at Groningen, where he died 1765, aged 67. He wrote Vesperæ Vadenses, or Diatribæ Theologico-Philologicæ de Hyperbolis, &c. 4to.—Observationes ad quædam Loca S.S. &c.—Miscellanea Duisburgensia ad Incrementum Rei Literariæ, &c. 4to.—Florilegium Historico-Criticum, &c.—Compendium Theologicæ Dogmaticæ, &c.

GERDIL, Hyacinth Sigismond, a cardinal, was born at Samoens, in Piedmont, in 1718. He was of the Barnabite order; and in 1742 was chosen professor of philosophy at Macerata, from whence he removed to Turin, where he was appointed tutor to the prince royal of Sardinia. In 1777 he was made a cardinal. He treated the concordat proposed by Buonaparte as a hypocritical farce; and told the pope, that in signing it he had ruined religion. He died at Rome in 1802. The cardinal published—1. A Treatise on the Immortality of the Soul.—2. A Treatise on the Nature of Ideas.—3. Introduction to the Study of Religion.—4. Another against Duels.—5. Reflections on Education, in Confutation of Rousseau, 2 vols.—6. The Phenomena of Capillary Tubes.—All his works were printed together, in 6 vols. 4to. at Bologna.—W. B.

GERHARD, Ephraim, a native of Silesia, professor of law at Altdorf, where he died 1718, aged 36. He wrote Delineatio Philosophiæ Rationalis, &c.

GERLACH, Stephen, a native of Swabia, educated at Tübingen, where, after being five years chaplain to the imperial embassy at Constantinople, he became professor of divinity and dean of the church. He wrote Epitome of Ecclesiastical History—Journal of the embassies to the Porte—dissertations, &c. He died at Tübingen, 1612, aged 66.

GERMAIN, Thomas, a native of Paris, son of the king's goldsmith. He resided for some years at Rome, distinguished as an ingenious goldsmith and as an architect, and eminent also in drawing. His metal sculptures were so neatly wrought that they obtained high celebrity at Paris, and sold very dear. He died 1748, aged 74.

GERMANICUS, Cæsar, son of Nero and Antonia, was adopted by Tiberius, and became a popular character at Rome in consequence of his valour in the field of battle, and particularly for the goodness of his disposition and his many private virtues. He died near Antioch, A.D. 19, it is supposed by poison, and was universally lamented.

GERMANIO, Anastasio, a native of Picomont. Originally self-taught, he acquired celebrity for his learning at Padua, and also at Turin, where he was elected professor of canon law. His abilities recommended him to the popes, and he was made bishop of Tarantasia. He died at Madrid, where he was an ambassador from the duke of Savoy, 1627, aged 76. He wrote De Sacrorum Immunitatibus, and other tracts.

GERMANUS, bishop of Cyzicum, was made patriarch of Constantinople 715, and died 740. He was degraded by a council for supporting image worship. He wrote a treatise de Sex Synodis Œcumanicis, &c. Another of the same name was patriarch of Constantinople 1222, and deposed 1240, but restored 1254, soon after which he died. He was author of some homilies, orations, &c.

GERMYN, Simon, a Dutch painter of Dort, who died 1719, aged 69. His fruits and landscapes were much admired.

GERRY, Elbridge, governor of Massachusetts, and vice president of the United States, was born at Marblehead, Massachusetts, in July, 1744, and graduated at Harvard college in 1762. He became a merchant, and by his intimate acquaintance with commerce, was qualified to render important services in the public stations which he afterwards filled. He was distinguished through every period of the revolution for his zeal in the popular cause; was several years a member of the provincial congress, of the committee of correspondence, and of the board of war. He was one of the delegates to congress in 1776 who subscribed the declaration of independence, and in 1778 assisted in forming the system of confederation. After this he was successively a member of the senate of Massachusetts, and of congress, and in 1787, was one of the delegates to the convention which framed the constitution of the United States. Dissatisfied, however, with some of the provisions of the constitution, he declined subscribing it. He was again a member of congress under the new form of government, until his health induced him to retire. In 1797 he was sent minister to France with Marshall and Pinckney. In 1804 he was one of the electors of president and vice president of the United States. In 1810 he succeeded Mr. Strong as governor of Massachusetts, but soon lost much of his popularity by generally removing from office those who were hostile to his political principles. In 1812 governor Strong was reinstated in the office, and Mr. Gerry was elected vice president of the United States, and filled the office until his death, which took place suddenly at Washington, Nov. 23d, 1814.

GERSON, John, an illustrious Frenchman, canon and chancellor of the church of Paris. When Petit justified the murder of the duke of Orleans, by the duke of Burgundy, he boldly inveighed against it, and had the doctrine condemned by the doctors and bishops of the university. He was at the council of Constance as ambassador from France, and in his eloquent speeches he asserted the superiority of the synod over the pope. He retired to Germany from the persecution of the duke of Burgundy, and died 1429, aged 66. His writings have been published by Du Pin, 5 vols. fol. 1706, in Holland. Thuanus, Hoffman, Cave, and others, speak highly of his erudition and universal knowledge.

GERSTEN, Christian Lewis, a native of Giessen, where he was mathematical professor. He was deposed from his office afterwards for refusing to submit to the sentence of a court of law, in a lawsuit with his brother-in-law, and was also imprisoned for 12 years for writing an improper letter to his sovereign in vindication of his contumacy. He died two years after his liberation from confinement, 1762, aged 61. He wrote Methodus Nova ad Eclipses Terræ, et Appulses Lunæ ad Stellas supputandas—Tentamina Systematis Novi ad Barometri Mutationes, &c.—Exercitationes circa Roris Meteora—Methodus Calculi Eclipsium Terræ, in the 43d vol. of philosophical transactions—Mercurius sub Sole Visus—Quadrantes Astronom. Muralis Idea Nova, &c.

GERVAIS, Armand Francis, a Carmelite ecclesiastic, superior of his order, and in 1695 abbot of La Trappe, which he soon after resigned. His attack on the Bernardines procured his confinement in an abbey at Troyes, where he died 1741. He wrote a History of the Cistercian Order—the Lives of Eloisa and Abelard, and other works in theology and biography.

GERVAISE, Nicholas, a French missionary in Siam, afterwards provost of Seuvre in the church of St. Martin of Tours. He was at Rome in 1724, and was made bishop of Horren, and soon after went as missionary to Guiana, where he and his attendants were cruelly murdered by the natives, 1729. He wrote History of Boethius—Life of St. Martin of Tours—and the History of his Church—the Natural and Political History of Siam, 4to. 1688.

GESNER, Conrad, an able scholar, physician, and philosopher, born at Zurich, 1516. The poverty of his father would have checked the display of his great abilities, had not Ammien, professor of Latin and eloquence at Zurich, with noble generosity, taken him to his own house and provided for his education. The death of his father left him his own master, and he began to travel to seek his fortune. He visited Strasburg, where he made some progress in the Hebrew language, and as he was allowed a small pension from Zurich university, he made the tour of France, and in company with John Frisius came to Paris. He afterwards returned to Strasburg, and was called back to Zurich to preside over a school, and there he married. His appointment, however, was not adequate to his expenses, and determining to apply himself to physic, he left Zurich in disgust, and studied the Greek physicians in their own language at Basil, till he was honourably nominated Greek professor at Lausanne. In some degree thus independent, he applied himself with redoubled assiduity to the medical profession, and passed to Montpellier, where he devoted himself to anatomy and botany, and on his return to Zurich he began to practise as physician, and received the honour of a doctor's degree. He was appointed there professor of philosophy, a place which he enjoyed 24 years till his death. He died of the plague 1565. For the variety of his attainments, and the extent of his erudition, he was deservedly called the German Pliny, and among his various avocations he found time to write not less than 66 various pieces on subjects of grammar, botany, medicine, and natural history. He was the first who distinguished the genera of plants by the comparison of their flowers, seeds, and fruits.

GESNER, Solomon, bookseller of Zurich, was author of some elegant poems in the German language. He was member of the senate of Zurich, and also obtained celebrity by his landscape paintings, many of which were sold in England. The most admired of his compositions is the Death of Abel, in poetic prose, which has been translated into English. He died 2d March, 1788, aged 58. He wrote besides, "Night"—Daphnis, a pastoral—Idylls—a Letter on landscape painting—poems, &c. He also published 10 landscapes, engraved by himself, 1765.

GESNER, John Matthew, an able scholar and acute critic, of the family of Conrad Gesner, born near Newburg in Germany 1691. After studying eight years at Anspach, he was appointed by the recommendation of Budus to superintend the public school at Weinheim. Eleven years after he was removed to the same but more lucrative situation at Anspach, and lastly to Gottingen, where he became professor of humanity, public librarian, and inspector of public schools in the province of Lunenburg. He died at Gottingen universally respected in 1761. He is much known as the author of some valuable editions of the classics, of which the Horace and Claudian are the more popular. He also published a most excellent Thesaurus of the Latin tongue.

GESNER, John James, a native of Zurich. He was professor in the university, and died there 1787, aged 80. He wrote Thesaurus Universalis Omnium Numismatum Veterum Græcor. et Roman. 4 vols. fol.—Specimen Rei Nummariæ Numismata Regum Macedon. ex Laboribus Crophii, Lazii, Golzii, &c.

GESNER, Solomon, a native of Silesia, who studied at Breslau and Strasburg, and became divinity professor at Wittenberg, 1593, and afterwards dean and rector of the university. He wrote the Prophecy of Hosea from Jerome's version—Dissertation on Genesis, &c. ; Disquisition on the Psalter ; sermons, essays, &c. He died 1605, aged 46.

GETA, Septimius, son of the emperor Severus, and brother of Caracalla, was slain in the arms of his mother, by his brother, who was jealous of his merits and virtues, A. D. 212.

GETHIN, lady Grace, an English lady, daughter of Sir George Norton, of Abbots-Leith, Somersetshire, born 1676. She married Sir Richard Gethin, of Gethin-Grott, Ireland ; but she did not live long enough to display to the world the superior talents she possessed, as she died at the premature age of 21. She was buried in Westminster abbey, where a beautiful monument records her merits, and where, to perpetuate her memory, she also founded a sermon to be preached every Ash-Wednesday for ever. After her death were published "Reliquiæ Gethinianæ," or Remains of the ingenious and excellent lady Grace Gethin, being a collection of choice discourses, pleasant apophthegms, and witty sentences, &c. 1700, 4to. This work, containing much good sense, and many judicious observations, deserves the compliments which the fair author received from the pen of Congreve.

GETHING, Richard, a curious penman of Herefordshire. He settled in London about 1616, at the Hand and Pen, Fetterlane, London, and published copy-books of various hands with plates. One of them was dedicated to Sir Francis Bacon. The time of his death is not mentioned.

GEVARTIUS, John Gasper, an eminent critic, born at Antwerp, 1593. He studied under the Jesuits at Antwerp, and then removed to Louvain and to Douay. He was at Paris in 1617, and took the degree of LL.D. in the university of Douay, and became town clerk of Antwerp, an employment which he held till his death, 1666. He was married 1625. He published Lectio-num Papinianarum Libri quinque in Statii Sylvas, 1621, 8vo. Leyden—Electorum libri tres, &c. 1619, 4to. Paris—a Latin poem on the death of Thuanus, 1618, &c.

GEUSS, John Michael, a native of Holstein, professor of mathematics at Copenhagen, and author of the Theory of the Art of constructing Mines, 1776—a voyage to Iceland, from the German, 2 vols. 4to.—an edition of Logarithmi Numerorum ab Unitate ad 10,000, &c. He died at Holstein, 1786, aged 41.

GHELEN, Sigismund, or GELENIUS. Vid. GELENIUS.

GHEZZI, Peter Leone, a painter, born at Rome, and knighted by Francis I. duke of Parma, his abilities were employed by the pope in adorning the castle of Gondolfo, and other public edifices. He died 1755, aged 81.

GHILINI, Jerome, an Italian writer, born at Monza, in Milan, 1589. He was educated by the Jesuits at Milan, in philosophy and polite literature, and studied the civil and canon law at Parma. He married; but upon the death of his wife he became an ecclesiastic. He lived to the age of 80. He is chiefly known for his "Theatro d'Huomini Letterati," reprinted 2 vols. 4to. Venice, 1647. The work, though praised by Baillet, is considered, in general, as insipid, partial, and often incorrect. He wrote besides, Cases of Conscience—poems—Annals of Alessandria.

GHIRLANDAIO, Domenico, a Florentine painter, born 1449. He was intended for the profession of a goldsmith; but he studied with success painting, and though his pieces possess not superior merit, he is yet respected as the master of the great Michael Angelo. His three sons, David, Benedict, and Randolph, were distinguished as painters. He died at the age of 44.

GHISOLFI, Giovanni, a painter of Milan, who died 1683, aged 60. His perspective views and his sea-ports are much admired.

GIAFAR, or SADEK the Just, a Mussulman doctor, by the mother side, descended from Abubekir the caliph. He wrote a book of Prophecies—one on lots and traditions, and died at Medina 764.

GIAHEDH, or Large-eyed, a Mussulman, the head of the Motazales, a sect who united religion and philosophy. He wrote treatises on Metaphysics, &c. and died 840.

GIANNONI, Peter, a Neapolitan, author of a history of his country, which so offended the court of Rome that he fled from persecution to the king of Sardinia's dominions, and died at Piedmont, 1748, aged 68. His history was translated into French by Desmanceaux.

GIBALYN, le Comte de, author of "le Monde Primitif," died 1784, aged 59. For this valuable work he twice received the prize of 1200 livres from the French academy.

GIBBON, Edward, the celebrated author of the history of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, was born at Putney, 8th May, 1737, of a very respectable and ancient family. From Kingston school he removed to Westminster, and afterwards entered as gentleman commoner at Magdalen college, Oxford. At the university he paid much attention to books of divinity, especially the works of Bossuet, and as he had never imbibed in his youth proper notions of religion, and decided tenets of faith, he at last, either from conviction, or the love of singularity, embraced the Roman Catholic principles, and in 1753 renounced the heresy of the protestants in the presence of a popish priest in London, and was received into the bosom of the church. This conduct alarmed and displeased his father, who immediately sent him to Lausanne, where, under the friendly care, and by the sensible conversation of Pavilliard, a Protestant divine, he was made to understand the true nature of religion, and the pure doctrines of the gospel, and in 1754, he renounced his errors, and received as a pledge of his reconciliation, the sacrament, according to the rites of the reformed church. During his residence at Lausanne, he paid much attention to classical literature, and acquired such a perfect knowledge of the French language, that he both spoke and wrote it with the same facility as his own native tongue. He here became intimate with the daughter of a protestant minister, an accomplished woman, who afterwards became the wife of the celebrated Necker; but his wish to form a matrimonial connexion with the lady was checked by his father, and while he sighed as a lover, he obeyed as a son, and abandoned the object of his passion to lead the rest of life in peevish celibacy. In 1758 he returned to England, but though engaged in a military life, as the captain of the grenadiers of the Hampshire militia, he continued his studies in the midst of the dissipation of a camp, and found more pleasure in the company of his favourite authors, than in the society of gay and profligate associates. His Essai sur l'Etude de la Literature, appeared in 1761, dedicated to his father, and was admired as an elegant and correct performance. At the peace of 1763 he quitted the militia, and travelled through Paris and Switzerland to Italy, and in the midst of the ruins of the capital, formed the plan of that great work which has immortalized his name. He contributed much to the completion of the "Memoires Literaires" of Great Britain by Deyverdun, 1767, and in 1770 he attacked Warburton's hypothesis on the descent of Æneas to the infernal regions, in his critical observations on the sixth book of Virgil's Æneid. The death of his father in 1770, left him master of a comfortable, independent, though encumbered family estate, and therefore as an owner of landed property, he determined to add to the consequence of his rank, by obtaining a seat in parliament for Liskeard in 1774. The first volume of his immortal work, the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, appeared in 1776, and was continued and completed in five other quarto volumes. The book was received with universal applause, and his bookseller, Mr. Cadell, sensible of the merits of the performance, and of its rapid sale, liberally paid him on the completion of the history 8000*l.* Much and deservedly as the historian is commended, yet it is to be lamented that he has inveighed with sarcastic rudeness, and with an insulting air of affected impartiality, against the great truths of Christianity. The unsettled state of his own religious opinions, and the frequent visits which he paid to the infidel hero of Ferney, left it indeed doubtful whether he was much more than a masked atheist; but it required the deep arts of hypocrisy to pretend to develope the awful causes which produced the redemption of mankind, and to unveil the mysteries which cover the revelations of heaven to fallen sinners. It is therefore not to be wondered, that the two offensive chapters on the growth and progress of Christianity were violently attacked by various writers, but these were disregarded by the phlegmatic historian, who deigned to give a reply only to Mr. Davis, because he had accused him with want of fidelity. Though the abilities of the historian were thus acknowledged of superior rank, and his powers of understanding extensive, yet he never ventured to speak in parliament, but during the eight years in which he held a seat, he gave a silent vote for the minister. His Memoir on the War with France, in consequence of her espousing the cause of the Colonies, written in French, was much admired, and procured for him, from lord North, a seat at the board of Trade, till its abolition by Burke's bill. In 1783 Gibbon returned to Switzerland, to complete the three last volumes of his history, and he returned to England 1788, where the work was published complete on his birthday. He afterwards returned to Lausanne, but the horrors of the French revolution, the origin of which he, with many other virtuous and sensible characters had falsely hailed as the regeneration of mankind, disturbed the tranquillity of his retirement, and he hastened back to England. He died of a dropsy 16th Jan. 1794, at the house of his friend, lord Sheffield. His posthumous works, with his memoirs written by himself, and finished by the pen of his friend lord Sheffield, appeared in 2 vols. 4to. soon after his death. His character as a writer has been well drawn up by the nervous pen of Mr. Porson, in his letters to archdeacon Travis. His history he allows to be one of the ablest performances that has ever appeared. His industry is indefatigable, his accuracy scrupulous, his reading, which is sometimes ostentatiously displayed, immense, his attention always awake, his memory extensive, his periods harmonious. In endeavouring, however, to avoid vulgar terms he too frequently dignifies trifles, and clothes common thoughts in a splendid dress that would be rich enough for the noblest ideas. In his anxiety to vary his phrase, he becomes obscure, and instead of calling his personages by their names, he describes them by their birth, alliance, office, or other circumstances of their history. An unpardonable fault too, is his rage for indecency, which pervades the whole work, especially the last volumes, though it is remarkable he is so affectedly prudish that he dares not call Belisarius a cuckold, because it is too bad a word to be used by a decent historian.

GIBBONS, Grinling, a famous sculptor, son of a Dutchman, settled in England. He was a member of the board of works, and was employed by Charles II. The best specimens of his art are the foliage in Windsor chapel, the choir of St. Paul's cathedral, the font of St. James's church, Westminster, and particularly the ornaments of Pctworth-house. He died 1721.

GIBBONS, Orlando, a native of Cambridge, made organist of the royal chapel, and admitted Mus. D. at Oxford 1622. He died three years after, of the smallpox, at Canterbury, aged 42. His compositions in music were far superior to all those of his age. He published Madrigals, 1612, &c. His son, and also two brothers, were eminent as musicians.

GIBBS, James, an architect, born at Aberdeen 1685. Besides the design of St. Martin's church, London, which cost 32,000*l.* in the erection, the new church at Derby, the senate house, and the new buildings of King's college, Cambridge, and St. Mary's church in the Strand, are part of his works. He sold his designs in 1728 for 1500*l.* and the plates for 400*l.* He died 5th Aug. 1754.

GIBBS, Sir Vicary, chief justice of the Common Pleas, was the son of an apothecary at Exeter, and born there in 1752. He received his education at Eton, from whence he removed to King's college, Cambridge, where he was distinguished by his classical attainments, and in 1772 was elected to a Craven scholarship. While at college, he entered as a student of Lincoln's Inn, and in due course was called to the bar. Through the friendship of Dunning, he became a leading counsel on the western circuit; and on the death of Mr. Richard Burke, was chosen recorder of Bristol. The trials of Horne Tooke, Hardy, and others, for high treason, brought the talents of Mr. Gibbs still more conspicuously before the public; and soon after he became king's counsel. He was also elected into parliament for the university of Cambridge; made chief-justice of Chester; next solicitor, and afterwards attorney-general, with the honour of knighthood. In 1813 he was appointed a puisne judge of the common-pleas; and the year following, chief of the same court. After discharging the duties of this office with the greatest reputation, he resigned it, at the end of 1818, on account of his increasing infirmities. He died Feb. 9th, 1820.—W. B.

GIBERT, Balthasar, a native of Aix, who, after being four years professor of philosophy at Beauvais, was elected to the chair of rhetoric at the college of Mazarin, where he presided 50 years. Though highly respected at Paris he was banished to Auxere by the court in 1740, because he opposed the revocation of an appeal which the university had made against the bull Unigenitus. He died at Regennes 28th Oct. 1741, aged 77. His works are Rhetorique, or les Regles de l'Eloquence—Jugement des Savans sur les Auteurs qui ont traité de la Rhetorique, 3 vols.—Observations sur le Traité des Etudes de Rollin, &c. His nephew Joseph was also a man of literary fame, and wrote Memoire pour l'Histoire des Gaules, &c. He died at Paris 1771, aged 60.

GIBERT, John Peter, a native of Aix, professor of theology at Toulon and at Aix, from which he, in 1709, removed to Paris. He lived here in a very retired and abstemious manner, and though offered several benefices he refused them all with the most indifferent composure. As a canonist, learned and well-informed, he was highly respected. He died poor at Paris 2d Dec. 1736, aged 76. He wrote Practical Cases concerning the Sacraments—Memoirs concerning the holy Scriptures—Institutions ecclesiastical and beneficial, &c.—Usage of the Gallican Church in Censures, &c.—Traditions, or History of the Church, on Marriage—Corpus Juris Canonici, &c. 3 vols. fol.—Notes on the Treatise of Abus, &c.

GIBERTI, John Matthew, a native of Palermo, who obtained favour and consequence at the court of Leo X. and Clement VII. and became governor of Tivoli and bishop of Verona. He was, in 1527, one of the hostages whom Clement delivered to the Imperialists, and, according to the barbarous prejudices of those times, he was treated with great rudeness, and even cruelty. When set at liberty he retired to his diocese; but returned to Rome at the invitation of Paul II. and with a liberal mind he established in his own house a Greek press, and thus enabled the learned men whom he patronised to publish some editions of the writings of the fathers. His letters and directions to the clergy are valuable. He died 1543.

GIBIEUF, William, a priest of the congregation of the oratory, who wrote a book on the Liberty of God, and of the Creator, in Latin, a performance of great merit. He died 1650.

GIBSON, Edmund, an English prelate, born at Knipe, near Bampton, Westmoreland, 1669. From a school in the county he entered as servitor at Queen's college, Oxford, and soon evinced his proficiency by publishing 1691, William Drummond's "Polemio Middiana" and James V. of Scotland's Cantilena Rustica, 4to. with curious and interesting notes. In 1692, he published a Latin translation of the Chronicon Saxonum 4to. and soon after Librorum MSS. in duabus Insignibus Bibliothecis, Altera Tenison, Londini, Altera Dugdali, Oxonii, Catalogus, dedicated to Tenison bishop of Lincoln, who appointed him his chaplain. He took his master's degree in 1694, and the next year showed his abilities as an antiquarian by publishing Camden's Britannia, with great additions, also dedicated to Tenison, under whose patronage he rose to the rectory of Stisted, Essex, in 1700, the rectory of Lambeth, and the mastership of St. Mary's hospital 1703, and in 1710, the archdeaconry of Surrey. His Codex Juris Ecclesiastici Anglicani in fol. appeared in 1713, and while it commanded the applause of the friends of the church, excited the censures and the envy of its enemies. When Wake on Tenison's death succeeded to the primacy 1715, Gibson was raised to the see of Lincoln in his room, and in 1723, he was translated to London. He died at Bath 6th Sep. 1748, leaving several children. As a prelate Gibson ranks high. Vigilant over the rights of the church, he warmly supported the test act, and was zealous that those who were admitted into holy orders should be persons of character, discretion, and learning. The establishment of preachers from Oxford and Cambridge, at Whitehall, alternately, took place at his suggestion. This worthy prelate wrote, besides, some tracts and pastoral letters, wisely calculated to recommend religion and to counteract infidelity and immorality.

GIBSON, William, a self-taught mathematician, born at Boulton near Appleby, Westmoreland, and died 1791, aged 71. Though he published nothing, his knowledge of mathematics, of navigation, of mechanics, optics, and experimental philosophy was very great and very accurate.

GIBSON, Thomas, an eminent painter, known at Oxford and in London. He died April 28th, 1751, aged about 71.

GIBSON, Thomas, a physician, born at Morpeth in Northumberland. He was very eminent for his knowledge of botany, history, physic, and divinity, and he performed very popular cures. He favoured the reformation, and fled during the persecution of Mary, but returned under Elizabeth, and died in London 1562. The titles of his writings are preserved in Tanner, and in Aikin's Memoirs of Medicine.

GIBSON, Richard, commonly called the dwarf, was an eminent painter in the time of sir Peter Lely. He was originally servant to a lady at Mortlake, who observed and encouraged his fondness for painting, and placed him under de Cleyn, master of the tapestry works at Mortlake, and the designer of the cuts for Ogilvy's works, and Sandy's Ovid. Gibson's pieces in water colours, but especially his copies of Lely's portraits, gained him great reputation. He was page of the back stairs to Charles I. he was also a favourite with Oliver Cromwell, and drew him several times, and he also instructed in drawing the princesses Mary and Anne, afterwards queens. He married Mrs. Anne Shepherd, who was likewise a dwarf, and the ceremony was honoured by the presence of Charles I. who gave away the bride. Though only three feet ten inches, they had nine children, five of which reached maturity, and were well proportioned, and of the common size. Gibson died in Covent Garden in his 75th year, and his wife 20 years after, 1709, aged 89.

GIBSON, William, nephew of Richard, was instructed by him and Lely in the art painting, in which he became eminent. He was successful as a limner, and a copier of sir Peter Lely; whose collection he purchased at his death, and enriched with several valuable foreign pieces. He died of a lethargy, 1702, aged 58.

GIBSON, Edward, kinsman to William, was instructed by him in drawing. He first painted in oil, but afterwards acquired great celebrity in crayons. His promising abilities were cut short by death when very young.

GIDEON, one of the judges of Israel. He was of the tribe of Manasseh, and was called by God, while he was thrashing, to extricate the people of Israel from the oppression of the Midianites. He was judge over the nation forty years, and died B. C. 1236.

GIFANIUS, Hubertus or Obertus, a critic and civilian, born at Buren in Guelderland, 1534. He pursued his studies at Louvain and Paris, and first erected a library for the Germans at Orleans, where he took the degree of doctor of civil law, 1567. He was in Italy in the suite of the French ambassador, and afterwards was professor of philosophy at Strasburg, and then at Aldorf and Ingoldstadt. He abandoned the protestants for popery, and was made counsellor to the emperor Rodolph. He died at Prague 16th Aug. 1604, according to Thuanus. He wrote notes and commentaries on Homer, Aristotle's Ethics and Politics, Lucretius, and other authors, and some law tracts, but he is accused with dishonourably suppressing the publication of the MSS. of Fruterius, an extraordinary youth who died at the age of twenty-five at Paris, and which had been intrusted to his care. He was unfortunately engaged in quarrels with Lambin, Scioppius, and others, which, in exhibiting the passions of human nature, too often show that the intellectual powers do not always exercise that authority over the heart which religion dictates.

GIFFORD, Dr. Andrew, a baptist minister, for some time assistant librarian in the British museum. He died 1784, aged 84, leaving his library to the baptist meeting, Bristol.

GIFFORD, Richard, an English divine, educated at Baliol college, Oxford, which he left after taking his first degree in arts. He was for some time curate of Richard's castle, Herefordshire, and then morning preacher of St. Anne's, Soho, and in 1758 he became chaplain to the marquis of Tweedale, and the next year obtained from bishop Cornwallis, Duffield vicarage in Derbyshire. He was presented, in 1772, to North Okendon rectory in Essex, where he was unable long to reside on account of the pestilential vapours of the fens. He was author of Remarks on Kennicott's Dissertation on the Tree of Life in Paradise,—Contemplation, a poem, 1753, quoted by Johnson in his dictionary,—Outlines of an Answer to Dr. Priestley's Disquisitions on Matter and Spirit, &c. He died at Duffield much respected, 1st March 1807, aged 82.

GIFFORD, John, a political writer, whose real name was John Richard Green, was born in 1758. He was brought up by his grandfather, who left him some property, which enabled him to go to Oxford, where he became a commoner of St. John's college; but left the university without a degree. He now turned to the law as a profession; but having dissipated his little fortune, he was obliged to go abroad, under the assumed name, which he ever after retained. He returned in 1788, and, on the breaking out of the French revolution, devoted his pen to the defence of government in church and state. He contributed to the establishment of the British Critic, and afterwards of the Anti-jacobin Review, which last arose out of a newspaper of the same name. Besides these concerns, and a number of pamphlets, which he published, Mr. Gifford found time to compile some larger works; as—1. "The History of France," 5 vols. 4to. 2. The Reign of Louis XVI., and "History of the French Revolution," 4to. 3. History of the Political Life of the Right Hon. William Pitt, 3 vols. 4to. For these services he was rewarded with a pension, and made a police magistrate. He died at Bromley, in Kent, March 6th, 1818.—W. B.

GIGGEO, Anthony, an Italian divine, who settled at Milan, and translated into Latin the commentaries of R. R. G. Solomon, Aben Ezra, and Levi Gersom on the Proverbs. His chief work is Thesaurus Linguae Arabicæ, or Lexicon Arabico-Latinum, four vols. folio. He died about 1632.

GILBERT, William, a learned physician, who first discovered some of the properties of the load-stone, was born 1540, at Colchester, where his father was recorder. He was educated at Cambridge, but he took his degree of M.D. abroad, and on his return to London, was elected fellow of the college of physicians 1573. He began to practise in London with such reputation, that Elizabeth appointed him her physician, with a liberal pension. In 1600, he published his book "de Magnete, &c. Physiologia Nova," which contained the observations of former writers, and might be said to be the foundation of all future improvements. He died 30th November, 1603, and was buried in Trinity church, Colchester. His reputation, in consequence of his discoveries on the magnet was very extensive, so that not only Carpenter, Barrow, sir Kenelm Digby, and others have compared him to Harvey, to Galileo, to Gassendus, and other great luminaries of philosophy, but foreigners have regarded him as a man of uncommon merit and of superior abilities. His MS. de Mundi Nostri Philosophiâ Novâ, was published at Amsterdam, 1651, 4to. by sir William Boswell. He left his books, &c. to the college of physicians.

GILBERT, Thomas, B.D., an English divine, educated at Edmund hall, Oxford. He was ejected from the parish of Egmond, Salop, for nonconformity, 1662, and died 14th July, 1694, aged 83. He wrote some theological tracts, and it is said that he made a convert of Dr. South to his opinion concerning predestination.

GILBERT, Sir Humphrey, an able navigator, born at Dartmouth. His mother, when a widow, married Mr. Raleigh, by whom she had the famous Sir Walter Raleigh. He was educated at Eton and Oxford, and afterwards followed the military profession, and was knighted in 1570 for his services in Ireland. He, in 1583, took possession of Newfoundland, in the name of his mistress Elizabeth, where his attempts to settle a colony on the American continent were unsuccessful. He wrote a book to prove a N. W. passage to Cathaia, and the Indies. On his return from Newfoundland, the ship in which he was foundered, and every soul on board perished, 1584.

GILBERT, Jeffrey, chief baron of the exchequer in Ireland, and afterwards in England, abridged Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding, published by Dodd, 1750, and translated the 12th ode of Horace's second book, in a very elegant style, which was inserted in the Wit's Horace, p. 67.

GILDAS, the most ancient of British historians, is known for his epistle written 560, twelve years after the evacuation of Britain by the Romans. He lived near the wall built by Severus, and Nicholson calls him a monk of Bangor. His epistle was translated into English in the reign of Charles II. There was also a poet of that name concerned in the writing of the prophecies of Merlin in Latin verse.

GILDON, Charles, an English critic, born at Gillingham, Dorsetshire, 1666. As his friends were of the Roman catholic persuasion, he was sent to Douay, to become a priest, but his inclinations were not for the church, and he returned to England, 1685. He spent in youthful follies in London the greatest part of his property, and married a woman of no fortune, and at last, to retrieve his affairs, at the age of twenty-three, he went on the stage, but proved unsuccessful as an actor, as well as the author of three plays. He afterwards published various pamphlets and essays, and affected the name and office of a critic, and wrote his "Complete Art of Poetry," and the "Laws of Poetry," &c. He offended Pope, for which he was placed in a conspicuous place in the Dunciad. He died 1723.

GILES, of Viterbo, an Italian cardinal, the favourite of the popes Julius II. and Leo X. He was legate in Germany, from the pope, and made a cardinal. He died 1532. He was author of Commentaries on the Psalms—dialogues—letters—poems—Remarks on the three first chapters of Genesis, &c.

GILES, John, or ÆGIDIUS, was born at St. Alban's, in the thirteenth century. He studied at Paris, and was physician to Philip, king of France, and professor of medicine at Montpellier and Paris. He was also made D.D. and was the first Englishman on record entered among the Dominicans. He was an eloquent preacher, and as eminent for his physical recipes.

GILMER, or GELIMER, descended from Genseric, was the last of the Vandal kings of Africa. He deposed his relation Hilderic, 530, but fled into Numidia, when invaded by the superior force of the great Belisarius. He was at last taken prisoner after various defeats, and when led through the streets of Constantinople, he exclaimed, Vanity of vanities, all is vanity! He was honoured by Justinian, but refused to be raised to the rank of senator, as it was offered on condition of his renouncing Arianism.

GILL, Alexander, an English scholar, educated at Christ-church, Oxford, and made master of St. Paul's school, 1608, in which he continued till his death, 1635, at the age of 71. He wrote some theological tracts, and was buried in Mercer's chapel.

GILL, Alexander, son of the above, was born in London, and educated at Trinity college, Oxford. He was usher to his father in St. Paul's school, and succeeded him in 1635. He removed five years after, and kept a school in Aldersgate till his death, 1642. He is called by Wood a good Latin poet.

GILL, John, D.D. a dissenting minister, born at Kettering, Northamptonshire, 19th Nov. 1697. In 1716 he was admitted pastor of the anabaptists at Kettering, and two years after went in the same capacity to Higham Ferrers. In 1721 he was invited to Horsleydown meeting, in Southwark, and soon after removed to Toolcy-street, where he died October 13th, 1771. He ranked high as a good orientalist, and as an extensive scholar. His publications were numerous, and in his principles he was a rigid Calvinist. His works are, an Exposition of the Bible, 9 vols. folio, a valuable performance—the Cause of God and Truth, 3 vols. Svo.—a Body of Divinity, 3 vols. 4to.—a dissertation on the Antiquity of the Hebrew Language—tracts and sermons.

GILLES, Peter, a learned adventurer, born at Albi, 1490. He distinguished himself by his knowledge of classical literature, and in 1533 he dedicated a book to Francis I. and invited him to send learned men into foreign countries to examine their manners and customs. He was accordingly sent by the monarch to the Levant, but as he was not supplied with money for his expenses, as he expected, he was obliged in his distress to enrol himself in the army of Soliman II. for subsistence. He was afterwards engaged in another voyage, and carried by the pirates into Algiers, from which he extricated himself by the liberal assistance of cardinal d'Armagnac. He died at Rome, 1555. He was author of Tracts de Vi et Naturâ Animalium—de Bosphoro Thracio—de Topographiâ Constantinopoleos.

GILLESPIE, George, a Scotch divine, one of the four sent as commissioners from the church of Scotland to Westminster, 1643. He wrote Aaron's Rod Blossoming—Miscellaneous Questions, &c. and died 17th Dec. 1648.

GILLOT, Claude, a French painter and engraver of Langres, disciple to Vateau, and the master of J. Baptiste Corneille. He died at Paris, 1722, aged 49. He was happy in representing grotesque figures, &c.

GILPIN, Bernard, an eminent divine, born at Kentmire, Westmoreland, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He afterwards went to Christ church, and became a zealous supporter of the reformation in consequence of reading attentively the works of Erasmus, and of other German divines. He obtained in 1552 the living of Norton, in Durham diocess, but with remarkable humility he resigned it, considering himself as yet unfit to preside over the spiritual concerns of a parish. He next visited the continent, where he printed a treatise on the sacraments, written by his uncle Tonstal, and returned to England in 1556. By the patronage of his uncle he now obtained the archdeaconry of Durham, and the rectory of Easington, and afterwards the rectory of Houghton le Spring. Zealous and active he conducted himself as the friend of piety and religion, he enforced residence among the clergy, and every where supported the honour and the interests of virtue. His influence as a pastor was considered as so great, that Bonner, jealous of the increasing power of the reformers, marked him for destruction, and Gilpin, summoned to London before a bloody tribunal, already prepared himself to march to the stake, with all the compo.

sure of those who had gone before him, when the death of Mary stopped the hand of his persecutors, and restored him to the wishes of his parishioners, and the duties of a benevolent pastor. This exemplary and hospitable man was offered the bishopric of Carlisle by Elizabeth, and also the headship of Queen's college, but he modestly refused those honours, satisfied to live and to die among his parishioners, who regarded him as a friend and a father. He died 1583, aged 66. His life has been written by bishop Carleton, and by his descendant William Gilpin.

GILPIN, Richard, a native of Cumberland, educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where he took the degree of M.D. He afterwards took orders, and became minister of Greystock, in his own county, and a popular preacher about London, but was expelled for nonconformity, 1662. He then practised physic in the north, especially at Newcastle, and died 1675. Of his works his discourse on "Satan's Temptations," is best known.

GILPIN, William, an able divine, descendant from the famous Bernard Gilpin, of whose life he wrote an account. He was born in Westmoreland, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford, and afterwards distinguished himself at the head of a respectable school at Cheam, Surrey. He died 5th April, 1804, aged 80, vicar of Boldre, in Hampshire, and prebendary of Sarum. He published the Lives of Lattimer, Wickliffe, Huss, and Cranmer—Lectures on Church Catechism, 12mo.—Exposition of the New Testament, 2 vols. 8vo.—Observations on Picturesque Beauty, 8vo.—a Tour to the Lakes, 2 vols. 8vo.—Remarks on Forest Scenery, 2 vols.—Essays on Picturesque Beauty—on Prints—on the River Wye, &c.—on the Western Parts of England, 8vo.—Moral Contrasts, 8vo.—Sermons to Country Congregations, 3 vols. 8vo. &c.

GILPIN, Sawrey, brother of the preceding, was born at Carlisle, in 1733. He was placed with a ship-painter, and his first works which attracted notice were some market groups, which he sketched from his window. He next applied to drawing of animals, particularly the horse, in which he excelled. He also etched the plates in his brother's works, and became a member of the Royal Academy. He died at Brompton in 1807.—W. B.

GINNANI, Francis, a native of Ravenna, page to duke Anthony Farnese. He afterwards retired to solitude, and devoted himself to the improvement of his estate, and the cultivation of natural history. He died 1766, aged 50. He wrote a historical treatise on the Diseases of Growing Corn, 4to. 1759—a Description of Indigenous Plants—Dissertation on the Scirpus of Ravenna—and an Account of the Curiosities of his Museum.

GIOCONDO, Fra Giovanni, a native of Verona, where he was schoolmaster, and had Julius Cæsar Scaliger among his pupils. He was well skilled in architecture, mathematics, theology, and antiquities, and he constructed some of the bridges of France and Italy. He died 1521. He published an edition of Cæsar's commentaries, and of Vitruvius.

GIOIA, Flavio, a Neapolitan, born at Amalfi, celebrated as being the inventor of the mariner's compass. As the sovereigns of Naples were at that time the younger branches of the royal family of France, he placed at the north of the compass a fleur de lis, a distinction adopted by every succeeding navigator. The principality of Principato, where he was born, also assumed a compass for its arms, no doubt as a monument of the celebrity of its citizen. Some have attributed the invention of the compass to the Chinese, and Dr. Wallis to the English. Gioia was born about 1300, but the time of his death is not mentioned.

GIOLITO, Del Ferrari, a printer of the 16th century at Venice, ennobled by Charles V. His types were more elegant than his printing was correct. He left two sons printers, and died 1547.

GIORDANI, Vital, a Neapolitan mathematician. He was at first a soldier in the pope's galleys, then purser of a ship, afterwards keeper of St. Angelo's castle at Rome, and lastly professor of mathematics. He died 1711. He wrote Euclide Restituto, fol.—de Componendis Gravium Momentis, fol.—Fundamentum Doctrinæ Motus Gravium, et ad Hyac. Christophorum Epistol.

GIORDANO, Luca, a painter of Naples, who died 1705, aged 76. He improved himself by studying the works of Titian, Corregio, and Paul Veronese, and for his merits he was knighted by the king of Spain. Several of his pieces are preserved at Milan, but his most finished picture is the battle of the angels, and the fall of Lucifer, preserved at Naples.

GIORGIANI, or ALSEID ALSCHERIF ABON HASSAN, or HOUSSAIN ALI, a native of Georgia, and a Mussulman doctor, author of an Explanation of Terms used in Theology and Philosophy—a Commentary on Euclid, &c. He died 1413, at Shiraz. Another of that name was eminent as a grammarian and mathematician.

GIORGIONE, an illustrious painter, so called from his noble and comely aspect, was born at Castel Franco in Trevisano, Venice, 1478. He devoted himself to music, in which he excelled, and afterwards directed his attention to painting, and was the first of the Lombards who found out the admirable effects of strong lights and shadows. He first studied under Giovanni Bellino, and improved himself by the imitation of the works of Leonardo da Vinci. Titian was his friend and fellow-pupil, but his frequent visits alarmed him, and viewing him in the light of a rival and enemy, he excluded him from his house. Thus become hostile each to the other, Titian assiduously laboured to copy nature, but while he surpassed Giorgione in the delicacies of natural objects, he was himself surpassed in greatness of conception, and sublimity of invention. The house where the German merchants assemble at Venice, had its front adorned by the pencils of these rival masters, and while Titian embellished one side, Giorgione laboured on the other, but time unfortunately has defaced these once splendid monuments of human excellence. A Christ carrying the Cross, in St. Rovo's church, Venice, is considered as the best piece from Giorgione's pencil. The ingenious artist employed his talents to show that sculpture is not superior to painting, and he represented all the sides of the body in the same picture, by the aid of reflection from a fountain at his feet, from a looking-glass at his side, and a shining armour. He died in his 33d year, 1511, of the plague, with which he unfortunately was seized by paying a visit to a favourite mistress, whose infection was not suspected.

GIOSIPPINO, a painter, so called from Giuseppe d'Arpino, a town of Naples, where he was born 1560. He learned at Rome the elements of his art, and so distinguished himself that he became the favourite of cardinals and popes, and was made knight of St. Michael by Lewis XII. His battles in the capitol are his best pieces. He died at Rome 1640.

GIOTTINO, Tomaso, a painter of Florence, whose name was Stefano. He was called Giottino from the resemblance of his style to that of Giotto. He died 1356, aged 32.

GIOTTO, an eminent painter, sculptor, and architect, born near Florence 1276. He was found by Cimabue while he was employing himself in the fields in drawing upon the sand the figures of the sheep which he was tending, and under the guidance of this excellent friend and master, he soon rose to consequence and fame. When Benedict IX. wished to see designs from the Tuscan artists, Giotto, with the greatest quickness, drew with one stroke of his pencil, a circle so round and so perfectly equal, that round as Giotto's O afterwards became proverbial. The pope understood from this the genius of the painter, and employed him at Rome. His most admired piece was a ship of Mosaic work over the three gates of the portico at the entrance of St. Peter's church. Giotto, still favoured by Clement V. Benedict's successor, returned in 1316 to Florence loaded with riches, and was afterwards honourably engaged in the service of the lord of Lucca, and of the king of Naples, and every where left specimens of his genius and of his art. His death of the Virgin, with the apostles about her, was greatly admired by Michael Angelo. He died 1336, and the city of Florence erected a marble statue over his tomb. Giotto was respected not only by princes, but by the learned and the witty, and among his particular friends were Dante and Petrarch.

GIRALDI, Lilio Gregorio, an ingenious critic, born at Ferrara 1479, and educated in Latin under Guarini, and in Greek under Demetrius Chalcondyles. He resided at Modena, and afterwards went to Rome, and saw the pillage of that ancient capitol by the soldiers of Charles V. After losing there the whole of his little property, and attending his patron cardinal Rangoni to the grave, and losing his other patron Mirandula, he returned to Ferrara poor and enfeebled by disease. Though, however, terribly afflicted with the gout, he yet read and composed several of his books, till he sunk under the heaviness of his complaint 1552, and was buried in the cathedral of Ferrara. He wrote 17 different things, afterwards collected into 2 vols. folio, Basil 1580, and Leyden 1696. The most valuable of his compositions are his Historia de Deis Gentium—Historiæ Poetarum tum Græcorum quam Latinorum Dialogi decem,—and the Dialogi de Poetis Nostrorum. His erudition was very great, and the high encomiums of Scaliger, of Casaubon, and Thuanus upon his meritorious services to the republic of letters, are very just and honourable.

GIRALDI, John Baptist Cintio, an Italian of the family of the preceding, born at Ferrara 1504. After studying philosophy and the languages he applied to physic, and took the degree of M.D. Though only 21 years old he was appointed to read lectures on physic and polite literature at Ferrara, and in 1542 he became secretary to the duke of Ferrara. After teaching belles lettres at Mondovi three years, he went to Turin, and thence to Pavia, where he was honourably made professor of rhetoric. He took the name of Cintio at Pavia, which he prefixed to his books. He was greatly afflicted with the gout, and retired to Ferrara, where he died soon after 1573. He wrote 9 Italian tragedies, besides some orations in Latin, and Hecatonmithi, or 100 novels. His tragedies, which some critics esteem as excellent compositions, were edited by his son Celso, Venice, 1583, 8vo.

GIRALDUS, Sylvester, a learned Welchman, born at Mainarpir castle near Pembroke, South Wales, 1145. He was educated under his uncle, the bishop of St. David's, and studied theology at Paris for some time. He returned to England 1172, and four years after was named by Henry II. who knew his merit and his learning, to fill the vacant see of St. David's, which he disinterestedly refused. Afterwards he went to Paris and Bologna to study the civil law, and in 1185 he was sent by the king as secretary to his son John, in Ireland. In this office he applied himself to making collections of materials for the History of Ireland, and in 1186 returned to England. In 1198 he was a second time elected to the see of St. David's, but as he had a rich competitor, and as every thing was venal at Rome, he did not succeed. He died at the age of about 70. He wrote several works, in which he displayed great erudition and commanding eloquence, which was wonderful, as Tanner observes, in so dark and ignorant an age. He was a great enemy to the monks, and very superstitious, and with respect to dreams and visions contemptibly ridiculous. Besides his History of Ireland, he wrote "Itinerarium Cambriæ"—"de Rebus a se Gestis," and other things, some of which are still in MS.

GIRARD, John Baptist, a Jesuit born at Dol. He was tried by the parliament of Aix, on the accusation of a girl of 18, Mary Catherine Cadriere, for using sorcery, according to her expressions, in the violation of her person, and in the attempt to destroy the fruit of her womb. This trial excited much of the public attention. Girard was acquitted.

GIRARD, Gabriel, a French ecclesiastic, almoner to the dutchess of Berri, and interpreter to the king in the Russian and Slavonian languages. He wrote Synonymes François—Principes de la Langue Française, &c. and died much respected 1748, aged 70.

GIRANDON, Francis, a native of Troyes. He studied sculpture and architecture under Anguier, and was sent to Rome by Lewis XIV. to complete his knowledge of the arts. He succeeded Le Brun as inspector general of sculpture to the king, and died 1715, aged 87. His chief works are the Mausoleum of Richelieu in the church of the Sorbonne—the equestrian statue of Lewis XIV. and the Rape of Proserpine in the garden of Versailles.

GIROU, D. Pierre, duke of Ossuna, a noble but proud and imperious Spaniard, who, when viceroy of Naples, encouraged the famous conspiracy against Venice, which was discovered by Jaffier, one of the accomplices, and which forms the subject of one of the finest pieces of the English tragedy. Girou was disgraced and died in prison 1624, aged 49.

GIRONST, James, a native of Beaufort in Anjou, educated among the Jesuits, and known as a popular preacher. His sermons appeared in 5 vols. 12mo. 1704. He died 1689, aged 65.

GIRTIN, John, an English painter of great excellence. His landscapes in water-colours, and in oil, were much admired. The views of London and Paris, exhibited in the Panorama in London, were by him, and are pleasing proofs of his genius and taste. Though labouring under the attacks of a dreadful asthma, he followed his profession till within a few days of his death, which happened Nov. 1802, in his 30th year.

GIRY, Lewis, one of the first members of the French academy, translated Tertullian's Apology—the Sacred History of Sulpicius Severus—Augustine de Civitate Dei, &c. This learned and excellent character died 1665, aged 70.

GISBERT, John, a native of Cahors, for some years divinity professor at Toulouse, and then provincial of the Jesuits at Languedoc. He died 1710, aged 71. He wrote Anti-Probalasimus, 4to. and other works of merit.

GISBERT, Blaise, a Jesuit, born at Cahors. He wrote a work on the Education of a Prince—another on Christian Eloquence, &c. and died at Montpellier 1731.

GISELINUS, a physician, native of Bruges, who published a correct edition of Prudentius at Antwerp. He died 1551, aged 78.

GIULANO, Di. Majano, a Florentine, sculptor and architect, who died at Naples 1447, aged 70. The Poggio Reale palace, and other edifices at Naples, are the monuments of his genius, as well as several buildings at Rome, in the pontificate of Paul II.

GIUSTI, Antonio, a painter of Florence, who died 1705, aged 81. His animals, as well as landscapes and historical characters are highly esteemed.

GLAIN, N. Saint, a native of Limoges, 1620, who retired to Holland to profess the protestant faith. After serving with reputation in the armies of the republic, he wrote in the Holland gazette, and from a zealous protestant, he became, by reading Spinoza's book, a rank atheist. So devoted was he to his new opinions, that he translated Spinoza into French, and published it in three different editions, under three different titles, to attract the public attention.

GLANDORP, Matthias, a physician, born at Cologne 1595, where his father was a surgeon. After studying at Bremen, and improving himself at Padua and other Italian universities, he became physician to the archbishop of Bremen 1625. He died soon after 1652. His works, which exhibit the powers of an attentive and able man, were printed together at London 1729, 4to. with his life prefixed.

GLANVIL, Joseph, an English divine, born at Plymouth, Devonshire, 1636. He was of Exeter college, Oxford, and in 1656 removed to Lincoln college, and soon after taking his degree of M.A. 1658, entered into orders, and became chaplain to Rouse, provost of Eton college. The death of his patron soon after left him at liberty; and he returned to his college, where he continued during the turbulence of the times, till the restoration brought back peace, confidence, and security. Glanvil, who had showed strong partiality for Cromwell's usurpation, now became an active royalist, and he drew the attention of the learned by his popular treatise, called the Vanity of Dogmatizing, &c. against the Aristotelians, so that when the Royal Society was established, he was chosen one of that learned body, whose opinions and philosophy he had so ably defended. In 1663 he engaged in a controversy about the possibility of witches and witchcraft, and though his friends, and particularly Mr. Boyle, advised him to be careful in his management of so delicate a subject, where religion might be treated with levity, he collected with more superstition than prudence, not less than 26 modern relations of apparitions, &c. besides that of the invisible drummer, which nightly disturbed Mumpesson's house at Tedworth, Wilts, and which was the origin of the controversy. In 1666, by the interest of his friends, he obtained the rectory of the Abbey church, Bath, where he fixed his residence. In 1677 he engaged in a controversy with Crosse, vicar of Chew, Somersetshire, in defence of the Royal Society, and against the Aristotelian philosophy; and the raillery used on both sides, brought a fresh antagonist, Dr. Stubbe, physician at Warwick, who treated our author with more vehemence and scurrility than propriety could countenance. Glanvil forgot his resentment in the attentive performance of his ministerial duty; and when Stubbe was unfortunately drowned near Bath, and his remains were brought to be interred in the Abbey church, he preached a very pathetic and eloquent sermon on the occasion, and paid very handsome and deserved compliments to the memory of his departed antagonist. He was presented, in 1678, to a prebendal stall of Worcester, by the patronage of the marquis of Worcester, to whom his wife was related, and with the approbation of the king, to whom he had been chaplain since 1672. He was attacked by a fever which proved fatal, and he died at Bath, 4th Nov. 1680, aged 44, and was buried in his own church, where his widow erected a decent monument to his memory. He was twice married, but had no issue. He was a man of great parts; but though he possessed in a high degree the power of writing with elegance and fluency, his publications were all on temporary and controversial subjects. Besides the works mentioned already, he wrote an "Essay concerning Preaching,—and a seasonable Defence of Preaching,"—a blow at modern Sadducism—"Reflections on Drollery and Atheism"—Essays on important subjects in Philosophy and Religion—sermons, &c.

GLANVILLE, Ranulph, an English lawyer in the 12th century. He is mentioned with great respect by law writers, for his diligence in collecting all the laws of the kingdom into one body.

GLAPHYRA, a priestess of Bellona's temple in Cappadocia, is known for her amours with M. Antony, from whom she obtained the kingdom for her two sons, Sisinna and Archelaus.

GLAPTHORNE, Henry, a dramatic writer in the age of Charles I. Winstanley speaks of him with commendation, but Langbaine allows him little merit. Besides plays, he wrote poems to his mistress Lucinda.

GLASER, Christopher, apothecary to Louis XIV. was author of an elegant and valuable treatise on chymistry, translated into English and German. He died about 1679.

GLASS, John, M.A. a Scotch divine, born at Dundee 1698, and educated at Aberdeen. Upon his publication of a pamphlet on the inconsistency of a civil establishment with Christianity, he was deposed from his church, near Dundee, and then became the founder of a new sect called the Glassites, in Scotland, and Sandemanians in England. As the discipline of his sect was very rigorous, few embraced his tenets, and the name is scarce known now. He wrote various controversial tracts, published at Edinburgh, 4 vols. 8vo. He died at Dundee 1773, aged 75.

GLASS, John, son of the preceding, was born at Dundee, 1725, and went a surgeon to the West Indies. He afterwards quitted the medical profession; and as captain of a ship traded to the Brazils. After an absence of two years, he returned from the Brazils to London in 1765, with all his property; but, when in sight of Ireland, four of the seamen conspired against him, and after murdering him, his wife and daughter, the mate, one seaman, and two boys, they loaded the boat with dollars, and sinking the ship, landed at Ross, and came to Dublin, where punishment overtook them. They were executed for the bloody deed, Oct. 1766. Glass possessed abilities, and published a description of Teneriff, with the manners, &c. of the Portuguese, 4to.

GLASSIUS, Solomon, a German divine, professor of divinity and D.D. in Jena university. He was afterwards superintendent of schools and churches in Saxe-Gotha, and died 1656, aged 63. He wrote Philologia Sacra, 4to.—Onomatologia Mes-siæ Prophetica—Disputationes in Augustanam Confessionem—Exegesis Evangeliorum et Epistol.—Christologia Mosaica, et Davidica, &c.

GLAUBER, Rodolphus, a German chymist, author of a volume "Glauberus Concentratus," translated into English, fol. 1689, London. He has acquired celebrity as the discoverer of the neutral purgative salt, which still bears his name.

GLAUBER, John, a painter of Utrecht, who died 1726, aged 80. His landscapes are much admired. His pieces are enriched by the expressive figures of his friend Lareisse.

GLAUBER, John Gottlieb, brother and disciple of the preceding, died 1703, aged 47. His landscapes, sea-ports, &c. are in a very finished style.

GLAUBER, Diana, sister of the above painters, born 1650, shone likewise by the execution of her pencil. She became blind in her old age. Her portraits and historical subjects were admired.

GLEDITSCH, John Gottlieb, a native of Leipsic, who took his degree of M.D. at Frankfort on the Oder, 1740, and there became lecturer in botany, physiology, and the Materia Medica. He was afterwards member of the Berlin academy of sciences, anatomical professor, and director of the botanical garden. He was author of treatises on the management of Trees—on the Means of destroying Locusts—on Fungusses—Miscellaneous Essays on Medicine, Botany, Economy—on Bees—on the System of Plants, &c. He died 1786, aged 72.

GLEICHEN, Frederic William Von, a nobleman, born at Bayreuth, who, after serving his country with the rank of lieutenant colonel, retired from public life in 1756, and, satisfied with the empty title of privy counsellor, devoted himself to the study of natural history. He was very ingenious in the delineation of plants, and well acquainted with chymistry, and he constructed a curious microscope, with which he made observations on seminal animalcules, and on the putrefaction of vegetables, of which he published an account. These, and other works on subjects of natural history, are written in German, and possess merit. He died 1783, aged 69.

GLEN, John, a painter and engraver on wood of Liege. He published, in the 16th century, a curious work of ancient and modern dresses, with figures, &c.

GLENN, James, governor of South Carolina, was appointed in 1739, but did not assume the administration until January, 1744. He was recalled in 1755, and was succeeded by governor Lyttleton. Although many years in office his name is seldom mentioned in the history of the colony. It was a season of quiet. In his message in January, 1748, he congratulated the assembly, that such was the peaceable condition of the colony, that there was not an Indian enemy within a thousand miles of Charleston. Towards the close of his administration he met the Cherokee warriors in their own country, and concluded a treaty with them, by which a large extent of territory was ceded to the king, greatly to the interests of the colony and the safety of the inhabitants. It was immediately followed by a great influx of population, and extension of settlement.

GLENDOWER, Owen, a famous Welchman, who boldly opposed in the field, during fourteen years, the elevation of Henry IV. to the English throne. His name is still revered among the Welch. He died 1415, aged 61.

GLENIE, James, a mathematician, was born in Scotland in 1750, and educated at St. Andrews, from whence he removed to a cadetship at Woolwich. He served in America during the war, and while acting as lieutenant of the artillery, communicated papers to the Royal Society, for which he was elected a member without fees. He was one of the most active opponents of Sir Joseph Banks in 1784. The next year he encountered the duke of Richmond's plan of fortifications, and thus not only was stopped in his career of promotion, but lost the situation which he had hitherto held. He then went to America, and was employed some time on the works of Halifax; but here also he became involved in disputes, and was obliged to return to Europe. After this he was appointed preceptor in the military academy of the East India Company; which place he also lost by his indiscretion, and died in poor circumstances, Nov. 23d, 1817. Besides papers in the Philosophical Transactions, he published "A History of Gunnery," 8vo. "The Doctrine of Universal Comparison and General Proportion," 4to. "The Antecedental Calculus," 4to. "Observations on Construction," 8vo. &c.—W. B.

GLICAS, a Byzantine historian, whose works, the Annals from the Creation, and the History of the Byzantine Emperors, were published by Labbe, 1660, in Greek and Latin.

GLISSON, Francis, an English physician, born at Rampisham, Dorsetshire, and educated at Caius college, Cambridge, where he became fellow. He took his degrees in physic, and became, in the room of Winter-ton, regius professor of physic to the university, an office which he held forty years. He was elected fellow of the college of physicians 1634, and in his practice and studies he followed the plans of the great Harvey, and depended more upon anatomical dissection and minute observations than wild theories and vague conjectures. During the civil wars, he removed to Colchester, where he practised physic, and he was present at the siege and surrender of that important fortress. He distinguished himself by the great attention he paid to the progress of the rickets, a disorder which then first began to appear in the counties of Dorset and Somerset, and he communicated his observations and discoveries to the world in his "Anatomia Hepatis," 1654. He was for several years president of the college of physicians, and died 1677, in the parish of St. Bride, London. He was a man of great erudition, and universally esteemed. He contributed much to the advancement of true medical knowledge, and he discovered the capsula communis, or vagina portæ, and more clearly defined the vena cava porta, and vasa fellea of the liver. Of his many compositions on anatomical and medical subjects his treatise on the Liver is his best work.

GLoucester, Robert of, the most ancient of English poets, flourished in the reign of Henry II. and died in a good old age in the beginning of John's reign. Camden speaks very highly of him, and quotes many of his English rhymes; but he is more esteemed for his history than for his poetry.

Glover, Richard, an English poet, born in London, and educated at Cheam school, where his verses on the memory of Newton were deservedly applauded. He afterwards engaged with his father in the Hamburg trade, and in 1737, he married a woman of fortune, and produced his admired poem Leonidas. The powers of mind which he possessed were now displayed in political dissensions; he was a popular leader at elections, and when appointed one of the committee in an application to the house of Commons from the London merchants, he spoke with such boldness and energy at the bar, that his address was printed, and excited universal attention. He sat in parliament for Weymouth at the election of 1761, and died 1785, aged 74, much and deservedly lamented. Besides his Leonidas he published London, or the progress of Commerce, a poem, 1739—Hosier's Ghost, a popular ballad to rouse the spirit of the nation against the insults of the Spanish Court—Boadicea, a tragedy, acted at Drury-lane, not with success, 1753—Medea, another tragedy, better received 1761—Athenaid, an epic poem of inferior merit, which appeared 1788, in 3 vols. 12mo. His great and immortal work Leonidas has been translated into French, and has passed through various editions.

GLUCK, Christopher, an able musician, born in the Upper Palatinate. He studied in Italy, and visited England and Germany, and afterwards acquired great celebrity at Vienna. He went to Paris, where his performances were honourably rewarded with a pension. He wrote besides operas, letters on music, &c. and died at Vienna, 1787, aged 73.

GLYNN, Robert, a native of Cambridge, educated at Eton and King's college, of which he became fellow. He studied medicine, and took his doctor's degree in 1752; but he preferred the easy and indolent life of a college to the labours of an extensive practice, which his knowledge and information might have commanded. After being for 63 years, for his wit, his learning, and his interesting fund of anecdotes, the favourite of his society, he died 1800, aged 82. He is known as the author of the Day of Judgment, a poem of singular merit, which obtained the Setonian prize at Cambridge 1757, and which is much read and deservedly admired.

GMELIN, Samuel Gottlieb, son of a physician at Tubingen, was born in 1745, and distinguished himself by his abilities and his perseverance in several voyages to France, Holland, and on the shores of the Caspian sea. He was seized by the Tartars when in their country, and died in confinement 1774. He published in German, "Travels in Russia," and "Historia Fucorum," but though a man of genius, and well versed in natural history, he was of a licentious turn of mind. Pallas has written his life.

GMELIN, John George, uncle to the preceding, was born at Tubingen, and became member of the academy at Petersburg. He is known by his Flora Siberica, 4 vols. 4to.—and his Travels in Siberia, published in French, 2 vols. He died 1755, aged 46.

GMELIN, John Frederic, a physician and chymist, was born at Tubingen, in 1748. He received his education at his native place, and afterwards at Gottingen, where he became professor of chymistry and natural history. He published several works on chymistry, mineralogy, and natural history. One of the most celebrated is his edition of the "Systema Naturæ of Linnæus." He was also the author of "A History of Chymistry;" and the world is indebted to him for the discovery of several excellent dyes, extracted from mineral and vegetable substances. He died at Gottingen, in 1805.—W. B.

GOADBY, Robert, a printer of Sherborne, Dorsetshire, author of an Illustration of the Scriptures, 3 vols. fol. and the Universe Displayed, and other books. He wrote also the life of Bamfylde Moore Carew, the famous king of the beggars; and he acquired some property by the establishment of a provincial paper at Sherborne. He died much respected 1778.

GOAR, James, a Dominican friar of Paris, sent to the Levant in 1618. He published "Græcorum Eucologium," in Greek and Latin, Paris, 1647, and also translated some of the Byzantine historians. He resided for some time at Rome, and was universally respected for his learning. He died 1653, aged 52.

GOBBO, Pietro Paolo Cortonese, a painter of Cortona, who died 1640, aged 60. His fruits and landscapes by their charming colouring and native elegance, are much admired.

GOBBO, Andrea, an Italian historical painter, who died about 1627, aged about 57.

GOBEL, John Baptist, a native of Hanne, bishop of Lydda. At the revolution he embraced the opinions of the popular party, and was appointed, 1791, first constitutional archbishop of Paris. Soon after, however, he resigned his episcopal habit in the convention, declaring at the age of 70, that he abjured a religion in which he placed no faith, and which dishonoured humanity. This hoary delinquent against truth and virtue did not pass unpunished, he was accused of atheism by Robespierre, and condemned as the accomplice of Chaumette. He was guillotined 14th April, 1793, regretted by none.

GOBELIN, Giles, a famous dyer in the reign of Francis I. known for the invention of the fine scarlet which still bears his name. The house where he lived in the Fauxbourg of St. Marcel, Paris, still preserves his name.

GOBIER, Charles, a Jesuit of St. Maloes, born 1644. He wrote the "History of the Mariannes," and "Lettres Edifiantes," which contain the history, geography, and politics of those countries, subjected to the observations and discoveries of the Jesuits. He wrote some other tracts, and warmly embraced the disputes about the worship of Confucius in China. He died at Paris, 1708.

GOBRYAS, one of the seven Persian nobles who conspired to dethrone the usurper Smerdis. He was father-in-law of Darius.

GOCLENIUS, Conrad, a German, born in Westphalia, 1486, and esteemed for his learning and virtues by Erasmus. He wrote valuable notes on Cicero's Offices, and published an edition of Lucan, and a translation of Lucian's Hermotimus. He died 1539.

GOCLENIUS, Rodolphus, author of a tract on the Cure of Wounds by the application of the Magnet, may be considered as the founder of modern magnetism. He was born at Wittemberg, and was professor of physic and mathematics at Marpurg, and died 1621, aged 49.

GOCLENIUS, Rodolphus, a voluminous writer, born at Wardeck, 1547. He was for nearly 50 years professor of logic at Marpurg, where he died, 1628. His works are on philosophical subjects.

GODDARD, Jonathan, an English physician and chymist, born at Greenwich, 1617, and educated at Magdalen-hall, Oxford. After four years residence in the university he travelled to improve himself in the knowledge of physic, and on his return he took his degree of M.D. as member of Christ college, Cambridge, and that of doctor at Catherine-hall. In 1646 he was chosen fellow of the college of physicians, and the next year was appointed their reader in anatomy. As he favoured strongly the measures of parliament, he was taken under the protection of Cromwell, and accompanied him as physician to the army to Ireland, and afterwards to Scotland, and for his services he was nominated by the usurper, warden of Merton college, Oxford, 1651. During Cromwell's absence in Scotland, he was one of the five delegates, whom he appointed to settle all grants and dispensations, and in the short parliament of 1653, he sat as the sole representative of the university. At the restoration he was driven with disgrace from his wardenship, and he retired to Gresham college, where he had been in 1655 chosen professor of physic, and afterwards his services and talents were considered as so respectable, that on the establishment of the Royal Society, to which he had so much contributed, he was named one of the first council, 1663. In his extensive practice, as physician, he was so conscientious that he mixed up his own medicines, and regardless of the clamours of the apothecaries against him, he even published a pamphlet strongly recommending it to his fellow-physicians. After being driven from the Exchange by the fire of London, he was enabled to return to the new lodgings in 1671, where he continued till his death, eagerly devoted to the advancement of medicine and of philosophy. He died of an apoplectic fit in Cheapside, as he returned home from the society of a number of his learned friends, 24th March, 1674. He was not only an able writer, but he was the liberal patron of learned men, and in consequence of his celebrity, had several books dedicated to him. He procured some fame by the invention of some drops, long since forgotten, but he deserves to be mentioned with particular honour, if, as Dr. Seth Ward says, he was the first Englishman who made a telescope. His writings, which are chiefly on medical and philosophical subjects, are preserved in the philosophical transactions, in Birch's history of the Royal Society, and in separate pamphlets.

GODEAU, Anthony, a French prelate, born at Dreux 1605. At the age of 24 he was one of those learned men who met at the house of Mr. Courart, on subjects of science and philosophy, and to their zeal in the cause of literature, the French academy of belles lettres owed its origin, and he became one of its first and brightest ornaments. In 1636 he was raised by Richelieu to the bishopric of Grasse, which he relinquished for that of Venice. He was an active prelate, attentive to the duties of his station, and exemplary in every part of his conduct. He died of a fit of apoplexy 21st April, 1671. His writings, both in prose and verse, are numerous. His Ecclesiastical History, 3 vols. folio, 1653, is very valuable, the first of which only appeared in 1653. He translated also the Psalms into French verse, which work, though abused by Vavassor and others, is preferred by some to Marot's version.

GODEFROI, Denys, a native of Paris, counsellor in the parliament there. As he was a protestant he left France at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and retired to Geneva, and afterwards to Strasburg where he died, 1622, aged 73. He wrote Corpus Juris Civilis, 4to.—Notæ in Quatuor Libr. Institut.—Opuscula Varia Juris, &c.

GODEFROI, Theodore, eldest son of the preceding, was a catholic, and became counsellor of state in France. He wrote on the Genealogical History of France, and died at Strasburg, 1642. His brother James remained a protestant, and was member of the council and law professor at Geneva, where he died, 1659. He was a learned man and edited Cicero and other classical authors.

GODEFROI, Denys, son of Theodore, was author of Memoirs and Instructions concerning the Affairs of the French king, in fol. He died 1681. His son John edited Philip de Comines' Memoirs, 5 vols. 8vo. and published also queen Margaret's Memoirs, &c. and died 1732.

GODESCHALC, surnamed Fulgentius, a monk of Orbais in Saxony, in the ninth century, known for his controversy about predestination and grace. He was attacked by Rab. Maurus, archbishop of Mentz, and thrown into prison, where, after being degraded from his ecclesiastical offices, he died; but his doctrines as well as his sufferings gained him followers. Maguin published in 2 vols. 4to. an edition of all the treatises written on both sides of the agitated question. He died about 869.

GODEWYCK, Margarita, a paintress of Dort, who died 1677, aged 50. Her landscapes, and also her works in embroidery, were much admired.

GODFREY, Sir Edmundbury, an able and upright magistrate, who exerted himself in the discovery of the popish plot. He was soon after found dead, pierced with his own sword, and with many marks of violence. His death was imputed to the resentment of the papists, and therefore his funeral was performed with great pomp, and no less than 72 clergymen preceded his corpse, and 1000 persons of rank attended the procession. The dean of Bangor, Dr. William Lloyd, afterwards bishop of Worcester, preached his funeral sermon. He died 17th Oct. 1678.

GODFREY, of Bouillon, an illustrious and active chieftain during the crusades, son of Eustace count of Boulogne. He was, after the fall of Jerusalem, elected by the Christians king of that city, and of the adjacent country, but, from motives of piety and humility, he declined the lofty title, and was satisfied with the appellation of duke of the holy sepulchre. He defeated the armies of the Egyptian sultan with great slaughter, and made himself master of all the holy land. He made an excellent code of laws for his subjects, and died after enjoying his dignity little more than a year, 1100. He is one of the heroes of Tasso's immortal poem.

GODFREY, Thomas, the inventor of Hadley's quadrant, was a citizen of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and by trade a glazier. He enjoyed only the advantages of a common education, but having an ardent thirst for knowledge, he read with avidity the books which fell into his hands, particularly such as related to mathematics, with which science he was particularly pleased, and made himself familiarly acquainted. He learned the Latin language that he might enjoy its aid in acquiring a perfect knowledge of his favourite study. It was about the year 1730, that he communicated to Mr. Logan an account of his invention of the quadrant. The London Royal Society, on being made acquainted, through Mr. Logan, with the discovery, presented Mr. Godfrey with household furniture to the value of 200*l*. It was by a fraud that the instrument came to bear the name of Hadley. Godfrey put it into the hands of an ingenious navigator going to Jamaica, that he might test its usefulness, who, on arriving there, showed it to a captain sailing to England, by whom a description of it was furnished to Hadley. And he, making an instrument of the same kind, had the baseness to claim the honour of having invented it. Godfrey was a member of a literary club in Philadelphia, but had not the merit of urbanity, or of temperance. He died in 1749.

GODWINOT, John, a native of Rheims, where he was canon of the cathedral. He was also a wine-merchant, and in his conduct very charitable. He was zealously attached to the tenets of the Jansenists, and died 1749, aged 88.

GODIVA, a lady of great beauty and greater celebrity. She was sister to Therauld du Bergenhall, sheriff of Lincolnshire, and wife of Leofric earl of Leicester, the son of the earl of Mercia. She solicited her husband to exonerate the people of Coventry from a heavy tax, and he consented to grant her petition provided she rode naked through the streets, which, from her generous affection towards the city she condescended to do. The adventure was painted in one of the windows of Trinity church, Coventry, with these words,

*I Luric, for the love of thee,
Do make Coventry toll-free.*

GODOLPHIN, John, a learned civilian, born at Godolphin, in the island of Sicily, 1617. He was of Gloucester-hall, Oxford, and devoted himself attentively to civil law, and took his doctor's degree 1642-3. He favoured the puritans, and under Cromwell he was appointed one of the three judges of the admiralty. So great was his reputation for integrity and knowledge, that at the restoration he was made king's advocate, and he asserted in his publications the king's supremacy. He died 1678. He published "A View of the Admiral's Jurisdiction," 8vo. 1661—"the Orphan's Legacy, &c. 1674,"—"Repertorium Canonicum, 4to."—the Holy Limbec, —the Holy Arbour, fol. &c.

GODWIN, earl, a powerful Saxon baron, who, in 1017, went with Canute against Sweden, and for his valour in that expedition received that monarch's daughter in marriage. On the king's death he supported Hardicanute against his brother Harold, but soon after changed sides. After Hardicanute's death he declared himself in favour of Edward, who had married his daughter, but, with a fickleness peculiar to his character, he afterwards conspired against him, and escaped to Flanders to avoid punishment. Bent, however, on revenge, he invaded the kingdom from the continent, and spread such terror by sailing up the Thames to London, that the king yielded to his wishes, and received him again into his protection. He died at Winchester suddenly, while dining with the king, 1053. It is said that he murdered Alfred, one of the sons of the second Ethelred, and that when accused of it he purified himself by the solemnity of an oath.

GODWIN, Thomas, an English prelate, born at Ockingham, Berks, 1517. Under the patronage of Dr. Layton he was sent to Magdalen college, Oxford, of which he became fellow, 1544. He early embraced the tenets of the protestants, and as his fellow-collegians were very zealous for the popish principles, he quitted Oxford, and took the grammar-school at Brackley, Northamptonshire, where he married, and lived in comfortable independence in the reign of Edward VI. At the accession of Mary he was exposed to persecution, and, leaving his school, he began to practise physic, and took his bachelor's degree at Oxford 1555. On Elizabeth's accession he took orders, and, by the friendship of Bullingham bishop of Lincoln, he was introduced to the queen, who admired his eloquence in the pulpit, and rewarded him with the deanery of Christ-church 1565, and that of Canterbury the next year. In 1584 he was made bishop of Bath and Wells, but he soon after fell under the queen's displeasure for taking a second wife, and this weighed much on his spirits, and increased his infirmities. He died of a quartan ague 1590.

GODWIN, Francis, son of the preceding, was born at Havington, Northamptonshire, 1561, and educated at Christ-church, Oxford, of which he became student 1578. He was rector of Samford Orcais, Somersetshire, prebendary of Wilts, subdean of Exeter, and in 1595 he took his degree of D.D. He devoted his time to literary pursuits, and accompanied Camden in his travels into Wales in search of antiquities, but while he left his friend to record the features of the country, he turned his thoughts to the history of some of the inhabitants, and produced in 1601, in 4to. "a Catalogue of the Bishops of England, since the first planting of Christianity in the Island, with a History of their Lives and memorable Actions." This valuable work gained him the friendship of lord Buckhurst, and the patronage of Elizabeth, who made him bishop of Llandaff. He now devoted himself to the improvement of his book, and, in 1615, published another edition, which however was so erroneously printed, from his distance from the press, that he gave another edition in an elegant Latin dress, dedicated to James I. who was so pleased with it than he translated the bishop to the see of Hereford 1617. He died of a languishing disorder April 1633, leaving several children by his wife, daughter of Wollton, bishop of Exeter. After his death, in 1638, was published "the Man in the Moon, by Domingo Gonsales, 8vo." an entertaining piece on a philosophical subject, which he had written in 1583, but never published. He wrote also annals of the reigns of Henry VIII. Edward IV. and Mary, in Latin, the third edition of which was 1630, with an English translation by his son Morgan, also a computation of the value of the Attic Talent, and Roman Sesterce, &c.

GODWIN, Thomas, a learned Englishman, born in Somersetshire 1537. He was of Magdalen-hall, Oxford, where he took the degree of M.A. 1609, and that year he was elected master of Royse's free-school, in Abingdon, where his genius and abilities were soon distinguished by a respectable number of pupils. He wrote for the use of his school "Romanæ Historiæ Anthologia," 1613, 4to. and, in 1616, published at Oxford his "Synopsis Antiquitatum Hebraicarum, &c." dedicated to his patron Montague, bishop of Bath and Wells. Some time after he obtained from his patron the rectory of Brightwell, Berks, and resigned his school. He printed, 1637, "Moses and Aaron," and took his degree of D.D. 1637. He died at Brightwell 1642-3, leaving a wife whom he had married while at Abingdon. This worthy and learned man was, on account of his book, called Three Arguments to prove Election upon Foresight, by Faith, engaged in a controversy with Dr. Twise of Newbury.

GODWIN, Mary Wollstonecraft, a woman of eccentric character and superior abilities, born at Beverley, in Yorkshire, 1768. Reduced in her circumstances by the extravagance of her father, she sought for subsistence in the resources of her own mind, and as a teacher of a day-school at Islington, and then at Newington, and afterwards as governess in lord Kingsborough's family, she maintained herself with reputation. Too fond of independence however to submit to the caprices and humours of self-willed children, she had recourse to her pen, and, in 1787, she settled in London, and published Original Stories for the use of children, and various translations from French and German authors. She was also engaged in the Analytical Review, and, in 1790, was one of Burke's opponents in an attack against his famous pamphlet on the French Revolution, and the next year she published her vindication of the Rights of Women, a book which in bold language attempts to overthrow the established regulations of society, and which, instead of conciliating concord, harmony, and mutual affection, in domestic life, would render the marriage state a scene of distrust and jealousy, of strife and contentious rivalry. She was, in 1792, at Paris, where she unfortunately formed an improper connexion with an American merchant, by whom she had a daughter, and while accompanying him in Norway, she wrote her letters on Scandinavia. The little respect she paid to her character, proved now the source of great unhappiness, and, deserted by her ungrateful favourite, she, on her return to England, attempted to destroy herself by throwing herself into the Thames, from Putney bridge. She in some degree atoned, 1796, for the insults she had offered to the good sense of her sex, and the precepts of a holy religion, and, after defending a promiscuous intercourse among the sexes, as passion or inclination dictated, she married Mr. Godwin, but died the August of the following year in childbed. Her letters, fragments, and posthumous works, appeared after her death.

GOERCE, William, an eminent scholar of Middleberg, who died at Amsterdam 1715, aged 80. He is author of Jewish Antiquities, 2 vols. fol. Utrecht, 1700—History of the Jewish Church—essay on the Practice of Painting—on Architecture.

GOERTZ, John, baron of, a memorable Swede, born in Holstein. He gained, by his intrepidity and valour, the good opinion of Charles XII. He endeavoured to excite an insurrection in England, in favour of the pretender, and was at last sacrificed to the popular fury. He had been placed, by Charles, at the head of his finances, and the discontents which he caused by raising money for the schemes of his eccentric master were such, that after the king's death he was beheaded, 1719.

GOES, Hugo Vander, a painter of Bruges, disciple of Van Eyck. His Abigail in the presence of David, is his most admired piece. He flourished about 1480.

GOESIUS, William, a critic, born at Leyden. His notes on Petronius, adopted in Burman's edition, are much admired. He was son-in-law of Dan. Heinsius, and died 1686.

GOETZE, George Henry, a native of Leipsic, who died at Lubec 1702, aged 34. He was superintendent of the churches of Lubec, and wrote, in Latin, dissertations historical, critical, and theological. A collection from his works appeared, 3 vols. 12mo. 1706.

GOEZ, John Augustus Ephraim, a native of Ascherleben, educated at Halle, and minister of Quedlinburg, where he died 1786, aged 55. He was an eminent naturalist, and his various discoveries with the microscope entitle him to great praise. He published Entomological Collections, in four parts, 1771-1781—History of Intestinal Worms, in German, 1782, &c.

GOEZ, Damian de, a Portuguese writer, born at Alanquar, near Lisbon, of a noble family. He travelled much, and became acquainted with the learned of Europe, especially John and Olaus Magnus, Erasmus, cardinal Bembo, and others. He married at Louvain, and hoped there to enjoy peace and security, after 14 years spent in travelling, but a war between Charles V. and Henry II. of France, drove him from his retirement. He was recalled home by John III. of Portugal, but the favours of the monarch were embittered by the jealousy and the persecution of the courtiers. By their influence he was confined within the walls of Lisbon on his parole, and he was soon after found dead in his house, with the appearance of having been strangled, or fallen a sacrifice to a violent apoplexy. He wrote "Fides, Religio, Moresque Æthiopum"—"de Imperio et Rebus Lusitanorum," and other works much esteemed.

GOFF, Thomas, an English writer, born in Essex, 1592, and educated at Westminster school and Christ-church, Oxford. In 1623 he obtained the living of East Chandon, Surrey, where he took for his wife a Xantippe, whose violence of temper destroyed his comforts, and probably shortened his days. He died 1627. Among his writings are five tragedies, published after his death, some sermons, and two funeral orations on sir Henry Saville and Dr. Godwin. Philips and Winstanley ascribe to him improperly "Cupid's Whirligig."

GOFFE, William, one of the Regicides, and a major general under Cromwell, left London before the restoration, in company with general Whalley, and arrived at Boston in June, 1660. They were received kindly by governor Endicott, and resided at Cambridge till February, 1661, when the intelligence reached them that they were not included in the act of indemnity; they then removed to New Haven, and were secreted by the principal inhabitants. They afterwards resided for some time on West Rock, and in the neighbouring towns. But in 1664 they removed to Hadley, Massachusetts, and remained concealed 15 or 16 years in the house of the reverend Mr. Russel. When the Indians attacked that town in 1675, and threw the inhabitants, who were assembled for worship, into the utmost confusion, Goffe, entirely unknown by them, white with age, of a commanding aspect, and clothed in an unusual dress, suddenly presented himself among them, and, encouraging them by his exhortations, placed himself at their head, and led them, by his military skill, to an immediate victory. The battle had scarcely terminated when he disappeared, and the people, alike ignorant of the place from whence he came and of his retreat, regarded him as an angel sent for their deliverance. He died at Hadley, it is supposed, about the year 1679.

GOGAVA, Antonius Hennanius, a German physician, who published Aristoxeni Harmonicorum Elementorum, Libri quinque, Venice, 1593.

GOGUET, Antony-Yves, a French writer, born 1716 at Paris, son of an advocate. Though dull in his younger years, his mind expanded, and produced that excellent work, called "l'Origine des Loix, des Arts, des Sciences, et de leur Progres chez les Anciens Peuples, 1758," 3 vols. 4to. The reputation of this celebrated performance he did not long enjoy, as he died of the small pox the same year; and his friend, Conrad Fugere, to whom he left his MSS. and library, followed him through affliction to the grave in three days.

GOLDAST, Melchior Haiminsfield, a learned civilian, born at Bischoffel in Switzerland 1576. He was always poor, though his distress was relieved by his publications and the liberality of his friends. He was of a very unsettled temper, and he passed from St. Gal to Geneva, from Geneva to Lausanne, and afterwards he was at Frankfort, Forsteg, and other places. He was some time secretary to the Duke of Bouillon, and he married a wife at Frankfort, with whom he lived nearly thirty years. He survived her five years, and died 1635. He was a most indefatigable man, and though his writings were not properly his own, but drawn from scarce books and old manuscripts, yet he displayed astonishing judgment and great erudition; and, though abused by Scioppius, he probably deserved all the flattering things which Conringius has said in his praise. As to the knowledge of the public law of the empire, and a thorough acquaintance with the affairs of Germany, no man was better entitled to respect, and therefore it might be said, that had he lived in the age of Athens, he would have found an honourable asylum in her prytaneum. His works are Monarchia S. Romani Imperii, 3 vols. fol.—Alamania Scriptores, 3 vols. fol.—Commentarius de Bohemia Regno, 4to.—Scriptores Rerum Suevicarum, 4to.—Collectio Consuetudinum Leg. Imperial. fol.—Politica Imperial. 2 vols. fol. &c.

GOLDHAGEN, John Eustachius, of Magdeburg, translated Herodotus, Pausanias, Xenophon, and other Greek classics, into Latin. He died 1772, aged 71.

GOLDMAN, Nicholas, a native of Breslaw, author of a Latin treatise on military architecture, on the proportion of the circle, &c. He died 1665, at Leyden.

GOLDONI, Charles, a native of Venice, who early showed a decided partiality for theatrical representation, so that his father, to humour his taste, fitted up a play-house on his own premises. The genius, so kindly patronised, was most happily exerted, and the Italian stage was completely reformed by the labours and the judgment of Goldoni, whose plays were numerous and popular. After acquiring deserved celebrity at home by the humour and genuine wit of his comedies, he went in 1761 to Paris, where he became composer to the Italian theatre, and obtained apartments at court, and a pension. He died 1792, aged 85. His works were collected together at Leghorn, in thirty-one volumes, 8vo.

GOLDSMITH, Oliver, a celebrated writer, born at Elphin 1729, or, according to some accounts, at Pallas, in the county of Longford, 1731. He was the third of four sons, and his father, who was a clergyman, intending him for the church, sent him in 1744 to Trinity college, Dublin, where he took his first degree in arts 1749. He preferred, however, medicine to divinity, and in 1751 passed to Edinburgh to qualify himself for his medical degrees, but here the benevolence of his disposition drew him into difficulties; and his imprudent offer to answer for the payment of the debts of an ungrateful fellow-collegian, obliged him to fly precipitately from Scotland. He was pursued, and arrested at Sunderland, but the friendship of two of his college friends, who knew his merits, and pitied his imprudence, relieved him from his difficulties; and he immediately embarked for the continent. From Rotterdam, where he had landed, he proceeded to Brussels, and then passing through Flanders he came to Strasburg, and visited Louvain, where he took his degree of M.B. From Flanders he travelled to Geneva, where he became tutor to a young man whom the sudden possession of a large fortune had induced to make the tour of Europe, but the dispositions of the preceptor and the pupil were so different, that after visiting the south of France, they separated in mutual disgust. After a long excursion, chiefly on foot, Goldsmith at last reached Dover in 1758, but persecuted by poverty. For a while he sought employment in London; but the rustic appearance of his dress and his broad Irish accent proved unfavourable to his application, till at last a chymist in Fish-street, pitying his misfortunes, received him into his laboratory, more as an act of charity than from the prospect of private advantage. From the hospitable roof this accidental patron, he soon, however, rose to greater consequence under the patronage of his old friend Dr. Sleight, and after being usher in a school at Peckham, he commenced writer in the Monthly Review, and then in the Public Ledger, where his Citizen of the World first appeared under the title of Chinese Letters. He was now courted as a man of genius, and respected as a public character; and emerging from his obscure lodgings near the Old Bailey, he took chambers in the Temple, and began to live like a man of fashion and of fortune. His Traveller, or Prospect of Society, his Vicar of Wakefield, and his Letters on the History of England, added to his reputation and to his income, and in 1768, his Good-natured Man, acted at Covent-garden, though censured by some critics, placed him in the rank of the most popular writers of the age. His excellent poem of the Deserted Village appeared in 1770, and two years after he produced his comedy of She stoops to Conquer, or the Mistakes of a Night, which was received with great and deserved applause, and will long engage the public approbation. He published besides a History of England in 4 vols. 8vo.—another in a Series of Letters from a Nobleman to his Son, long attributed to lord Lytleton, in 2 vols. 12mo.—a Roman History, two vols. 8vo.—a Grecian History, two vols. 8vo.—a History of the Earth and Animated Nature, eight vols. 8vo. &c. but though his income was respectable, he was far from feeling the comforts of independence and prosperity. His temper was unfortunately peevish and sullen, and though humane, benevolent, and generous, though the friend of indigence and pining merit, he was often a prey to childish moroseness and sullen melancholy, and frequently retired from the company of the gay and the convivial to brood over his self-created miseries and his imaginary woes. The last part of life was embittered by the lingering attack of a strangury, and bodily disease at last produced a settled melancholy. A nervous fever succeeded to wear out his constitution, shattered by debility and the horrors of despondency, and by inadvertently taking an improper dose of Dr. James's powders, he hastened his own dissolution. He died 4th April, 1774, aged 45, and was buried in the Temple churchyard. A monument worthy of his fame and merit has been erected to his memory in Westminster abbey, where a Latin inscription, in nervous and beautiful language by the pen of Dr. Johnson records his virtues. As a writer, Goldsmith acquired great and deserved celebrity. His poems possess singular beauty; the Traveller abounds with elegant and animated description, and as Dr. Johnson observed, no poem of greater excellence has appeared since the days of Pope. The Deserted Village exhibits beauties peculiarly its own, and while the simple tale of indigent nature, and of suffering humanity can interest and captivate the heart, so long will the lines of this correct poem continue to be read and admired. Besides the works already mentioned, many are enumerated as the composition of Goldsmith, though it is probable that, like Guthrie, Smollet, and others, he only lent his name to them to give them a temporary celebrity.

GOLDSMITH, or GOULDSMITH, Francis, an able translator of Grotius's play of Sophomarcas, or History of Joseph, into English verse. He lived in the reign of Charles I. and was highly respected.

GOLIUS, James, a learned orientalist, born at the Hague, 1596. He studied with unusual application at Leyden, and travelled afterwards to France with the dutchess de la Tremouille, and was honourably invited to teach Greek at Rochelle, where he stayed till that city was reduced by the French arms. He afterwards returned to Holland, and directed by the genius of his friend and preceptor the learned Arabic professor Erpenius, he accompanied the Dutch ambassador, in 1622, to the court of Morocco, thus to enrich his mind with a more intimate knowledge of the Arabian tongue, and to advance the interests of literature. He carried with him a letter of recommendation from his master Erpenius, for the Moorish prince, with a present of a grand atlas, and of a New Testament in Arabic, which was received with great satisfaction by Muley Zidan the king of Morocco. During his residence here, Golius devoted himself assiduously to the Arabic, and in an audience which he had from the king, he was admired for the facility with which he understood the language, though on account of its guttural sounds he could not pronounce it fluently, and on his return to Holland he brought with him a most valuable collection of books and manuscripts, hitherto unknown to Europe, and among them the Annals of the Kingdoms of Fez and Morocco. On the death of his valued friend Erpenius, he was chosen as his successor in the Arabic chair, but so great was his thirst after knowledge, that he asked and obtained permission to travel into the east. He was 15 months at Aleppo, and made various excursions into Arabia and Mesopotamia, and then came by land to Constantinople, and at last in 1629, he returned to Leyden. He not only had thus become a perfect master of the Persian, Turkish, and Arabic languages, but he had made observations on their manners, and he brought with him such curious and valuable manuscripts, as has ever since been the pride and glory of the university of Leyden. With indefatigable zeal he now converted the treasures he possessed to the good of mankind, and nobly patronised by the states, he began and finished a New Testament in the Arabic language, with a translation into the vulgar Greek, besides the Confession of the Reformed Protestants, and a Catechism and Liturgy, assisted by an Armenian and an Archmandrite, to be dispersed among the Greeks and Mahometans in every part of the world. During his absence, his countrymen, in honour of his great services, had appointed him mathematical professor, and soon after he was nominated interpreter in ordinary to the States for eastern languages, for which he was so well qualified. To these honours from his country he added all the virtues of private life; his temperance and regularity ensured him a vigorous constitution, and at the age of 70 he travelled on foot from the Meuse to the Waal, a journey of 14 hours. He died 28th September, 1667, much and deservedly respected for his learning, his virtue, meekness, and piety. He had by his wife, with whom he lived 24 years, and who survived him, two sons, who rose to distinction in Holland. Besides a valuable "Arabic Lexicon," and a new edition of Erpenius's Grammar, and a Persian Dictionary, printed in London, the life of Tamerlane, &c. he engaged in a Geographical and Historical Dictionary of the East, which, however, he did not complete.

GOLIUS, Peter, brother of the preceding, was born at Leyden, and established a monastery of the bare-footed Carmelites on the summit of mount Libanus. He was an excellent orientalist, and published some books in Arabic and Latin, and assisted in the editions of the great Arabic Bible, printed at Rome 1671. He died at Surat, in the East Indies, 1673.

GOLTZIUS, Henry, an eminent painter and engraver, born 1658, at Mulbrec, in the dutchy of Juliers. He travelled through Germany to Italy disguised in the habit of a servant, whilst his servant appeared in the character of a master, and pretended to keep him for his knowledge and skill in painting. After visiting Rome and Naples, and studying the works of the best masters, he returned to Haerlem, where he died 1617. As an engraver he has been highly commended by Evelyn, and his imitations of Leyden, in the Passion, the dead Christ, and other pieces, have been long and deservedly admired.

GOLTZIUS, Hubert, a German writer, born at Venloo, in the dutchy of Gueldres, 1526. Though brought up a painter under his father, who was of the same profession, he devoted himself to the pursuits of antiquities, and particularly of medals, and travelled through France, Germany, and Italy, in the cultivation of his favourite study. His fame as an antiquary was so respectable that he was honoured with the freedom of Rome, and the books he wrote were so curious and so valuable that they were deemed the ornaments of the first libraries in Europe. He was so devoted to the science of antiquity, that he gave to his children the names of ancient Romans, such as Julius, Marcellus, &c. but though very nice and judicious in his examination of antiques, he has admitted some medals as true which are evidently not such. He married a second wife, widow of Smetius, more for the antiques which her husband had possessed than for love, and, consequently, the union proved so disagreeable that the violent temper of his bride shortened his days. He died at Bruges 1583, aged 57. His chief publications were "Imperatorum fere omnium vivæ Imagines à J. Cæsare ad Carolum V. ex Veter. Numismatibus."—"Fasti Magistratum, &c."

—“de Origine Populi R.”—“Fasti Consulares”—“Thesaurus Antiquit.”

GOLYDDAN, a bard in the court of Cadwallader in the beginning of the 8th century.

GOMAR, Francis, a native of Bruges, known for his strong and able defence of Calvin's principles against Arminius, his colleague as divinity professor at Leyden, and his adherents. He died at Groningen, where he was divinity and Hebrew professor, 1641. He had before held a literary situation at Middleburgh and Saumur. His works were collected into one volume, Amsterdam, 1645.

GOMBAULD, John Ogier de, a French poet born at St. Just de Lussac, in Saintonge, 1567. He was educated at Bourdeaux, and then came to Paris, where he determined by his abilities to advance his fortune, which he, as the son of a fourth marriage, found very circumscribed. His sonnets and epigrams gained him applause, and the verses which he wrote on the king's assassination by Ravalliac, 1610, so pleased the queen regent, Mary de Medicis, that she made him her favourite, and granted him a pension of 1200 livres. Thus cherished by the great, and the respected friend and associate of those who frequented the house of that virtuous and amiable woman Mad. Rambouillet, he charmed every company with his wit and his elegant manners. He was one of those whose meetings gave rise to the academy of belles lettres, 1625, under the patronage of Richelieu, and he became one of its first members. Though a friend of the reformed religion he conducted himself with such propriety that he offended no party, but on the contrary he gained universal esteem, and lived respected. His income was increased by an additional pension from Seguier, chancellor of France, and, by prudent economy, his equipage and finances were always on the most respectable footing. By an accidental fall in his room he was confined for some of the last years of his life to his bed. He died 1666, aged 99. At the age of 90 he published a collection of epigrams, and some years after, the tragedy called Danaïdes. Among his chief productions are “Endymion,” a romance, in prose—Amarintha, a pastoral—letters—poems, &c. His posthumous works appeared in Holland 1673, and were chiefly religious, and in favour of protestant principles.

GOMBERVILLE, Marin le Roi, a native of Chevreuse, member of the French academy, and author of Palexandre—la Cytherée—la Jeune Alcidiene, romances—Discours sur les Vertus et les Vices de l'Histoire, &c.—la Doctrine des Mœurs selon les Stoïques—de la Riviere des Amazones—Poesies Diverses, &c. He died 1674, aged 75.

GOMERSAL, Robert, a poet in the time of Charles I. student of Christ-church, Oxford, and B.D. 1627. He left poems and sermons. His “Levite's Revenge,” containing poetical meditations on the 19th and 20th chapters of Judges, is his best piece. He died 1646.

GOMEZ, de Ciudad, Alvarez, a Latin poet of Guadalaxara near Toledo. He wrote Solomon's Proverbs in Latin verse—the Golden Fleece, and other works, esteemed in Spain. He died 1553, aged 70.

GOMEZ, de Castro, Alvarez, a learned Spaniard, born near Toledo, and author of the History of Cardinal Ximenes. He died 1580, aged 65.

GOMEZ, Magdelene Angelica Poisson de, a French lady who wrote some romances and theatrical pieces, very numerous, but not much esteemed. She died 1770, aged 36.

GONDEBAUD, third king of Burgundy, after his brother Chilperic 491. He attacked Italy, and endeavoured in vain to reunite the catholics and Arians at a synod at Lyons 499, but he was afterwards defeated and made tributary to Clovis king of the Franks. He put to death his brother Godesil who had revolted against him, and afterwards devoted himself to the improvement of his subjects, whose morals and property he protected by the establishment of a system of laws still called la Loi Gouibelle. He died 516.

GONDRIN, Lewis Antony, a favourite of Lewis XIV. When visited at his country house by the monarch, he removed in one night the grove of old trees which had appeared to the king as offensive to the sight. Lewis the next day, complained of a large wood which obstructed his view, and in a moment 1200 men, who were ready, levelled the disagreeable wood to the ground. What if the king, said the dutchess of Burgundy, who was present, wished our heads thus to disappear, the duke, I fear, would not hesitate to gratify his sovereign.

GONDY, John Francis Paul, cardinal de Retz, was born at Montmirel in Brie, in 1613, and died 1679. He was doctor of the Sorbonne, and coadjutor to his uncle archbishop of Paris, and after many intrigues he obtained a cardinal's hat. Though a debauchee in his youth, he yet assumed the sanctity of the preacher, and with such eloquence and effect that he was adored by the people. He caballed against Richelieu, and at last, after six years of exile, and after being imprisoned at Vincennes and Nantes, he was permitted to return, and by his good conduct and exemplary manners he made atonement for the vices of his youth. He was, says Voltaire, a Catiline in his youth, and an Atticus in his old age. He wrote besides the Conspiracy of count Fiesco—Memoirs of his Life, which are very authentic and interesting. The best edition of this valuable performance is that of Amsterdam 1719, 4 vols. 12mo.

GONET, John Baptist, a Dominican friar, doctor and professor of theology in the university of Bourdeaux, and author of a System of Theology, in 5 vols. folio. He died 1681, aged 65, at Beziers his native place.

GONGORA, Lewis de, a Spanish poet, born at Cordova 1562. He studied at Salamanca, and taking orders, became chaplain to the king, and prebendary of Cordova, where he died 1627. His works were all published after his death, and consist of sonnets, elegies, a comedy, a tragedy, &c. Though he is abused by some critics for affectation, and a false sublime, yet the Spaniards regard him as the prince of their poets.

GONNELLI, John, the blind man of Combassi, lost his sight at the age of 20. He afterwards became a sculptor, and by the touch acquired great excellence, and even attempted portraits, and with some success. He gave a good likeness of pope Urban VIII. and of Cosmo the great duke of Florence. His works are much admired in France.

GONSALVA, Fernandez, the great captain of Cordova, was an illustrious Spaniard, distinguished against the Portuguese, and in the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella in the conquest of Grenada, and in the wars of Italy, where he conquered Calabria, Apulia, Naples. This great character, so respectable for his valour and his private virtues, became at last suspected to his sovereign, by the artifice of his enemies, and he died in retirement in Grenada, 1515. Florian has made him the hero of his romance.

GONTHIER, a Latin poet, author of the History of Constantinople, 1203.

GONTHIER, John and Leonard, two brothers, eminent as painters on glass. Their works were much admired, and are still held in high estimation.

GONZAGA, Lucretia, a learned and illustrious woman of the 16th century. At the age of 14 she married Paul Monfrone, who conspired against the life of the duke of Ferrara, and was discovered and imprisoned. Lucretia, though he was not put to death, applied to every European power for his deliverance, and even solicited the grand Signior to seize the castle where he was confined, but her endeavours were fruitless, and her guilty husband died in prison. Though afterwards solicited in marriage, she lived in widowhood, and of her four children only two daughters survived, whom she placed in monasteries.

She was so elegant a writer that her epistles were collected and published at Venice 1552. Though she did not profess to be learned, yet she infused spirit, and all the graces and flowers of erudition into her pieces, and she fully deserved all the praises and flattering compliments of Hortensio Lando, and of the wits of her time. She died at Milan, 1576.

GONZAGA, Scipio, a noble Italian, educated at Padua, and eminent for his knowledge of philosophy and divinity. He was created a cardinal by Sixtus VI. and died 1593, aged 51. He wrote some poems, and left manuscript memoirs of himself, &c. He was concerned in the establishment of the academy of Degli Etereî at Padua.

GONZAGA, Vespasian, duke of Sabbioneta, a city which he founded, and which he adorned with churches and schools, died 1591, aged 60, universally respected as a liberal patron of literature, and as an excellent Italian poet.

GONZALEZ, Thyrsus, a Spaniard, general of the Jesuits, who died at Rome 1705. He is author of the Doctrine of Probability, folio, 1694, and of several other tracts.

GOOCH, Sir William, governor of Virginia, succeeded Drysdale in 1727. He had formerly been an officer in the British service, and possessed superior military talents. On the death of general Spotswood, in 1740, he was appointed commander of the forces raised for the Spanish war, and accompanied them in the unsuccessful attack on Carthage. In 1746 he was appointed a brigadier general in the army raised for the invasion of Canada, but declined accepting the office. The same year he was created a baronet, and in 1747 major-general. He returned to England in 1749, and the government devolved on Robinson, president of the council. His administration was marked by great civility towards the legislature, and was extremely popular; and his private, as well as public character, was free from reproach.

GOODALL, Walter, a writer, born in the shire of Angus, and educated at King's college, Aberdeen. He is known as philologist, and as the author of a Vindication of Mary, in 2 vols. 1751, in which he shows himself very strongly attached to the house of Stuart. He died at Edinburgh, 1758, aged 71. He has been censured for his excessive fondness of drinking.

GOODRICH, Elizur, D.D. congregational minister of Durham, Connecticut, was born at Weathersfield in that state, October 26th, 1734, and educated at Yale college, where he was graduated in 1752, and afterwards served for some time a tutor. He was ordained to the care of the church at Durham November 24th, 1756, and continued there till his death in November, 1797, aged 64. He was one of the most distinguished among his contemporaries in the ministry, in talents, literary, scientific, and theological acquirements, and in piety and usefulness; and was for more than twenty years a member of the corporation of Yale college.  L.

GOODRICH, Chauncy, lieutenant governor of Connecticut, was the son of the preceding, and was born at Durham, October 20th, 1759, and graduated at Yale college in 1779, with a high reputation for genius and acquirements. After having spent several years as a tutor in that seminary, he established himself as a lawyer at Hartford, Connecticut, and soon attained the first eminence in the profession. He was chosen a representative in the legislature of the state in 1793, and the following year was elected to a seat in congress, and continued there till 1800. In 1802 he became a councillor of the state, and retained the office till 1807, when he was appointed a senator of the United States. He received the office of mayor of Hartford in 1812, and lieutenant governor of the state in 1813, when he resigned his seat in the United States senate. His death took place on the 18th of August, 1815. He possessed superior talents, was an accomplished lawyer and statesman, and was greatly distinguished for uprightness, benevolence, and piety.  L.

GOODWIN, John, an able disputant, educated at Queen's College, Cambridge, and appointed, 1633, minister of St. Stephen, Coleman-street, London, from which he was ejected, 1645, for refusing to administer the sacrament to his people promiscuously. Under the republic his principles were so violent that he wrote a vindication of the beheading of Charles I. At the restoration he was excepted from the act of indemnity, and his works were burnt by the hangman, and he soon after died lamented by few. His writings, which were in favour of Arminianism, were a treatise of Justification, 4to.—Exposition of the ninth of the Romans, 4to.—Redemption redeemed, fol. &c.

GOODWIN, Thomas, a puritanical divine, born 5th Oct. 1600, at Rolseby, Norfolk, and educated at Christ-church, Cambridge. He was fellow of Catherine-hall, but in 1630, to avoid persecution he went to Holland, and settled at Arnheim, as pastor of the English church there. During the civil wars he returned to London, and was one of the assembly of divines at Westminster, and in 1649 was made by Cromwell president of Magdalen college, Oxford. He attended the protector in his last illness, and was ejected from Oxford, at the restoration. He afterwards preached to an assembly of independents in London till his death, 23d Feb. 1679. His works have been collected 5 vols. folio. He is supposed by Granger to be alluded to in No. 494 of the Spectator.

GOODWIN, Daniel, author of the historical collections respecting the Indians of New-England, and major general of Massachusetts, was a native of Kent, England. In 1621 he came with his father to Virginia; but in 1644 removed to Massachusetts, that he might enjoy a ministry which he approved. He settled at Cambridge. In 1652 he became an assistant to the governor, and four years afterwards was appointed superintendent of all the Indians who were under the jurisdiction of that colony. In 1656 he went to England, and was commissioned by Cromwell to persuade the inhabitants of Massachusetts to remove to Jamaica, which had then lately fallen into the hands of the English. But he met with no success in the undertaking. At the commencement of Philip's war in 1675, he in conjunction with the Rev. Mr. Eliot, greatly to the credit of his humanity, zealously advocated the cause of the friendly Indians, whom the populace were ready to destroy, and succeeded in shielding them from injury. In 1681 he received the appointment of major general of the province. He died in 1687, aged 75. He left in manuscript, historical collections respecting the New-England Indians, which in 1792 were published by the Massachusetts historical society in their first volume, and are a most valuable record of information respecting them.  L.

GOOL, John Van, a Dutch painter, born at the Hague, 1685. He also wrote an account of the lives and works of the Flemish painters.

GORDIAN I. emperor of Rome, was invested with the purple in Africa, much against his wish, 237, in the reign of Maximinus. His son of the same name assumed the imperial power with him, but soon after their elevation they were attacked by a general of Maximinus, and the son was killed in battle, and the father destroyed himself with his girdle, 237. A youth of the family afterwards was raised to the throne, but a few years after he was murdered near the Euphrates by his minister Philip, 244.

GORDON, Thomas, a political writer, born at Kircudbright, Galloway. He came to London early, and distinguished himself in the Bangorian controversy, and other political subjects as the defender of lord Oxford. He was patronised by Mr. Trenchard, who with him began to publish, under the name of "Cato," a number of letters on public affairs. He about this time published "the Independent Whig," in which he showed his violence against the hierarchy, but Sir Robert Walpole, knowing his abilities, gained him over to his party, and made him commissioner of wine licenses. Thus devoted to the minister, he began ably to defend his measures in several pamphlets, and continued attached to him till his death, which happened 23th July, 1750, at the age of 66. His second wife was Trenchard's widow, by whom he had some children. Besides political tracts, he published English translations of Sallust and Tacitus, with additional discourses.

GORDON, Alexander, M.A. a Scotchman, admired as a draughtsman and as a Grecian. He travelled over France, Germany, and other places, and was secretary to the society for the encouragement of learning, afterwards to the Egyptian club, whose members had visited Egypt, and to the Antiquarian Society, which he resigned 1741. He went with governor Glenn to Carolina, where he died a justice of peace, leaving a handsome inheritance to his family. He wrote "Itinerarium Septentrionale," or a Journey through Scotland, with plates—Lives of Alexander VI. and his son Cæsar Borgia, &c. folio—History of Ancient Amphitheatres—and 25 Plates of Egyptian Mummies, &c. folio, 1739—Hieroglyphical Figures, &c.

GORDON, James, a Jesuit, descended from a Scotch family. He taught philosophy and languages at Bourdeaux and Paris, and suffered much for the catholic religion. He died at Paris 1620, aged 77. He wrote Controversiarum Christianæ Fidei Epitome, 2 vols. folio. There was another Jesuit of that name, author of a Commentary on the Bible, 3 vols. fol. 1632, and other works.

GORDON, Robert, of Straloch, was author of "Theatrum Scotiæ," an excellent book with maps of the country, dedicated to Oliver Cromwell. He died about the middle of the 17th century.

GORDON, Andrew, a native of Aberdeen, who became professor of philosophy in the Scotch monastery of Benedictines at Erfurt, where he died 1751, aged 39. He wrote Phænomena Electricitatis Exposita, 3 vols.—Philosophia Jucunda et Utilis, three vols. 8vo.—Origin of the Present War of Great Britain, 4to.—Physicæ Experimentalis Elementa, 8vo. He first substituted a cylinder instead of a globe in his electrical machine.

GORDON, lord George, son of Cosmo duke of Gordon, was originally in the navy, which a dispute with the first lord of the admiralty obliged him to quit. He afterwards obtained a seat in parliament for Ludgers-hall, and anxious to gain popularity he violently opposed the ministry, and attacked the bill which granted certain immunities to the Roman catholics. Not satisfied with the opposition which he gave to the measures in the house, he had the imprudence to head the mob when they presented a petition to the commons, and thus by his artful and intemperate conduct, he occasioned those dreadful riots, which in 1780, nearly converted the capital into a heap of ruins. So gross a violation of duty did not pass unnoticed, he was sent to Newgate and tried, but acquitted. In 1786 he was excommunicated for refusing to appear as a witness in a cause, and two years after he was found guilty of publishing a gross libel against the queen of France. To avoid the punishment due to this offence he fled to Holland, but soon after returned in the habit of a Jew. His disguise, however, could not screen him from the pursuits of the officers of the law, he was sent to Newgate, and died there 1793, aged 43.

GORDON, Sir Adam, a baronet and divine, was born in Scotland, in 1745. He was educated at Westminster school, and next at Christ-church, Oxford, where he took the degree of master of arts in 1777. On entering into orders he served the curacy of St. Mary-le-Bone; after which he obtained the rectory of Hincworth in Hertfordshire, and that of West Tilbury in Essex, to which was added a prebend at Bristol. Late in life he succeeded to the title of baronet. He died in 1817. Sir Adam published—1. The Contrast, or an Antidote to lord Chesterfield's Letters, 2 vols. 2. Plain Sermons on Practical Subjects, 2 vols. 3. Sermons on the Fasts and Festivals, 8vo. 4. Homilies of the Church of England modernized, 2 vols. 5. Miscellaneous Sermons and Tracts.—W. B.

GORDON, Patrick, governor of Pennsylvania, under the proprietors, commenced his administration as the successor of Sir William Keith in June 1726. It was distinguished by prudence, moderation, and a regard to the interests of the province, and was highly popular. He was bred to arms, and served from his youth to near the close of queen Anne's reign, with a high reputation. He died at Philadelphia, August 5th, 1736, aged 72.  L.

GORDON, William, D.D. author of a history of the war of the American revolution, was a native of Hitchin, Hertfordshire, Eng. and was settled at an early age, pastor of an independent church at Ipswich, where he continued a number of years. He afterwards preached some time at Wapping, but in 1770, came to America, and soon after settled in Roxbury. He took a deep interest in the contest with the parent country, and in 1776, began the collection of materials for a history of the revolution, which, going to England after the close of the war, he published. He was afterwards settled at Noets in Huntingdonshire, but suffering a premature failure in his mental powers, soon resigned, and retired to Ipswich, where he died in 1807. ☞ L.

GORE, Thomas, born of an ancient family at Alderton, Wilts, was educated at Oxford. He was of Lincoln's Inn, and died on his estate, 1684, author of some Latin miscellaneous pieces.

GORELLI, an Italian poet, born at Arezzo. He wrote after the manner of Dante, the history of his country from 1010 to 1384, which if not elegant as a poem, is, however, useful as a chronicle.

GORGAS, Leontinus, a philosopher of Sicily, B.C. 417, so eminent that a statue of gold was raised to his honour at Delphi.

GORHAM, Nathaniel, was a native of Charlestown, Massachusetts, and born in 1738. He enjoyed only the aid of an ordinary school education, but possessing fine endowments, rose to influence in the state. After having been for some time a leading member of the legislature, he was appointed a delegate to congress in 1784, and elected president of that body. He was also a member of the convention which formed the constitution of the United States, and highly respected by that body, particularly for his skill in managing debates. He died June 11th, 1796.

GORIUS, or GORIO, Antonius Franciscus, a historian, critic, and antiquarian of Florence. He wrote several valuable works on Grecian and Roman antiquities, especially Musæum Etruscum, 3 vols. fol.—Musæum Cortonense, fol.—Inscription on Tuscany, 3 vols. fol.—Description of the grand duke's Cabinet, 11 vols. He died 1757.

GORLÆUS, Abraham, an antiquarian of Antwerp, who died at Delft, 1609, aged 69. He published an interesting collection of the rings and seals of the ancients, the best edition of which is that of Leyden, 1625. He also gave to the public a collection of medals in 1608, in which, says Scaliger, he is not always to be depended upon. His collections of antiques were sold by his heirs to the prince of Wales.

GORLÆUS, David, a native of Utrecht, in the 17th century, author of some philosophical books, in which he advanced new opinions.

GOROPHUS, John, a physician of Brabant, who after travelling over Europe, settled at Antwerp. In his "Origines Antverpianæ," he maintained with ridiculous pertinacity, that Flemish was the language of Adam. He died 1572.

GORRAN, Nicholas de, a Dominican, confessor to Philip the Fair of France. He died 1295. He was an admired and eloquent preacher, and his sermons, together with a commentary on the gospels, appeared at Paris 1523 and 1539.

GORREUS, a protestant physician at Paris, who published a translation of Nicander, and died 1572, aged 72. Upon being suddenly arrested by some soldiers, on account of his religion, he unfortunately lost his senses.

GORTER, John, a native of Enhuysen, in West Friesland, who took his doctor's degree in medicine at Leyden, and in 1725, became medical lecturer, and public physician at Harderwyck. He afterwards went to Petersburg, but returned in 1758, to Holland, and died 1762, aged 73. He wrote a treatise de Perspiratione Insensibili Sanctoriana Batavia—Compendium Medicinæ—de Secretione Humororum é Sanguine ex Solidorum Fabricâ, &c.—Morbi Epidemici Descriptio et Cuatio—Materies Medica, &c.—Exercitationes Medicinæ, 4to. &c.

GORTON, Samuel, a fanatic, who occasioned much disturbance in Massachusetts and Plymouth colonies, by his religious extravagancies. He came to Boston in 1636. Having been punished both at Plymouth and Newport for his disorderly conduct, he settled in 1641 in the south part of Providence, but soon removed, and began the settlement of Warwick. In 1643 he was seized by order of the general court of Massachusetts, and tried on the charge of hostility to the gospel and to civil government. He resorted for his defence to ingenious equivocation, but such impressions were formed respecting his opinions, that he narrowly escaped a sentence of death. He was condemned to imprisonment and hard labour, but soon after, his punishment was changed to banishment. In 1644, he obtained an order of parliament securing him the possession of his property at Warwick, to which he returned, and resided there till his death in 1676. ☞ L.

GOSNOLD, Bartholomew, the first navigator who sailed directly across the Atlantic to the American coast, was an Englishman. He sailed from Falmouth in March 1602, and on the 14th of May, discovered Cape Cod, to which he gave that name, on account of the abundance of cod fish he found on its coast. After spending some time on the Elizabeth Islands he returned to Europe. He afterwards went to Virginia and there died in 1607. ☞ L.

GOSSELIN, Antony, regius professor of history and eloquence, and principal of the college du Bois, at Caen, published the history of the ancient Greeks, in Latin 1636.

GOSSELINI, Julian, a writer born at Rome, 1525. At the age of 17, he was appointed secretary to Ferdinand Gonzaga, viceroy of Sicily, in whose service he continued forty years. He published several things in Italian, in verse and prose, besides Latin poems, and died at Milan, 1587.

GOTU, Stephen, archbishop of Upsal, who by attempting in vain to restore the Roman catholic religion in Sweden, in conjunction with John the king, nearly kindled a civil war in the 16th century.

GOTHOFRED, Dennis, an able lawyer, born at Paris. He taught law in some of the German universities, but was not permitted to reside in France, on account of his attachment to the principles of Calvin. He died 1622, aged 73. He edited "Corpus Juris Civilis," and wrote some law treatises, published in Holland, in folio.

GOTHOFRED, Theodosius, eldest son of the preceding, was born at Geneva, 1580, and professed the catholic religion, which his father had abjured. He became counsellor of state, and assisted in the embassy for a general peace at Munster, where he died 1649. He wrote several works on the history, rights, and titles of the French monarchy.

GOTHOFRED, James, son of Dennis, was born 1587. He was a Calvinist, and enjoyed five times the office of Syndic, and other high appointments at Geneva, where he died 1652. He wrote several works, which display his great and extensive erudition.

GOTHOFRED, Dennis, son of Theodosius, was born at Paris, 1615, and died at Lisle, 1681, director of the chamber of accounts. He wrote the histories of Charles VI. VII. and VIII.

GOTHOFRED, John, son of Dennis, just mentioned, succeeded his father as director at Lisle. He was equally well skilled in the history and antiquities of France, and wrote Journal de Henry III.—Memoires of Marguerite, and an edition of Philip Comines. He died 1732, very old.

GOTTESCHALC. Vid. GODESCHALC.

GOTTI, Vincent, Lewis, an Italian of Bologna, made a cardinal by Benedict XIII. He wrote several works on theology, &c. and died 1742, aged 73.

GOTTIGNIES, Giles Francis, a native of Brussels, professor of mathematics at Rome, where he died 1689, aged 59. He was also a Jesuit, and wrote Elementa Geometriæ Planæ—Arithmetica Introductio ad Logisticam Mathesæ Universæ Servientem—Epistolæ Mathematicæ.—Figura Cometarum, qui apparuerunt Annis 1664, 5, and 8.

GOTTLIEBER, John Christopher, an excellent German critic, who died 1785, aged 52. Of his learned works, the best known is Animadversions on Plato's works.

GOTTSCHED, John Christopher, a German poet of Koningsberg, professor of logic, philosophy, and metaphysics, who died at Leipsic 1766, aged 66. He was assisted in the composition of his dramatic pieces by his wife, and so great was his influence and celebrity, that he banished buffoonery from the stage, and spread a love of literature over Germany. His wife died 1762. The best of his works are, Essay towards a Critical History of Poetry for the Germans—Collections for a Critical History of the Language, Poetry, and Eloquence of Germany—Principles of General Philosophy—Principles of the German Language—the German Theatre—Poems—the Death of Cato, a tragedy, &c.

GOUDELIN, or GOUDOULL, Peter, a Gascon poet, born at Toulouse, so esteemed among his countrymen, that he is called the Homer of Gascony. His works, containing great sprightliness and elegance, were published at Toulouse, and Amsterdam. He died 10th Sept. 1649, aged 70.

GOUDIMEL, Claudius, an excellent musician, put to death at Lyons, for setting the Psalms of Marot and Beza to music.

GOVEA, Martial, a Latin poet of the 16th century, author of a Latin grammar.

GOVEA, Andrew, brother to the preceding, taught grammar and philosophy, and established under John III. of Portugal, the college of Coimbra. He died 1548.

GOVEA, Antony, youngest brother of the preceding, eminent for his erudition, and professor of law at Toulouse, and then at Turin. Besides an excellent edition of Virgil and of Terence, he wrote Latin epigrams, and a commentary on Cicero's Topica. He died, as Blount says, after an inordinate meal of cucumbers, at Milan, 1565, aged 60.

GOUFFIER, Marie Gabriel Auguste Laurent, Count de Choiseul, was born in 1752. His family name was Choiseul, to which he added that of Gouffier, in compliment to his lady. At the age of twenty-two, he travelled into the Levant, the result of which he published in a work, entitled "Voyage en Grèce," folio, 1782. This performance procured him admission into the academy of belles lettres, and also into the French academy. In 1784 he was appointed ambassador to the Porte, where he established a printing-office in his palace, and took several men of letters and artists into his service, for the purpose of illustrating the antiquities of Asia and Greece. The French revolution having disarranged his plans, he went to Russia, where he was made a privy counsellor, director of the academy of arts, and superintendent of the imperial libraries. In 1802, his name being erased from the list of emigrants, he returned to France; and the year following was chosen a member of the National Institute. He now published a continuation of his work upon Greece; but became involved in disputes with Le Chevalier and Cassas, who had, as he conceived, injured him, by sending to the press their works on the same subject, after having been employed in his service. On the return of Louis XVIII. our author was made a peer of France. He died at Aix, June 22, 1817. Several curious papers by him are in the memoirs of the French academy.—W. B.

GOUGE, William, minister of Blackfriars, was born at Stratford le Bow. He was of King's college, Cambridge, and is remarkable for not being absent from morning and evening prayers for nine years, and for reading 15 chapters of the Bible every day. He was one of the ministers of the assembly of Westminster, and was appointed one of the annotators of the Bible. He died 16th Dec. 1653, and was buried at his own church, leaving an exemplary character for perseverance as a preacher, for humility, faith, and patience. He wrote "the whole Armour of God"—Exposition of the Lord's Prayer—"Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews," and other works in support of Calvinism.

GOUGE, Thomas, son of the preceding, was educated at Eton and King's colleges, Cambridge, and became minister of St. Sepulchre, London, for 24 years, but was ejected at the restoration. He died in his sleep 1681, aged 77. He wrote several books of practical divinity, and distributed many thousand copies of the Bible, catechism, &c. among the 300 schools which he is said to have established in Wales. Dr. Tillotson preached his funeral sermon, though he was a nonconformist.

GOUGES, Mary Olympe de, a native of Montauban. During the revolution, she espoused the violent measures of the times, and made Mirabeau the hero of her writings. Reflection, however, and the enormities of the times, cooled her prejudices, and when Louis XVI was dragged before the bloody tribunal, she had the courage to demand of the convention the privilege of defending an innocent monarch. This heroic conduct, and her attacks upon Marat and Robespierre, marked her out for death. She was guillotined 3d November, 1792, aged 38. She wrote some dramatic pieces, which were collected in three vols. 8vo.

GOUJET, Claude Peter, a French writer who died at Paris 1767, aged 70. He published a supplement to Dupin's Bibliothèque, 18 vols. 12mo.—Richelet's Dictionary, &c. His library consisted of above 10,000 volumes.

GOUJON, John, a sculptor of Paris, from the correctness and grace of his works, called the Correggio of sculpture. He flourished in the reigns of Francis I. and Henry II. and was killed at the massacre of St. Bartholomew 1572.

GOULART, Simon, an able writer, born near Paris 1543. He studied at Geneva, where he succeeded Calvin as minister; and died there 1628. He wrote a History of the League—Notes on Plutarch's works, translated by Amiot—and on Cyprian's works; and published besides some treatises on divinity—and on moral subjects—and a Translation of Seneca, and other authors. His works are enumerated in Nicéron's Memoirs.

GOULD, Robert, an English poet, who died 1708. His works, which are miscellaneous, appeared in 1709, 2 vols. 8vo.

GOULIN, John, a French writer, born at Rheims, 10th Feb. 1728. He studied medicine, but was more distinguished as an author, learned, judicious, and enlightened. He published various works of merit, and died at Paris 1799.

GOULSTON, Theodore, a physician, born in Northamptonshire, and educated at Merton college, Oxford, where he became fellow, and where he took his degree of M. D. 1610. He practised with great celebrity in London, and died 1632, and by his will left 200*l.* to purchase a rent-charge, to endow a pathological lecture in the college of physicians. He wrote a paraphrase of Aristotle, and of other Greek writers.

GOULU, John, a French writer, born at Paris, where he died 1625, aged 49. He translated into French Epictetus, Arrian, Basil, Diogenes the Areopagite, &c. and had a very severe controversy with Balzac.

GOUPIL, James, a native of Lucon, who studied medicine at Paris, and succeeded there J. Sylvius as royal professor of physic 1555. Besides editing several Greek medical writers, he translated from the Italian, Piccolomini's treatise on the sphere of the world, and died 1564.

GOUPY, Joseph, a French artist, admired for his execution in water colours, and for his skill as a copier. He taught the princess of Wales; and his cartoons were so highly valued, that the duke of Chandos gave 300*l.* for the copy, when they produced at his death not more than 17 guineas. He died 1747.

GOURDON, Simon, a native of Paris, who at the age of 15, embraced the ecclesiastical profession among the canons of St. Victor, and lived a very austere life till his death 1729, aged 83. He was author of Letters on Cases of Conscience, hymns, &c.

GOURNAY, Mary de Jars, lady of, a Frenchwoman, born in Gascony, 1565, and allied to several illustrious families. She had a great partiality for literature, and she showed such respect for Montaigne upon reading his first essays, which were then published, that she solicited his friendship; and on the death of her father, adopted him as her own parent. Thus devoted to the muses, and the purest regards of this celebrated philosopher, she passed the best part of her life rejecting every connexion which might destroy her friendship and her mental enjoyments. On Montaigne's death, she crossed the kingdom to mingle her tears with those of his widow and her much-loved daughter, and as a proof of her great gratitude and immortal affection, she reprinted his Essay in 1634, with an elegant preface sacred to his memory. Her works, in prose and verse, were published in 1636, in one volume. She died 1645 at Paris, and her memory was honoured with various epitaphs from the pens of Mcnage, Valois, Patin, la Mothe, Vayer, and others.

GOURVILLE, John Heral, author of "Memoirs" containing anecdotes of the French ministers from Mazarin to Colbert, and of Lewis XIV. was originally valet to the Duke of Rouchefoucault, and by him raised for his merit, to offices of trust and confidence. He died 1705, aged 80.

GOUSSER, James, a French protestant minister of Blois, who left France at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and became professor of Greek and theology at Groningen. He died there 1704, leaving several books as proofs of his great erudition, especially an Hebrew Dictionary—Dissertations on Controversy with the Jews, &c.

GOUTHIERES, James, a French advocate, born at Chaumont. He wrote some valuable works, "de Vetere Jure Pontificis Romæ Publicæ," &c. He died 1638.

GOUVION, N. a French officer who served in America, and during the revolution was member of the national assembly, and afterwards general in the army of the North, where he was killed at the head of his troops, 11th June, 1793, near the village of Glisville.

GOUX DE LA BOULAYE, Francis le, a native of Anjou, who travelled through Asia and Africa in the character of a Mahometan, and through Europe as a catholic, of which he published an account in 4to. 1653. He went as ambassador to the great Mogul in 1668, and was carried off by a fever the next year in Persia.

GOUYE, John, a Jesuit and mathematician of Dieppe, member of the academy of Sciences. He wrote Mathematical and Philosophical Observations, 2 vols. 8vo. He died at Paris, 1725, aged 75.

GOUYE LONGUEMARE, a French author who wrote some memoirs and dissertations, to illustrate the history of France, and died 1763.

GOWER, John, an old English poet, born in Yorkshire 1320. He was professor of law in the Inner Temple, and according to some was chief justice of the common pleas. He was a munificent benefactor to St. Mary's church, now St. Saviour's, Southwark, where his monument is still preserved. His works called Speculum Meditantis—Vox Clamantis—Confessio Amantis, were first printed by Caxton, 1483. They possess great spirit, and the author in bold and energetic language inveighs against the debaucheries of the times, the immorality of the clergy, the wickedness of corrupt judges, and the vices of an abandoned court.

GOYEN, John Van, a painter of Leyden, who died 1656, aged 60. His landscapes, battles, and sea-pieces are most highly valued.

GOZON, Deodati, grand master of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, died 1353. A fabulous story is related of his killing an enormous dragon that infested Rhodes.

GOZZI, count Gaspar, a Venetian noble who died 1786, aged 73, illustrious for his lyrical and satirical poems. He was also the author of a periodical paper "l'Observatore," in imitation of the Spectator. His works appeared together at Venice 1794, in 12 vols. 8vo.

GRAAF, Barent, a painter of Amsterdam, who died 1709, aged 81. His landscapes were in the style of Bomboccio.

GRAAF, Regnier de, a physician born at Schoonhaven in Holland; 13th July, 1641. He studied at Leyden, and with such success, that in 1663 he published a most respectable treatise "de Succo Pancreatico." He went to France, and settled at Delft, where he practised with great celebrity. He had a controversy with Swammerdam, on account of the three treatises which he published on the organs of generation in the human species. He died 17th August, 1673, aged only 32. His works appeared at Leyden 1677, and 1705, and were translated into Flemish, 1686.

GRAAW, Henry, a native of Hoorn, disciple of Van Campen. His historical pieces are admired. He died 1682, aged 55.

GRABE, John Ernest, a native of Konigsberg, in Prussia, who studied divinity with great attention, and then determined to go to Rome, to embrace popery, because he considered the Roman church as the true church of Christ. He published his opinions before his departure, but before he reached Rome, he met with three pamphlets, which had been written by order of the elector of Brandenburg, in answer to his book, and these had such an effect upon him, that after conversing with Spener, the author of one of them, he resolved to come to England, as the only place which retained the regular succession of the Apostolic ministry, without the superstitions of Rome. He was liberally received in England, and presented to the degree of D.D. by the university of Oxford, and in proof of his sincerity, and his adherence to the principles of the Anglican church, he took orders, and wrote some valuable works in divinity. He also published an edition of the Septuagint, from the Alexandrian MS. preserved in the king's library. He died 1712, aged 46, and was buried in Westminster abbey.

GRACCHUS, Tiberius, and Caius, sons of Sempronius Gracchus by Cornelia, are celebrated for their intrigues and death. By attempting to revive the Agrarian law at Rome, they drew down upon themselves the vengeance of the senate. They were both killed, Tiberius 133 B. C. and Caius, some years after.

GRACCHUS, Sempronius, a Roman, banished for his licentious amour with Julia, to a solitary island on the coast of Africa, where 14 years after he was assassinated.

GRACCHUS, Rutilius, a Roman poet of the 10th century. Though possessing merit, he was inconsistent in his character.

GRACIAN, Balthazar, a Spanish Jesuit, rector of the college of Arragon. He died 1658. His sermons and theological treatises were highly esteemed among his countrymen, though written in a turgid and affected style.

GRADENIGO, Peter, doge of Venice, is known in the history of Europe, for changing the government of his country, from a democracy to an aristocracy. He died 1303.

GRÆCINUS, Julius, a native of Frejus, Forum Julii, put to death by Caligula, for refusing to become the accuser of M. Silanus. He wrote a book on agriculture, and was the father of Jul. Agricola.

GRÈME, John, a Scotch poet born at Carnwarth, Lanarkshire, 1748. As the youngest of four sons, and of a weakly constitution, he was intended for the ministry by his father, a farmer of the middling class, whose income arose chiefly from his industry. From the school of Lanark, he was removed to Edinburgh university, where his talents soon displayed themselves in the composition of elegant Latin, and in the acquisition of the more abstruse sciences of natural philosophy and metaphysics. He declined accepting an exhibition at the university of St. Andrews, and satisfied with the friendship of Wilkie, the author of the Epigoniad, he devoted himself fully to the cultivation of the muses, in the ease and retirement of a college life, but his rising fame was cut short by the appearance of a rapid consumption, of which he died 26th July, 1772, aged 22. His poems, consisting of elegies and miscellaneous pieces, were printed at Edinburgh 1773, 8vo. and exhibited him in the character of a spirited author, and a benevolent man.

GRÆVIUS, John George, a celebrated critic. Vid. GREVIUS.

GRAFFIO, a Jesuit of Capua in the 16th century, author of two 4to. volumes on moral subjects. He was grand pensionary of Naples.

GRAFIGNY, Frances, a French lady, who wrote the "Peruvian Letters," an admired and elegant performance, translated into every European language. After her husband's death, who was chamberlain to the duke of Lorraine, and from whom, for his brutality, she was separated, she removed to Paris, to live with the wife of marshal Richelieu, where she died 1758, aged 65. She wrote also Cenies—la Fille d'Aristide, two dramatic pieces.

GRAFTON, Richard, author of an abridgment of the Chronicles of England, and of a Chronicle and large meere Historye of the Affayers of England, and Kings of the same from the Creation of the World, was born in London under Henry VIII. and died there in the reign of Elizabeth.

GRAFTON, Augustus Henry Fitzroy, duke of, was born Sept. 28, 1736. He was educated under Dr. Newcombe, at Hackney, and next at Peter-house, Cambridge. He succeeded his grandfather in the family honours in 1757, and in 1765 was appointed secretary of state, but the year following he relinquished that station, and soon after became first lord of the treasury, which he held till 1770. During his administration he was virulently attacked by Junius, who seems to have been actuated by personal enmity. In 1771 the duke was nominated lord privy seal, which office he resigned in 1775, and acted in opposition to the court till 1782, when he was again in place for a short time. After this he was uniformly an opponent of ministers till his death, March 11, 1811. Though his grace was an avowed Socinian, and regularly attended the meeting-house in Essex-street, he was chancellor of the university of Cambridge, to which dignity he was elected in 1768. He was the author of—1. Hints submitted to the serious attention of the clergy, nobility, and gentry newly associated, 8vo. 1789.—2. Apeleutherus, a volume of essays on theological subjects, 8vo. He was at the expense of reprinting an edition of Griesbach's Greek Testament.—W. B.

GRAHAM, George, an eminent watch and clock-maker, born at Gratwick, Cumberland, 1675. In 1688 he came to London, and some time after lived in the family of Tompion, a clock-maker, who knew his merit, loved his person, and respected his abilities. To the most perfect knowledge of mechanics he added practical astronomy, and by his perseverance and accuracy, he not only improved but invented several astronomical and mathematical instruments, with a degree of perfection and dexterity hitherto unknown. The great mural arch in Greenwich observatory was made for Dr. Halley under his inspection, and divided by his own hand; and with his sector Dr. Bradley first discovered two new motions in the fixed stars. But not only England was benefited by his genius, but the rest of Europe. The instruments with which the French academicians made observations to ascertain the figure of the earth, and those which enriched the collections and cabinets of the king of Spain and other princes, were all constructed by this most ingenious and eminent artist. As a member of the Royal Society, he contributed some valuable discoveries, especially on the horary alteration of the magnetic needle, and a quick silver pendulum, and other particulars respecting the simple pendulum. With all the powers of his genius he was candid and modest, friendly and communicative, and more anxious to advance the happiness of mankind by the improvement of science, than to accumulate a private fortune. The remains of this most respectable man were carried, Nov. 24, 1751, with great solemnity to Westminster, and deposited in the same grave with his friend and master Tompion.

GRAHAM, Catherine Macauley. Vid. MACAULAY.

GRAHAM, James, a Scottish poet, was bred to the bar, which profession he forsook, and was ordained according to the form of the church of England, after which he entered upon a curacy in the neighbourhood of Durham, where he died, in the prime of life, of hydrocephalus, in 1811. His poetry is mostly of a religious character, solemn, yet animated, flowing, and descriptive. His principal pieces are The Sabbath—The Bards of Scotland—and Georgics.—H. B.

GRAIN, John Baptiste le, a French historian, born 1565. He was counsellor and master of the requests to queen Mary de Medicis, and became a great favourite with Henry IV. He wrote the Decades, containing the History of Henry IV. and the History of Louis XIII. to the death of marshal d'Ancre, 1617. He was so censured and so illiberally abused by the Jesuits, who interpolated his works to make him appear ridiculous, that he ordered in his will that none of his descendants should be educated by the Jesuits. He died at Paris, 1643.

GRAINDORGE, Andrew, a physician and philosopher of the Epicurean sect, born at Caen. He wrote some treatises on fire, light, colours, &c. and died 1676, aged 60.

GRAINGER, James. Vid. GRANGER.

GRAMAYE, John Baptist, provost of Arnheim, and historiographer to the Low Countries, was taken during his voyage from Italy to Spain, and carried to Algiers. He returned home, and died at Lubec, 1635. He wrote a history of Africa—“Peregrinatio Belgica,” a valuable work—“Antiquitates Flandriæ,” &c. and some poetry.

GRAMMOND, Gabriel lord of, president of the parliament of Toulouse, and author of the History of Lewis XIII. and of a curious History of the Wars of Lewis XIII. against the Protestants, died 1654, respected for his integrity.

GRAMONT, Antony duke of, marshal of France, is known as a warrior and as a writer. He was of the family of Gramont, in Navarre, and by marriage was allied to cardinal Richelieu. He wrote two volumes of Memoirs, and after being the greatest ornament of the court of Lewis XIV. he died 1678, aged 74.

GRAMONT, Philibert count of, son of the preceding, was a volunteer under Condé and Turenne. He had the temerity of paying his addresses to the mistress of Lewis XIV. and in consequence of this, his services were forgotten, and he fled to England for protection, where his vivacity and agreeable manners gained him many admirers. He became a favourite at the court of Charles II. and afterwards married a lady of the name of Hamilton. His memoirs were communicated by him to count Hamilton, by whom they were made public in elegant and interesting language.

GRANBY, Marquis of. Vid. MANNERS.

GRANCOLAS, John, a doctor of the Sorbonne, author of some theological works, and of some translations of the fathers, died 1732.

GRAND, Antony le, a Cartesian philosopher of the 17th century, author of some historical treatises—of a Sacred History from the Creation till the Age of Constantine the Great, published in London, 8vo.—and of Institutio Philosophiæ Des Cartes.

GRAND, Joachim le, a French political writer, much esteemed at the court of Lewis XIV. He wrote some interesting tracts on the History of France, besides translations of Lobo's and of Ribeyro's Histories, and the History of the Divorce of Henry VIII. and Catharine of Arragon, 3 vols. He died 1733, aged 80.

GRAND, Mark Antony le, a French actor, who died at Paris, 1723. His various comedies were received with great applause, as well as his performance in several characters. His works appeared 4 vols. 12mo.

GRAND, Lewis, a doctor of the Sorbonne, born at Luzigni, in Autun. His works on the theological subjects are much admired. He died 1780.

GRAND, Peter le, captain of a Dieppe privateer, was famous for his courage. He attacked, in 1640, with his ship of four guns and 28 men, a Spanish vessel of 54 guns, which he took, and carried in triumph to France.

GRANDET, Joseph, a French priest of Angers, whose amiable manners and benevolence of heart are highly commended. He wrote several volumes on subjects of biography, in 12mo. He died at Angers, 1724, aged 78.

GRANDI, Francis Lewis, a native of Cremona, professor of philosophy at Florence, afterwards at Pisa, and then abbot of St. Michael at Pisa, where he died 1742, aged 71. He wrote various mathematical works of merit.

GRANDIER, Urban, a Jesuit, native of Bouvere, near Sable, curate and canon of St. Peter's, Loudun, in France. He was an eloquent preacher, and as he recommended confession to the curate at Easter, he drew upon himself the envy and resentment of the monks at Loudun. He was accused of criminal conversation with maids and married women in his own church, and when honourably acquitted, his enemies inveighed against him for causing the Ursuline nuns of Loudun to be possessed with the devil. The folly of this accusation would have appeared before impartial judges, but the monks persuaded cardinal Richelieu, that Grandier was the author of "la Cordonniere de Loudun," a severe satire upon himself, and consequently his fate was determined upon. He was ordered to be tried, and soon found guilty of magic, witchcraft, and possession, and condemned to be burnt alive, and to have his ashes dispersed in the air. The dreadful sentence was executed, and this innocent man perished in the flames because his enemies were acrimonious against him, and their virulence was supported by the approbation of a gloomy tyrant in power.

GRANDIN, Martin, a doctor of the Sorbonne, author of a Popular Course of Theology, in 6 vols. 4to. He died at Paris, 1691, aged 87.

GRANDIUS, Guido, a mathematician of Cremona, who among other things translated Euclid into Italian, and died 1742, aged 71.

GRANDET, Charles, a French actor for 35 years, the successful representative of all the Paris petits-maitres. His operas, and other poetical pieces, met with some success on the stage.

GRANET, Francis, a learned French writer, intimate with the abbé de Fontaine, who speaks with great respect of his talents and amiable character. He translated Newton's Chronology, and wrote Remarks on Racine and Corneille, and was for some time engaged as a journalist at Paris, where he died 1741.

GRANGE, Joseph de Chancel, a French writer, who brought upon himself several difficulties, with imprisonment and exile, in consequence of a satirical work on Philip duke of Orleans. He died 1758, aged 82, leaving several works. His tragedies are much admired, as well as his miscellaneous pieces, and they display genius, judgment, and sublimity.

GRANGE, Nicolas, an able writer and critic. He translated Lucretius with notes, and edited the Greek antiquities of le Bos. His translation of Seneca appeared after his death, with an account of his life by his friend Diderot. He died at Paris, 1775, aged 37.

GRANGER, or GRAINGER, James, M.D. a physician, known as the author of a poem on the Sugar Cane, of a translation of Tibullus, and of some medical tracts, was born at Dunse, in the south of Scotland, 1723. He was educated at Edinburgh, and was under lord Stair, as surgeon in the army, during the German campaign of 1748, and afterwards he practised in London, where his genius and learning procured him the friendship of Shenstone and other men of letters. Probably his success as a physician was not equal to his expectations, as he left London and embarked to settle at the Island of St. Christopher. In his passage he administered to the cure of Mrs. Burt, who sailed in another ship of the fleet, and who had been seized with the smallpox, and by his friendly attentions to her he gained the affection of her daughter, whom he married as soon as he reached St. Christopher. In the midst of a respectable practice, Granger did not forget the muses. He wrote his Sugar Cane, which he came to England to publish, and after a few years' residence again returned to his favourite island, where he died of a contagious fever, 1767. His wife and one daughter survived his loss. In his character he was a man of pleasing manners, and of great benevolence of heart. His merits as a poet are well known. Besides the Sugar Cane, he wrote an Ode to Solitude—a West Indian Ballad—Historia Febris Anomalæ Batavæ, 1746—a Treatise on the more common West India Diseases, 8vo.—a Translation of Tibullus's Elegies into English verse.

GRANGER, James, author of the Biographical History of England, 4 vols. 4to. a valuable work, was vicar of Shiplake, Oxon, and died 15th April, 1776, in consequence of an apoplectic fit, with which he had been attacked on the preceding day, whilst administering the sacrament in his own church.

GRANGER, Gideon, was born at Suffield, Connecticut, on the 19th day of July, 1767. He was graduated at Yale college in 1787, and in the following year was admitted a member of the bar of the supreme court of Connecticut, where he practised law with great celebrity and distinction.

In 1793 he was elected a member of the legislature of Connecticut, and was continued in that body for several years, and distinguished for energy, talents, and usefulness. To his enlightened exertions that state is principally indebted for its school fund, so justly celebrated as the foundation of its primary schools, and the fostering parent of that useful information which prevails so generally in that state. In 1801 he was appointed postmaster general of the United States, and continued to execute the duties of that important office with great ability until the spring of 1814, when he removed to the state of New-York. In April, 1819, he was elected a member of the senate of that state, which situation he resigned in 1821, on account of ill health. He died at his seat in Canandaigua, on the 31st of December, 1822. Mr. Granger was a man of commanding appearance, of a striking physiognomy, of talents equally brilliant and profound, of a kind and benevolent heart, and unimpeachable rectitude. He was an able speaker and a powerful writer. His writings were confined almost entirely to political subjects. His principal publications were written under the signatures of Algernon Sidney, and Epaminondars, in favour of president Jefferson's and governor Clinton's administrations, and of Senectus on the school fund of Connecticut.

GRANT, Francis, lord Cullen, an eminent lawyer and judge of Scotland, born of the ancient family of the Grants, about 1660. He was educated at Aberdeen, and finished his studies under Voet at Leyden, and displayed even in his younger years, such assiduity as promised the highest exertions. On his return to Scotland he became the friend of Sir George Mackenzie, and distinguished himself by the able and constitutional character which he supported at the revolution. While in the Scotch convention of estates, some of the aged lawyers argued in favour of the house of Stuart, he boldly and manfully adopted the principles of the English nation, and asserted the right of the people to fill up the vacant throne. This decided conduct tended not a little to recommend the succession of William III. and Grant thus became a popular advocate, and a politician whose opinions were respected and universally approved. Without his solicitation he was created a baronet by queen Anne in 1705, and a year after he was nominated one of the judges of Scotland, when he assumed the title of lord Cullen. After 20 years of indefatigable and honourable labour devoted to the good of his country, and the impartial administration of her laws, this upright magistrate fell a sacrifice to an illness of three days, 16th March, 1726, in his 66th year. Respected as a judge in public, and as a man in private life, he was equally great as a writer. His essays on law, religion, education, and on several literary subjects, proved him to have been a man of solid sense, extensive erudition, and strongly fixed principles. He left three sons and five daughters.

GRANT, Patrick, a Scotch judge, by the title of lord Preston-Grange, was born at Edinburgh, 1698, and studied at Glasgow, Paris, and Leyden. He was member of the house of Commons, and in 1746, was made lord advocate, and in 1754, advanced to the bench. He wrote some ingenious pieces against the rebellion of 1745, and greatly distinguished himself as a lawyer. He died at Edinburgh, 1762, aged 64.

GRANVILLE, George, viscount Landsdowne, an English poet, second son of Bernard Granville, Esq. brother of the first earl of Bath of this name, who had a principal share in bringing back Charles II. The father of Bernard was Sir Bevil, killed in the royal cause at Landsdowne, 1643. Under the tuition of Sir William Ellys, a pupil of Busby, young Granville travelled abroad, and at the age of 11 he entered at Trinity college, Cambridge, and two years after, in consequence of his extraordinary abilities, he was created M.A. He had a strong passion for a military life; but his father checked his ambition when he expressed a wish, on the insurrection of the duke of Monmouth, to arm in defence of the king, and his ardour was renewed at the invasion of the prince of Orange, but he was equally rebuked, and he, with his family, remained quiet spectators of the revolution, and acquiesced in the measures of parliament. Unable to shine in the field, he devoted himself to the cultivation of the muses, and soon told the world, in all the sweetness of amorous poetry, how much he was charmed with the beauty of Myra, a name under which he immortalized the charming, but inexorable countess of Newburgh. In vain his friends expostulated with him for the prostitution of his poetry and of his fame, at the shrine of unyielding charms; he indulged his favourite passion, and, in enjoying the company of the fair, he celebrated, after the example of his predecessor Waller, the reigning beauties of the age. He wrote also some dramatic pieces, and his play of the "British Enchanters," introduced on the stage under the care of Betterton, called and obtained the public applause for 40 successive nights. Thus distinguished as a writer, and flattered by the muse of Addison and of Dryden, Granville, at the age of 35, was introduced to queen Anne after her accession, and found that polite reception which his character and his great veneration for his royal mistress deserved. In seconding the views of ministry in their war against Spain, he translated the second Olynthiac of Demosthenes to animate his countrymen, and presented to Harley the journal of Wimbledon's Expedition against Cadiz, in 1625, that his errors might be avoided in the projected plan under the duke of Ormond; but in vain, for the attempt was unsuccessful, though Vigo fell into the hands of the disappointed English. After the death of his father, Granville was in parliament for Fowey, and by the death of his elder brother, who died governor of Barbadoes, he was now at the head of his family, and in possession of a very ample fortune. A change of administration, however, cut off his prospects of aggrandizement, till, at the trial of Sacheverell, in 1710, his friends were again replaced into the favour of the queen, and he became secretary at war in the room of Walpole. In 1711, he married Mary, lord Jersey's daughter, widow of Thomas Thynne, and the same year he was created baron of Bideford, viscount Landsdowne, in Devonshire. Though he was one of the 12 persons created peers at the same time, for the purposes of party, his elevation caused not so much noise as that of the others, as already two peerages had been extinct in his family, which, for antiquity, respectability, and fortune, was equal to any in the kingdom. In 1712, he was made privy counsellor, comptroller, and afterwards treasurer of the household. The death of the queen removed him from his offices; but he did not forget his friends, and therefore strongly protested against the attainting of Ormond and Bolingbroke. As he was suspected of violent attachment to the pretender's party, and was even suspected of planning an insurrection in the West, at the rebellion of 1715, he was arrested on the 26th Sept. and committed a close prisoner to the Tower, where he remained till 1717. As he continued to oppose the ministry his conduct was always suspected by the court, and therefore, on the breaking out of Atterbury's accusation, he retired to France, to avoid the imputation of treason and the persecution of his enemies. After 10 years' residence at Paris he returned to England, and published, in 1732, his poems, corrected of their juvenile inelegances, together with a vindication of his uncle, Sir Richard Granville, against the misrepresentations of Burnet, of Echard, and Clarendon, in 2 vols. 4to. The rest of his life was passed in the ease of privacy and literary retirement. He died 30th Jan. 1735, aged 63, a few days after his wife, and as he had no male issue, but only four daughters, the title was extinct. The last verses which he wrote were to inscribe two copies of his poems to queen Caroline, who had honoured him with her protection, and to the princess royal, Anne of Orange.

GRAPALDUS, Francis Marius, a native of Parma, who distinguished himself so much in an embassy to the pope, that Julius II. crowned him with his own hand. He wrote a book in which he described all the parts of a house with great judgment and taste. The work has often been reprinted.

GRAS, Anthony le, an ecclesiastic of Paris, who translated Cornelius Nepos into French, and wrote an account of the fathers in the age of the apostles. He died 1761, aged 70.

GRAS, James le, an advocate of Rouen, who translated Hesiod's Opera et Dies into French verse in the 17th century.

GRASWINCKEL, Theodore, a native of Delft, who died at Mechlin, 1666, aged 66. He was eminent not only as a lawyer, but as a man of letters, and he was made knight of St. Mark by the Venetians for vindicating them against the duke of Savoy in his work called Libertas Veneta. He was buried at the Hague, where a monument is erected to his memory. He wrote besides de Jure Majestatis against Buchanan, and other learned and valuable treatises.

GRATAROLUS, William, a learned physician, born at Bergamo. As a protestant he wished to live in Germany, but after visiting Marpurge he settled at Basil, where he practised, and died 1562, aged 52. He wrote a great many books.

GRATIAN, a Roman, emperor in conjunction with his father Valentinian. He was cruel in his government, but warlike in the field, and successful against the Goths, and the other barbarians who had invaded the Roman empire. He was killed in a revolt, A.D. 383, aged 24.

GRATIAN, a private soldier, raised to the imperial throne in Britain, 407, and put to death four months after.

GRATIAN, a Benedictine monk of Chiusi in Tuscany, in the 12th century, employed for 24 years in writing a book to reconcile the contradictory canons one to the other. This book called "Decretals," was in high repute for some centuries, and greatly contributed to advance the authority and supremacy of the papal see.

GRATIANI, Jerome, an Italian writer of the 17th century, author of the Conquest of Grenada—and of Cromwell, a tragedy—and other miscellanies in prose.

GRATIUS FALISCUS, a Latin poet in Ovid's age. He wrote Cynegeticon, or Art of Hunting, &c.

GRATIUS, Ortuinus, a learned German, born at Helwick in the diocese of Munster. His real name was Graes. He wrote sever-ral works, especially Lamentationes Obscurorum Virorum, &c. and died 1542.

GRATTAN, Henry, a statesman, was born about 1750, in Dublin, of which city his father was recorder. He studied at Trinity-college, and next in one of the inns of court, where he was called to the bar, but relinquished that profession for the senate. He was elected into the Irish parliament in 1775; and by his powerful remonstrances obtained for his country a participation in the commerce of Britain, for which he was rewarded with a vote of fifty thousand pounds. In 1790, he was returned for the city of Dublin, and from that time was the active leader of the opposition till the union, which measure he resisted with all his eloquence; but when it was effected he accepted a seat in the imperial parliament for Malton. In the late war he supported government, with great ability; but his principal exertions were called forth in advocating the Catholic claims, to which cause he fell a martyr by leaving Ireland in an exhausted state to carry the petition with which he was intrusted to England. He died soon after his arrival, May 14th, 1820; and his remains were interred in Westminster abbey.—W. B.

GRAVELOT, Henry Francis Bourguignon, an engraver of Paris, who spent some time at St. Domingo, and afterwards came to London, where he resided 13 years. He employed his art in adorning the best editions of the French poets, and died 1773, aged 74.

GRAVEROL, Francis, a French advocate, born at Nismes, who wrote among other works Sorberiana. He was an excellent scholar, and died 1694, aged 59. His brother John wrote Archæologia Philosophica, against bishop Burnet.

GRAVES, Richard, a popular English writer. He was born at Micleton, Gloucestershire, 1715, and after receiving his education at Abingdon school he removed to Pembroke college, Oxford, and afterwards in 1736, was elected fellow of All-Souls. He studied physic for some time, but abandoned it for divinity, and entered into orders in 1740. He was presented in 1750, to the rectory of Claverton near Bath, and to this was added in 1763, the living of Cilmersdom, by the friendship of Mr. Allen of Prior park, and the empty honour of being chaplain to lady Chatham. He distinguished himself much as a popular and pleasing writer, and every where displayed that ease, that freedom, and that good humour which were so eminently visible in his character. The best known of his publications are, the Festoon, or Collection of Epigrams, 12mo.—Lucubrations, in prose and rhyme, published under the name of Peter Pomfret—the Spiritual Quixote, 3 vols. 8vo. a work of merit, in which he successfully exposed to ridicule the conduct and tenets of the Methodists—Eugenius, or Anecdotes of the Golden Bull—Columella, or the Distressed Anchorite—Plexippus, or the Aspiring Plebeian—political pieces, under the name of Euphrosyne—Recollections of some Particulars in the Life of his friend Shenstone—Life of Commodus, translated from the Greek of Herodian—Hiero, or Royalty, from Xenophon—Sermons on Various Subjects—Meditations of Antoninus from the Greek—the Reveries of Solitude—the Coalition, or Rehearsal of the Pastoral Opera of Echo and Narcissus—the Farmer's Son, as a Companion to Anstey's Farmer's Daughter—the Invalid, with the Means of enjoying Long Life—Senilities, &c. This truly amiable man, long respected for his benevolence, and the urbanity of his manners, died at his rectory of Claverton, 1804, in his 90th year.

GRAVESANDE, William James, an eminent mathematician and astronomer, born at Delft, in Holland, 1688. He was educated at Leyden, and intended for the law, and before the age of 19 he wrote an able treatise on perspective. He settled at the Hague 1707, and practised at the bar, but his acquaintance with learned men led him to the cultivation of literature, and he was one of those who united in the periodical review, called "le Journal Litteraire," from 1713 to 1722. In 1715 he was one of the delegates sent to congratulate George I. on his accession to the English throne, and during his stay in England he became the friend of the great Newton, whose sublime philosophy he afterwards taught, when elected to the mathematical and philosophical chair of Leyden. This learned man died 1742, after long enjoying the respect of his countrymen, by his patriotism, talents, and assiduity. He wrote, among other things, "an Introduction to Newton's Philosophy"—"a small treatise on the Elements of Algebra,"—a Course of Logic and Metaphysics.

GRAVINA, Peter, an Italian poet, who published a 4to. volume of poems, admired for harmony, sweetness, and delicacy. He was the friend and favourite of Sannazius, and Paul Jovius, who speak of him in terms of rapture and admiration.

GRAVINA, John Vincent, an illustrious lawyer, born at Roggiano, 18th Feb. 1664, and educated under his relation, Gregory Caloprese, the well-known philosopher. He afterwards studied at Naples, and so ardent was his attachment to literature and science, that each day he dedicated 10, often 12 hours to his improvement. He went to Rome 1696, and some time afterwards was made professor of canon law in the Sapienzi college, by Innocent XI. He was invited by liberal promises and high patronage to settle in the universities of Germany, and also at Turin, but he preferred his residence, where he died of a mortification in his bowels, 6th Jan. 1718. Though learned, he was unhappily of a disagreeable temper, and spoke with such freedom and contempt of mankind, that he raised himself many enemies. He wrote various works, but that which entitles him to the praises of the learned, is his three books, "de Ortu et Progressu Juris Civilis," the best edition of which is that of Naples, 2 vols. 4to. with the addition of his treatise de Romano Imperio. In this famous work he called upon the Roman youth to study the law in the original records, in the pandects, institutes, and the code, and not in modern inelegant abridgments. He wrote also five tragedies, besides philosophical treatises, orations, &c.

GRAUNT, Edward, a learned man, head master of Westminster school, and author of "Græcæ Linguæ Specilegium et Institutio Græcæ Grammaticæ." He died 1601.

GRAUNT, John, the celebrated author of "Observations on the Bills of Mortality," was born in Birchinlane, London, 24th April, 1620. He was brought up in the rigid principles of the puritans, and as he was intended for trade, he received no advantages from grammar education, but was barely qualified in writing and arithmetic, for the business of a haberdasher. In this employment he gained by his good sense and strict probity, the confidence and esteem of his fellow-citizens; so that he rose to all the offices of his ward; was a common council-man, and a captain, and then a major of the train bands. His "Observations" first appeared in 1661, and with such success that Louis XIV. of France adopted his plans for the regular register of births and burials, and Charles II. in proof of his general approbation, recommended him to the Royal Society to be elected one of their members in 1661-2. In 1665 the third edition of his popular book was printed by the society's printer, and the author, flattered by the honours paid to his literary services, abandoned the business of shopkeeper, and in 1666 became a trustee for the management of the New River, for the countess of Clarendon. In this new office, it has been reported by Burnet, that he was guilty of a most diabolical crime, by stopping all the cocks which conveyed water from Islington to London, the night before the fire began, which consumed the city. The accusation, however, is false, as he was admitted among the trustees 23 days after the conflagration happened; and the malevolent report arose only after his death, and probably owed its origin to his change of religious principles, as about 1667 he reconciled himself to the tenets of the church of Rome. He died 18th April, 1674, and was buried in St. Dunstan's church, Fleet-street, attended by many respectable friends; and among them by sir William Petty, to whom he left his papers. A fifth edition of his book appeared in 1676, under the care of his friend, and it may be fairly inferred, that to this work, and the persevering powers and inquisitive mind of the author, we are indebted for the science of political arithmetic, so ably treated afterwards by sir William Petty, Daniel King, Dr. Davenant, and other learned men.

GRAY, Thomas, an English poet, son of a reputable citizen, was born in Cornhill 26th Dec. 1716. He was educated at Eton, from whence he removed to Peterhouse, Cambridge, and four years after, in 1738, he came to town to apply himself to the study of the law. His pursuits were for a while suspended, while he accompanied his friend Horace Walpole on the continent. Two months after his return, in 1741, his father died, and he then discovered that his income was inadequate to support him in the study of the law, therefore he returned to Cambridge, where he took his degree of LL.B. and where he afterwards chiefly fixed his residence. Between the years 1759 and 1762, he had lodgings in Southampton-row, to be enabled to consult the Harleian and other MSS. in the British museum, from which he made some curious extracts. In 1768 he was appointed professor of modern history at Cambridge, but his health was such that he never executed the duties of the office. He died of the gout in his stomach July 30th, 1771, and was buried with his family at Stoke Pogges, Buckinghamshire. As a scholar, Gray was profound, elegant, and well informed; he had read all the historians of England, France, and Italy, and was well versed in antiquities, in criticism, in morals, and politics; and he possessed the most refined taste in painting, architecture, and gardening. His letters are correct, pleasing, and instructive. His poems, which are very few, but most elegant, nervous, and sublime, were published in 1775, in 4to. by his friend Mason, who had lived with him in intimacy since 1747, and who, therefore, was well qualified to prefix to the edition "Memoirs of his Life and Writings."

GRAYSON, William, a senator of the United States, was a native of Virginia, and was in 1784 elected a member of congress by that state. He was in 1788 a member of the convention of Virginia, which assembled to consider the constitution of the United States, and made himself conspicuous in that assembly, both by his talents, and his union with Mr. Henry in opposing the adoption of the constitution. The next year he was appointed a senator of the United States, and died at Dumfries, while on his way to the seat of government, March 12th, 1790.

GRAZZINI, Antony Francis, surnamed Lasca, one of the principal founders of the academy of la Crusca, was born in Florence, and considered as nearly equal in merit as a writer to Boccace. He published six comedies, and other things, besides a collection of novels printed at Paris 1756. He died 1583.

GREATRAKES, Valentine, an Irishman, who acquired some celebrity by attempting to cure diseases by the mere touch. He came to England; but the high expectations formed of his powers were soon dissipated, when the populace found themselves disappointed. He is described as an extraordinary person, by Boyle, who with several others has attested his cures. But, though Glanville imputed his healing powers to some sanative qualities about his person, it is plain that his enthusiasm was strongly assisted by the imagination of his patients. He was otherwise a humane and virtuous character, and died about 1680.

GREAVES, John, an eminent mathematician and antiquary, born 1602 at Colmore, near Alresford, Hants, where his father was rector. At 15 he entered at Baliol college, and in 1624 he was elected first of five candidates to a fellowship in Merton college. He devoted his time to mathematics and oriental learning, and in 1630 he was chosen geometry lecturer in Gresham college. Intimately acquainted with the works of the most celebrated astronomers of the age, he wished to extend his knowledge by travelling, and accordingly, in 1635, he went to Holland to attend the lectures of Golius at Leyden, and afterwards passed to Paris, and then visited Rome and other parts of Italy. Lord Arundel saw and admired his spirit in Italy, and endeavoured to prevail upon him to accompany him to Greece, with the liberal allowance of 200*l.* per annum, and the promise of more extensive patronage, but Greaves had formed the design of penetrating to Egypt, and therefore, on his return to England, he communicated his plan to his patron Laud. With praiseworthy zeal, Laud applauded and liberally encouraged his intentions, but when the city of London was solicited to add its influence, and to subscribe to the design, it was peremptorily rejected, and Greaves remembered ever after with sullen disdain the illiberality of the Londoners. In June 1637 he embarked for Leghorn, and from thence he proceeded to Constantinople, where, by the kindness of sir Peter Wyche, the English ambassador, he was introduced to Cyril Lucaris, the Greek patriarch, who enabled him to procure valuable MSS. but whose violent death, however, soon frustrated his design, and rendered his longer residence at the Porte dangerous. He then embarked for Alexandria, and after visiting Rhodes he reached Egypt, Sept. 1638. After twice penetrating into the desert, measuring the pyramids, and making various observations on the climate, monuments, and manners of the country, he left Alexandria April, 1639. He came back through Italy, and after visiting Florence and Rome, with the eye of a philosopher and an antiquarian, he embarked at Leghorn, and reached London before midsummer, 1640, richly loaded with the classical spoils of the East, Arabic, Persic, Greek MSS. besides gems, coins, and other valuable antiquities. The political state of the kingdom, however, promised little encouragement to his studious pursuits, and for his attachment to his patron and to his royal master, he suffered much from the virulence and persecution of the parliament. He was removed from his professorship at Gresham college, and though appointed to the Savilian professorship of astronomy at Oxford, and permitted by the king to retain his Merton fellowship, he found himself disturbed in his views of arranging his papers for the press. In this undertaking he was assisted by his friend archbishop Usher, and though the Commons were acrimonious against the partisans of royalty, yet he found an active patron in Seldon, who was burgess in the house for Oxford, and to whom he dedicated his "Roman Foot." Such at last was the persecution of the parliament that he was ejected from the Savilian professorship, in which he was succeeded by Seth Ward, and he afterwards went to reside in London, where he married. Devoting himself to studious pursuits, he shunned the politics of the times, and chose rather to enrich English literature by the translation of Arabic and Persian manuscripts, with explanatory notes. He died 8th Oct. 1652, and was buried in the church of St. Benet Sherchog, London. He had no children by his wife. His coins were left to his friend sir John Marsham, and his astronomical instruments were presented to the Savilian professorship of Oxford, with several of his papers. The best known of his works are, his "Pyramidographia," and his "Description of the Roman Foot and Denarius." He had formed a plan for adopting the Gregorian calendar by omitting the bissextile days for 40 years, which, though approved by the king and council, was not adopted, through the turbulence of the times.

GRECOART, John Baptist Joseph Villart de, a French poet, born at Tours. Though an ecclesiastic, he lived a disorderly life, but afterwards quitted the church, and became the favourite of men of rank and fashion, on account of his great wit. He died 1743, aged 60. He wrote tales, epigrams, songs, fables, sonnets, and other light works.

GREEN, Robert, a poet in the reign of Elizabeth. He was of St. John's college, Cambridge, and afterwards of Clare-hall, where he took his degree of M.A. 1583. The wit and humour which he possessed in great plenty, were unfortunately prostituted to encourage the cause of vice and obscenity, and he showed himself a most abandoned libertine in theory and practice. He is said to be the first English poet who wrote for bread, and happy had it been if virtue had been the idol of his muse. It is said that he felt remorse with penury and disease, as Cibber has preserved one of his letters to his much-injured wife. He died, according to Wood, 1592, of a surfeit, after eating too many pickled herrings and swallowing too much Rhenish wine. His pieces, which are numerous, are now little known.

GREEN, John, an English prelate, born at or near Hull, in Yorkshire, 1706. He was of St. John's college, Cambridge, and afterwards usher of Lichfield school, and then chaplain to the duke of Somerset, who became his friend and active patron, and gave him the rectory of Brough Green near Newmarket. In 1748 he was made regius professor of divinity, in 1750, master of Corpus Christi, Cambridge, and in 1756 he became dean of Lincoln, and vice chancellor of the university. On the translation of Dr. Thomas Salisbury, he was raised to the see of Lincoln, and in 1764, he resigned the headship of his college. In 1771 his income was increased by the addition of the residentiaryship of St. Paul's. It is remarkable that on the debate concerning the dissenters in 1772, he favoured the bill for their relief, and was the only bishop who voted with that side of the house. He died suddenly at Bath, 25th April, 1779. He wrote the "Academic, or a disputation on the State of the University of Cambridge," and some sermons.

GREEN, Edward Burnaby, author of some poetical works, was educated at Bennet college, Cambridge. He translated Anacreon, Apollonius Rhodius, and some parts of Pindar, and paraphrased Persius. He died 1788.

GREEN, Matthew, an English poet. His parents were dissenters, but he afterwards abandoned their tenets for the church of England. He held an office at the custom-house, where he attended to his duty with diligence and ability. His best poem is the "Spleen," containing wit, elegance, and originality. He was a very amiable man, and died at the age of 41, 1737. His works have been elegantly edited by Dr. Atkin.

GREENE, Dr. Maurice, a musician, son of a London clergyman. He was organist, before the age of 20, to St. Dunstan in the West, and afterwards, in the year 1718, to St. Paul's, and in 1727, to the royal chapel. In 1730, he took his doctor's degree at Cambridge, and was also appointed professor of music to the university. He projected the plan of reforming our church music, which had been corrupted by mutilated copies, and the inattention of transcribers, and the design, stopped by his ill health, was happily completed by his friend Dr. Boyce. He died 1st Sept. 1755. His performances are mentioned by sir John Hawkins.

GREENE, Samuel, the first printer in North America. The press he used was procured by the Rev. Joseph Glover, who died on his passage to Massachusetts in 1638. It soon fell into the hands of Mr. Greene. The first thing printed was the freeman's oath in 1639, the next an Almanac for New England, made by Mr. Pierce, a mariner, and the next the New-England version of the Psalms in 1640. He afterwards printed Eliot's Bible and the laws of Massachusetts, Plymouth, and Connecticut. The time of his death is unknown.  L.

GREENE, William, governor of Rhode Island, was of an ancient family in Warwick. He was many years clerk of the county court of Providence. In 1740 he was elected deputy governor, and in 1743 governor of the colony. In both instances he succeeded governor Ward. He was a very useful man, and held the office of governor fifteen years. He died February 23d, 1758, aged 62.  L.

GREENE, William, speaker of the assembly and chief justice of Rhode Island, was also several years governor of the state. He was born in 1732, and died at Warwick, November 30th, 1809.  L.

GREENE, Nathaniel, major-general in the army of the United States, was a native of Warwick, Rhode Island. He enjoyed only the advantages of a common education, but made himself acquainted while a boy with the Latin language, and read assiduously the books which fell into his hands, particularly such as related to military operations. His strong mind, and industrious cultivation of it, soon gave him a superiority over his fellow-townsmen, and procured his being sent by them to the legislature at an early period of his life. He had a strong passion for a military life, though educated a quaker, and on the commencement of hostilities between the British and the colonies, was intrusted by his native state with the command of three regiments, which he led to Cambridge. In August, 1776, he was appointed by Congress major-general, and soon after, in the battles of Trenton and Princeton distinguished himself by his bravery and skill. At the battle of Germantown he commanded the left wing of the army, and the right of that at Mounouth. In March, 1778, he was appointed quarter-master general, and by his admirable talents for business, and incessant application, soon rendered the most essential services to the army, by restoring order and efficiency to that department. He presided in the court-martial which tried major Andre in 1780. In December of that year, he was appointed to the command of the southern army, and after a series of battles and marches, in which, amid the greatest difficulties, he sustained the American cause with great credit to his skill and courage, he at length on the 8th September, 1781, gained the famous victory at the Eutaw springs, which procured for him the most flattering applause from Congress and the American people. He retired to Rhode Island after the close of the war, and rendered important services to that state, by his calming the unhappy dissensions by which it was distracted. In 1785, he removed to Georgia to take possession of a tract of land presented to him by that state; but died suddenly on the 19th of June, 1786, in the forty-seventh year of his age. He possessed a mind of great energy, was amiable in his disposition and manners, but capable of the keenest sarcasm. In the several stations which he occupied in the army, he distinguished himself by an extraordinary capacity for business, and great talents and courage as a commander. ¶ L.

GREENHILL, John, an English painter, born at Salisbury. He studied under sir Peter Lely, who was so jealous of his powers that he never would use his pencil before him, till he inadvertently betrayed himself by taking a likeness of his wife. His licentious and imprudent mode of life, it is said, hastened his end. A portrait of bishop Ward, by him, is preserved in Salisbury town-hall. He died 19th May, 1676.

GREENUP, Christopher, governor of Kentucky, succeeded Garrard in 1804, and was four years in office. He was a revolutionary soldier, and was at various times a member of the state legislature and representative to Congress. He died at Frankfort, April 24th, 1818. ¶ L.

GREENVILLE, sir Richard, grandfather to the well-known Sir Bevil Greenville, was son of Sir Roger, and was born in Cornwall, 1540. He served in the imperial army against the Turks, and was knighted 1571. He was, in 1585, sent on an expedition to America, and in 1591 he was commissioned to intercept a rich Spanish fleet, in conjunction with lord Howard. He with only a few ships attacked the enemy's squadron of 52 sail, on the American coast; but when about to sink his own ship he was carried on board the Spanish fleet, and died three days after of the wounds which he had received.

GREENVILLE, sir Bevil, grandson of sir Richard, was born at Stow, in Cornwall, and educated at Exeter college, under Dr. Prideaux. During the civil wars, he behaved with singular courage, and after defending the rights of his sovereign, in various encounters, he at last fell at the battle of Lansdowne, near Bath, 5th July, 1643, aged 47.

GREENWOOD, Isaac, first professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in Harvard college, Massachusetts, was graduated at that institution in 1721. He received his appointment to that professorship in 1723, and continued in the office till 1738, when he was dismissed. ¶ L.

GREGORIUS, Georgius Florentinus, or Gregory of Tours, a learned bishop of Tours, in the 6th century. He was an able writer, as his History of France, Lives of the Saints, and other works fully prove, though Gibbon censures his style as devoid of elegance and simplicity. He died about 595.

GREGORY, St. surnamed the Great, was descended from an illustrious Roman family. He was made prefect at Rome, 573, by Justin the younger, but he soon after quitted all secular employments to retire to a monastery. He was sent by Pelagius to Constantinople as nuncio, and on the death of that pontiff he was elected in his room, 590. He laboured earnestly in his new dignity to heal differences, and to make proselytes; and in Sardinia, and also in England, by the preaching of St. Augustine, the monk, the blessings of the gospel were rapidly spread. This mild and benevolent pontiff died 12th March, 604, aged 60.

GREGORY II. a native of Rome, elected pope after Constantine, 715. He was an enlightened and virtuous pontiff, and died 12th February, 731.

GREGORY III. a native of Syria, who succeeded the preceding, 731. He excommunicated the Iconoclastes, and solicited the assistance of Charles Martel, against the Lombards, who ravaged Italy, by means of a pompous embassy which is regarded by some authors as the origin of the apostolic nuncios in France. He was a charitable but magnificent pontiff, and the first who added temporal consequence and imposing splendour to the ecclesiastical power of the holy see. He died 28th November, 741.

GREGORY IV. a native of Rome, elected pope 827, or 828. He rebuilt Ostia, and visited France, to reconcile the jarring interests of the royal family, but returned without accomplishing his designs, and died at Rome, 25th January, 844.

GREGORY V. Brunon, a German, elected pope after John XVI. 996. He was opposed by Crescentius, the consul of Rome, who raised to the holy seat the antipope, John XVII. but the usurper was expelled by the influence of the emperor Otho, who was the relation of Gregory, and excommunicated in the council of Pavia. He died 18th Feb. 999, aged 27.

GREGORY VI. John Gratian, a Roman, elected pope 1044, after Benedict IX. He laboured zealously to restore the revenues of the church to their former flourishing situation, and punished peculators and plunderers, but his anathemas offended those who reaped advantage from the public calamities, and a formidable party was raised against him. Gregory defeated them, and rendered travelling easy and safe, but the severity of his measures displeased again the Romans, who preferred public robbery to private industry, and Gregory, in disgust, abdicated the tiara, in the council of Sutri, near Rome, 1046, and was succeeded by Clement II.

GREGORY VII. Hildebrand, son of a carpenter of Soano, in Tuscany. He entered among the monks of Cluni, and obtained preferment at Rome, and in 1073 was elected successor to Alexander II. In his new dignity the pope soon assumed extraordinary powers, and claiming superiority, not only in all spiritual but temporal affairs, he regarded the sovereigns of Europe as vassals, whom he could depose and appoint at his pleasure. His presumption soon embroiled him with his ancient friend Henry IV. emperor of Germany, who had the weakness to submit to his power by the most mortifying penance. A reconciliation was followed by fresh disputes, and at last Henry elected another pontiff, in opposition to Gregory, while the offended Italian prevailed upon the German princes to appoint another emperor. At last Gregory, tired with the dissensions, which his inordinate ambition had raised around him, and disgusted with the murmurs of the Romans, retired to Salerno, where he died 24th May, 1085.

GREGORY VIII. Albert de Mora, of Benevento, succeeded Urban III. as pope 1187, and died two months after, 17th Dec. exhorting the Christian princes to undertake a crusade against the infidels. The antipope Bourdin assumed also the name of Gregory VIII.

GREGORY IX. Ugolin, of the family of the counts of Segni, and nephew to Innocent III. was elected pope 1227. He excited the Christian princes to undertake a crusade, and Frederick, emperor of Germany, though twice excommunicated for his disputes with the see of Rome, joined the expedition. He died 12th Aug. 1241.

GREGORY X. Theobald, of the noble family of the Visconti, at Placentia, was elected pope 1271, while he was in the Holy Land, with Edward king of England. He summoned a general council at Lyons, and laboured earnestly to heal all schisms in religion, and to reconcile the Eastern and Western churches. He died 10th Jan. 1276, at Arezzo.

GREGORY XI. Peter Roger, nephew to Clement VI. and son of the count of Beaufort, of Limousin, was elected pope 1370. He was a zealous promoter of concord and reconciliation among the Christian princes, and distinguished himself by his benevolence, his charity, and his liberal patronage of letters. He quitted Avignon, where the popes had fixed their residence for several years, and transferred the see to Rome, where he died 28th March, 1378, aged 47.

GREGORY XII. Angelo Corario, a native of Venice, made a cardinal by Innocent VII. and elected pope 1406, during the schism in the West. He was opposed by Benedict XIII. the other pope, and at last a general council, held at Pisa, deposed both the competitors, and elected Alexander V. in their room. Gregory, who wished to oppose the proceeding of the council, at last fled before the storm to Gaeta and Rimini, and sent his abdication to the council of Constance. He died at Recanati, 13th October, 1417, aged 92.

GREGORY XIII. Hugh Buoncompagno, a Bolognese, elected pope after Pius V. 1572. He was an able civilian, and warmly opposed the protestants. He embellished Rome with churches, palaces, and porticoes, and chiefly immortalized himself by the reformation of the calendar, and the adoption of the style which bears his name. He was assisted in this honourable and necessary alteration by the labours of Lilio, an able astronomer of Rome, but though the plan was acknowledged universally useful, it was pertinaciously rejected by the protestant princes of Europe. Gregory also published the Decretals of Gratian, which were enriched with valuable learned notes. He died 10th April, 1585, aged 83.

GREGORY XIV. Nicholas Sfondrate, son of a senator of Milan, was elected pope after Urban VII. 1590. He declared himself, at the suggestion of Philip II. of Spain, against Henry IV. of France, and levied an army to enforce his threats, but his troops were defeated, and his military plans disconcerted. He died of the stone, 15th Oct. 1591, aged 57.

GREGORY XV. Alexander Ludovisio, of an ancient family of Bologna, was archbishop of his native town, and made a cardinal by Paul V. He was elected pope 1621, and died 8th July, 1623, aged 69. He erected the see of Paris into an archbishopric, and assisted the emperor and the king of Poland in their wars. He wrote Epistola ad Regem Persarum Schah Abbas, cum Notis Hegalsoni, 8vo.—Decisions de la Rote.

GREGORY, James, a Scotch mathematician, born and educated at Aberdeen. His strong genius began early to display itself, and in 1663, at the age of 24, he invented the reflecting telescope, which still bears his name, but which the inexperience of the London artists could not then construct according to his approbation. He afterwards went to Italy, which at that time was considered as the cradle of mathematical knowledge, and applied the powers of his mind with such success, that he discovered a new analytical method of summing up an infinite converging series, to calculate with exactness the area of the hyperbola, and of the circle. On his return to London, in 1669, he was chosen a member of the Royal Society, and soon after engaged in an unfortunate controversy with Huygens about the quadrature of the circle, in which his arguments were false. His reputation as a mathematician, and as the inventor of the reflecting telescope, and of the burning concave mirror, was now so well established, that the royal academy at Paris proposed him to the French king as deserving an honourable pension from him, a step which was not, however, adopted. In 1672, he had a dispute, but in amicable terms, with sir Isaac Newton, after his wonderful discoveries on the nature of light, about the various utility of his dioptric telescope against that of the catoptric instrument of his antagonist. This able philosopher, whose genius daily contributed to the improvement of mathematical science, was unhappily attacked by a fever which proved fatal, Dec. 1675, in his 36th year. A short history of his mathematical discoveries was compiled and published by his friend Mr. Collins, with his letters to him in the "Commercium Epistolicum." His works are Optica Promota seu Abdita Radium Reflexorum et Refractorum Mystera, &c. 1663, translated by Dr. Desaguliers into English—Vera Circuli et Hyperbolæ Quadratura, &c. besides some papers in the philosophical transactions.

GREGORY, David, nephew to the preceding, was born at Aberdeen, 24th June, 1661. He there received the elements of his education, and then went to Edinburgh, where he took the degree of M.A. The fame of his uncle and the perusal of his papers excited his attention in mathematical pursuits, and at the age of 23 he was deemed capable to fill the mathematical chair of Edinburgh. He published, in 1684, an ingenious treatise called "Exercitatio Geometrica de Dimensione Figurarum," 4to. and soon after, on the appearance of Newton's Principia, he applied himself to study the great truths of that immortal philosopher, and was the first to introduce them into the university schools. In 1691 he came to London with the intention of soliciting the Savilian professorship of astronomy at Oxford, upon Dr. Bernard's resignation, and by the friendship of Sir Isaac Newton, and of Flamsteed, he succeeded, after being admitted at Baliol college, and incorporated M.A. and created M.D. He now devoted himself to his laborious studies, and displayed great powers in the elements of optics and physical and geometrical astronomy, improving the discoveries of others by new and elegant demonstrations. He proposed to publish the works of all the ancient mathematicians, and in the prosecution of this plan produced an edition of Euclid in Greek and Latin, and prepared with his friend Halley, an edition of the Cones of Apollonius. His labours, however, were stopped by death. He died at his villa near Maidenhead, 16th Oct. 1710, and a handsome monument was erected to his memory, in St. Marys, Oxford, by his widow. His eldest son David, was educated at Christ-church, and successively became regius professor of modern history, canon, and dean of his college. Many of his papers were inserted in the Philosophical Transactions, and the various things which he wrote, and the improvement which he made in geometry and philosophy, are fully mentioned in the Biographia Britannica. His brother James was for 33 years mathematical professor at Edinburgh, where he was succeeded by Maclaurin.—Another brother, Charles, was 32 years mathematical professor at St. Andrews, where he was succeeded by his son David, author of a System of Arithmetic and Algebra in Latin.

GREGORY, John, an English divine, born at Agmondesham, Bucks, 10th November, 1607. His abilities displayed themselves so early that as his parents were poor, though well respected, his opulent neighbours united to give him a liberal education by common subscription. With this benevolent intention, he was sent with Sir William Drake to Christ-church, Oxford, as servitor, under the tuition of Morley, afterwards bishop of Winchester. Young Gregory rose in the esteem of his fellow-students, he took his degree of M.A. 1631, and was made by dean Duppa chaplain of the cathedral. When Duppa was promoted to the see of Chichester, and afterwards to Salisbury, he accompanied him as his domestic chaplain, and obtained from him a stall in the church of Sarum. The violence of the times, however, did not long permit him to enjoy his ecclesiastical honours, he was ejected by the parliament, and, in his distress, he went to reside in the house of one Sutton, who kept an ale-house at Kiddington green, near Oxford, to whose son he had been tutor, where he died of the gout in his stomach, March 13th, 1646. His remains were buried in Oxford cathedral. His works were, Notes and Observations on some Passages of Scripture,—an edition of Ridley's View of the Civil and Ecclesiastical Law,—"Gregorii Posthuma," &c.

GREGORY, Edmund, author of the "Historical Anatomy of Christian Melancholy,"—of "a Meditation on Job," 8vo. was of Trinity college, Oxford, and died 1650.

GREGORY, Dr. John, a physician of respectability, born at Aberdeen. He studied at Edinburgh and Leyden, and became professor of philosophy and medicine at Aberdeen. He wrote several valuable medical tracts, but he is chiefly known for his "Comparative View of the State of Man, and other Animals,"—a Father's Legacy to his Daughter, and other moral pieces. He settled in London in 1751, but removed to Edinburgh as professor of physic, in 1766, and died there 1773, aged 49. His works have been collected into 4 vols. 8vo.

GREGORY, Peter, a native of Toulouse, author of some learned but injudicious works. He died 1527.

GREGORY, George, a divine and miscellaneous writer, was the son of a clergyman in Ireland, and born in 1754. He was educated at Liverpool for the counting-house, in which he spent some years; but at length applied for, and obtained orders in the established church. In 1782 he settled in London, where he became evening preacher at the Foundling, and lastly vicar of Westham in Essex, for which preferment he was indebted to Mr. Addington, who employed him to defend his administration. He died in 1803. Dr. Gregory, for he had obtained a degree from Scotland, published—1. Essays, historical and moral, 8vo.—2. A Translation of Louth's Lectures, 2 vols.—3. Church History, 2 vols.—4. The Life of Chatterton, 8vo.—5. The Economy of Nature, 3 vols. 8vo.—6. Sermons, 8vo. He left for the press, "Letters on Philosophy," 2 vols.; and "Letters to his Son," 2 vols.—W. B.

GRENADA, Lewis de, a Dominican, born at Grenada. Devoted to the duties and austerities of a monastic life, he had the firmness to refuse the bishopric of Braganza, and died 1588, aged 84. He wrote several works which evince his labours, his piety, and his benevolence.

GRENAN, Benignus, a Latin poet, professor of rhetoric at Harcourt. He was born at Noyers, and died at Paris, 1723, aged 42. He was the friend and the poetical rival of professor Coffin. His verses contain great elegance, with many noble and delicate sentiments.

GREUCE, a French painter of great merit. His pieces are much admired, especially the sacrifice of Jephtha, Diana and Endymion, Susannah, &c.

GRENVILLE, George, a celebrated statesman, known in parliamentary history for his two bills for the more regular payment of the navy, passed in 1757, and for the trial of contested elections, passed in 1770. He was distinguished for his eloquence in the senate, and possessed that extensive and enlightened knowledge which fitted him for the highest offices of the state. He was in 1754, made treasurer of the navy, and became first lord of the treasury in 1763, but resigned two years after to lord Rockingham. He died 13th November, 1770, aged 58. By Elizabeth, daughter of Sir William Wyndham, he had four sons and five daughters, and of these, the present marquis of Buckingham, who inherited the family estates in Buckinghamshire; lord Grenville, and Mr. Thomas Grenville, have raised themselves high in the public estimation for their services to their country, in the important offices which they have filled with so much ability, firmness, and wisdom.

GRESHAM, Sir Thomas, descended from an ancient family in Norfolk, was born in London, 1519, and was bound apprentice to a mercer. That his mind might, however, be somewhat more cultivated, he became member of Caius college, Cambridge, where his proficiency was such that he was called by Caius the founder, "Doctissimus Mercator." He was admitted into the mercers' company in 1543, and about that time married, and in 1551, he went to Antwerp to settle as agent to king Edward, for taking up money from the Flemish merchants. In this office he displayed great dexterity and wisdom, and made the balance of trade preponderate much in favour of England. On Mary's accession he was removed from his office, in consequence of which he presented a petition to the queen, and represented in modest terms the many services which he had rendered to her brother Edward, and to the kingdom, in consequence of which he was restored to favour, and continued in the same employment under Elizabeth. In 1559, he was knighted by the queen, and in the midst of his great reputation, and commercial prosperity, he built himself a mansion-house on the west side of Bishopsgate-street, but his hopes were ruined, and his happiness embittered by the death of his only son, a youth of 16, in 1564. Full of liberality, Sir Thomas wished that the merchants of London might meet in a more convenient place than the open air in Lombard-street, and therefore, agreeable to his suggestions, the city of London bought for more than 3532*l.* about 80 houses, which were pulled down, and on the site of them was begun, 7th June, 1566, the erection of a noble building. It was fully completed in 1569, at Sir Thomas's expense, after the model of the exchange at Antwerp, and Jan. 29th, 1570, Elizabeth, attended by her nobility, visited it, and by the voice of a herald, caused it to be proclaimed "the Royal Exchange." Sir Thomas afterwards built the mansion-house at Osterly park, for his residence, and he determined to appropriate his house in Bishopsgate-street to literary purposes, though earnestly solicited to apply his liberality to the foundation of a college at Oxford, or more particularly at Cambridge, where he had received some part of his education. In 1575 he therefore founded Gresham college, leaving the half of his property in the Royal Exchange to the corporation of London, and the other to the mercers' company, for the endowment of seven lectures in divinity, law, physic, astronomy, rhetoric, geometry, and music, at 50*l.* each, with his house where the lectures were to be delivered. Besides these munificent donations, he was a very liberal benefactor to various charities and institutions, and, in every respect, showed that riches in his hand could best be employed in acts of benevolence and humanity. This truly illustrious character did not long enjoy the satisfaction of conscious and dignified virtue; he fell down senseless on his return from the exchange to his house, Bishopsgate-street, and expired soon after, 21st November, 1579. He was buried with great pomp in his parish church of St. Helen's. His corpse was attended by 100 poor men and as many women, clothed in black, and the expenses of the funeral, in those cheap days, amounted to no less than 800*l.* His lady survived him some years; she died 23d November, 1596, and was buried in the same vault with him. The character of this generous and public spirited man has been drawn accurately by Mr. Ward, who observes that, to the knowledge of ancient and modern languages, and an eagerness to patronise literature and learned men, he united a very comprehensive knowledge of commercial affairs, foreign and domestic. He therefore deservedly acquired an immense fortune, which rendered him not only the highest commoner in the kingdom, with the appellation of the Royal merchant, but the most capable and the most willing to employ his opulence in such acts as dignify human nature.

GRESSET, John Baptist Lewis, a celebrated French poet, known chiefly for his elegant, lively, and interesting poem called Vert-vert. His Euvres Diverses were published 1748, 12mo. He was director of the French Academy, and obtained the order of St. Michael, and letters of nobility. He died at his native town, Amiens, 16th June, 1777, aged 68. His comedy of the Mechant was a very popular play.

GRETSER, James, a learned Jesuit, born at Maredorf 1561. He was twenty-four years professor of morality and school divinity at Ingoldstadt, and published a great number of books on theological subjects, and against the protestants. To great learning he united unusual modesty. He died at Ingoldstadt 1635. His works were published at Ratisbon, in 17 vols. folio, by Nicéron, 1739.

GREVENBROECK, a Flemish painter of the 17th century, admired for his sea pieces, and particularly for the correctness with which he delineated the most minute objects.

GREVILLE, Fulk, or Foulk, lord Brooke, was born 1554, at Beauchamp court, Warwickshire, the seat of his father Sir Fulk Greville. He was educated, as is supposed, at Shrewsbury school and at Trinity college, Cambridge, and afterwards entered at Oxford. After travelling abroad, he was introduced to the court of queen Elizabeth, where he became a great favourite, and where he obtained an annual income of above 2000*l.* as clerk of the signet to the council of Wales. Though prevented by the commands of the queen from indulging his attachment to military affairs, he distinguished himself, with his affectionate friend Sir Philip Sydney, in the tilts and tournaments which engaged the public attention on the expected marriage of Elizabeth to the duke of Anjou. In 1597, he was knighted, and continued to represent his county in parliament till the end of the queen's reign. Though under James he obtained the grant of Warwick castle, on the reparation of which he spent 20,000*l.* yet he found Cecil jealous of his power, and therefore retired to privacy, and to studious pursuits. He wished to engage in the history of his country from the union of the two roses in Henry VII. but Cecil the secretary refused him the perusal of those papers which might have thrown a great light on the annals of that interesting period. After Cecil's death he became, in 1615, a favourite at court, and was made under-treasurer and chancellor of the exchequer, and in 1620 he was raised to the dignity of the peerage. He continued in the favour of Charles I. and in the beginning of his reign founded a history lecture in the university of Cambridge, with an annual salary of 100*l.* The succeeding history of his life is most melancholy; Ralph Heywood, one of his domestics, considering his services too long unrewarded, upraised him in his chamber with unusual freedom, and upon finding his application disregarded, stabbed him mortally in the back with a knife or sword, and then reting to an adjoining chamber, destroyed himself with the same weapon. This bloody catastrophe happened at Brook-house, Holborn, 30th September, 1628. The dead body was conveyed to Warwick, and buried in St. Mary's church there. Lord Brooke deserves to be recorded not merely as a courtier, but as the friend and patron of learned men, and among his respectable associates may be numbered besides Sydney, Spenser, Shakspeare, Ben Jonson, Egerton, Overal, Camden, Speed, Davenant, &c. As he was never married, his estates descended to his relation Robert Greville.

GREVIN, James, a French poet and physician, born at Clermont, 1538. He was in the service of Margaret of France, dutchess of Savoy, and died at Turin, 5th Nov. 1573. He wrote three plays; and had he not died thus prematurely, he would have been distinguished still more by his genius as a poet, and by extensive practice as a physician. His poems, &c. were printed at Paris 1561, in 8vo. As he was a strong Calvinist, he joined Roche Chandieu and Christian to write the well-known poem "the Temple," against Ronsard, who in his "Miseries of the Time," had abused the protestants.

GREVIUS, OF GRÆVIUS, John George, a learned Latin critic, born at Naumbourg in Saxony, 29th Jan. 1632. He finished his studies at Leipsic, but though intended for the law by his father, he paid much attention to classical literature, and by the friendship and assistance of J. F. Gronovius at Deventer, and of D. Heinsius, at Leyden, he laid the foundation of that universal learning, which soon after so eminently distinguished him. By the persuasion of D. Blondel, at Amsterdam, he quitted the tenets of Luther for those of Calvin. His reputation was so well established that his assistance as public professor was solicited by the elector of Brandenburg, but he finally settled at Deventer, where he succeeded his friend Gronovius. After adorning, by his eloquence and the great powers of his mind, successively, the chairs of eloquence, politics, and history; and after being honoured with the particular attentions of the states of Utrecht, who as well as many students from Germany and England, paid homage to his superior abilities; this excellent scholar was suddenly carried off by an apoplexy, 11th Jan. 1703, aged 71. By his wife, whom he married 1656, he had 18 children, but only four daughters survived him. As an editor and annotator, Grævius has acquired great celebrity. Hesiod, Suetonius, Cicero, Florus, Catullus, Tibullus, Propertius, Cæsar, Lucian, &c. were edited by him, besides Callimachus, which his son, who died in his 23d year, had nearly completed. His chief work is his "Thesaurus Antiquitatum Romanarum," 12 vols. fol. to which he added Thesaurus Antiq. et Histor. Italiae, printed after his death, 3 vols. fol. The best part of his letters to the learned men of the age were preserved in Dr. Mead's collection.

GREUZE, a very eminent French painter. His Pere de Famille giving his daughter to an honest peasant, to whom she was betrothed, his Filial Piety, and his young Woman deploring the loss of her canary-bird, are very fine performances.

GREW, Obadiah, an English divine, born at Atherston, Warwickshire, 1607. He entered at Baliol college, and after taking his degrees in arts, he entered into orders at the age of 28, and favouring the views of parliament, settled at Coventry as minister of St. Michael's there. Active and exemplary in his conduct, he was an indefatigable parish priest, and as he sided with the presbyterians against the hierarchy, so he opposed them in their views of cutting off the king; and even drew a promise from Cromwell, as he passed through Coventry, in 1647, that no violence should be offered to his royal master. In 1651, he took both his degrees in divinity, but at the restoration he refused to conform, for which he was ejected from his parish. He died 22d Oct. 1698. He published Meditations on the Parable of the Prodigal Son, and other theological tracts.

GREW, Nehemiah, son of the preceding, was eminent as a writer and a physician. He was educated abroad, and was admitted into the college of physicians, 1680. His great merits and extensive practice, in London, recommended him to the Royal Society, of which he became fellow; and in 1677, secretary. Besides the publication of the philosophical transactions in which he was engaged, he sent to press the Anatomy of Plants, fol. Comparative Anatomy of the Stomach, &c.—Catalogue of the Rarities of the Royal Society—Cosmologia Sacra, &c. He died suddenly, Lady day, 1711, in London.

GREY, lady Jane, celebrated for her virtues and her misfortunes, was daughter of Henry Grey, marquis of Dorset, by Frances Brandon, daughter of Mary, dowager of France, and sister to Henry VIII. She was born in 1537, at Bradgate-hall, Leicestershire, and from her very infancy showed great quickness and comprehension of mind. Under Harding and Aylmer, her father's chaplains, she improved herself in the various branches of learning; and became such a proficient in languages, that she spoke and wrote, with astonishing facility, the French, Italian, Latin, and it is said the Greek; and was also well skilled in Hebrew, Arabic, and Chaldee. To these high acquisitions in literature, were united great beauty, the mildest manners, and the most captivating virtues of humility, benevolence, and modesty. Regardless of the pleasures and frivolous occupations of the great, she sought for gratification in reading and in meditation, and she observed to her tutor Aschani, who found her reading Plato while the rest of the family were hunting in the park, that the sport which they were enjoying, was but a shadow compared to the pleasure which she received from the sublime author. The alliances of her family, however, and their ambition, were too powerful to suffer her to live in her beloved seclusion. No sooner was the declining health of the sixth Edward perceived by his courtiers, than Dudley, duke of Northumberland, prevailed upon the unsuspecting monarch, to settle the crown on his relation, lady Jane, whose attachment to the principles of the reformation was indubitable; and to pass over his sisters Mary and Elizabeth. When this was effected, the artful favourite married his son Guilford Dudley to the future queen, and thus paved the way to the elevation of his own family to the throne. But while others rejoiced in these plans of approaching greatness, Jane alone seemed unconcerned, and, when at last, on Edward's death, she was hailed as queen by her ambitious father-in-law, Northumberland, she refused the proffered dignity, till the authority of her father the duke of Suffolk, and the entreaties of a husband whom she tenderly loved, prevailed upon her reluctantly to consent. She was, as usual, conveyed to the Tower, preparatory to her coronation, and she was proclaimed queen in the city, and honoured with all the marks of Royalty. This sunshine of prosperity was, however, but transitory; her rival Mary proved more powerful, and the kingdom seemed to espouse her cause with such loyalty, that Northumberland and Suffolk yielded to the popular voice, and lady Jane, after being treated as queen for a few days, descended again, and with exultation, to privacy. But misfortunes accompanied her fall. She saw her father-in-law and his family, her own father and his numerous adherents, brought to the Tower, and at last expire under the hand of the executioner, and she herself together with her husband were to complete the bloody tragedy. She and lord Guilford and Cranmer were carried to Guildhall from the Tower, and attainted of high treason, and condemned, but it is imagined that had not Wyatt's rebellion at that time alarmed the suspicions of the bigoted Mary, the innocent Jane might have been pardoned. Three months after her condemnation she was ordered to prepare for death, and as her husband was dissuaded from increasing their mutual bitterness by taking leave of each other, she gave him her last farewell through the window as he passed to the place of execution, and soon after she saw his headless body wrapped in a linen cloth borne to the chapel. From the horrid sight she was soon summoned herself to the scaffold, where she suffered with the most Christian resignation, exclaiming with fervency, "Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit." This bloody catastrophe took place 12th Feb. 1554. Jane carried with her to the grave, the regrets and the affections of the protestants, and Mary, in shedding the blood of those who were so nearly related to her, seemed to proclaim that she little regarded the sacrificing of the lives of her subjects to her own bigoted principles.

GREY, Dr. Zachary, an English scholar, descended from a Yorkshire family. He was of Jesus college, Cambridge, and afterwards removed to Trinity-hall, where he took the degree of LL.D. He was rector of Houghton-Conquest, Bedfordshire, and vicar of St. Giles' and St. Peter's, in Cambridge, and died 25th Nov. 1766, aged 79. He was author of near thirty publications, the best known of which is his edition of Hudibras, with curious and interesting notes, 2 vols. which has been censured and ridiculed by Warburton and H. Fielding, but ably defended by Warton on Shakspeare. He also answered Neale's History of the Puritans, 3 vols. 8vo. Dr. Grey was twice married, and left two daughters.

GREY, Dr. Richard, an English divine, born 1693. He was of Lincoln college, Oxford, and obtained the livings of Kiln-cote, Leicestershire, and afterwards Hinton in Northamptonshire, and a prebend in St. Paul's. He was made D.D. 1731, by the university, for his "System of English Ecclesiastical Law." He published, besides, in 1736, an anonymous pamphlet, called "the Miserable and Distracted State of Religion in England, upon the Downfall of the Church Established," 8vo.—and also "a New Method of Learning Hebrew without Points,"—Liber Jobi.—the Last Words of David—some sermons, &c. He left some daughters, and died 28th Feb. 1771, aged 78.

GRIBALDUS, Matthew, a learned civilian of Padua, who left Italy to embrace the protestant faith, and became professor of civil law at Tubingen. He followed the errors of the anti-trinitarians, for which he was obliged to fly from Tubingen, and he was at last seized at Bern, where the plague carried him off in Sept. 1564, and thus prevented the ignominious death which his persecutors would have inflicted upon him. He wrote some valuable books on civil law, the best known of which is his "Commentarii in Legem de Rerum Mixtura, et de Jure Fiscali."

GRIBNER, Michael Henry, professor of the law at Wirtemberg, died 1734. He wrote several works in Latin on jurisprudence, &c. and his abilities are mentioned with respect by Saxius in his Onomasticon.

GRIDLEY, Jeremiah, an attorney general of the province of Massachusetts, who was graduated at Harvard college in 1725. He devoted himself to the practice of the law, and soon becoming eminent for his superior talents and knowledge, was appointed king's attorney. It was in that capacity that, in 1761, he defended the famous writs of assistance, in opposition to Mr. James Otis. He held the first place among his associates at the bar, in strength of understanding and extent of legal erudition. He died 10th September, 1767.  L.

GRIERSON, Constantia, a woman of great respectability as a scholar in Greek and Roman literature. She was born in Kilkenny, Ireland, of poor and illiterate parents, but she proved her title to celebrity by her edition of Tacitus, dedicated to lord Carteret, and by that of Terence, inscribed to his son, and also by her poems, and a Greek epigram of great merit. In acknowledgment of her literary abilities, lord Carteret inserted her name in the patent which granted the office of king's printer to her husband for life. She died in 1733, aged only 27. She received, as she informed Mrs. Pilkington, some instruction from the clergyman of her parish, but for the best part of her learning she was indebted to her own industry. To her learning and philosophical knowledge, she united great modesty, genuine piety, and every female virtue.

GRIESBACH, John Jacob, a learned critic and divine, was born Jan. 4, 1745, at Buzbach, in Hesse-Darmstadt, where his father was a minister. The son was educated at Frankfort, afterwards at Tubingen, next at Halle, and lastly at Leipsic. In 1773 he was appointed professor extraordinary of divinity at Halle, where, in 1775, he published his edition of the Greek Testament, with various readings. This inestimable edition passed through several impressions, one of which was taken off at the expense of the late duke of Grafton. Professor Griesbach was called to the divinity chair at Jena, where also he became rector of the university, and privy counselor for ecclesiastical affairs to the duke of Saxe Weimar. His critical notes upon the Scriptures are very valuable; but his publications are too numerous to admit of a list in this place. He died at Jena, March 24, 1812.—W. B.

GRIFFET, Henry, a Jesuit of Moulins, who died at Brussels 1775, aged 77. He published Daniel's History of France, in which he continued the reign of Lewis XIII. 7 vols. 4to. besides sermons, and a popular work called "Delices des Pays Bas," 5 vols. 12mo.

GRIFFIER, John, an eminent painter, called old Griffier, and abroad the gentleman of Utrecht. He was born at Amsterdam, and died in London 1718, aged 60. His views on the Thames were much admired, as also his etched prints of birds, beasts, &c. from the designs of F. Barlow. His son Robert, called the young Griffier, was born in England, and was living in 1713. He was an excellent landscape painter.

GRIFFIN, the last prince of Wales before its total subjugation by the English, was inhumanly put to death in London by his conqueror.

GRIFFIN, Cyrus, president of congress, was educated in England, and connected by marriage with an ancient and noble family in that country. He was attached to the cause of American independence, and, after having held a seat in the legislature of Virginia, was elected, in 1778, a delegate to congress. He was afterwards appointed president of the admiralty court, and continued in that office until it was abolished. While Kentucky was attached to Virginia, he was appointed chief justice of that territory, but declined. In 1787 he was again elected a delegate to congress, and the following year was chosen president of that body. He was the last who held the office. Under the constitution, he was appointed judge of the United States district court for Virginia, and discharged the duties of that station for a period of twenty-one years. He died at Yorktown, December 10th, 1810, aged 62.  L.

GRIFFITH, Michael, a native of London, who studied at Seville and in the Low Countries, and became a Jesuit, and was sent as missionary of his order to England. He died at St. Omers 1652, aged 65. He wrote Annales Ecclesie Britannicæ, 4 vols. fol.—Britannia Illustrata, 4to.

GRIFFITHS, Ralph, a native of Shropshire, known in the republic of letters as the first editor and proprietor of the Monthly Review, a periodical work, begun in 1749, and by his assiduity and the co-operation of men of talents and information, raised to great celebrity. This useful work was so ably and so successfully conducted, that it procured him a comfortable independence, on which he retired to his residence at Turnham Green, some years before his death. He was honoured, for his services to literature, with the degree of LL.D. from one of the American universities, and he died 1803, aged 83.

GRIGNAN, Frances Margaret de Sevigné, countess of, daughter of the celebrated madame de Sevigné, was born in 1646. She married, in 1669, count Grignan, an officer of high rank at the court of Lewis XIV.

Her residence in Provence with her husband, and at a distance from her mother, was the cause of the writing of those excellent letters, which passed between the mother and daughter. She had two daughters and one son. She died 1705, one year after the death of her son, and her husband survived her till 1714, aged 85.

GRIGNON, Charles, an engraver, studied at Paris, under Le Bas, after which he settled in England, where he was most extensively employed for above half a century, till his old-fashioned manner was superseded by a more imposing style. This revolution in the art threw him into obscurity; and, in his latter years, a subscription was formed for his support. He died at Kentish-Town, aged 94, in 1810.—W. B.

GRIGNON, Charles, an artist, was the son of a clock-maker in Russel-street, Covent-garden, and born there in 1754. He discovered his genius for drawing at an early age; and at fifteen gained the prize of the silver pallet from the Society of Arts. He was at this time a pupil of Cipriani's, with whom he was a favourite. In 1769 he became a student of the Royal Academy; and, in 1780, gained the gold medal for the best Historical painting, on the choice of Hercules. After this he was sent by the academy to Rome, where he painted a picture of the death of captain Cook. He also undertook another of Prometheus, for lord Clive. When the French entered Rome he went to Naples, and thence to Sicily, where he painted a portrait of Nelson. He next removed to Leghorn, and died there of a malignant fever, Oct. 29, 1804.—W. B.

GRIGNON, Jaques, a French engraver, at the end of the 17th century. His best works are his portraits. He engraved some pieces from Chauveau's designs for "les Tableaux de la Penitence."

GRIMALDI, John Francis, a painter, born at Bologna 1606. He studied under his relations the Caraccis, and was honourably employed by Innocent X. in adorning the Vatican, and the other edifices of Rome. He was also engaged by Mazarin, at Paris, for three years, in embellishing his palace and the Louvre, but the troubles of the times, and the warmth with which he espoused the cause of his patron, obliged him to fly to the Jesuits for protection. On his return to Rome he gained the patronage of Innocent's two successors, Alexander VII. and Clement IX. and devoted the labours of his pencil in their service. He was also skilled in architecture, and 42 of his engravings in aqua fortis are mentioned with great commendation. In him the celebrity of the painter was united with great benevolence and the most charitable disposition. He died of a dropsy, at Rome, 1660, leaving a considerable fortune among his six children, the youngest of whom,

Alexander, distinguished himself as a painter.

GRIMANI, Domenico, son of the doge of Venice, was born there 1460. He was a learned man and the correspondent of Erasmus, and translated some of Chrysostom's homilies into Latin. He was made a cardinal, and died 1523.

GRIMANI, Hubert, an excellent portrait painter of Delft, who died 1629, aged 30.

GRIMAREST, Leonard, a French writer, who died 1720. He wrote the Life of Charles XII. and that of Moliere, severely censured by Voltaire.

GRIMAUD, N. de, professor of Medicine at Montpellier, is author of a treatise on Fevers—Memoirs on Nutrition, &c. He died 1791.

GRIMMER, James, a much admired landscape painter of Antwerp, who died 1546, aged 30.

GRIMOUX, a French painter, who affected to make no distinction between night and day. His portraits are highly valued as cabinet pieces. He died 1740.

GRIMSTON, sir Harbottle, a learned lawyer, master of the rolls to Charles I. He died 1633, aged 99.

GRINDAL, Edmund, archbishop of Canterbury, was born 1519, at Halsingham in Cumberland. He entered at Magdalen college, Cambridge, and then removed to Christ's, and afterwards to Pembroke-hall, when he became fellow 1538, and M.A. 1541. He was afterwards chosen lady Margaret's public preacher, and distinguished himself so much that Ridley, bishop of London, made him his chaplain 1550. The next year he was appointed chaplain to the king, and, in 1553, he obtained a stall at Westminster, and was marked as one of those who were to enjoy in two portions the rich bishopric of Durham, but the succession of Mary clouded all his prospects. He fled to Strasburg, and there remained till the death of the queen, when his services were employed in drawing up the new liturgy, and in opposing in a public dispute with seven other protestants the popish prelates. In 1559 he was made master of Pembroke-hall, in the room of Young, who refused the oaths of supremacy, and the same year he was nominated to succeed, after Bonner's deposition, as bishop of London. In 1564 he took his degree of D.D. and, in 1570, he was translated to York, and succeeded Parker, five years after, in the see of Canterbury. His elevation was of short duration. Elizabeth saw with displeasure that the frequent meetings of the clergy for purposes of mutual improvement, and for the better understanding of the Scripture, were often converted into faction instead of Christian edification, and she therefore directed Grindal to exercise his authority to abolish these prophesyings, as they were called. The primate, who acknowledged that the interference of the laity in these public meetings was often subversive of good order and decorum, yet saw consequences in the friendly meeting of the clergy so favourable to the cause of religion that he ventured to dispute with the queen about the propriety of her measures. Elizabeth was peremptory; her commands were issued to the bishops to silence all prophesyings and exercises, all preachers not lawfully called; and Grindal, after being allowed a decent time to consider of his conduct, was, by order of the Star-chamber, confined to his house, and his see sequestered from him. Though in some degree afterwards restored to his metropolitan power, yet he chose to resign his see, and to receive a pension from the queen. With this he retired to Croydon, but died two months after, 6th July, 1583, and was interred in Croydon church. This learned prelate, whose firmness was doubted whilst he held the see of London, and seemed to waver in his treatment of the papists, wrote little. The patrons of his early life were, besides Ridley, secretary Cecil and archbishop Parker. He was engaged in drawing up the statutes for the government of Christ-church, Oxford, and by his humanity he provided a new settlement at Embden for the British merchants of Antwerp, whom Spanish tyranny oppressed and insulted.

GRINGONNEUR, Jacquemin, a Parisian painter in the 14th century, said to have invented playing cards about 1392, to amuse the melancholy hours of Charles VI. king of France. Some, however, imagine that cards were in fashion long before the derangement of the sixth Charles.

GRINGORE, Peter, herald at arms to the duke of Lorraine, died 1544. His "Moralities" in verse, though not very interesting, are curious, to mark the progress of theatrical improvement.

GRISAUNT, William, an English physician, astronomer, and mathematician, who studied at Merton college, Oxford, and to avoid the suspicion of magic which in those barbarous ages attended the possession of learning, fled over to France. He settled at Montpellier and afterwards at Marseilles, where he acquired eminence and fame by an inquisitive examination of the diseases and constitution of his patients. His son rose to the pontificate under the name of Urban V. His works are mentioned in Aikin's Biog. Memoirs. The time of his death is unknown, though he was an old man in 1350.

GRISWOLD, Roger, LL.D. governor of Connecticut, was the son of governor Matthew Griswold, born at Lyme, May 21, 1762, and graduated at Yale college in 1780. He was admitted to practise law in 1783, and was elected a representative in congress from Connecticut in 1794. He was one of the most distinguished members of that body during the administrations of president Adams and his successor, was warmly attached to the principles of the federal party, and a powerful advocate of its measures. In 1801 he was appointed to, but declined accepting, the office of secretary of the war department. In 1807, having resigned his seat in congress, he was appointed a judge of the supreme court of Connecticut. In 1808 he was one of the electors of president and vice president, and in 1809 was elected lieutenant governor of the state. In 1811 he was chosen governor. His death took place at Norwich, October 25th, 1812. He was for several years regarded by both political parties, as one of the first men in the nation, in talents, political knowledge, and force of eloquence, and commanded the esteem and admiration of opponents as well as friends in the several stations which he occupied. He possessed an understanding of uncommon energy, a brilliant fancy, a fine memory, and was an acute reasoner, was distinguished by great uprightness and public spirit, and was eminently accomplished and dignified in his manners.

GRIVE, John de la, a French geographer born at Sedan. He died 1757, aged 68. His "Topography of Paris" is extremely accurate, and his plans of Versailles, Marly, &c. are much admired. He wrote also a Manual of Spherical Trigonometry and other works.

GROCYN, William, a learned Englishman, born at Bristol 1442, and educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford. In 1479 he obtained from his college the rectory of Newton Longville, Bucks, and afterwards, in consequence of holding in the ablest manner a disputation before Richard III. when he visited Oxford, he was made prebendary of Lincoln. He travelled to Italy, and improved himself in the Greek, then little understood, under Demetrius Chalcondylas, and Politian, and at his return 1491, settled at Exeter college, Oxford, where he became public professor of his favourite language. He was the correspondent and friend of Erasmus. When that illustrious scholar visited Oxford, Grocyn received him with affection, and introduced him to Warham the primate, and other great and learned men. In 1490, Grocyn exchanged his living for the mastership of All-hallows college, Maidstone, Kent, where he died 1522, of a stroke of the palsy, which the year before had greatly impaired his faculties. He had little respect for Plato, but paid great homage to the philosophy of Aristotle, whose works he undertook with Latimer, Linacre, and More, to translate, but did not pursue. He left part of his property to Linacre his executor, and to Thomas Lilly the grammarian, who was his godson. A Latin epistle from him to Aldus Manutius, is preserved in Linacre's translation of Proclus de Sphæra. Though Erasmus says this is all he wrote, yet some other writings of his are mentioned by Bale and Leland.

GROCHOWSKI, a Pole, who after serving in the Prussian armies, took up arms in defence of his country against the Russians. He was with Kosciuszko at the battle of Syczekociny, 6th June, 1791, and was mortally wounded by a cannon ball.

GRODITUS, Stanislaus, a Jesuit of Poland, author of eight volumes of Latin sermons, and other polemical writings. He died at Cracow, 1613.

GRONOVIVS, John Frederic, a respectable civilian, critic, and historian, born at Hamburgh, 1613. After making great progress in literature at home, he travelled through Germany, Italy, and France, further to increase the resources of his mind, and on his return through Deventer, he was stopped and honourably appointed professor of polite learning. In 1658 he removed to Leyden as successor in the professorial chair, to Dan. Heinsius, and there he died greatly regretted, 1672. He married at Deventer, and had two sons both eminent in literature. He published a dissertation on Statius's Sylva—a treatise on the Sesterce—a work of Ecclesiastical Writers, besides valuable editions of Plautus, Seneca, Sallust, Livy, Quintilian, Pliny, &c.

GRONOVIVS, James, son of the preceding, was born at Deventer, 20th Oct. 1645, and educated under his father at Leyden. In 1670, he visited England, and not only examined the valuable libraries of the universities, but he gained the friendship of the learned, of Pocock, Pearson, and M. Casaubon, and after his return to Leyden, he extended his travels to France, where he was introduced to Chaplain, d'Herbelot, Thevenot, and other scholars. Though his father's death disconcerted his plans, he proceeded to Italy, where the grand duke of Tuscany, in respect to his merits, granted him a pension, and a professor's chair, at Pisa, where he had for his colleague Henry Norris, afterwards a cardinal. After some time he left Tuscany, and returning by the way of Venice and Padua, he came to Leyden, where, in 1679, a professorship awaited him. In this peaceful retreat, endeared to him by the residence of his father, and the partialities of youthful life, he determined to pass the remainder of his days, and therefore rejected the honourable offers of a chair at Padua, and also at Keil, in Holstein, under the duke of Sleswick. In the midst of his literary occupations the death of his favourite daughter rent his bosom with affliction, so that in the fulness of his grief, he felt sick, and five weeks after he followed her to the grave, 21st Oct. 1716. He left two sons, the eldest a physician, and the youngest Abraham, history professor at Utrecht. Gronovius was inferior to his father in modesty and moderation, though superior in learning; but his virulence against his literary antagonists was such, that he was called a second Scioppius. Besides editions of Macrobius, Polybius, &c. he published that valuable book, "Thesaurus Antiquitatum Græcarum," 13 vols. fol.

GROPPER, John, an able polemic of Westphalia, who refused a cardinal's hat. He died at Rome 1559. He had a great abhorrence of women. He wrote a valuable work "Erchiridion Christianæ Religionis."

GROS, Peter, an able sculptor, born at Paris. He embellished the capital of France with many fine specimens of his art, and died at Rome 1710, aged 44.

GROS, Nicholas, a theologian of Rheims, whose opposition to the bull unigenitus obliged him to fly from France. He was for some time in England, and wrote several things on temporary subjects. He was theological professor at Amersfort, and in his writings ably supported the Jansenists in Holland. He died 1751, aged 76.

GROSE, Francis, an English antiquary, and able writer. He illustrated "the Antiquity of England and Wales" in 4 vols. 4to. "and of Scotland," in two. His design, with respect to Ireland, was checked by death, which carried him off in Dublin, in 1791, aged 52. He published besides "a Classical Dictionary of the Vulgar Tongue,"—Military Antiquities, &c.—a treatise on Ancient Armour, &c. His talents were much admired as a draughtsman, and he was equally respectable as a pleasing and agreeable companion in private life.

GROSLEY, Peter John, member of the academy of belles lettres, and of Inscriptions, was born at Troyes, and died there 1785, aged 67. He wrote "Recherches pour l'Histoire du Droit François"—the Lives of the two Pithou's, &c. besides large contributions to the Encyclopedia, and the Dictionnaire Historique.

GROSSETESTE, Robert, an English prelate, born about 1175, at Stradbroom, Suffolk. Though obscurely born, he received a decent education, most ably assisted by indefatigable application, at Oxford and Paris, where he became a respectable proficient in Greek literature, little regarded at that time. On returning from Paris, he read lectures on philosophy and divinity at Oxford, and from the celebrity which he acquired was made archdeacon of Chester, afterwards of Wilts, and in 1234-5, elected bishop of Lincoln. He died at Buckden, 1253, highly respected for learning, integrity, and piety, even in the opinion of Matthew Paris, who often speaks of him with marked indifference. He wrote commentaries on Aristotle, and other voluminous works, mentioned in Tanner's Bibliothèque. He possessed great learning, a clear and vigorous intellect. Dr. Pegge has written his life.

GROSTESTE, Claude, a French refugee, who came to London, after the revocation of the edict of Nantes. He was minister of the Savoy, and wrote several sermons, and a treatise on the Inspiration of the Sacred Books, displaying learning, benevolence, and humility. He died 1713, aged 28.

GROSVENOR, Benjamin, a native of London, made minister of a dissenting congregation, in Crosby-square, 1704, and in 1716 removed to Salters' hall meeting-house. Besides essay on Health, and the Mourner, often edited, and universally approved, he wrote several sermons, and died 1758, aged 83.

GROTIUS, or GROOT, Hugo, a celebrated writer, son of John de Groot, a respectable burgomaster of Delft. He was born at Delft, 10th April, 1583, and from his earliest years displayed strong powers of mind, great genius, sound judgment, and a most retentive memory. He studied at the Hague, and afterwards removed to Leyden under the care of Francis Junius, and here Joseph Scaliger saw and admired his promising abilities, and affectionately interested himself in his improvement. In 1598 he accompanied count Justin of Nassau, and the grand pensioner Barneveldt, in their embassy to France, and he was received with every mark of kindness by the court, and presented by Henr IV. with his picture and a gold chain. The university of Paris also paid its respects to this learned youth, and granted him a doctor of law's degree before his return to Holland. Devoting himself to the law, he pleaded his first cause at Delft, and though scarce seventeen, he commanded the general applause by his eloquence and extensive information. But polite literature also engaged much of his attention, and in 1599 he published an edition of Martianus Capella, dedicated to the celebrated de Thou, and translated into Latin, Stevin's treatise for the instruction of pilots in finding a ship's place at sea. In 1600 he published his phænomena of Aratus, and acquired such celebrity as a poet that his Propopœia was translated into French by du Vaer, Rapin, Pasquier, and Malherbe, and into Greek by Casaubon. He also wrote tragedies, and his Adamus Euxi, his Christus Patiens, and his Joseph, were received with great applause. In 1603, he was appointed historiographer to the states of Holland, who thus selected him as the ablest historian worthy to transmit to posterity the heroic deeds of their countrymen, and their emancipation from Spanish slavery. He was next appointed advocate general for the fisc of Holland and Zealand, with an increased salary, and he ably defended in 1609, in his "Mare Liberum," the freedom of the ocean, and the right of the Dutch to trade to the east, though the work was severely and acutely censured by Selden. His treatise de Antiquitate Republicæ Batavæ, to assert the ancient independence of his country from the Roman yoke, and the modern usurpations of Spain, appeared in 1610, and was rewarded with the unanimous thanks of the states. In 1613, he was honourably elected pensionary of Rotterdam, and obtained a seat in the assembly of the states of Holland, and afterwards of the states general, and soon after his abilities were employed in settling the disputes between the English and the Dutch, on the subject of the fishery in the Northern seas. In the religious differences which now began to agitate Holland, Grotius, who had hitherto marched unopposed in the road of honour and glory, took a share, and, in embracing the tenets of Arminius, he declared himself a zealous advocate for toleration. His conduct, and that of those with whom he acted, proved offensive to prince Maurice, and the conference begun for reconciliation, soon ended in mistrust and warfare. At the national synod of Dort, 15th November, 1618, the five articles of the Arminians were condemned, their ministers were banished, and their three able defenders, Barneveldt, Grotius, and Hoogarbets, were tried, and the first was executed, and the others doomed to perpetual imprisonment. In his prison of Louvestein, Grotius found consolation in literary occupations, and though his confinement was rigorous, he derived every comfort from the attentions of his wife, who after some difficulty was permitted to visit him. The fond care of this worthy woman at last procured his deliverance, after a captivity of nearly two years, and on pretence of removing books which she declared proved injurious to her husband's health, she was permitted to send away a small chest of drawers of the length of three feet and a half, in which he was confined. Thus carried by two soldiers from the fortress of Louvestein, the chest was removed to Gorcum on horseback, and at the house of a friend the illustrious prisoner was set at liberty, and immediately escaped disguised in the dress of a mason with a rule and a trowel, to Valvic in Brabant, and then to Antwerp. From Antwerp he wrote to the states general, exculpating himself, and asserting that his conduct was guided by the purest love for his country, and the sincerest regard for the interests of the states, and he afterwards went to Paris, where he received a pension from the French court. His apology appeared in 1622, but it was received with such indignation by the states general, that all persons were forbidden to read it on pain of death, and a decree was issued to seize the offending author wherever he could be found. In 1623, he retired from the tumults of Paris to the seat of one of his friends near Boulogne, and there began his great work on the Rights of Peace and War. The death of Maurice in Holland made no change in the politics of the Dutch, and the next stadtholder, Frederic Henry, professed the same enmity against the exiled sufferer, but, at last, through the solicitations of his friends, and the earnest applications of his wife, the confiscation was removed from his property, and in October, 1631, he ventured to revisit Holland. Though honourably received at Rotterdam, at Amsterdam, and at Delft, he found still the spirit of rancour in the magistrates, and when threatened again with persecution, he determined to remove from an ungrateful country on which his services and his writings have conferred immortal fame. In March, 1632, he retired to Hamburg, and there was flattered with the most pressing and liberal invitations from Spain, Portugal, Denmark, Holstein, and other princes, but he preferred the friendship of Oxenstiern, and a residence in Sweden, to all other situations. By the kindness of his new patron, and the celebrity of his own meritorious works, he was at last declared counsellor to the queen of Sweden, and appointed her ambassador to France, and for eight years, till 1644, he supported the character of his station, and the interests of his new adopted country, with firmness and with dignity. When, at his own solicitation, he retired from the French embassy, he removed through Holland to Sweden, and was honourably received by queen Christina; but seeing the cabals of his enemies, who, without merit, were jealous of his fame and consequence, he sighed again for retirement, and requested permission to go to Lubec. On the 12th of August, 1645, he embarked, but the vessel was driven by a dreadful storm on the coast of Pomerania, and Grotius, intent to reach Lubec, arrived at Rostock, after a tedious journey of sixty miles, exposed to the rain and to the inclemency of the air. The difficulties of his journey were increased by the attacks of a fever, and the illustrious stranger, whom the ingratitude of his countrymen had banished from his home, and the envy of courtiers had driven from his long wished for asylum, sinking under fatigue and disease, expired at midnight, 28th August, 1645. His remains were conveyed to Delft, and deposited in the grave of his family, where this modest epitaph written by himself marks the spot:

Grotius hic Hugo est, Batavum captivus et exul, Legatus regni, Suceia magna, tui.

Besides his valuable treatise on the Christian religion, which is known to every student of Christianity, and his treatise de Jure Belli et Pacis, and the other pieces already mentioned, he published, among other works, Via ad Pacem Ecclesiasticam,—Anthologia,—Historia Gothorum,—Commentary on the Old and New Testaments,—Dissertatio Historice de Dogmat. Ritib., &c.—Ecclesiæ, &c.—de Origine Gentium American.—Notes on Tacitus, Lucian, &c.—Epistles, &c. His wife, Mary Reigesberg, whom he married 1608, survived him. She was a woman of a most respectable family in Zealand, and in her character most amiable, benevolent, and exemplary. The religious opinions of Grotius were very favourable to the church of England, and it is no despicable testimony to the purity and authenticity of the doctrines of our national establishment, that its tenets and discipline were commended and applauded by a man whose judgment was so discriminating, and whose opinion is so respectable and so satisfactory, especially on the subject of religion, to which he devoted for a long time all the powers of a strong, vigorous, and unprejudiced mind. Two of the sons of this illustrious character, Cornelius and Diederick, embraced the military profession, and another, Peter, became eminent in the law, and as a philologist, and was known as a pensionary of Amsterdam. He died 1678.

GROTIUS, William, brother of Hugo, was born at Delft, and distinguished himself as a lawyer. He wrote Enchiridion de Principiis Juris Naturæ,—et Vitæ Juris consultorum in Pandectis Nomin. &c. and died 1662.

GROVE, Henry, a learned teacher among the presbyterians, born at Taunton, Somersetshire, 4th January, 1683. He was descended from very respectable families in Devonshire and Wiltshire, by his father and mother, and therefore his education was particularly attended to. After being under the care of Mr. Warren, who kept an academy at Taunton, he went to London, and studied under his relation, Mr. Rowe, and by his learning and abilities, recommended himself to the notice of some respectable divines, among whom was Dr. Watts. At the age of twenty-two he began to be a preacher, and soon after married; and undertook with Mr. James, the care of Taunton academy, in the room of his friend Warren, where he continued very successfully employed for 18 years. During that time he engaged in the theological disputes which agitated the dissenters and the clergy, and he published his "Essay on the Terms of Christian Communion," and other things. In 1736 he lost his wife, and the following year he fell a victim to a violent fever, which carried him off 27th Feb. 1736-7. An inscription was placed over his grave by Dr. Ward of Gresham college. He wrote Miscellanies in prose and verse, besides a Discourse on Saving Faith,—an Essay on the Soul's Immortality—and the numbers 588, 601, 626, 635, in the Spectator. His posthumous works appeared in 1740, 4 vols. 8vo.

GRÖVE, Joseph, an Englishman, who wrote the life of cardinal Wolsey. He died 1764.

GRUCHIUS, Nicolas, of a noble family in Rouen, was the first who explained Aristotle in Greek. He translated Castanedo's history of the Indies, and wrote a treatise de Comitibus Romanorum, besides tracts against Sigonius, and other works. He died 1572, at Rochelle.

GRUDIUS, Nicolas Everard, treasurer of Brabant, wrote sacred and profane poetry in Latin, and died 1571.

GRUE, Thomas, a Frenchman at the end of the seventeenth century, who translated several English works into French, and among them, Ross's history of all Religions, and Rogers' Gate opened to the Knowledge of Paganism.

GRUET, N. a young poet of very promising abilities, who was unfortunately killed by the discharge of a fowling-piece, on which he was resting his head, and of which the trigger was pulled by the motion of his dog. His farewell to Hector and Andromache, and his Annibal to the Carthaginian senate, are poetical pieces of great merit. He died 1778, aged 25.

GRUGET, Claude, a Parisian of the 16th century, who translated Spanish and Italian works into French, and among them the queen of Navarre's Heptameron.

GRUNER, John Frederic, an able theologian and scholar, born at Cobourg. He wrote an introduction to Roman Antiquities,—Miscellanea Sacra,—Critical Remarks on the Classics, besides editions of Cælius Sedulius, Eutropius, Paterculus, and other valuable works. He died 1778, aged 55.

GRUTERUS, Janus, an eminent philologist, born 3d December, 1560, at Antwerp. His father was burgomaster there, and he was obliged to fly in consequence of signing that petition to the dutchess of Parma, which gave rise to the word Guex. He came to Norwich with his wife, who was an Englishwoman, and with his infant son. Under the eye of his mother, who was an excellent scholar, and could read Galen in the original, young Gruter made a rapid progress, and at the proper age he was sent to Cambridge. On the return of his parents to the continent he followed them, and completed his education at Leyden, where he took a doctor's degree in civil law. During the political agitation of Flanders, he travelled into foreign countries, and was some time professor of history at Wittemberg, but refused to continue there, as a confession of faith, contrary to his sentiments, was tendered to him. He was afterwards offered a professor's chair at Padua, but he preferred the invitation which he had received to settle at Heidelberg. In this situation he published his large collection of inscriptions, dedicated to the emperor Rodolphus II. who in approbation of his merit granted him the license of publishing his own works and those of others, and intended him the honours of nobility, the completing of which his death prevented. On the taking of Heidelberg he had the misfortune to lose his valuable library, which had cost him 1200 golden crowns, and all applications for its recovery were fruitless. He afterwards had honourable invitations to settle in Denmark, and in the university of Franeker, but he rejected them, and at last fixed his residence at a country house near Heidelberg, from whence going to visit his son-in-law he was 10th September, 1527, suddenly taken ill, and expired ten days after. He was buried in St. Peter's church, Heidelberg. He was an able critic, a man of extensive erudition, and a very voluminous and respectable writer.

GRUTERUS, Peter, a practitioner of physic in Flanders, who published in 1709 at Leyden "a Century of Latin Letters," with obsolete phrases, and a "New Century," also in 1629 at Amsterdam, where he died, 1634.

GRYLUS, son of Xenophon, slew Epaminondas, and fell himself at the celebrated battle of Mantinea, B.C. 363.

GRYNÆUS, Simon, a learned German, son of a peasant of Swabia, born at Veringen, in the county of Hohenzollern, 1493. He studied with great assiduity, and became Greek professor at Vienna, but his attachment to the protestants exposed him to many dangers and frequent persecution. He was imprisoned by the monks at Baden, and after his liberation, had a conference with Luther and Melancthon at Wittemberg. He was afterwards for six years Greek professor at Heidelberg, from whence he went to Basil, and in 1531, visited England with strong recommendations from Erasmus to Sir Thomas More, Montjoy, and others. In 1534, he was employed in reforming the church and school of Tübingen, and two years after returned to Basil, and in 1540, assisted at the conferences of Worms. He died of the plague the next year at Basil. He was an excellent scholar, whose great erudition is usefully displayed in his editions of the Almagest of Ptolemy, of Euclid, Plato, Proclus, &c.

GRYNÆUS, John James, a native of Berne, of the family of the preceding. He was minister and divinity professor at Basil, and died there 1617, aged 77. He was blind for the last five years of his life. He wrote notes on several of the fathers, besides an ecclesiastical history, &c.

GRYNÆUS, Thomas, nephew of the preceding, was born at Syringen in Swabia, and educated under the care of his uncle. He was Latin and Greek professor at Berne and Basil, and was highly respected as a scholar and a man. He left four sons, all eminent in literature.

GRYPHARDER, John, professor of history and poetry at Jena, was author of some works, and died 1612.

GRYPHIUS, Sebastian, a celebrated printer at Lyons, born at Reuthlingen, in Swabia, 1493. He was equally known as a scholar, and Conrad Gesner, in testimony of his merit, dedicated one of his books to him, and Julius Scaliger also spoke respectfully of his abilities. The books printed by Gryphius are much admired, especially his Hebrew, Greek, and Latin editions, and particularly his "Latin Bible," in 2 vols. folio, in the largest types then seen, 1550. He died 1556, and left his trade and reputation to his son and able successor Anthony Gryphius.

GRYPHIUS, Andrew, the Corneille of Germany, was born at Glogaw 1616. He is highly extolled by the Germans as a tragic writer, and he also published in a fine vein of satire and irony, a critique on the ancient comedies of the Greeks. He died 1664.

GRYPHIUS, Christian, son of Andrew, was professor of eloquence at Breslaw, and principal librarian of the college of Magdalen. He was a man of extensive erudition, and was the author of German poems—a treatise on the German language—of a dissertation on the historical writers of the 17th century, &c. He died 1706, aged 57.

GUA DE MALVES, John Paul de, a French ecclesiastic, born at Languedoc. He first conceived the idea of an encyclopedia, which was so successfully executed by d'Alembert, Diderot, and others. He wrote Usage de l'Analyse de Des Cartes, &c. and died at Paris, 1786, aged 74.

GUADAGNOLO, Philip, a learned orientalist, born at Magliano. He chiefly devoted himself to the study of Greek, Hebrew, Chaldean, Syriac, Persian, and particularly Arabic, which he taught many years in the Sapienza college at Rome. He was so well versed in Arabic, that he spoke an oration in that language before queen Christina at Rome, 1656. He also at the request of pope Urban VIII undertook in 1622, and finished after 27 years' labour, a translation of the Bible into Arabic, for the use of the Eastern churches, published at Rome, 1671, 3 vols. fol. He wrote besides an Apology for the Christian Religion in Latin, 1631, and in Arabic, 1637, against a Mahometan, and with such effect that his antagonist embraced Christianity—"a Methodical Arabic Grammar"—an Arabic Dictionary, not completed, the manuscript of which is preserved in the convent of San Lorenzo, in Lucinia. This accomplished scholar died 1656, aged 60.

GUAGUIN, Alexander, an author, who was born at Verona, 1538, and died at Cracow, aged 76. He wrote some valuable topographical works, especially "Sarmatiæ Europæ Descriptio, Spires," 1581—et Rerum Polonicarum Scriptores, 3 vols. 8vo.

GUALBERT, St. John, a Florentine, who founded a monastery at Vallombrosa among the Apennines, where he died, 1073. The spot is immortalized by the pen of Milton in his Paradise Lost.

GUALDUS, Prioratus, or Galeazzo, an Italian historian, born at Vicenza, where he died 1678. He was historiographer to the emperor, and wrote the History of Ferdinand II. and III. and also of Leopold, 3 vols. folio—the Troubles of France from 1648 to 1654.

GUALTERUS, Rodolphus, author of Commentaries on the Bible, and of a translation of Julius Pollux, was born at Zurich, 1529, and died 1586.

GUARIN, Peter, a Benedictine of Rouen, who died at Paris, 1729, aged 51. He was an excellent Hebrew scholar, and published a Hebrew Grammar, 2 vols. 4to. and also a Hebrew Lexicon.

GUARINI, an eminent scholar, of a noble Veronese family, who went to Constantinople to learn Greek, and was the first who taught it in Italy. He was professor of learned languages at Ferrara, and translated some of the ancient authors, especially Strabo and Plutarch's Lives, and died 1460, at Ferrara. His son Baptist was professor at Ferrara, and translated into Italian some of Plautus's comedies, and wrote besides some poems and other works, &c.

GUARINI, John Baptist, a famous Italian poet, great-grandson of the preceding, born at Ferrara, 1537. He was educated at Pisa and Padua, and afterwards introduced to the court of Alphonso II. His abilities were employed in frequent embassies to Venice and to Turin, where his "Pastor Fido" was first exhibited to the applauses of an admiring populace, at the nuptials of the duke of Savoy with the sister of Philip III. of Spain. In 1571 he went as ambassador to Rome, and four years after negotiated in Poland, to obtain for his master the crown, which Henry of Valois had resigned. Disgust, with the intrigues and ingratitude of the court, drove him, in 1582, into retirement; but he was prevailed upon again to become secretary of state, and ambassador, and again he abandoned, with dissatisfaction, the offices of elevated life for privacy. As the duke of Ferrara had favoured his son in a lawsuit against him, he offered his services to the duke of Savoy; but the loss of his wife, in 1589, produced a revolution in his sentiments, and for a while determined him to become an ecclesiastic. After, however, being in the service of the duke of Mantua, he was reconciled to Alphonso of Ferrara; but fresh quarrels arose, and Guarini quitted his country for the protection of the grand duke of Tuscany. He died at Venice, October, 1612, aged 70, after exhibiting the peevishness and dissatisfaction of an ambitious, but inconsistent character. He was member of several learned societies; but so regardless of the poetical fame which his Pastor Fido had acquired, that he considered it below the rank of a gentleman to be a poet. He wrote several things besides, mentioned by Niceron.

GUARINI, Guarino, a well-known architect, born at Modena. He died 1683, aged 59. He embellished Turin, and other cities of Italy, and even Paris, with palaces; but though admired, his buildings are irregular.

GUASCO, Octavian, a native of Turin, who died at Verona, 1783. He was member of the French academies, and distinguished himself by his writings, especially "a treatise on Asylums"—on the Statues of the Ancients, &c.

GUAZZI, Stephen, an Italian, secretary to the dutchess of Mentz, and author of some poems, dialogues, &c. much esteemed. He died at Pavia, 1565.

GUAZZI, Mark, a native of Padua, eminent in arms and in literature. He wrote a History of Charles VIII.—a History of his own Time, and other things, much admired. He died 1556.

GUAY TROUIN, René du, a famous admiral. Vid. DU-GUAY.

GUDIN, De la Brenellerie, Paul Philip, a French writer, was born at Paris in 1738, and died there in 1812. He wrote some tragedies—Observations on Good Manners—a Discourse in verse on the Abolition of Slavery—Essay on the Progress of the Arts under Lewis XV.—a Treatise on writing History, against Mably—Essay on the Comitia of Rome, the States General of France, and the Commons of England, 3 vols. 8vo.—The Conquest of Naples, 3 vols.—Tales, 2 vols.—and Astronomy, a poem.—W. B.

GUDIUS, Marquard, an able critic of Holstein, educated at Rensburg and Jena. He early displayed a strong inclination for literature, and was recommended by Gronovius to D. Heinsius, as a person of great and promising talents; but his parents were anxious to advance him at court, and, therefore, earnestly desired to see him lay aside all studious pursuits. By the interest, however, of his friends Grævius and Gronovius, he obtained the office of tutor to a young man of family and fortune, named Samuel Schas, and with him he began to travel, in 1659, into France. His abilities and the recommendation of his friends in Holland introduced him to the learned of Paris and of Toulouse, and after visiting the libraries and most curious collections of France and Italy, the tutor and the pupil returned, in 1664, to Germany. He was afterwards in England, and in the company and friendship of his pupil, who possessed great erudition, and employed much of his great property in the collection of rare and valuable manuscripts, he spent the whole of his time, and declined accepting a professorship, which was offered him at the Hague. So great and sincere was the friendship between Gudius and Schas, that the pupil left his property to his preceptor in 1675; but such was the ungrateful conduct of Gudius, that on the acquisition of his riches he forgot and disregarded the friends in Holland, to whose interference he owed his elevation and his opulence. He was afterwards counsellor to the duke of Holstein, and to the king of Denmark, and died immaturely, as Burman observes, in 1689. Though very learned, he never published any thing of great importance; the notes and MSS. however, which he communicated to his friends were valuable, and his assistance and abilities have been honourably recorded by Grævius, Burman, and others.

GUDIUS, Gottlob Frederic, a Lutheran minister, author of some valuable works, especially on the Difficulty of learning Hebrew—Remarks on the Emperor Julian—a Life of Hoffman.

GUEDRIER DE ST. AUBIN, Henry Michael, a doctor of the Sorbonne, born at Gournai-en-bray, near Rouen. He died abbot of St. Vulmer monastery, in Bayonne, 1742, aged 47. He distinguished himself as a casuist, and wrote the Sacred History of the two Covenants, 7 vols. 12mo. &c.

GUERARD, Robert, a Benedictine monk, born at Rouen, where he died 1715, aged

74. He wrote an Abridgment of the Bible in questions and answers, 2 vols. 12mo. and assisted Delfau in the editing of St. Austin's work, and was sent to exile, when his associate was disgraced for his book called l'Abbé Commendataire.

GUERARD, Benjamin, governor of South Carolina, was a descendant from one of the families of protestant refugees who fled from France to Carolina after the revocation of the edict of Nantes. He was elected speaker of the house of representatives in 1783, and afterwards governor. He died at Charleston, Jan. 1789.  L.

GUERCHEVILLE, Antoinette de Pons, marchioness of, a French lady, remarkable for her dignified answer to Henry IV. who meditated an attack on her virtue. If, said she, I am not noble enough to be your wife, I am too noble to be your mistress. When married to Mary de Medicis, he made her lady of honour to his queen, saying, Since you are a lady of honour, be one to my wife.

GUERCHI, Claude Lewis de Regnier, count de, a French general, who distinguished himself in the wars of Italy and Flanders, and afterwards came to England as ambassador from his court. He died 1768.

GUERCINO, Francisco Barbieri da Cento, so called from a cast in one of his eyes, was a painter of eminence, born near Bologna, 1590. He began to practise his profession at the early age of eight, and by attending the lessons of Michael Angelo, and the Caraccis, he acquired great reputation for correctness, invention, and a becoming boldness in his figures. For two years he practised at Rome, by the desire of Gregory XV. but afterwards the liberal offers of the kings of England and France could not draw him away from his favourite retreat at Bologna. Christina, queen of Sweden, paid her respects to him, and shook him by the hand, by that hand, said he, which had painted 106 altar pieces, 144 pictures for people of distinction, and besides composing 10 books of designs. He died 1666, a bachelor, leaving much of his property to build chapels, and for other charitable purposes. His private character for piety and morality was as eminent as his abilities as a painter.

GUERET, Gabriel, eminent as an advocate at the bar, and as an author, was born at Paris 1641, and died there 1688. He wrote "Parnassus reformed"—the War of Authors, and other facetious and satirical works.

GUERICK, Otho, a German philosopher, and physician, celebrated as the inventor of the Air-pump, and of the Weather-glass. He was counsellor to the elector of Brandenburg, burgomaster of Magdeburg, and author of some treatises on experimental philosophy. He was twice married, and by his first wife had Otho, who was counsellor to the king of Prussia, and a man of learning. This able man died at Hamburgh, 1686, aged 84.

GUERIN, Francis, professor of the college of Beauvais, translated Tacitus and Livy into French. His Livy was esteemed, printed at Barbou's press, 10 vols. 12mo GUERINIERE, Francis Robichon, author of "l'Ecole de Cavalerie," and "Elemens de Cavalerie," was equerry to the French king, and died 1751.

GUERRE, Martin, a Frenchman whose history excited some interest in his country. After living about ten years with Bertrande de Rols, his wife, he went from her and engaged in the Spanish service. Eight years after one of his friends, Arnaud du Thil, presented himself to the deserted Bertrande, and by imposing on her credulity, was received by her as her husband. The impostor was suspected by the uncle of Guerre, but du Thil, though prosecuted, and condemned to be hanged, asserted his innocence, and declaring himself the real Martin, appealed to the parliament of Toulouse. The cause seemed intricate, but before the decisive sentence was pronounced, Martin returned, and the impostor was for his treacherous and immoral conduct, hanged and burned, 1650.

GUESCLIN, Bertrand du, a celebrated warrior, constable of France, he was a native of Britany, but his education had been so neglected, that he could neither read nor write, and in his person he was as mean, as his mind was noble. He was principally distinguished in his wars against the English. His life has been written by several of his countrymen. He died in the midst of his triumphs, before Chateau Neuf de Rendon, 1350, aged 69.

GUETTARD, John Stephen, a French physician and botanist, whose extreme application in literary pursuits, brought on a premature death 1786. He wrote Observations on Plants, 2 vols. 12mo. and Memoirs of different parts of the Sciences and Arts, 3 vols. 4to.

GUEVARA, Antony de, a Spanish writer, born in the province of Alaba. He was brought up at court, and became known as a preacher, and historiographer to Charles V. He was made bishop of Guadix in Granada, and of Mandonedo in Galicia, and died 1544. The best known of his works is "Dial of Princes, or, the life of M. A. Antonius," which has been translated into all the languages of Europe. He is deservedly censured as a historian, not only for the ill taste, but the improbabilities, and distorted accounts, which he introduces as historical facts, more becoming the meretriciousness of romance than sober truth. He wrote besides Golden Epistles, &c. His nephew, Anthony, was also an ecclesiastic, and author of Commentaries on the Scriptures.

GUEVARA, Lewis Velez de, a Spanish comic poet, admired at the court of Philip IV. for his pleasantries. His humorous piece, "el Diabolo Cojuelo," is the foundation of le Sage's Diable Boiteux. He was a native of Icija, in Andalusia, and died 1646.

GUEULETTE, Thomas Simon, a French advocate, author of some novels and comedies, was born at Paris, and died 1766, aged 83. His works display genius, elegance, and ease. Besides "the Sultans of Guzerat," &c. he wrote Italian pieces, &c.

GUGLIELMINI, Dominic, a mathematician, born at Bologna. He was of the academy of Paris, and was patronised by Lewis XIV. Of the valuable works which he wrote the treatise on the Nature of Rivers is the most esteemed. His works are printed at Geneva, 2 vols. 4to. 1719. He died 1710, aged 55.

GUIBERT, author of Gesta Dei per Francos, or a History of the first Crusade, died abbot of Rogent-sous-Couci, 1124, aged 71.

GUIBERT, James Anthony Hippolite, a native of Montauban, who early served in the German wars, and became a colonel in Corsica. He published, in 1770, Essai general du Tactique, and afterwards quitted the military profession to devote himself to dramatic writings. He became member of the French academy, in the room of Thomas, and died 1790, aged 47. Besides tragedies, he wrote also the eulogy of the king of Prussia—of Catinat, and of l'Hopital.

GUICCIARDINI, Francisco, a celebrated historian, born at Florence, 1482, of a noble family. After receiving a most liberal education, he practised the law, and held some offices of dignity and importance, and then devoted himself to the public affairs of his native city. From Florence he went to Rome, and was highly honoured by Leo X. and his two successors, who employed him in a high civil and military capacity, and trusted much to his integrity and talents. He died universally respected 1540. His history of Italy, in Italian, 4 vols. 4to. is a performance about which his countrymen deservedly pride themselves.

GUICCIARDINI, Lewis, nephew of the historian, was himself a writer of great fidelity. He was born at Florence, and died at Antwerp, 1589, aged 66. Of his valuable works the most esteemed is his description of the Pays Bas, in Italian, translated into French by Belleforet.

GUICHARD, Claude de, historiographer to the duke of Savoy, was author of a curious work called "the Funerals of the Ancients," in 4to. He died 1607.

GUICHERON, Samuel, a French advocate of Bourge, in Bresse, known as a historian. Among other things his "Genealogical History of the House of Savoy," is much admired by Bayle and others. He died 1664, aged 57.

GUIDI, Alexander, an Italian poet, born at Pavia in Milan, 1650. He was patronised by the duke of Parma, and afterwards under the protection of Christina of Sweden, who resided at Rome, he not only became acquainted with the literary characters of that city, but read to great advantage the works of his favourite masters, Dante, Petrarch, and Chiabrara. After thus enjoying the friendship of the learned, and the good opinion of the popes, of Eugene of Savoy, and others, he was seized with an apoplexy which proved fatal at Frescati, in June, 1712. His body was carried back to Rome, and buried in the church of St. Onuphrius, near that of Tasso. His works, which consist of pastorals, operas, and other poems written in an easy, agreeable, but correct style, were published at Verona, 1726, 12mo. with an account of his life. Though respectable as a poet, he was in his person very deformed, his head was disagreeably large, and he was blind of one eye.

GUIDO, Reni, a celebrated Italian painter, born at Bologna 1575. His father, who was a musician, designed him for his profession, but nature had given him a strong genius for painting, and by improving himself under the direction of Dennis Calvert, a Flemish painter, and afterwards of the Caraccis, he acquired such excellence as rendered him superior to the artists of his age. His merits happily were not buried in oblivion, he was honoured with the notice and esteem of pope Paul V. of the cardinals and princes of Italy, of Lewis XIII. of Philip IV. of Spain, and of Udislaus king of Sweden and Poland. He lived in great splendour at Bologna, and afterwards at Rome, but a most invincible attachment to gaming ruined his fortune, and rendered him indigent and discontented. From the most elevated affluence he sunk to poverty, and the reflection of his deplorable and ruined situation had such an effect upon him that it brought on a distemper of which he died 1642. In his youth his features were so pleasing that his master Ludovico Caracci painted his angels from him. In every part of his character Guido was respectable, gaming was his only vice. His pictures are much valued, and they adorn the collections of the great. His best piece is what he painted with Domenichino in the church of St. Gregory. Some of his designs were etched by himself.

GUIDO, Cagnacci, a historical painter of Bologna, disciple to Reni Guido. He possessed great merit. He died 1680.

GUIDOTTI, Paul, a painter, engraver, and architect, of Lucca. He had also some knowledge of anatomy, and pretended he could fly with wings. In the attempt he fell and broke his limbs. He died 1629, aged 60.

GUIGNARD, John, a Jesuit, born at Chartres, and professor of divinity at Clermont college. He was executed at Paris, 7th Jan. 1595, for high treason. During the affair of John Chastel, which so nearly concerned the life of Henry IV. some papers were seized at Clermont, in the handwriting of Guignard, and as in these he maintained that the murder of Henry III. and of Henry IV. was lawful, and refused to retract his assertions, he was put to death.

GUIGNES, Joseph de, a native of Pontoise, who studied the oriental languages under Stephen Fourmont, and became interpreter to the French king, 1741, and member of the belles lettres academy 1753. The revolution, though it hurried him not to the guillotine, yet proved the source of his misery, and reduced him to poverty. He died at Paris 1800, aged 79. He was well acquainted with the Chinese characters, and for thirty-five years was the principal conductor of the Journal des Savans. He wrote General History of the Huns, Turks, Moguls, and Tartars, 5 vols. 4to.—the Life of Fourmont—the Military Art of the Chinese—Memoir to prove the Chinese an Egyptian Colony—Essay on the Oriental and Greek Topography—Principles of Topographical Composition—Memoirs in the Academy of Inscriptions, &c.

GUILD, William, D.D. a Scotch divine born near Dundee, and educated at the Marischal college, Aberdeen, where he was successively professor of philosophy, divinity, and church history. Though he opposed the covenant in 1638, he afterwards complied, and at the restoration went as one of the commissioners to Breda to congratulate Charles II. He wrote in 1657, an answer to a Roman catholic book on Innovations, and died 1662, much esteemed, aged 60.

GUILLAIN, Simon, a sculptor, rector of the painting and sculpture academy at Paris. He died 1658, aged 77.

GUILLANDIUS, Melchior, an eminent physician and botanist of Koningsberg in Prussia. He was taken by the Algerines when going on botanical pursuits to Africa. His commentary on the Papyrus is full of erudition. He wrote several works, and died at Padua 1589, where he was botanical professor.

GUILLELMA, a woman of Bohemia, who in the 13th century, founded in Italy a sect which united enthusiasm with lewdness.

After being respected during life as a saint, she was, when dead, dug up from her grave and burnt with ignominy.

GUILLEMEAU, James, a French surgeon, author of some valuable books on his profession. He died at Paris, 1612.

GUILLET DE ST. GEORGE, George, first historiographer to the academy of painting and sculpture in Paris, was born at Thiers in Auvergne, and died at Paris, 1705, aged 80. He wrote among other things, the History of Mahomet II.—Ancient and Modern Sparta—Ancient and Modern Athens, &c.

GUILLIAUD, Claude, doctor of the Sorbonne, was author of Commentaries on the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. John, and of Collationes in omnes S. Pauli Epistolae, &c.

GULLIM, John, author of the celebrated work "display of Heraldry" in folio, was born in Herefordshire, 1565, and educated at Brazen-nose college, Oxford. He was of the society of the college of arms, and in 1617, was made rouge-croix pursuivant of arms. He died 1621. The sixth edition of his valuable work appeared 1724, with many additions. Some have attributed the work to Dr. Barkham.

GUILLOTIN, a physician, born at Saintes, 29th March, 1738. He studied at Paris, and at the revolution he was sent as a deputy to the national assembly from Paris. In making a report on the penal code, he recommended an instrument of death which might be more expeditious, and create to the unhappy sufferers less pain than either the halter or the wheel, and this new machine so fatally used during the civil dissensions of the state, has immortalized the name of its author. Though it is reported that he perished under his guillotine, it is, however, certain that he died a natural death, and it is said of grief for the infamous abuse of what he intended for the more humane punishment of the guilty.

GUISCARD, Robert, a famous Norman knight, son of Tancred Hauteville, of Countances, assisted in the conquest of Naples and Sicily, from the Saracens. He obtained the dukedom of Apulia and Calabria, and took prisoner pope Gregory VII. who died a captive under his care. His daughter married Constantine, son of the emperor Michael Ducas, for which elevation he is censured by the invidious Anna Comnena. He died 1095, in the island of Corfu.

GUISCARD, Charles, a Prussian officer of distinction, author of "Military Memoirs of the Greeks and Romans," a valuable work. He wrote besides Memoires Critiques et Historiques sur Plusieurs Points d'Antiquités Militaires, 4 vols. 8vo. &c. As a soldier, he served with reputation under the Dutch, and under Frederic II. of Prussia, who called him Quintus Icilius, and gave him a regiment. He died 1775, aged 33.

GUISE, Claude de Lorraine, duke of, fifth son of duke Rene II. of Lorraine, settled in France and became the founder of the family of Guise there. At the battle of Marignan he displayed such valour, that he received more than twenty wounds. He married Antoinette de Bourbon, of the blood royal, in 1513, and died 1550.

GUISE, Francis, duke of, son of the preceding, was a man of great talents, and extensive influence in France. In him began the factions of Condé and Guise. He was at the head of the Catholic party, and was a most furious bigot. He died by a pistol shot from the hand of Poltrot de Meré, a protestant gentleman, 1563, aged 44.

GUISE, Henry, duke of, eldest son of Francis, was born in 1550. Brave and gallant as a soldier, he was turbulent, imperious, factious, and violent as a subject, and at the head of that party which were called the league, and formed by the intrigues of his brother the cardinal, under pretence of supporting the catholic religion and the state, he long overawed the king, Henry III. and prevented his appearance at Paris. After massacring the Huguenots, and filling the streets of Paris with blood, on the famous day called the day of Barricades, Guise considered his success secure, but Henry escaped his guards and fled to Blois, where he called an assembly of the states. Guise appeared there, but a forced reconciliation with the king was followed by the assassination of the demagogues, 23d Dec. 1588, and on the morrow the cardinal shared the fate of his brother.

GUISE, Charles, duke of, eldest son of Henry, was arrested on his father's murder and confined in the castle of Tours, from which he escaped 1592. His partisans received him with open arms, but he afterwards had the good sense to be reconciled to the king, and might have lived in security, had not Richelieu's jealousy of him driven him from the kingdom. He fled to Italy, and died at Cuna 1640, aged 69.

GUISE, Lewis de Lorraine, cardinal of, son of Henry, was illustrious as well in arms as in the arts of peace. He was with Lewis XIII. in Poitou, where he greatly signalized himself. He died at Saintes 1621.

GUISE, Henry of Lorraine, duke of, grandson of Henry, was remarkable for his intrigues with the duke of Bouillon, and the court of Soissons, which obliged him to fly from France to Rome. During his exile, the revolt of the Neapolitans from the Spanish power, called him into the field, but while flushed with victory he regarded the crown of Naples already within his reach, he was taken prisoner at Abruzzo and carried to Spain. After four years imprisonment he was liberated. He died 1664, aged 50, author of Memoirs of his Neapolitan Enterprise, which appeared in one vol. 4to. after his death.

GUISE, William, an English divine, born at Ablond's court, near Gloucester, 1653. He entered at Oriel college, Oxford, of which he became fellow, and he applied himself with indefatigable zeal to the study of oriental literature, and published a translation with a valuable commentary of "Misnæ Pars Ordinis Primi Zeraim Tituli Septem." His learning was highly esteemed both at home and abroad. He died of the smallpox 1638, and was buried at St. Michael's, Oxford, where he had long resided, and where his wife erected a monument to his memory. His son was general Guise, of military memory.

GUITTON, d'Arezzo, an early Italian poet, some of whose productions are to be found in the Florence collection of ancient Italian poets, 1527, in Svo. He flourished in the middle of the 13th century.

GUITTON, John, a native of Rochelle, mayor of the town when it was besieged by Richelieu. He always had a dagger on the table, to stab the first man who talked of surrendering, and when told that many perished by famine, he said, it matters little if one only is left to shut the gates.

GULDENSTAEDT, John Antony, a famous traveller, born at Riga. He visited, during an absence of three years, Astracan, Caucasus, Georgia, Tartary, and the neighbouring places, with the eyes of a politician and philosopher. His performances are enumerated by Coxe. He was honourably invited to Petersburg, where he became professor of languages, and where he died of a fever, 1781.

GUNDLING, Nicolas Jerome, a native of Nuremberg, professor of eloquence, civil law, and philosophy, at Halle, on which subjects he wrote some valuable works. His reputation for sagacity and knowledge was such that he was often consulted at Berlin by the court. His "Course of Philosophy," "of Literary History," and his History of Moral Philosophy, are much esteemed. He died rector of Halle, 1729.

GUNNERUS, John Ernest, a native of Christiana, made bishop of Drontheim 1758. He died at Christiansund 1773, aged 55. He was well skilled in botany, and published Flora Norwegiæ, &c. He founded, for the encouragement of Natural history, the royal Norwegian society at Drontheim. Linnæus, in compliment to his merit, gave the name of Gunnera to a plant.

GUNNING, Peter, an English prelate, born at Hoo in Kent, 1613, and educated at Canterbury school, and Clare-hall, Cambridge. He became fellow and tutor of his college, and distinguished himself as a preacher, but he exposed himself to the persecution of the parliament, on account of his zeal for the king's service; and when ejected, he returned to Oxford. Here he was made chaplain of New college, and afterwards became tutor to lord Hatton, and sir Francis Compton, and chaplain to sir Robert Shirley, at whose death he obtained the chapel of Exeter-house, Strand. At the restoration, his services and sufferings were rewarded; he was created D.D. by the king's mandate, and then advanced to a prebend of Canterbury, and successively to the headships of Corpus Christi and St. John's college, Cambridge. He was one of the committee for the review of the liturgy, and he had a conference with the dissenters at the Savoy, in 1661. In 1669 he was made bishop of Chichester, and, in 1674, he was translated to Ely, where he died, 6th July, 1684, a bachelor. He was buried in his cathedral. Opinions have varied with respect to his character, but it must be confessed that, though some question whether his head was as good as his heart, he was distinguished by erudition, piety, and exemplary manners. His charities to public use were great and numerous.

GUNTER, Edmund, a mathematician, of Welch extraction, born at Gunter's town, Brecknockshire, 1581. He was educated at Westminster, under Busby, and entered at Christ-church, Oxford, where he took his degrees, and was ordained. His genius led him to mathematical pursuits, and by the new projection of a sector, he acquired celebrity, and was, in 1619, honourably appointed astronomy professor at Gresham college. In this appointment he directed all the powers of his mind in the improvement of science. He invented a portable quadrant, observed a new variation in the magnetic needle, and contrived that valuable rule of proportion, the line of numbers, called from him, Gunter's scale. His merits gained him not only the friendship of the learned, of Oughtred, Henry Briggs, and others, but the patronage of the earl of Bridgewater, and the notice of his sovereign, Charles I. This excellent philosopher was carried off in the prime of life, 10th Dec. 1626. He was buried in St. Peter's the poor, Broad-street, where no monument records the name of a mathematician, whose services to science and to mankind are so great. The fifth edition of his works was published by Leybourn, 1674, in 4to.

GUNTHER, a German poet in the beginning of the 18th century, whose superior genius proved his destruction. As he was going to be presented to Augustus II. king of Poland, a rival poet mixed some poisonous drugs in his drink, in consequence of which the unhappy man, as he was addressing the monarch, fell down, and he expired soon after, in his 28th year. He wrote some elegant poetry, an Ode on Eugene's victory over the Turks, &c.

GURLER, Nicolas, a native of Basil, who died 1707, aged 53. He wrote a Greek, German, and French Lexicon—Historia Templariorum—Origines Mundi Institutiones Theologicae.

GUSMAN, Lewis, a Spanish Jesuit, author of the history of his fraternity in the Indies, and the success of their missions in Japan, 14 books. He died at Madrid 1605, provincial of Seville and Toledo.

GUSSANVILLAN, Peter, a native of Chartres. He edited the works of Gregory the Great, the best, before the Benedictine edition.

GUSTAVUS, king of Sweden, was son of Eric, duke of Gripsholm, is known by the name of Gustavus Vasa. He was born 1490. After the reduction of Sweden by Christian II. king of Denmark, Gustavus was kept a prisoner in the capital of the conqueror; but after many years of captivity he escaped, and appeared among the Dalccarlians, whom he engaged to revolt. A great boldness of character, and an ardent love of military glory, together with capacious resources of mind, had calculated him for a leader in times of danger and difficulty. The conduct of the Danes, who had murdered his father and other Swedish nobles, roused him to revenge. He retook Upsal; and though occasionally defeated, he acquired fresh vigour from disasters; and, animated to desperation by the cruelties of Christian, who put his mother and his sister to death, by shocking tortures, he overran Gothland, and besieged Stockholm. The states of the kingdom were convened, and Gustavus was offered that kingdom which his valour had recovered, and by his influence the crown was declared hereditary in his male issue. Invasion from abroad ceased, by the expulsion of the Danish monarch from the throne, and the succession of Frederick, duke of Holstein, and Gustavus, secure in the love of his subjects, cultivated all the arts of peace and commerce, and made the Lutheran tenets the established religion of his country. This great and heroic monarch died at Stockholm 1560, in his 70th year, and was succeeded by his son Eric.

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS, deservedly sur-named the Great, was born at Stockholm 1594. In 1611 he ascended the throne of Sweden, and though so young he evinced the sagacity of a great character in the choice of able ministers. He was fond of military glory, and soon acquired renown in his battles against the Danes, Muscovites, and Poles. By his heroic valour and judicious conduct, he made an honourable peace with the two first, and obliged the last to evacuate Livonia, and then, forming an alliance with the protestants of Germany, he overran in two years and a half all the countries between the Vistula, the Rhine, and the Danube. The imperial general, Tilly, was twice defeated, and the pride of Austria was humbled, but the battle in the plains of Lutzen proved fatal to the life of the brave monarch, 1632. He fell, it is said, by the treacherous intrigues of Richelieu, or by the hand of Lauemburgh, one of his generals, who had been dishonourably bribed by the emperor Ferdinand to take away his life. This warlike monarch possessed those virtues which in a reign of peace might have equally distinguished him. He patronised literature, he enriched the university of Upsal by his munificent donations, he founded the royal academy of Abo, and the university of Dorp, in Livonia. Before his time the Swedes were indifferent soldiers, but such was the enthusiasm which he inspired among his subjects, that he had always an army of 80,000 men well disciplined. He has been, with some justice, compared to the great Scipio; and the parallel, in some particulars, is striking. He was succeeded by his only child, the celebrated Christina, who succeeded, though only five years old.

GUSTAVUS III. king of Sweden, son of Frederic Adolphus, by Louisa Ulrica, the sister of Frederic II. king of Prussia, was born 24th January, 1746, and succeeded to his father, 1771. Disgusted with the influence of Russia at Stockholm, and with the usurpation of his senators, who wished to abridge his liberty, and not only to appoint him a confessor, but to settle even how much wine he might be permitted to have on his table, he secretly formed the plan of a revolution, which was effected without bloodshed in 1772. The senate, surrounded by the guards, surrendered its authority, and the friends of Gustavus were afterwards distinguished by wearing a white handkerchief on the left arm, which was the signal of mutual attachment during the revolution. The wisest regulations followed this change of government, a new translation of the Bible was made, torture was abolished, commerce, the arts, and the sciences were liberally encouraged, agriculture and industry patronised, and the laws were administered with greater despatch and more impartiality. To put an end to the disputes which prevailed with Russia, he in 1777, paid a visit to Catherine at Petersburg, and was received with magnificent hospitality, and in 1783 he spent ten months in travelling over Italy and France, not only to improve his health, but to observe the manners, the political regulations, and the industrious exertions of foreign countries. The peace with Russia was disturbed in 1788, by the emissaries of Catherine, who wished to excite disturbances in Finland, and Gustavus declared war, and equipped a formidable fleet at Carlserona. Though he had to contend with Denmark and Russia, he, encouraged by assurances of support from Turkey and Prussia, boldly attacked Frederickshavn, where he destroyed several vessels, but he was repulsed in his attempt against Revel, and obliged to retreat. The attempt on Wyburgh was equally unsuccessful, but a splendid victory was obtained July 9th, 1790, by the monarch over the Russian fleet, who took and destroyed forty-five ships, and peace soon after was restored between the two countries. The abilities which Gustavus had displayed made him ambitious of acquiring greater glory in war, and therefore on the breaking out of the French revolution, he zealously engaged in the coalition which Spain formed with the Northern powers for the invasion of France. But during the preparations for this distant war, the life of the monarch was cruelly sacrificed by the hand of an assassin. The Swedish nobles, dissatisfied with the events of the revolution of 1772, and with the changes which had been introduced into the government at the diet of Gefle, in 1792, conspired against his life, and three of them drew lots who should give the fatal blow. Ankarstroom, a disbanded officer who had received favours from the monarch was the assassin, and during a mask ball in which the unfortunate king had been warned of his danger, the fatal blow was given by the discharge of a pistol. This was in the night of the 15th April, 1792, and the king languished till the 29th of the same month, and expired in great agony, maintaining to the last the firmness and serenity of a heroic mind. He took an affectionate farewell of his son and of his friends, and appointed his brother the duke of Sundermania the regent of the minority. Gustavus possessed an enlightened mind, and as his education had been under the care of count Tessin, he imbibed a strong partiality for literature and for noble achievements. He wrote some dramatic pieces, academical discourses, and an eulogy on Torstenson, which was secretly conveyed to the academy of Stockholm, and obtained the prize.

GUTHIERES, James, a French advocate, known as an able antiquarian and correct writer. He died 1638.

GUTHRIE, William, was born at Breichen, Angusshire, 1701, and educated at King's college, Aberdeen. A love affair drove him to London, where he wrote for the booksellers, and died 1769. He was a justice of Middlesex, but did not act. His works were History of England, three vols. folio, a Geographical Grammar in 8vo. and 4to. He lent his name to "History of Scotland," 10 vols.—to "Universal History," 12 vols.—and a "Peerage," 4to.

GUTTEMBERG, John, a German, born at Mentz, 1408, of a noble family. He disputes with Faust, Schœffer, and others, the honour of inventing printing. Boyer says, Laurentius of Haerlem is the real inventor, and that his types were stolen by a brother of Guttemberg. Guttemberg, however, claims the merit of regularly printing a book, and of inventing cut metal types, with which the earliest editions of the Bible were printed. He died at Mentz, 1468.

GUY, Thomas, son of a lighterman and coal dealer of the same name, in Horsley-down, Southwark, was apprenticed in 1660 to a bookseller, and began trade with about 200*l.* stock, in the house which forms the angle between Cornhill and Lombard-street. He engaged with others in a scheme to print Bibles in Holland to import into England; but when that was prohibited, he contracted with the university of Oxford for their privilege, and by this lucrative connexion he began to amass a large fortune. His property, however, was immensely increased by purchasing seamen's tickets and south-sea stock in the year 1720. It was his intention to marry his maid-servant, and to adorn the avenues of his house, on this occasion, he had the pavement before his door mended. A broken piece was observed in his absence by the maid-servant, and she desired the workmen to repair it, and when they said they were not to go so far, she, presuming on the partiality of the old man, required them to mend it, and to tell her master not to be angry, as she had directed it. The pavement was mended, but Guy was offended at the presumption of his intended bride; he determined never to marry her, but to apply his riches to charitable purposes. After being a great benefactor to St. Thomas's hospital, he, at the age of seventy-six, formed the noble design of erecting that stately pile which bears the name of Guy's hospital. The erection cost him 18,793*l.* and 219,499*l.* were left by him for its endowment, and he had the satisfaction to see the building roofed in before his death, which happened 17th December, 1724, in his 81st year. He also founded an alms-house at Tamworth, which he represented in parliament, and which was his mother's native place, and he also gave 400*l.* a year to Christ's hospital, and left 80,000*l.* to his relations. This most extraordinary and very benevolent man, who left more to charitable uses than any private man on record, was in his habits very parsimonious. He dined on his shop counter with an old newspaper for his table cloth, without dainties, and his dress and appearance were so mean that in some instances the alms of the humane were pressed upon him as upon an indigent and half-starved beggar.

GUY, a monk of Arezzo, known as a musician, and as the first who produced a delightful harmony from several different voices singing together. He also invented the six syllables of the gamut, ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la. His inventions were received with applause by the world. He lived about the year 1026.

GUYARD, de Berville, a French author of some merit. He was born at Bans, 1697, and after suffering, like Otway and Chatterton, all the evils of pinching poverty and accumulated distress, he died in the prison of Bicetre, at the age of 73. He wrote the lives of Bertrand, of du Guesclin, of the chevalier Bayard, &c.

GUYARD, Anthony, a benedictine monk, author of Political Observations on the Administration of Benefices, &c. He died at Dijon, 1770.

GUYET, Francis, an eminent critic, born at Angers, 1575. He lost his parents in his infancy, but though his property was squandered by the negligence of his guardian, he devoted himself assiduously to letters, and went to Paris, where he had the happiness to be introduced to the society of the two du Puys, Thuanus, and other learned men. In 1608 he visited Rome, and acquired a perfect knowledge of Italian. After his return through Germany to Paris, he became tutor in the house of the duke d'Epemon to the abbot de Gransalve, afterwards cardinal de la Valette. In this office he conducted himself with such judgment and prudence, that he gained the confidence of his patrons, and might have risen to eminence in the church, had he not preferred the retirement of Burgundy college to the splendour of a palace. He employed himself here in a work to prove that the Latin is derived from the Greek, and that all the primitive words of the Greek are but of one syllable. Though learned, he published nothing, but his criticisms afterwards appeared very valuable in the hands of his friends, especially those on Hesiod, published by Gravius, and those on Terence by Bocclerus. As a critic, however, he was severe, and he scrupled not to erase many verses in Virgil, and to reject the first ode in Horace, and the secret history of Procopius. Thus respected for his erudition, and for the virtues of private life, this good man died of a catarrh after three days' illness, in the arms of his friends, J. du Puy, and Menage, 12th April, 1655, aged 80. His life, in Latin, was published by Portner.

GUYON, Johanna Mary Bouviers de la Mothe, a French lady of a noble family, born at Montargis, 1648, famous for her writings. She wished to take the veil, but her friends made her marry, and she became, at the age of twenty-eight, a widow. Abandoning the care of her family, she devoted herself to the mysteries of quietism, which Michael de Molinos, a Spanish Jesuit at Rome, had imposed upon the credulity of the world. Wavering in her opinions, and inconstant in her temper, she, however, endured persecution for her tenets, and when she declared herself the pregnant woman mentioned in the apocalypse, and threatened the peace of the kingdom by the number of her followers, she was imprisoned in the Bastille by order of the king. Fernelon undertook her defence, but his enemy, Bossuet, had the art to procure the condemnation of his works on the subject. Her verses, after her death, which happened at Blois, 1717, were published in five volumes, and also some of her Mystical Reveries.

GUYON, Claude, a French historian, born at Franche Comté. He died at Paris, 1771. Besides his "Ecclesiastical History," a very valuable book, he wrote History of the Indies,—of the Amazons,—and a continuation of Echard's Roman History.

GUYSS, Peter Augustine, a native of Marseilles, eminent as a merchant, and as a man of letters. He travelled over various parts of the east, with the eye of a philosopher and an antiquarian, and published the result of his researches, in which he compared the different characters of the ancient and of the modern inhabitants of those classical countries. He died at Zante in the Ionian sea, in 1799, aged 79. His works are essays on the Antiquities of Marseilles, 8vo.—Voyage Litteraire de la Grece, four vols. 8vo. 1783,—a Voyage in Italy and in the North, 8vo. &c.

GUYSE, John, a native of Hereford, who became a dissenting minister there, and in 1727 removed to New Broad-street independent congregation, London. He was made D.D. by the university of Aberdeen 1732, and though blind for some years before his death, he nevertheless continued his pastoral functions. He died 1761 aged 81. He wrote a paraphrase of the New Testament, three vols. 4to.—the Standard Use of Scripture in the Purposes of Divine Revelation, 8vo.—Jesus Christ God-Man, &c. in several sermons,—the Holy Spirit in sermons,—Youth's Monitor in ten sermons to young persons, 12mo.

GUYTON DE MORVEAU, Lewis Bernard, was born in 1737 at Dijon, where his father was professor of civil law. He was bred to the bar, and became advocate-general to the parliament of his native city ; where, however, he applied chiefly to natural philosophy and chymistry, in which science he made many discoveries. In 1777 he was appointed to examine the coal-mines of Burgundy, on which he made a mineralogical tour of that province ; in the course of these inquiries he discovered a rich lead-mine. Soon after this he was engaged in writing the articles on chymistry in the Encyclopedie Methodique, and in 1782 he published his new Chymical Nomenclature, which met with much opposition. Afterwards Guyton renounced the phlogistic theory, and embraced the system of Lavoisier. In 1783 he established a soda manufactory, and the same year published his pleadings at the bar. The discovery of aerostation engaged much of his attention ; and he was one of the first who ascended in a balloon. He took an active part in the Revolution, and was a member of the council of five hundred. He was also one of the first members of the National Institute, a director of the polytechnic school, administrator of the mint, a member of the legion of honour, and, lastly, a baron of the empire. He died Dec. 21, 1815. His principal works are—1. A Course of Chymistry, 4 vols. 8vo. 2. The Articles of Chymistry in the New Encyclopedie. 3. Papers in the Annales de Chymie, &c.—W. B.

GWINNET, Button, was born in England about the year 1732, and after receiving a good education, embarked in mercantile pursuits at Bristol. In 1770 he emigrated to Charleston, South Carolina, and after a residence there of two years, removed to Georgia and became a planter. He took an active part in favour of the colonies at the commencement of the Revolution, and was elected a representative of Georgia in the general congress of 1775, 1776, and 1777, and signed the declaration of independence. He was also chosen to a seat in the convention, which in 1777 formed a constitution for that state, and was one of its most conspicuous members. He was not long after appointed president of the council. But his rapid exaltation to popularity and office, by exciting his ambition and provoking the jealousy and rivalry of general M'Intosh, who was also a leader of a popular party in that state, involved him in a quarrel with that gentleman, and at length in a duel, in which Mr. Gwinnet was mortally wounded, and died May 27, 1777, in his 45th year. He possessed a vigorous mind, and was polished in his manners, but was irritable and ambitious.

GWYNN, Eleanor, better known by the name of Nell, was famous in the history of courtizans, as she rose, from an orange girl of the meanest description in the play-house, to be the mistress of Charles II.

In the first career of life she gained her bread by singing from tavern to tavern for the amusement of the guests, and gradually advanced to the rank of a popular actress, at the theatre royal. She is represented as handsome, but low of stature. She was mistress successively to Hart, Lacy, and Buckhurst, before she was admitted to the arms of the licentious Charles. It is said that in her elevation she showed her gratitude to Dryden, who had patronised her poverty, and she was, unlike the other concubines, faithful to her royal lover. From her are sprung the dukes of St. Alban's. She died 1687.

GWYNNE, Matthew, an English physician, born in London, of an ancient Welch family. He was educated at Oxford, where in 1593, he took his degree of M.D. He went in 1595, as physician to Sir Henry Unton, queen Elizabeth's ambassador to France. He obtained great reputation by his practice, as well as by his writings, which modern discoveries have rendered now of little value. He died after 1639, though what year is uncertain.

GYLIPPUS, a Lacedæmonian general, sent to assist Syracuse against the Athenians, B.C. 414. He was banished for embezzling the booty which he had obtained.

GYZEN, Peter, a landscape painter, disciple to John Breughel, born at Antwerp, about 1636. His views on the Rhine are much admired.
